84. In this ſucceeding Year, wherein Beliſarius was Conſul, he publiſhed twelve Novels, whereof the firſt ſoon after the coming out of the Code, on the Calends of January. It confirms the ſeverity of the old Laws, againſt ſuch Heirs and Legatees, as do not fulfill the Will of the Teſtatour, 'ordaining that ſuch ſhall re'ceive no benefit by a Teſtament, who ſo long defers to doe what therein he is or'dered, that he continues negligent an whole Year after a Judicial Condemnation. No other way was there to make good the Will of the Dead, and afterward he was a little more ſevere upon the Score of Religion, 'depriving one of the Right 'of Succeſſion, who being by a Magiſtrate once and again admoniſhed, did not pay 'Legacies given to pious Uſes, condemning him as to the Fruits and Intereſt, if he 'made not payment within ſix Months after the Teſtatour's death, whereas the Heir was wont to pay Fruits and Intereſt of old, for ordinary Legacies from the Conteſting of the Suit. 'But he excepts Parents and Children, ſo as they ſhall have their 'Legitimate ſhare which they ſhould have had by Law, or otherwiſe might have 'brought the Querela Inofficioſi Teſtamenti, though they contemn the Commands of 'the Teſtatour; this belonging to them, whether the Teſtatour will or not. By the ancient Law, called Lex Falcidia, ſuch Care was had of an Heir, that the fourth part he was inabled to retain of an Eſtate left by the Teſtatour, to be deducted if need were, out of Legacies and other burthens impoſed on him. 'Now Juſtinian was 'ſo favourable to Legatees that he indeavoured by this Novel, in a manner to remove 'and take away this Falcidian part, leaving it in the Power of the Teſtatour: If an 'Heir in ſuch a Caſe would not take to the Eſtate, he left it to others that were next 'concerned to doe it. If the Heir omitted to make an Inventary; to be ſure he ſhould have no benefit of this Law, or if he did it not in due form; and here he will not truſt a Tabularius, but all the Legatees, or three Witneſſes in the Room of them, muſt be called together. In Concluſion, if the Heir pay a whole Legacy to one of the Legatees, he ſhall be obliged to all the reſt, and have no benefit of this Law.

Will have Principal Debtours ſued before ſuch as are bound.

Nov. 4.

85. By another Novel he would have principal Creditours, to be ſued before Fidejuſſors, or ſuch as were bound with them, and this Conſtitution he gave out this ſame year, on the fourteenth before the Calends of April. Of theſe it ſhall ſuffice to have touched, for we muſt not give an Account of all his Novels, whereof ſeveral have been mentioned, and others nearly relate to the more private Part of the Jus Privatum, and belong to Law, and not to Hiſtory. Indeed ſome that concern the Jus Publicum, Hiſtory and the Conſtitution of the State its requiſite that we Examine, but firſt we ſhall mention at parting with theſe things, that concern private Law, one Novel which by no means is to be paſſed by: The reaſon is given by Baldwin. If there be any new Conſtitution which abrogates many old Laws, which overthrows the moſt ſubtile Myſtery of the ancient Doctrine, which delivers the Juriſprudentia from many Ambages and vain Circuitions, which not onely diſſolves, but cuts many of its Knots; in Concluſion, which as it were with one Stroke blots out many Pages of the Pandects, this is it. Juſtinian had formerly taken pains to Model aright this moſt Noble part of the Law, concerning the Legitimate Succeſſion to Perſons dying inteſtate. But now he perceived all was to no purpoſe, except he cut down with one blow, all that wood of the ancient Law, being too acute and preciſe, beſet with ſo many Thorns, and perplexed with ſo many Turnings and Windings; and that by reducing the whole matter to ſome one Form, ſimple, agreeable to Nature, and the Law of Nations. Great Conteſts had continued about this Buſineſs in the Roman Law, for one thouſand and three hundred Years, from the founding of the City, and Juſtinian had ſpent ſixteen in the Compoſing of them.

86. What a difference was made, and how great in the Roman world, betwixt Children in ones own power and Emancipated, betwixt Agnati and Cognati, from the Laws of the twelve Tables till this time for a thouſand years, what diſturbance

Sect. 2.

Novel. 118.

He cuts off Conteſts about ſucceeding to the Eſtate of an Inteſtate, By calling all Children to the Inheritance.

it made, and in what difficulties it involved the Juriſdiction, the Books of Law ſpeak aloud. ‘But now our Legiſlatour commanded it to ceaſe, in Legitimate Inheritances of the Inteſtate. To thoſe Inheritances in the firſt place, he ſimply and naturally calls the Children of the Deceaſed, whether they were in his power or not, and of whatſoever Degree or Sex. The Law of the twelve Tables firſt called onely Children, under the paternal power and ſuch as were in the firſt Degree. Yet the Prætor alſo admitted ſuch as were Emancipated, and at length the Senate commanded Sons to be the Legitimate Heirs of their Mothers, though a Woman had not her Children in her power. Therefore a neceſſity of Children being in power to become legitimate Heirs, was taken away many Ages before Juſtinian. And for the other point of the firſt Degree, Grandchildren were alſo admitted, but rather as Sons than Grandchildren, for they ſupplied the firſt Degree, and came to the Inheritance, rather as their Fathers than their Grandfathers, by way of Repreſentation. ‘Now Juſtinian ſeems not to have altered the Law in this point, for he always would have Grandchildren by two Sons not to ſucceed in Capita by Poll, but in Stirpes by way of Repreſentation. Though had he regarded Natural more than Civil reaſon, he would have judged in the opinion of Baldwin, that they ought rather to have ſucceeded in Capita, eſpecially there being onely Grandchildren. But he did not always with ſufficient acuteneſs ſee what was conſequent, the ſubtilty of the ancient Law being taken away. As for the Sex, there was of old alſo ſome difference betwixt Nephews and Neices. But he had aboliſhed it before.

If no ſuch, Parents.

87. ‘If there were no Children which are called Deſcendents, then in the ſecond place he called to the legitimate Inheritance Parents termed Aſcendents, that is, Father and Mother equally, or if there were no ſuch, thoſe above them, but ſo as he granted them Stirpes not Capita, that is one half to thoſe of the Father's ſide, and another half to them of the Mother's. Now here is no Succeſſion from Degree to Degree, it being contrary to nature that what ought to be in aſcending, ſhould be in deſcending. ‘Therefore doth the Mother exclude the Grandfather by the Father; for ſimply and naturally the next Degree in order of Aſcendents, is preferred by this Conſtitution. Now the old Law made a long Diſtinction as to the Father. As whether the Son dying Inteſtate, was in his power or Emancipated, whether he was Emancipated Contracta fiducia: and ſometimes the Father, by virtue of his paternal Power, ſeized the Goods of his Son as his own, and otherwhile became Heir as a Manumiſſour by right of Patronage. Hardly at length did the Senate admit the Mother to the Legitimate Inheritance of her Son. Of theſe things it's fit a remembrance ſhould be had by the Confeſſion of Baldwin, to make us more ſenſible of the natural ſimplicity of the new Law introduced by Juſtinian.

With whom he joyns Brothers and Siſters of the whole bloud.

88. ‘Our Legiſlatour together with Parents, admits and joins Brothers and Siſters of the whole bloud, and gives to each of them, as much as to each of the Parents. But here he hath reſpect to Capita rather than Stirpes, whereas he divided the Inheritance to Father and Mother by Stirpes, ſo the Acceſſion of Brothers and Siſters alters the Law of Aſcendents. And ſuch Brothers and Siſters as are admitted with Parents, are much more Heirs if no Parents be alive, and it is alſo to be ſuppoſed, that they are to be preferred before thoſe of half bloud onely. The ancient Law when it called Agnati, in the firſt place called thoſe by the Father's ſide, but thoſe by the Mother not at all, for the former ſort were Agnati, but the latter not. And becauſe it had reſpect to Agnation, not to Cognation, it provided for thoſe that were by the Father, onely as much as for Germans, or thoſe of whole bloud. ‘But Juſtinian takes notice of the Natural more than Civil Conjunction, and by this one Rule, cuts off infinite Diſtractions and Diſputations of the Ancients, and obliterates ſo many things in the Digeſts, that Baldwin tells us, his Relation would be without end if he ſhould reckon them up. ‘But, what he confers on Brothers and Siſters, he alſo gives to their Children, but not ſo fully and in ſolidum. When the old Law called the next Agnatus, or thoſe of the Father's ſide, to the Inheritance of the Inteſtate, it called not the Son of one Brother already Dead, together with another Brother, for the Brother being in the nearer Degree excluded the other Brother's Son. Neither did the Ancients grant the Succeſſion, which was given to a Grandſon, to ſucceed with his Uncle by the Father's ſide, to the Son of a Brother. They gave it to the Grandſon, becauſe though he was alone, yet otherwiſe he could not but be Heir. To the Son of a Brother they granted it not, becauſe by the Law he might from his Degree come to his Inheritance, if there was none nearer than he; but they thought it not Law to joyn him with a nearer,

Takes notice of Natural rather than Civil Relation.

as

Will have the Son of a Brother exclude Brothers of half bloud, as it were born out by a new Succeſſion. ‘ But our Legiſlatour liberally granted the ‘ ſucceſſion which they denied, ſo as the Son of a Brother German, ſhould exclude ‘ both the Brothers of half bloud, in right of his Father, into whoſe place and Degree ‘ he ſucceeded. But this is conſequent, that if there be ſeveral Sons of one Brother, who are admitted with a Brother German of the Deceaſed, the Inheritance ſhall be divided in Stirpes and not in Capita. Yet if onely Sons of two Brothers ſucceed without an Uncle, no reaſon there is, but that they ſucceed the old way, not in Stirpes, but in Capita or by Poll. ‘ The ſame thing was granted to Sons of Uncles, ‘ but not to a Grandſon of an Uncle, to have equal right with the Sons. Juſtinian ‘ prefers the Son of a Brother before an Uncle, becauſe in the order of De‘ſcendents, to whom an Inheritance naturally devolves before it returns to Aſcen‘dents, of which rank an Uncle is.

Gives the ſame privilege of the tenth degree to Cognati as Agnati.

89. As for thoſe who are called to a Succeſſion from a collateral or tranſverſe Line, that Succeſſion is to be meaſured by the privilege given to the former ſort. Juſtinian in his Inſtitutions ſaith, an Agnatus is to be admitted to an Inheritance, though he be in the tenth Degree. And the Prætor in caſe of Proximity, would promiſe poſſeſſion of an Eſtate, to thoſe alone who were in the ſixth Degree, and from the ſeventh to the Children of a Couſin by the Mother's ſide. Therefore Agnati were admitted at a greater diſtance than Cognati; but whereas Juſtinian took away the difference betwixt them as to Inheritances, he ſeems to have granted the ſame privilege to the Cognati, as formerly the Agnati had enjoyed. So that it may be preſumed, that ſuch as are removed no farther than the tenth Degree, may be called to an Inheritance; for Juſtinian eaſily would admit them before his Exchequer, having waved the concernment of the Caduca. But what difference was made by the Lombards, how they admitted Agnati in infinitum, and denied Aſcendents could be Heirs; and by ſuch as have from them imbraced the Feudatary way, is not proper at preſent to be inſiſted on; it being novelty to what we are now about. Afterwards he made another Novel Conſtitution, which is as an Appendix or Acceſſion to this, dated on the fifth before the Calends of December, in the ſeventh year after the Conſulſhip of Baſilius. He had formerly granted to the Sons of a Brother, that they might be Heirs with another Brother of the Deceaſed, by a certain Right of new Succeſſion; yet he had denied, that ſuch Sons of a Brother, could be admitted to inherit together with Parents. But muſing long, and much about it, at length he concluded it was not to be denied them, and for this purpoſe, he publiſhed his Hundred twenty and ſeventh Novel, which in this matter, ſhould correct and amplifie his Hundred and eighteenth. This Novel was publiſhed at Conſtantinople, the ſame time that Totilas King of the Goths, took and defaced Rome.

The Authenticum.

Novels how many.

De uſu & authoritate Juris Civilis, lib. 1. c. 4.

90. We think it not fit to ſay much more, concerning the Novels of Juſtinian, but give onely farther ſome few hints. For firſt, ſeveral of them have been ſpoken of already upon occaſion. Then many of them relate to Eccleſiaſtical matters, and ſo are not of our Cogniſance here. And then there is no order obſerved in the Diſpoſition of them, as is either in the Digeſt or the Code, but as occaſion was offered of any doubt wherein the Prince his Reſolution was neceſſary to every thing, ſo it is ſet down without any other method or form. The Body or collection of them is called the Authenticum, becauſe moſt of them being written in Greek by the Emperour, they were Tranſlated into Latin, and the Tranſlation was ſo good as to be counted Authentical, as alſo to diſtinguiſh them from the Authenticks, which are crept into the Code, and from the Epitome of Julian, which was often called a Book of Novels. Accurſius and the Doctours have commented and gloſſed onely on ninety eight as Dr. Duck tells us, but Julian in his Epitome, preſently after the Death of Juſtinian, publiſhed one hundred and twenty five. Holoander publiſhed an hundred ſixty five, and Cujacius added three. But we ought he ſaith to follow the opinion of Accurſius, and the common and received one of Interpreters, when we ſpeak of that Law, which is received and uſed amongſt Chriſtian Nations. However, in our lateſt Editions, we find one hundred ſixty eight, and thoſe illuſtrated by the Commentaries of the Learned Dionyſius Gothofredus and others.

The Latin Verſions.

91. The firſt Latin Verſion of the Novels, was that of Julian, the Anteceſſour, made not long after Juſtinian, which all Writers commend. The other which Accurſius and the Interpreters make uſe of, Alciate calls barbarous, but Cujacius commends its authority from Antiquity. It was made as Molinæus gueſſeth by an uncertain Authour, and one unskilfull in the Latin Tongue; but being received by all Nations, both in their Studies and Judicatories, it hath the Authority of Law; and if a Controverſie ariſe concerning the Text, recourſe is not always to be had to the Greek Fountain, becauſe Contius thinks, that this Tranſlation was made from a more perfect Copy than now we have. Therefore our lately mentioned Countreyman concludes, that ſuch Novels as are not by Cuſtome received, ought not to be admitted, which alſo is to be ſaid concerning the Novels of Leo the Emperour, ſirnamed Philoſophus. But we muſt farther add, that the whole Volume is diſtinguiſhed or divided into nine Collations, Conſtitutions or Sections, as the Novels into Chapters; that is, the Latine Volume is ſo divided, for the Greek Text acknowledgeth not this Diviſion into Collations. Some are general and concerned all, who had the like cauſe of Doubt; and ſome are private and concern onely the place or Perſon, for whom they were written, ſome belong to the Jus publicum, and others to the Jus privatum, theſe being far the greater number. In concluſion, we have been tedious upon this Subject of Juſtinian's Laws, and ſtill muſt add ſomething farther, and therefore it will be convenient to diſmiſs the Novels; eſpecially conſidering what is added at the bottom of the Titles of all the Collations by Gothofred or ſome other. What ever Dr. Duck writes, having reckoned them all up he adds, 'Therefore all conſent that there are an hundred 'and ſixty eight Novels of Juſtinian, neither more nor leſs. But Mathæus Monachus, 'in his Preface to the Collection of Greek Eccleſiaſtical Conſtitutions, plainly 'wrote, that Juſtinian made an hundred and ſeventy, from whence it appears that 'two are yet wanting, that I may omit, that moſt above related, are not the 'Conſtitutions of Juſtinian himſelf.

The nine Collations.

Twelve Edicts.

92. Still beſides theſe, we find added in the later Editions, twelve Edicts ſo called, or General Laws tranſlated into Latin by Henry Agylæus. Concerning them, the ſame is to be ſaid as of the Novels, in which ſome of them are included. They belong for the moſt part to the ordering of the Eaſtern Provinces, whoſe-ſoever they were. And now we ſuppoſe we have our whole Number, or all the Conſtitutions and Laws made by Juſtinian, if not more than all. Put them then altogether, and we have this Account. In his Code, there are of Eccleſiaſtical concernment which bear his Name, thirty and eight at the leaſt, and of ſuch as relate to Civil Affairs, three hundred thirty and five, as I have reckoned them. Add to theſe one hundred and ſeventy Novels, which Mathæus Monachus wrote that he publiſhed, two being wanting of the number, and twelve Edicts, and they make up five hundred and fifty five Conſtitutions made by him. Of theſe, ſuch as are in the Code are undoubtedly his, and therefore in ſhewing how he introduced new Law, they were to be made uſe of. And thus we have taken a ſufficient ſurvey what Juſtinian did, as to modelling the old, and bringing up new Law; we ſee that beſides his own Conſtitutions in the Digeſt, and in the Code, he has cauſed to be inſerted the opinions of the ancient Lawyers, and the Edicts of the Emperours his Predeceſſours. But here we find a loud Complaint made, and that not undeſervedly, that after the compiling of theſe his Books, the writings of the ancient Lawyers ſo full of Wiſedom and Learning were neglected, and indeed periſhed, little to purpoſe being left of them. And he is by many accuſed, together with his Tribonian, of burning or deſtroying all thoſe writings of the Ancients, and the Laws of the twelve Tables, that his own Collections might be of greater authority, and be the Standard of Law. O what ſighing and complaining there is amongſt learned Lawyers, that they want thoſe clearer lights and more infallible Guides.

Five hundred and fifty five Conſtitutions in all.

Some thought Juſtinian deſtroyed the writings of the ancient Lawyers,

93. But others are more kind and charitable to his memory, who rather think that theſe writings periſhed by misfortune, by the Calamity of the Times, and the Incurſions of the Barbarous Nations. For of the three Cities which were the Univerſities for Law, Berytus periſhed not long after Juſtinian by an Earthquake; Rome was often taken and waſted by the Goths, and other Barbarous People; and after many other Calamities, Conſtantinople at length became a prey to the Turks. Certainly after Juſtinian's Death, the whole Roman Empire was overwhelmed by the Goths and other Barbarians, with ſo many Calamities, ſuch Plunderings, Burnings and Deſolations happened, that they attribute it to the ſingular providence of Almighty God, that in the Pandects, by the indeavour of Juſtinian, ſuch remains of the ancient Lawyers were preſerved. And here it will not be amiſs, nor beſides our purpoſe to let the Reader know, what Reliques or Remainders there are left of the ancient Law before Juſtinian, which eſcaped the Envy, or the Iniquity of the Times. The firſt Foundation of the Law, were thoſe Ordinances made by the Kings of Rome, called Leges Regiæ. Theſe were collected into a Body by Sextus Papirius, and afterward Granius Flaccus wrote a Commentary upon them, but both Volumes have miſcarried. Yet fragments of them have been collected by Antonius Auguſtinus, Contius, Baldwin and others; that is of three of the Kings, viz. Romulus, Numa and Servius Tullius, which laſt as Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus writes, made fifty Laws concerning Contracts and Crimes, for no Footſteps are extant of any made by Tullus Hoſtilius, Ancus Martius, or Priſcus Tarquinius, and much leſs of Tarquinius Superbus who aboliſhed thoſe of Servius Tullius.

Others Vindicate him.

Remains of the Laws of three Kings of Rome.

Vide Notitiam Juris ante & poſt Juſtinianum Reliquiarum præmiſſam Pandectis.

Of the Laws of the twelve Tables.

Of other Laws.

Of Senatuſconſulta.

Orations of Princes.

Of the Edictum Perpetuum.

94. Of the Lawes of the twelve Tables, the ſecond Body of the Roman Juriſprudentia, fragments have been collected by many, every one uſing his own method therein. Of the ſeveral methods, that of Francis Pithæus is judged beſt by Jacobus Gothofredus, who himſelf hath made Obſervations concerning Errours committed, Omiſſions, Interpolations and matters foreign to the thing, hath reſtored the Fragments that remain into order, added the Hiſtory, Proofs, Notes and Gloſſaries in a work publiſhed at Geneva, in the year MDCLIII. All Laws afterwards enacted for the uſe of the People at Rome, at leaſt as much as in them lay, have been collected and catalogues of them exhibited by Ant. Auguſtinus, Zaſius, Mauntius, Hotoman and Charondas. Of theſe Laws ſome ſingular ones have been collected, and illuſtrated by Commentaries. As the Lex Velleia by Antonius Auguſtinus, the Lex Julia Majeſtatis by Contius, and the Lex Julia de Adulteriis by Briſſanius. Baldwin hath collected the Heads of the Lex Voconia Falcidia, Julia, Papia, Poppæa, Rhodia, Aquilia. Curatius, Jacobus Gothofredus, and others have done the ſame by other Laws of leſſer Note. As for Senatus Conſulta, Ant. Auguſtinus collected ſuch as concerned the Jus Privatum from Tiberius his time till that of Marcus. And Scipio Gentilis hath illuſtrated with ſingular Commentaries, Orations of Princes, which were wont to precede the Senatuſconſulta. The Edictum Perpetuum, the third and indeed the cheifeſt Body of the Roman Juriſprudentia, was indeavoured to be collected by Eguinartius Baro, but with a mixture of other things. A better and pure collection was made by Guil. Ranchinus, onely the Chapters of the Edict are not diſpoſed according to the true method, but that of Juſtinian's Law.

Fragments of ancient Lawyers remaining beſides thoſe in the Pandects.

As of Gaius.

Of Vlpiar.

Of an Anonymous Authour.

Of Paulus.

Of Modeſtinus.

95. Of the writings of the ancient Lawyers, fragments and pieces are put into the Pandects, under the ſeveral Titles of the ſeveral Subjects. And ſome, as Ant. Auguſtinus, have taken pains to unite thoſe pieces of the ſame Authours, and exhibite them together with ſome antecedents and conſequents of the ſame Chapter, ſo that thereby a ſhew is made of a Reſtitution of the Books of thoſe ancient Authours which periſhed. Some have illuſtrated with Commentaries thoſe particular Authours, or the particular Books mentioned to be written by them. And beſides theſe Fragments in the Pandects, ſome other Fragments out of them, have come to our Hands which it would be moſt uſefull to put into one Volume, and in part it hath been performed by Peter Pithæus. But particularly ſome Fragments of Gaius are remaining, which were collected by Anianus the Chancellour of the Gothick King, and mangled out of the four Books of his Inſtitutions; for ſo many he wrote: and other Fragments of his Inſtitutions might ſtill be added from the Pandects, the Authour of the Collation of the Moſaical Laws, Boetius, Priſcian and Diomedes. There are alſo ſome remains of the Labours of Vlpian, or twenty nine Titles, collected alſo by Anianus, and it's thought out of his Book or Body of Rules; and more Fragments ſtill might be added from the Collation of the Moſaick Laws, and Boetius upon the Topicks of Cicero. Beſides theſe there are ſome Fragments of an anonymous Writer, concerning the Species of Law and Manumiſſions. Moreover five Books of the received Sentences of Paulus, written to his Son, or rather pieces taken out of theſe Books by Anianus, the Collectours of the Pandects and others, but highly uſefull for the knowledge of ancient Law, and the underſtanding of that of Juſtinian. One Fragment alſo of Modeſtinus ſtill remains, taken out of his third, or rather his ninth Book, bearing title concerning the Goods of Liberti and Teſtaments.

Three Stemmata. A Conſultation. An Hiſtorical Narration.

A Collation of the Moſaick and Roman Laws.

96. Three ſeveral Stemmata are alſo extant, or ancient Deſcriptions of the Degrees of Agnation, according to which Inheritances deſcended. A Conſultation of an ancient Lawyer of the middle Age concerning Pacts. An Hiſtorico Juridical Narration, concerning the Confirmation of the Rhodian Laws by the Emperours, viz. Tiberius, Veſpaſian, Trajan, Adrian, Antoninus, Pertinax and Severus. A Collation of the Moſaick and Roman Laws, out the intire Books of the ancient Lawyers, Papinian, Paulus, Vlpian, Gaius, Modeſtinus and others; as alſo from the Gregorian, Hermogenian and Theodoſian Codes, and diſtinguiſhed into ſixteen Titles. From the Prefaces to the ſixth and ſeventh Titles, ſome collect that the Authour was no profeſſed Lawyer, but the Book is uſefull in that it ſhews, what liberty

Tribonian

Anſwers of Papian.

Juridical Notes.

Voluſius Mæcianus de Aſſe.

Other Writers.

The Notitia.

Remains of Conſtitutions.

Tribonian and his Collegues took in Hearing, Reading and Altering the writings of the ancient Lawyers, in that it contains many Fragments of old Writings, and Conſtitutions, no where elſe extant or not ſo fully; and ſhews how the Books of ancient Lawyers were divided into Titles, eſpecially in Title the fifteenth. A Book of Anſwers of Papian, is hither alſo to be reckoned, collected out of the Roman Lawyers and Laws, though it's thought he was a Burgundian, and did it for the ſervice of that Nation. Moreover Juridical Notes uſed in publick Monuments and Books of the Civil Law, before Juſtinian's Collection. Of theſe are publiſhed ſeveral Treatiſes of ancient Writers, Voluſius Mæcianus his Book alſo de Aſſe and the diſtribution of it, neceſſary for knowledge of Inſtitution of Heirs and many other things, and thought fit by Cujacius to be read before the Inſtitutions. To theſe it's thought fit to add ſuch as have written Books concerning Boundaries, (Finium regendorum,) as Siculus Flaccus, Frontinus and Aggenus Vrbicus: And the Notitia Dignitatum ſo often mentioned by us. Then in the laſt place as for Imperial Conſtitutions, there is a Collection of the ſhort Reſcripts of Hadrian left done by Goldaſtus. A Conſtitution of Gordian concerning Marriages contracted contrary to Order, and de Dote Caduca publiſhed by Cujacius. Some remains alſo there are of the old Imperial Conſtitutions, collected in the two Codes Gregorianus and Hermogenianus, to which ſeveral might be added out of divers Authours. Of the Theodoſian Code and the Novels, Theodoſius and other Emperours before Juſtinian, great mention has been made in our ſecond Part, and here we need to ſay nothing more concerning them.

The Riſque that Juſtinian's Law ran in the Eaſt.

Admired and received in the Weſt at this day.

97. If Juſtinian was guilty of deſtroying the Writings of theſe ancient Lawyers, he was juſtly puniſhed himſelf with a certain Lex Talionis. His Books continued in eſteem and uſe in the Schools and Forum for forty years, till Phocas the Emperour deſpiſed all Law and Equity. Afterward they were in a little uſe and eſteem two hundred years, but then Baſilius Macedo, out of Envy it's ſaid, did what he could to aboliſh them, and he and his two Sons, Leo and Conſtantinus Porphyrogenitus made new Collections, viz. an Epitome of Juſtinian's Code, and another large work called Baſilica, which continued to be the Standard of Law at Conſtantinople, till the end of that Empire; Juſtinian's Books being wholly neglected and forgotten. Yet out of his Books were the Baſilica Compoſed; and though the ſaid Books were not known in Italy, and the Weſtern parts, for five hundred years after his Death, yet by chance the Pandects were found at the taking of Amalfi in Italy, in the War betwixt Pope Innocent the ſecond, and Rogerius King of Sicily and Naples, about the year MCXXVII, ſince which time Juſtinian's Law has revived, flouriſhed, and continues to be indeed the general Law of Chriſtendom, one ſingle Kingdom excepted. Of the Errours committed by the Compilers enough has been ſaid; but withall a Neceſſity of reducing the Law into narrower bounds, than formerly it was hath been ſhewed. And conſidering the loſs of the Writings of the Ancients eſpecially, the World is happy that the Collection was made, for ſo it eſteems it ſelf in it, all Nations, as was ſaid, that are governed by Laws, imbracing them as the moſt exact form of that Nature.

98. We have now done with the Wars, and alſo the Laws of Juſtinian. And though from a Man's Actions ſo much in publick as theſe were, an indifferent Character might ſeem eaſie to be drawn; yet there is a Book which hath done it to our Hands, though the Pourtraiture be very ugly, and the work it ſelf very bad. But it is fathered upon no other Pencil than that of Procopius, whoſe Lines hitherto we have had reaſon to commend, and it is dreſſed and preſented to the World, with as much advantage as poſſible, by a very learned hand; we muſt not be partial, but muſt open and diſcover this peice, and then we muſt be ſo juſt withall, as to make Obſervations upon it, ſuch as it ſelf and other Writings ſhall ſuggeſt; to doe right as near as may be, to truth and Perſons.

SECT. III.

The Character of Juſtinian.

1. IN the firſt place, where the Writer takes him in hand, and conſiders him as the Heir Apparent of the Empire, in the days of his Uncle, he pronounces this concerning him, that at length he proved the Authour of ſo many and ſo great Miſcheifs, as never had been heard of in former Ages. That he was prone to invade the Rights and Poſſeſſions of other men, and ſo much to the ſlaughter of them, that he eſteemed it but a trifle to deſtroy many Myriads, which were not guilty of the leaſt offence. That he never would ſtick to any thing already determined, but ſtill thirſted after Novelty and Change, and the utter Deſtruction of whatſoever was excellently conſtituted. That with the Raging Peſtilence, we have formerly deſcribed, ſome men although very few were Infected, and others though ſeized with it, yet Conquered it's Malignity. But the ill influence of Juſtinian's Government, no Roman whatſoever but ſadly felt, who being ordained by Heaven for a common Scourge and Plague, none eſcaped him; ſome being wickedly Murthered, others conſtrained to lead a Life made miſerable by penury, to whom Death would have been a great kindneſs, and others deprived both of Fortune and Life together. He thought it not enough to deſtroy the Roman Empire, but would turn his Forces alſo upon Africk and Italy, that the Nations there Inhabiting, might alſo periſh with thoſe that were ſubject to his Command.

The Authour's general charge againſt Juſtinian.

In particular.

He cauſed to be ſlain Amantius and Vitalianus.

In the Factions favoured the Veneti in an extravagant manner.

2. On this fair Text as fairly he Comments by theſe particular inſtances, which amongſt others he heaps up againſt this Prince. Scarcely had he been in Power ten days, when Amantius cheif of the Eunuches, with others, he commanded to be killed, becauſe they had ſpoken ſomething ſawcily, concerning John the Biſhop of the City. Vitalianus the Tyrant he cauſed to be put to Death, notwithſtanding the publick Faith given for his Security, at the Celebration of the Sacred Myſteries. In the Faction of the Citizens he ſo far incouraged, or rather excited the Veneti to their ſeditious practices, that thereby the Roman Empire ſeemed to be ſhaken from its Baſis, and the Cities were made deſolate, as by the Invaſion of ſome Enemy, ſome terrible Earthquake, or a Contagious Sickneſs. Yet theſe horrible Diſorders did nothing ſo much perplex the minds of good People, as his Carriage in reference to ſuch a Miſcheif. For when men ſuffer never ſo much from violent or unjuſt Oppreſſours, yet ſtill they are comforted with the thoughts of Juſtice, which they expect from the Hands of Magiſtrates, and ſuch as ought to demean themſelves as maintainers of the Laws. But Juſtinian was ſo far from giving them any Redreſs, that he manifeſtly favoured both by word and deed thoſe Riotous Perſons, giving great gifts to ſome of them, and conferring upon others Offices of Magiſtracy, and places of Dignity. Therefore this Miſchief, like a Gangreen, ſpread over the whole Empire, not one City being free from the Factions of thoſe two Parties. And as for the Emperour, he never regarded how matters went, nor in the leaſt did ſuch things affect him, as were done under his own Eyes in the Circus. For he was unſpeakably dull and ſenſeleſs, moſt like to a ſlow and ſtupid Aſs, following which way ſoever he was drawn by the Bridle, and moving alſo his Ears when he liſted, as that and other Animals are wont to doe.

He exhauſts his Treaſure.

And is rapacious in recruiting it.

Like to Domitian.

He was a Fool,

But very cunning.

3. After he came to manage Affairs upon his own ſole Concernment; whereas it ſhould have behoved him to have ſpecial regard to his Treaſury, he as it were ſet himſelf by all means poſſible to exhauſt it. The Hunnes and other Barbarous Nations, by bribing them to quit the Territores of the Empire, he irritated and provoked to make more Incurſions; for after each Invaſion, they ſtill preſumed they ſhould not fare worſe than they had formerly done. Vaſt Sums he drowned in the Sea, thinking to give bounds unto that Element, and by great heaps of ſtones and Rubbiſh to oppoſe its natural force and motion. Yet the Eſtates of Private men he greedily devoured, objecting to ſome feigned Crimes, and pretending that others had freely bequeathed to him their Fortunes. Moſt that were guilty of Paricide and other heinous Offences, redeemed their Lives by all they were worth. Such as were at Law with their Neighbours, about any Lands or Poſſeſſions, and had no good Title, made it over, ſuch as it was, to the Emperour, whoſe Relation to it took away preſently all flaws. Here our Authour, though contrary to all method and order, cannot diſpence with a fancy come into his Head, but muſt needs compare our Emperour with Domitian. Firſt, as to the form and lineaments of his Body. For he was of a middle Stature, indifferently Fat, of a beautifull Countenance, though ſomething long Viſaged; his Complexion being Ruddy, after he had faſted two days together. Then as to his Diſpoſition, he was abſolutely[a] as ill Conditioned, and as apt to be deceived, being both a Knave and a Fool equally with the other. Yet though he lay expoſed to the tricks and artifices of other men, was he the greateſt diſſembler in the World, ſpeaking nothing but upon deſign, and his Heart and Tongue never agreeing. He was the moſt perfect in the Art of Diſſimulation that ever was man, covering his Deceit, hiding his Indigna-

[a] Ὃν δὴ μωροκακοήθη καλοῦσιν.

Indignation, and concealing his Reſolutions with the greateſt craft imaginable.

4. He could laugh or cry according to the preſent occaſion. His breach of Faith was not ſingle, but accompanied with violation of all ſacred Obligations. In his Friendſhip he was utterly uncertain, and in his Enmity inexorable. Gold and Bloud he equally thirſted after, with a kind of inſatiableneſs. Nothing did he more delight in than Contentions and Innovations. Eaſily was he perſwaded to whatſoever was naught, but to what was good could not be drawn by any motives. In deviſing and executing what was wicked, he was very ſubtile and dextrous; but the very Name of Honeſty he could not endure. Theſe and very many other vices abounded in him, above the proportion of humane Pravity; for Nature had as it were taken them by parcels from other men, and with them patched up his Diſpoſition. Accuſations he readily admitted, and as readily puniſhed. For he never heard a Cauſe thoroughly, but as ſoon as the Accuſer had done, immediately gave Judgment, and by his raſh decrees, ordered the Deſtruction of Places, the burning of Cities, and Plundring of Nations of whatſoever they had. All theſe things conſidered, our Hiſtorian doubts not to affirm, that if any one will well conſider what Miſcheifs formerly happened to the Romans, and compare them with the Calamities ſuffered under this Prince, he will find greater ſlaughter of men, to have been made by this one man, than in all ages which went before him put together. Then repeats he again, what he had formerly ſaid concerning his ſpoiling private Perſons of their Eſtates. And that he may finiſh all in a word, he aſſures us that this Emperour neither had any money himſelf, nor ſuffered his Subjects to have any; as if he did not ſo much deprive them of what they had out of Covetouſneſs, as envy at their proſperous Condition, for he exhauſted and made beggerly the whole Empire. Such was his Diſpoſition and temper, the pretended Procopius tells us, as near as he could reach it. Then he comes to his Wife, to deſcribe her Original and Education, and how in Conjunction with ſuch an Husband, ſhe utterly ruined the Roman State.

Subtile and dextrous in what was naught.

More Calamities under him than ever before him.

5. At Conſtantinople lived one Acacius, whoſe Calling and Employment it was to feed and look to the Beaſts which belonged to the Faction of the Praſini, and were wont to be baited on the Amphihteatre, being commonly from the Bears called Arctotrophus or Urſarius, as we uſe to ſay the Bearward. He dying in the time of Anaſtaſius left three Daughters, Comitona, Theodora and Anaſtaſia, whereof the Eldeſt was ſcarcely then ſeven years old. Their Mother married a ſecond Husband, but Aſterius Maſter of the Orcheſtra, who by virtue of his Office had the diſpoſal of the Place, ſold it to another, and ſo turned out the Mother, her Husband and Daughters. She being reduced to a great ſtrait, when ſhe ſaw the People flock thick to the Shews, put Garlands upon the Heads and Hands of her Daughters, thereby preſenting them as humble Supplicants. The Praſini rejected both them and their Petition; but the Veneti at that time wanting a Bearward, readily entertained them. Being thus provided of a Livelyhood, and very handſome, yet their Mother as they grew up, put each of them upon the Stage. Comitona the Eldeſt was accounted one of the eminenteſt Courtiſans of her time, on whom Theodora when young waited in Quality and Habit of a Servant, carrying after her on her Shoulders the folding Stool, on which ſhe was wont to ſit in the places where Company reſorted. But as ſoon as ſhe came to Womans Eſtate, ſhe alſo put her upon the Stage, and ſhe became preſently a Strumpet, ſuch as the Ancients called Planipedes, pretending neither to Muſick, Singing, nor Dancing, but proſtituting her ſelf to every one as ſhe had opportunity. After this ſhe Acted with the Mimicks or Clowns, all ſorts of Farſes, being ſo ready of her Tongue, that ſhe was preſently taken notice of, and of ſuch a demeanour, that ſhe more and more attracted the Eyes of the beholders. For ſhe was complaiſant throughout, not taking ill any word or geſture how obſcene ſoever; however men behaved themſelves to her, ſhe would ſet up a Laughter, and that was all.

The Original of Theodora his Wife.

A Comediante.

6. Therefore all ſober Perſons eſteemed her no better than a Plague-ſore, and whoſo ever met her in the morning, accounted it a ſign of ill luck. Afterward Hecebolius the Tyrian, Governour of * Pentapolis, carried her down into his Province as his Miſtreſs; but preſently taking ſome Conceit againſt her, he caſt her off again, and ſo to get Bread ſhe was conſtrained to proſtitute her ſelf as formerly. She firſt tried her Fortune at Alexandria, and thence paſſing through all the Eaſt, returned to Conſtantinople, where ſhe drove ſuch a trade, as no man ought to name who would have Almighty God his Friend; it's certain that the Devils ſo provided, that no place ſhould be free from her Impure practices, and ſo ſhe was born and bred as one that was to be the moſt famous of all Whores, of what Ages ſoever. Indeed the Miſtreſs to Hecebolius, who caſt her off.

* Eam intelligit quæ eſt in Ægypto & ab Alexandria decem dierum itinere diſtat. Alem.

Sect. 3.

the Authour of the Antiquity of the City of Conſtantinople writes, that Theodora, the Wife of Juſtinian, after her Return from Paphlagonia, lived in Embolus, where ſhe ſpun Wool for her living, and after ſhe came to be Empreſs, built a Church, which ſhe dedicated to St. Pantaleon. Now in this part of the City, called Embolus, as formerly on the Bank ſide in Southwark, and in the Lapell Street at Antwerp, lived the moſt common and pooreſt ſort of Strumpets; therefore is to be found in Pliny, Mulier Embolaria, concerning which the Criticks have waſted ſo much paper. For the word Emboli, in the plural number, ſignifies the ſame with Porticus in Latin, from the Fornices or Arches of which, Women being called Fornicariæ, and conſequently the word Fornication coming; ſo from the Porticus or Galleries themſelves, in Greek Emboli, thoſe Strumpets were alſo named Embolariæ.

* Ἔμβολοι præter alias ejus vocis acceptiones ſunt Porticus Heſychius Mileſius in πατρίοις Conſtantinum muros Byzantii protuliſſe ait uſque ad Τρωαδικὰς Ἐμβόλους, Porticus Troadenſes vocat Autor Antiquiſſimus Deſcriptionis urbis Conſtantinopolis. Alemann. ad pag. 42.

Juſtinian falls in love with her.

Being his Miſtreſs he makes her a Patritian.

7. But Theodora had not been very long at Conſtantinople, e'er Juſtinian fell moſt paſſionately in love with her. At firſt he converſed with her as his Miſtreſs, being promoted to the degree of a Patritian, and ſhe ſo far made uſe of her time, and his fondneſs, as to heap up a great deal of Wealth. Yet ſo long as Euphemia the Empreſs lived, who was otherwiſe indulgent enough to him, he never could obtain Licence to marry her; but ſhe dying, and Juſtin the Emperour, her Husband, doating, through the extremity of his Age; he who had all the power in his Hands, began to be feared on all ſides, and reſolved to improve his Intereſt and Opportunity to the accompliſhing of the Marriage. But there was a great rub in the way, which muſt neceſſarily be removed. This was an * ancient Law which forbad Men of Senatorian Rank to marry Strumpets, or any other of ſuch baſe or unlawfull Callings, which by a croſs Conſtitution he cauſed the Emperour, his Uncle, to repeal, which done, he married Theodora, and opened the way for other Perſons of Quality, to beſtow themſelves in ſuch unequal and diſparaging Matches. The Conſtitution is yet extant in the Code, but theſe four Letters J U S T, being prefixed to it in ancient Manuſcripts, gave occaſion of miſtake to learned men, who therefore have thought it made by Juſtinian, as the Title ſhews in the very laſt Edition. But there's no doubt but Juſtin was the Authour; for into the Code have crept ſeveral other falſe Inſcriptions, and Subſcriptions alſo, as Alemannus ſhews in many particulars. And there was another Conſtitution of Juſtinian, of the ſame ſubject, quite different from this, containing not onely more Chapters, but alſo ſome contrary matter, which though it be not now extant, yet is there the ſumm and ſubſtance of it in a Reſcript to the Biſhops, written to the ſame purpoſe. This Conſtitution of his Uncle, Juſtinian did not onely confirm, by this Edict, but ſeveral other Novels alſo. And this is obſervable, that as after ſeveral expreſs Laws about the Marriage of Senatours, (as the Julian, that of Conſtantine and of Martianus,) it was now firſt heard of in the Roman World, that they could marry with baſe Perſons; ſo in this Conſtitution of Juſtin, there is onely made mention of Stage-players, ſuch as Theodora was, although in that of Conſtantine, antiquated by it, ſeveral other * ſorts be expreſly mentioned.

Having made it lawfull,

* Reſcriptum Conſtantini ad Gregorium, C. de nat. lib. l. 1. Senat. & Valentiniani & Martiani ad Palladium, C. de Inceſt. & Motil. Nupt. l. 7.

C. de Nupt. l. 23.

Imp. Juſtinianus A. Demoſtheni P. P. C. lib. 5. tit. 4. l. 23.

Hæc celebris Conſtitutio quæ olim erat in quinto libro Cod. planè ab hac Juſtini diverſa, nam illa reſcripta fuit πρὸς τὰς πολιτικὰς ἀρχὰς, ad civiles Magiſtratus, hæc vero ad Demoſthenem, Deinde ad Matrimonia Scenicarum mulierum dotalia Inſtrumenta requiſivit in illa Juſtinianus, non autem Imperatoris Reſcriptum, in hac verò contra Juſtinus ſancivit. Hæc explicatiùs habes in Juſtiniani Reſcripto ad omnes Epiſcopos quod Græcè tibi exhibet ex vaticana Bibliotheca Alemannus in Not. ad Arcan. Hiſt. p. 4.

* Ancillæ, Libertæ, Scenicæ, Tabernariæ, Lenonum & Arenariorum Filiæ, quæque mercimoniis publicæ præfuerint. Alem.

He marries her.

8. Juſtinian and Theodora now married, began their Reign the third day before Eaſter, when it was not lawfull to ſalute or wiſh well to any Man. Indeed ſuch was the cuſtome then in the Church, that although in Celebration of Divine Service the Prieſt prayed for Peace, after the uſual manner, yet in memory of the Paſſion of our Saviour, they abſtained from the chearfull Kiſs of Peace, and from Salutation. The beginning of their Domination falling out on this day, the Authour accounts it an Omen of the Wars, Conſpiracies, Plagues, Prodigies and Earthquakes, which fell out in the Reign of Juſtinian, who having it in his Power to make his choice out of the moſt beautifull, moſt rich, and every other way moſt accompliſhed Women which the whole Roman Empire afforded, could fix no where but on one of the moſt vile and filthy Strumpets in the World, and prefer the Embraces of one defiled with many other Villanies, beſides the Murther of many abortive Infants, before the Bed of any chaſte and pure Virgin whatſoever. Yet was there not one man that opened his Mouth againſt ſo foul an Indignity, not a Senatour, not one Churchman; but ſuch as had formerly ſeen her act upon the Stage, now,

They act cunningly, and with deſign.

Vide Ectypum Imaginis illius dum adhuc vivebat, apud Alemann. ubi ſuprà, p. 47.

now, with Hands lift up, proteſted themſelves her Slaves and Vaſſals; and the Souldiers vowed, they would, for the ſake of Theodora, encounter with all Difficulties and Dangers. Indeed ſhe had a lovely Face, and was otherwiſe alſo very tempting; She was of little Stature, and had very quick and rowling Eyes. They acted all things with joynt conſent, though at firſt the World believed they were of contrary Inclinations; but this they counterfeited by agreement, the better to conceal and carry on their Deſigns. Sometimes he would take the part of the Veneti, and then ſhe would ſeem to be againſt them, and they would complain that they were diſreſpected by each other. In Law Suits, and matters of Controverſie, the one ſided with the Plaintiff, and the other with the Defendant, and to be ſure he that had the worſt Cauſe carried it, giving ever one half, or more, to gain the other. Many Perſons he pretended to favour, and ſuffered them to pill the Commonwealth at their pleaſure, whom ſhe muſt accuſe and proſecute, ſore againſt his Mind, as he pretended, who would ſeem to take their part, but in the end they muſt bleed out their Wealth into his Coffers. By theſe Arts they carried on their work with much eaſe, and eſtabliſhed their Tyranny, ſo as it was not to be ſhaken.

He abrogates the old, and introduceth new matters.

How he ſpent his ill gotten money.

Introduceth troubles about Religion.

9. Being come to the Adminiſtration of Affairs, after his Uncle's death he immediately ſet himſelf to overturn the whole frame and poſture of all things, as if he had put on the Imperial Enſigns for this very purpoſe. For, abrogating the ordinary forms of Laws, of Magiſtracy, and the Militia, he brought up new Models of his own Invention, without any ſhew of Reaſon, but that every thing might receive a mark from his Name; which alſo he beſtowed upon ſuch things as he could not find a pretence to alter. The vaſt Treaſures which he ſcraped out of the Ruines of numberleſs families, he either prodigally ſpent upon Barbarians, or conſumed in extravagant Buildings. Whereas the Romans had Peace one with another, he, impatient of Reſt, and thirſting after Bloud, ſet the Barbarians together by the Ears. He gave vaſt ſumms to the Captains of the Hunnes, to procure Peace and a good Underſtanding, as he ſaid; but they, like Beggars that had fared well at his door, cried Roſt-meat, and ſent their Neighbours to ſpeed as they had done, who entring, and waſting the Emperour's Dominions, conſtrained him to purchaſe Peace from them at the like rates. Hence came it to paſs that there was no end of War, but it was handed, as it were, from one to another, there never wanting Commanders amongſt Hunnes, Saracens, Sclavi, Perſians and other Barbarians, whoſe mouths were to be ſtopped as well as thoſe of others, and conſequently there was hardly a Mountain or Hole in the Roman territories free from Devaſtations, many Provinces having been five times, or oftner, waſted in his time. Vaſt Treaſures did he employ in purchaſing Peace from Choſroes, the Perſian King; but then again, without any reaſonable cauſe, he would break the League, by drawing into a Confederacy of Arms againſt him Alamundarus, the Hunnes, and other Aſſociates of that Crown. The Provinces being thus exhauſted, and no way repleniſhed, except by great Effuſion of Man's Bloud; that he might make the greater ſpoils, he involved them in farther troubles, upon the Account of Religion.

Severe againſt Sodomy.

77, & 141.

Anonym. in chron. apud Alem.

10. But having filled his Treaſury with Confiſcations upon this account, and procured the Deſtruction of more than an hundred thouſand Men; he fell upon ſuch as he ſuppoſed, or would take for granted, to be guilty of Sodomy. He proceeded againſt them by making a poſitive Law, ſaith our Authour, for that purpoſe; and indeed there are two ſeveral Conſtitutions of his extant, upon this ſubject, as Aleman obſerves, whereof one being made upon another occaſion, and the other bearing date of the eighteenth year after the Conſulſhip of Baſilius, there is no doubt but that which was made in the beginning of his Reign, as this Procopius hints, and as Theophanes plainly tells in his ſecond Year, hath miſcarried. The occaſion of the ſeverity uſed againſt this ſort of Offenders, Theophanes writes to have been given by two Biſhops, Eſaias of Rhodes, and Alexander of Diſpolis in Thrace, who being found guilty of this Crime, were put out of their places, and ſeverely puniſhed, having their Members cut off, and then being led through the City, with a Crier before them, making this Proclamation, All ye that are Biſhops, beware that ye diſhonour not your Reverend Dignity. Wherefore, ſaith he, the Emperour publiſhed ſevere Laws againſt thoſe libidinous Perſons, and many were puniſhed by virtue thereof. Theſe ſurely are they which this Procopius deteſteth as ſevere, and inflicting indecent puniſhment upon the Offenders. He mentions onely loſs of their Genitals, and then expoſing to open ſhame; but Cedrenus, and others, farther add, that ſome were tormented by ſharp Reeds, thruſt into their privy parts. At firſt, this Severity was not uſed towards all, but either ſuch as were of the Faction of the Praſini, or were reputed very rich, or were out of the Prince his favour. But herein appeared his Cruelty and Injuſtice, that when no body proſecuted, and upon the Teſtimony of one ſingle Witneſs, ſometimes a Boy, and ſometimes a Slave, who was compelled to appear againſt his Maſter, he would proceed to Sentence and Condemnation.

Againſt Aſtrology.

They ſpoil all the wealthy Senatours of their Eſtates.

11. Aſtrologers he could not endure, and upon this account roughly handled certain Magiſtrates, whoſe Employment it was to puniſh and prevent Roberies. Being ancient Men, ſober, and of good Repute, he cauſed them to be ſet on Camels, to be contumeliouſly carried through all the City, and laſhed on the Shoulders, for no other Crime but being skilfull in Aſtrology, and living in the City. For ſuch like Reaſons as this, a great multitude of men fled their Countrey, betaking themſelves not onely to the neighbouring Barbarians, but to the Nations at greateſt diſtance from the Roman World, and in moſt Cities you might have ſeen Strangers come from far to hide their Heads, as if their own Dwellings had been waſted by the Incurſions of ſome Enemy. All the wealthier ſort of Senatours, whether living at Conſtantinople, or other Cities, he outed of their Eſtates. There was one Zeno, Nephew of that Anthemius who was Emperour in the Weſt, and him they named Governour of Egypt by deſign. The Ship, appointed for his Tranſportation, being laded with his beſt Moveables, abundance of Money, and veſſels of Gold, ſet with pretious Stones of exceeding great value, the Emperour and his Wife perſuaded thoſe that were intruſted with the Treaſure, to convey it into a place appointed, and then to ſet fire to the Ship, which he muſt be made to believe periſhed by accident. And not long after Zeno dies ſuddenly, whereupon they ſeize on all his Eſtate, producing a certain Teſtament, which the World verily believed he forged. By virtue of the ſame trick they made themſelves Heirs to Tatianus, and others of eminenteſt note in the Senate. The Eſtates of ſome they invaded by counterfeit Letters, and by that means became Heirs to Dionyſius, that lived in Libanus, and to John the Son of Baſilius, the moſt eminent Man in Edeſſa, who, ſore againſt his mind, was, as we ſaid before, delivered as an Hoſtage to Choſroes. When he had once got him into his Hands, Choſroes pretended the Conditions were not performed on the Roman part, and refuſed to ſet him at liberty without Ranſome. This coming to the knowledge of his Grandmother, ſhe ſent away two thouſand pounds of Silver to redeem him, which being come to Daras, into the Emperour's Hands, he forbad any thing to be concluded with the Perſians, leſt, as he ſaid, the Wealth of the Romans ſhould inrich the Barbarians. It happens in the mean time, that John dies, and then does the Governour of Daras produce a Letter, whereby the Deceaſed made the Emperour Heir of all he had, and ſignified that to be his laſt Will and Pleaſure.

Vide Paragr. 133. hujus cap.

Make themſelves Heirs to many Perſons.

The Authour thought them to be Devils incarnate.

12. But it's hard to ſay, thus our Authour proceedeth, to how many Men they made themſelves Heirs. For before the Sedition of Nica happened, they made their choice here and there; but afterward they ſold the Goods of the Senatours by heaps, taking out of them what they thought fit, and appropriating to themſelves the beſt Lands; onely out of their abundant Mercy they left ſome parcels, moſt obnoxious to Taxes, to the right Owners, who tired with the exactions of the Collectours, and the Importunity of their Creditours, were weary of their miſerable Lives. Wherefore to me, and thoſe of my rank, ſaith this Authour, theſe two ſeemed neither Man, nor Woman, but ſome pernicious, incarnate Divels, ordained for a Plague to Mankind, conſulting how to deſtroy and root out all Nations upon the Face of the Earth, and, like Furies in humane Shape, vexing, diſturbing and tormenting the whole World. But he makes them worſe than Divels in reſpect of their wicked Tempers and Diſpoſitions. Many there have been in former Ages, ſaith he, whom either Nature or Occaſion have made very terrible to Mankind, who have been the ruine of Cities, Provinces, and ſome whole Countries; but none like theſe could ever turn upſide down the Frame of the whole World, to whoſe Councils Fortune always was ſubſervient, and ever at hand, for the deſtruction of Mortals; for at the ſame time ſuch deſolation was made by Earthquakes, Plagues and Inundations, that they ſeemed to have been procured by them, in ſome extraordinary way, beyond the limits and methods of humane Power. Indeed it's reported, he adds, that Juſtinian's Mother, by ſome of her moſt intimate Friends, has been heard to ſay, that he was neither the Son of Sabbatius, her Husband, nor of any other Man living, but that a certain Dæmon came and lay with her, whom ſhe onely felt, and could not ſee, by whoſe Incubation ſhe preſently conceived. Some alſo of his Chamber, watching by him, have ſeen in the night a certain Spectrum, or Dæmon, appear in his likeneſs.

Several Stories to that purpoſe of Juſtinian.

13. Another affirmed, that he had ſeen Juſtinian riſe haſtily from his Seat, (for he never ſate long) and as he walked, his Head ſuddenly was diſſolved into air, the trunk of his Body ſtill keeping in motion, and obſerving the accuſtomed methods of walking; which when he admired, and blamed his Eyes for ſo deceiving him, preſently his Head would return to his Body again. Another related how as he ſtood by Juſtinian, he ſaw his Face turned inſtantly into a ſhapeleſs piece of Fleſh, without the print of any Forehead or Eyes, and then again a reſemblance of a Face as ſpeedily returned. Our Authour tells you, he did not ſee theſe paſſages with his own Eyes, but writes thoſe things as were in great ſeriouſneſs affirmed to be true. Another Report went, that a certain devout Monk, perſuaded by ſome of his Brethren, came to Conſtantinople to plead the cauſe of the neighbouring Countries, which were very much burthened, contrary to all Law and Equity. Being eaſily admitted, when he came to the Threſhold he ſtill retired back again, which the Eunuch that brought him in, and other by-ſtanders, admiring, asked him ſeriouſly what the matter was, and why he went not forward, but he, like a mad Man, in ſilence returned to his Cell, where being importuned to tell the true Reaſon, he affirmed, that he ſaw the Prince of the Divels ſitting on a Throne, whom no Man could well deſire either to go or ſpeak to. And why may not this Man ſeem a Dæmon, who never did eat, or drink, or ſleep, to ſpeak on, but onely taſting of the meat ſet before him, preſently roſe from the Table, and ſpent the night in walking about the Court, being alſo deviliſhly inclined to the ſin of Leachery?

And Juſtinian ſcarcely did ever eat, drink or ſleep.

And was leacherous.

Stories alſo of Theodora.

14. As for Theodora, while ſhe was yet a Player, her Gallants reported, that Spirits were wont to ſpend a great part of the night in her company. As ſhe returned to Conſtantinople from Egypt and Africk, being much perplexed with the ill uſage ſhe had received from the Hands of Hecebolius, one Macedonia, a Woman of the ſame Profeſſion, comforted her, and bad her not deſpair of better fortune, which would be able to give her great Wealth, and make her a ſufficient compenſation for her preſent penury. To this ſhe anſwered, that as for Wealth ſhe was not at all ſolicitous, being the laſt night bidden in a dream to take no thought about it; for when ſhe was come to Conſtantinople, ſhe ſhould be preferred to the Bed of the Prince of the Dæmons, or Genii, and being by the power of Art once married to him, ſhould be inſtantly poſſeſſed of the greateſt Riches the World could afford. Theſe things were credibly reported, and believed by many. But Juſtinian, however otherwiſe qualified, yet carried himſelf with great gentleneſs and affability to all. No man was denied acceſs to his preſence, neither would he be offended with any Indecorum that happened, either in word or geſture. He never ſhewed any ſenſe or compaſſion at the Sufferings and Miſeries of his People, yet againſt ſuch as had offended him would he carry himſelf with that calmneſs and evenneſs of Temper, that with a pleaſant look, and a low voice, would he give order for the deſtruction of an infinite number of innocent Perſons, the devaſtation of Cities, and the ſetting of their Goods to ſale. But in caſe any one petitioned him in their behalf, or implored his Clemency and Compaſſion, then would he frown and ſwell, and pertinaciouſly adhere to his former Sentence. Such Churchmen as incroached upon their Neighbours, he would protect, eſteeming it a choice piece of Piety ſo to doe. When any ſuch Cauſes came before him, he thought himſelf obliged by Religion to give the Victory to ſuch as had got any thing into their hands, though never ſo unjuſtly, upon that account. Much of his ill-gotten Goods he gave to Churches, to cover his Crimes with a Veil of Piety, and that they might never any more return to the right Owners.

Yet Juſtinian was affable,

Except importuned to ſhew mercy.

Much of ill-gotten Goods he gave to Churches, and why.

Cruel upon the account of Religion.

15. By this prepoſterous ſort of Piety, he defiled himſelf with infinite Murthers. And he laboured with all his might, to bring all men to be of the ſame Opinion concerning Chriſt, under which Religious Pretext he deprived many of their Lives, not accounting that Murther, which was acted upon men of a contrary Judgment. He had a mind as light and unſtable as duſt in the Wind, eaſie to be drawn to any thing but Humanity, and from any thing but Covetous deſires. With flatteries he was much taken, whom he eaſily believed that he ſhould be taken up into the Air, Tribonian his Aſſeſſour earneſtly affirming that he was in great Fear, leſt for his ſingular Piety he ſhould ſuddenly be rapt up into Heaven. This piece of flattery or Jeer he firmly believed. If Theodora at any time found him averſe to any of her Propoſals, ſhe had nothing more to doe than to bait her Hook with hope of Profit, and ſhe might lead him whither ſhe pleaſed. Therefore did he make no difficulty at all, to enact and repeal Laws, if there were any Money to be got by it; neither would he hold the Judges to the meaning and intent of his Tribonian's flattery.

Nothing ſtable in Religion, or other matters in his time.

He was of a ſharp Wit, to put miſchief in Execution.

own Conſtitutions. In his time, there was no conſtant or firm Opinion concerning Almighty God; no Faith nor ſtable Law, Covenant or any thing elſe that was conſtant, Such of his Officers as were cruel in the Execution of his Orders he prized, and hated ſuch as ſhewed any Humanity, which cauſed ſome to make a ſhew of Naughtineſs, who otherwiſe were Vertuouſly inclined. He often abſtained from meat for two days together, eſpecially in the Holy Week, or that preceding Eaſter, drinking onely a little Water, eating a very few Herbs, and ſleeping the ſpace of an hour; the reſt of his time he ſpent in walking. Had he employed his Talent all this while in the Affairs of the Commonwealth, it would have been moſt happy under him; but uſing theſe natural Abilities, and improving his Watchings, Labours and Indeavours, to the diſquiet of his Subjects, eſpecially being of a moſt ſharp Wit, to invent and put Miſchief in Execution, the natural Parts and Endowments he had proved the Plague of the Commonwealth. There was no incouragement under him, for doing any buſineſs. Neither was there any Footſtep or ſhadow of Antiquity. But here ſaith the Writer of theſe Accuſations, leſt I ſhould be tedious, I will explain my meaning in a few things, and paſs over the greater part; how truly let the Reader judge.

All his Anſwers in point of Law, he himſelf dictated without his Quæſtor.

The Senate ſignified nothing.

16. In the firſt place he neither did any thing, nor cared for any thing which was becoming imperial Majeſty, accommodating himſelf to the Manners and Cuſtoms of the Barbarians in his Speech, Habit and Diſpoſition. The Anſwers which of Courſe he was to make in writing to any Conſultations, he did not commit to the Care and Diſcretion of the Quæſtor, as the Cuſtome was, but he himſelf for the moſt part ſpake and pronounced them, although he ſpake very bad Greek. Many Perſons therefore came and required Juſtice, but had no Judges, before whom they could proceed. The Secretaries, who of old time were intruſted to write things never ſo private, now would not he admit to any ſuch buſineſs; but diſpatched all himſelf, and dictated the very Judgments of the Magiſtrates of the Municipia, allowing to no Body the Liberty of declaring what was Law, but arrogating all things to himſelf, and deciding Cauſes upon hearing of one Party. Through this covetous humour of his, oftentimes it came to paſs, that he and the Senate made contrary Decrees concerning the ſame thing; although indeed the Senate now ſignified nothing at all, onely aſſembled of Courſe, becauſe it was an ancient Cuſtome ſo to doe, having no Power at all to doe Right or Juſtice to any man, but what the Emperour and Empreſs before reſolved, that ever paſſing and concluding. If any one doubted of his Cauſe, for a ſum of Money he could procure the Prince to antiquate all former Laws, and make a new Conſtitution for his very purpoſe. But if again it happened, that any could receive benefit from the abrogated Law, for the ſame Cauſe and Conſideration, he could recall it as it were from Baniſhment, Tanquam ex poſtliminio.

17. The Referendarii were hardly permitted to preſent Petitions according to the Nature of their employment, or to declare their Judgment concerning them, yet making uſe of the time, and of the diſpoſition of the Emperour, who was apt enough to be deceived, they put falſe Colours upon things, and Cheating him firſt, abuſed alſo their Clients by falſe Repreſentations, and ſqueezed out of them great ſums of Money. The Prætorian Guards in the Court, forced the Judges to give Sentence as they pleaſed; ſo that there was no Order, nor any certain Courſe or Government, every one acting what he liſted in deſpight of the Laws, and all things being deformed and broken, not ſo much as their Names intire and ſafe, ſo that the Commonwealth at this time reſembled a wanton Queen of Children. But the Emperour was perſuaded to this Trade of ſelling Juſtice by one Leo a Cilician, a man of inſatiable Avarice, and as great Flattery, by whom being inſtructed in the Myſtery he never after left it off; but Couzened as well the Plaintiff as the Defendant. To be ſure there was nothing to be obtained by Force of any Law, Promiſe, Bill, Stipulation or any Contract, but onely by Money given to Leo and Cæſar. Theodora, on the other hand, had a mind ſo prone to Cruelty, that ſhe ſeldom acted by direction of any one whomſoever; but with Pride and Violence, did whatever came into her Head. No Prayers, Petitions, or Intreaties could ever ſtop or allay her Fury. Not onely did ſhe retain, as her Husband did, Malice to the death of the Party, againſt whom ſhe had once conceived hatred, but trampled and inſulted upon their very Aſhes, the Children together with the Inheritance, receiving her Indignation and tranſmitting it to thoſe that came after them. Her Body ſhe had ſpecial Care of, though not ſo much as ſhe deſired. Early in the Morning ſhe entred her Bath, wherein having ſpent conſiderable time ſhe went to Breakfaſt, and thence to ſleep. At Dinner and Supper ſhe had all plenty and variety of Meats imaginable, imaginable. She ſlept both very long and often, and ſo uſing all manner of Intemperance, the ſmall time ſhe had to ſpare ſhe thought to be ſufficient for the Government of the Roman Empire.

Theodora Prodigiouſly Cruel.

No employment without her.

Hard of acceſs.

And inſufferably arrogant.

18. If any ſought for employment without addreſſing themſelves to her, they were ſure to be diſmiſſed with Diſgrace. Juſtinian was by Nature fit for ſpeedy diſpatch of buſineſs, both by reaſon of his Watchfulneſs, the readineſs of his Wit, and that eaſie acceſs to his Perſon which all men found. But the greateſt Nobles were forced to dance attendance, and could get hardly any admittance to the Empreſs, ſtanding by troops, like Slaves, in an hot and little Lobby, and glad ſtill to ſtand, leſt any miſchief ſhould come by their abſence. And they ſtood with their Necks and Shoulders erected, and their Faces bearing out, ſo to be ſeen by the Eunuchs which paſſed out. After many days waiting they were hardly admitted, and that one after another, and theſe but ſuch and ſuch neither. Being come into her preſence, they ſtood as aſtoniſhed, and preſently withdrew, having firſt worſhipped her, and kiſſed both her Feet, not daring ſo much as to ſpeak, much leſs to aſk any thing, except commanded ſo to doe; to ſo ſervile flattery was the Senate it ſelf degenerated, Theodora being ſovereign Lady of the Roman Empire, which now went wholly to wreck, partly through the incredible levity of the Tyrant himſelf, and partly by reaſon of her difficult humour, which put a ſtop to all buſineſs. Her manner was, if any, with whom ſhe was offended, were accuſed of the leaſt Crime, to lay heinous things to their charge, and then calling ſuch Judges as were fit for her purpoſe, to cauſe their Eſtates to be ſold, then to have them moſt cruelly laſhed, though they were deſcended from moſt noble Anceſtours, and after this preparative, either to be baniſhed, or put to death. On the contrary, if ſuch as ſhe favoured were guilty of Murther, or any other heinous Crime, ſhe would ſometimes pleaſantly, ſometimes with indignation, divert their Adverſaries from farther proſecution. Such matters as were moſt grave, and of the deepeſt conſequence, ſhe would turn into ridicule, with laughter and a jeſt, as if ſhe had ſtill thought her ſelf to be upon the Stage.

19. A certain Patritian there was, both deſerving reſpect for his Age, and the long time he had been employed in Offices of Magiſtracy. This Man (our Authour tells us he is obliged to conceal his name, leſt ſo great an affront ſhould be tranſmitted to Poſterity) having a Debtour who was a great Confident of Theodora's, and had been often ſolicited in vain to pay him his Money, he was reſolved now to proſecute him, and came to the Empreſs to beg the favour, that he might be indifferently dealt withall, and as the merits of his Cauſe might require. Theodora having warning of his coming, commanded her Eunuchs to compaſs him about, to have an Eye upon her ſelf, and to echo out a Song, or company of Verſes, which ſhe would ſing. The Patritian introduced, as the manner was, caſt himſelf at her Feet, and being ready to weep, told her, that the caſe of a Patritian, who wanted Money, was very hard, becauſe that thing which to other Men procured pity and compaſſion, to Perſons of his Rank brought Diſgrace and Miſery. For if a Man of inferiour condition were in debt, he might but reveal his caſe, and he had ſome relief; but a Patritian, though he could not pay his debts, yet to confeſs ſo much, was a ſhame, if he did confeſs it, no body would believe him, it being thought impoſſible that any Patritian ſhould fall into Poverty, and if ſo be that credit ſhould be given him, he were ruined in his Fame and Dignity for ever. Now truly, Madam, ſaith he, I am both in debt, and have others indebted to me; I do not defraud my Creditours, which would tend to the diſparagement of Men of my Quality, yet others indeavour to defraud me; wherefore I humbly intreat you would aſſiſt me in ſo juſt a Cauſe, and deliver me out of my preſent troubles.

20. He making this his Complaint, Theodora ſung the word Patritian, and then the Chorus of Eunuchs added, Thou art troubled with a Tumour or Hernia. He continued ſtill his Complaints, and ſhe perſevered in the ſame Tune; the Eunuchs keeping time as formerly, wherewith being much troubled he got him home, having according to the Cuſtome done his Obeiſance to the inſulting Empreſs. The greater part of the Year ſhe paſſed in the Emperour's Houſes, ſituate near the City, and upon the Sea; but eſpecially in that called Heræum, to the great damage of her Attendants, who following her thither in great multitudes were ſtraitned of Proviſions, and expoſed to the Inconveniences of paſſing by Water, of Tempeſts and the Whale or Porphyrion, formerly mentioned. Here it will not be amiſs, to let the Reader know, that the Emperours had ſeveral Houſes of Pleaſure near Conſtantinople; as the Hebdomum, or Septimum, ſeven miles diſtant, and not the ſeventh Region of the City, as ſome have imagined. Beſides this, there were others which received their Names from their diſtance to Conſtantinople, Broia, Pegæ, or Fountains, firſt beautified by Juſtinian, as the certain Procopius writes in another Work. Then Eria or Sepulchres, where the Citizens were of old time wont to be buried, for ſo Cedrenus and Suidas write; but Procopius chuſes rather to call the Place by its old Name Heræum, which it received from the Chapel of Juno there ſtanding. This place, which Juſtinian and Theodora choſe for their Retirement, was ſo well furniſhed with every thing tending to Neatneſs and Pleaſure, that ſeveral Poets, as Agathias (the Hiſtorian alſo) and Paul the Silentiary conceived it a fit object of their Wit. But beſides, Juſtinian and Theodora, in their firſt Years were wont for their Pleaſure to paſs the time at Chalcedon, as appears by ſeveral Reſcripts. And once for the recovery of her Health, ſhe went as far as to the Baths of the Pythii; wherever ſhe went or ſtaid, carrying with her a mind implacable towards thoſe, againſt whom ſhe had conceived any Diſpleaſure, or apprehended the leaſt cauſe of Jealouſie.

The Emperour's Houſes near Conſtantinople.

Aleman.

Ἠρία Sepulchra.

Ἡραῖον in quo Ἥρας. id eſt Junonis Templum olim fuerat. Alii vocârunt ἱερεῖον & ἱερεῖα. Vide Alem.

Anthol. l. 4. Vide Alem.

21. After that Amalaſuntha, as Procopius declares in other Books, had reſolved to quit the Government of the Goths, and thought of ſpending her days at Conſtantinople, Theodora preſently began to bethink her ſelf, that ſhe might poſſibly have ſuch a Rival, as by the Nobility of her Birth, her Royal Dignity, her ſingular Beauty, and ſharpneſs of Wit, might ſo work upon the Levity and Inconſtancy of her Husband's humour, as to bring her no ſmall Diſpleaſure, and therefore reſolved to prevent her Journey, by ſending her farther off, to another World. She perſuaded Juſtinian to ſend Peter to her, with ſuch a Meſſage as we formerly mentioned; but having picked him out for the purpoſe, ſecretly injoyned him to make her away, promiſing him great matters if he did it ſpeedily. He overcome with her Temptations paſſed into Italy, and by reaſons unknown to others, perſuaded Theodatus to put her to Death, and was rewarded with the Office of Magiſter, wherewith he received great Power, but with it the Indignation and Hatred of all the World. This Office was that of Magiſter divinorum Officiorum, as appears from two Novel Conſtitutions, directed to him under that Title. He was born at Theſſalonica in Illyrium, was one of the ordinary Advocates of Conſtantinople, being a Man of ſingular Prudence, powerfull Eloquence, and excellent Temper, but exceſſively Covetous. After his return from Italy, and his Preferment, he was ſent Ambaſſadour to Choſroes. He wrote a Book De Republica and an Hiſtory, the Fragments whereof Alemannus ſaw in the Vatican Library. His Son Theodorus, called Contocheres, becauſe one of his hands was ſhorter than the other, was accuſed of Treaſon in the thirty fourth year of Juſtinian.

Theodora procures Amalaſuntha to be murther'd.

Καὶ ὑπ' αὐτοῦ ἔστε πὶ τὸ τοῦ μαγιστράτου ἀξίωμα ἦλθε.

Nov. 123. 127. Petro Glorioſiſſimo Magiſtro Divinorum Officiorum.

Vide Procop. de bello Goth. l. 1. Caſſiod. var. lib. 10. ep. 19. & l. 23. ep. 22. Suidam in voce πέτρος & εὐβειδής. Κοντοχέρης. De his omnibus vide Alem.

22. There was one Priſcus Secretary to Juſtinian for his Letters, a Paphlagonian born, and of an Humour very well ſuiting with his Maſter's Temper, whom he much loved, and doubted not but he was beloved by him again, and by his Favour arrived at great Wealth. But Theodora not brooking his high and ſlighting demeanour, accuſed him of we know not what to her Husband, which for the preſent did not take; but not long after, ſhe makes him be carried aboard a Ship, and whither ſhe was pleaſed to order, there to be ſhaven, and ſore againſt his mind to be made Prieſt. Juſtinian in the mean time taking no notice of it, nor, as if he had been ſeized with a Lethargy, ever asking what was become of him, onely he ſo far remembred himſelf as to ſeize on that ſmall Eſtate which was left him. Theophanes, Alemannus tells, in Confirmation of this ſtory writes (and it ſeems he had it not from Procopius) that Priſcus was made Deacon of Cyzicum. And the Reader muſt know (what otherwiſe the Courſe of this Hiſtory will teach him) that it was an ordinary Practice of the Eaſtern Emperours, to cauſe ſuch as to whom they would ſtop all Acceſs to Worldly Honours, to enter into Orders though quite contrary to their Inclinations. Theodoſius Junior is the firſt that's known to have begun this no-way laudable Cuſtome, compelling Cyrus the Præfectus Prætorio, of whom he had conceived ſome Jealouſie, to be Biſhop of Smyrna. But after the later Greek Emperours, there were few that did not Practiſe it toward their Friends, Relations or others. But to purſue the ſtory; there was one Areobindus a Barbarian born, but very beautifull, and of Theodora's Ward-robe, againſt whom, though ſhe was to be thought to be paſſionately in Love with him, ſhe conceived a deep Diſpleaſure. Having firſt cauſed him to be cruelly Whipt, ſhe afterward ſo diſpoſed of him, as no body ever knew where he was. For whatſoever ſhe would have kept ſecret, ſhe ſo terrified her Inſtruments that they never blabbed it out, being herein more ſucceſsfull, than ever was any Tyrant living; on the contrary, ſhe had ſo many, and ſo faithfull Spies abroad, that nothing could be ſaid or done by her Adverſaries that came not to her knowledge.

Cauſes Priſcus a Secretary to be ſhaven and made Prieſt.

An ill Cuſtome of the Emperours, to ſhave ſuch as they would not have preferred.

Alem.

Theodora conveyed away Perſons, ſo as they were never heard of.

Whom ſhe had a mind to puniſh without the Worlds taking notice, ſhe would ſend for him if he were a Patritian, and ſhe alone would deliver him into the hands of her Officer, who ſhould in the dead of the Night cover his Head, bind him faſt and carrying him aboard, Tranſport him ſome whither into the utmoſt bounds of the Roman World, where he ſhould languiſh till either her hard Heart relented, or Death made an end of him, and his Miſery both together.

Her horrible Cruelty againſt Baſianus.

23. Baſianus a young Nobleman, of the Faction of the Praſini, had ſpoken ſome Words of the Empreſs; and underſtanding ſhe would be even with him, betook himſelf to the Church of St. Michael. She bade the Prætor pull him out thence, and accuſe him not of Contumelious Language againſt her Perſon, but of Sodomitical Practices. The young man was taken out of the Church by the Magiſtrate, and cruelly tortured. The multitude at the ſight of his tender and beautifull Body made Exclamations, and required he might be diſmiſſed; but this cruel Woman perſiſted in her Reſolution, and cauſing his Privities to be cut off, deſtroyed him unheard and uncondemned, and then was his Eſtate confiſcate to the publick Treaſury. For if ſhe was in a rage and ſet upon it, neither the Sanctuaries, nor Laws, nor the Prayers and Intreaties of the whole City could appeaſe her, nor reſcue that which ſhe had appointed to Deſtruction. This farther appeared in the Caſe of Diogenes, a man well beloved and favoured by Cæſar himſelf, as addicted to the Faction of the Praſini. But concerning a Diſpleaſure againſt him, ſhe laid the Crime of Sodomy to his Charge, and endeavoured to ſuborn two of his own Slaves, both as Accuſers and Witneſſes againſt him. But this device not taking, by reaſon that the Dignity of the man required, that many and eminent Judges appeared upon the Bench, and the Teſtimony of the Slaves was rendred invalid, for want of Competency of Age, ſhe got one Theodorus into her Clutches, a familiar acquaintance of Diogenes, and him ſhe attacked both by fair Words and Tortures. For, perceiving ſhe could make nothing of it, ſhe cauſed a Leather Thong to be tyed about him, from the Forehead to the Ears, and to be twitched ſo ſtrait together, till ſhe hoped his Eyes would guſh out of his Head, yet would not he lye for the matter, and the Judges diſmiſſed the Cauſe, which had no matter of Proof, to the great Satiſfaction of the People, which highly applauded them. What this Woman Practiſed againſt Beliſarius, Photius, and Buzes has been already ſhewn. Callinicus Prefect of the ſecond Cilicia, for putting to Death two of that Countrey, who being of the Faction of the Veneti had attempted his Death, and killed his Servant, ſhe cauſed to be Crucified at their Graves. The Emperour upon the News ſhed Crocodiles tears, grunted in his Palace, and threatned the Executioners; but ſo far received Comfort, as to ſeize on the Eſtate of the deceaſed. Euagrius makes mention of this Act of Cruelty, and ſays farther, that the Names of the men were Paulus and Feſtinus; whence it appears, that he had not the particulars out of the ſecret Hiſtory, as Hubertus Giphanius did imagine.

Againſt Diogenes.

Againſt Callinicus.

Lib. 4. c. 31. Alem.

She puniſheth Strumpets.

24. Farther, Theodora as if ſhe intended thereby to hide the filthineſs of her former Age, ſet her ſelf to puniſh all ſuch Women, as proſtituted their Bodies. Five hundred common Strumpets or thereabout ſhe ſent by Troops beyond the Boſphorus, and ſhut them up in a Monaſtery, compelling them to lead ſtrict and ſevere Lives, which ſome of them not able to bear caſt themſelves down Headlong in the Night. Two young Widows of the very chief Nobility, pretending they lived incontinently, ſhe compelled to take Husbands out of the very dregs of the People, ſuch as they could not but abominate, though they were of her chuſing. They aware of her purpoſe, fled to the Church of St. Sophia, hid themſelves in the Baptiſterium and graſped about the Font: But no Sanctuary was ſo Sacred as to be inviolable, where her Paſſions were ingaged. Their Mother to her great Grief was preſent at the Nuptials, and Theodora (though it was a wonder) at laſt deteſted what ſhe had done, and to make them ſome amends got Preferment for both their Husbands. But this proved no Satiſfaction to them, their Husbands raging with intolerable Cruelty, againſt thoſe that were under their Juriſdiction, as I ſhall hereafter declare ſaith our Authour; for as for Theodora, ſhe had neither Reſpect to Magiſtracy, Commonwealth, nor any Office in the State whatſoever, not caring how things went, ſo ſhe could but have her Will and fulfill her Humour.

Nomen Monaſterio fuit Μετάνοια ſive Pœnitentia in quo fœminæ degerent quas anteactæ vitæ pœnituiſſet. Procopius, lib. 1. Ædif. fuſè hoc proſequitur laudátq; Juſtiniani & Theodoræ pietatem, ut notat Alem.

Whilſt ſhe was a Strumpet, had a Son named John.

25. Another thing there was, which happened to her whilſt ſhe was yet a Player, and muſt not be forgotten. She proved with Child by one of her Lovers, and as her Cuſtome was endeavoured all manner of ways to procure Abortion; but nothing would doe. Her Gallant perceiving her to be much troubled, that being big ſhe could not follow her whoriſh Trade as formerly, took all care poſſible that ſhe ſhould not miſcarry, and at laſt ſhe was brought to Bed of a Boy; which naming ming John, he carried with him into Arabia. Being at the point of Death, he opened to his Son now grown up, the whole matter concerning his Mother, who having buried his Father comes up to Conſtantinople; where he tells the ſtory to her Servants, that he might get Admiſſion. They thinking no harm, and rather with joy told her, her Son John was come. She fearing the Report might reach her Husband, ſent for him in, and delivered him into the hands of one of her Domeſticks, whom ſhe was wont to employ on ſuch like Errands, who ſo diſpoſed of him, that the wretched Youth was never after heard of, nor no man ever ſaw him ſince her Death. At this time the manners of almoſt all Women were corrupted, with all Impunity and Liberty injuring their Husbands; for when they were accuſed of Adultery, by her means they eſcaped, and their Husbands as a puniſhment of falſe Accuſation were condemned to give them double Dower; ſome were ignominiouſly Whipped, and others impriſoned, and then again ſaw their Beds defiled, by ſuch as were rewarded with Dignities and Employments for ſo doing. For this reaſon moſt Husbands diſſembled the diſhoneſty of the Wives, and leſt they ſhould be diſcovered, gave them all opportunities of playing the Whore.

Ὁρῶν δὲ αὐτὴν ὁ τοῦ τεχθέντος πατὴρ ἀπορουμένην, &c. Alemannus τεχθέντος πατὴρ vertit maritus malè.

Whom ſhe ſent away ſo as he was never heard of, and why.

Women Generally corrupted.

26. All matters concerning Marriage, ſhe would have wholly in her Power. The Caſe of Romans was now worſe than that of the very worſt Barbarians, who married according to their own Inclinations; but here it was not, who liked her or him, but whom Theodora pleaſed to put together. Often did ſhe take away the Bridegroom out of the Arms, if not out of the Bed of the Bride, denying with Choler, that ſhe ever gave her Conſent to the Match. One Saturninus ſhe thus uſed, and compelled him to marry the Daughter of one Chryſomalla, who had been once a publick Dancer and then a common Strumpet; yet together with Indara, another of the ſame Profeſſion, was now taken from the Stage, and the Stews, into the Court to ſit at the Helm of the Commonwealth. But Saturninus found his new Wife corrupted, and told a Friend that he perceived he had not married a Maid, which coming to the Ears of Theodora, ſhe commanded her Servants to take him up as they uſe to do Boys at School, and Whip him ſoundly for his Tatling, ſhe looking on and as he received the ſtrokes, bidding him beware next time, and learn to keep a good Tongue in his Head. How ſhe puniſhed John the Cappadocian, we have ſaid, ſaith this Procopius in other Books; ſhe did not herein deſire to revenge the Part of the Commonwealth upon him, but onely gratified her private Malice; for the Truth was, he feared not to accuſe her to Cæſar, and almoſt had brought her out of his Favour. Now the ſtory of her revenge we muſt here relate out of the firſt Book of Procopius, concerning the Perſian War; having purpoſely hitherto omitted it, and referred it to this as a more proper place.

The diſpoſers wholly of Marriages.

And ordereth Saturninus.

She hated John the Prefect, and Why.

27. The Empreſs of all men living hated this John for Plotting againſt her, and accuſing her to Juſtinian; and deſired to kill him, but could not, the Emperour ſo much eſteemed him. He knowing her mind, was deadly afraid, ſuſpecting every Night to be murthered by ſome Barbarian in his Bed, ſo that he could not ſleep; but was ſtill peeping out, and ſearching the Entries, though he had about him ſome Thouſands of Lanciers and Targetiers, a thing never uſed by any Prefect. But no ſooner was it day, but again forgetting all fear, both of God and Man, he became a Plague to all Romans, frequented Sorcerers, and harkned after impious Southſayings, vainly foretelling to him the imperial Dignity. Of his wicked Courſe of Life, he bated nothing, nor was God in all his Thoughts. If he went to Church, or watched all Night, he obſerved not the Chriſtian Rites; but having on a courſe Garment like a Heathen Prieſt, mumbled all the Night ſome ungodly Spells, to captivate more the Emperour's mind, and to preſerve himſelf from miſchief. To Beliſarius he was very harſh, and ſtill Plotted againſt him, becauſe of all men he was moſt Renowned, and he himſelf by all men hated; but Beliſarius being to goe for Perſia, left his Wife Antonina behind him at Conſtantinople, where being the ableſt Woman alive to Effect, and bring about hard things, to gratifie the Empreſs ſhe had this Device. John had a Daughter, his onely Child, named Euphemia, very modeſt, but young, and ſo eaſily caught. Her having by much Soothing, gained to her lure, and having her on a time above in her Chamber, ſhe feigned to lament to her, her own Fortune; ſaying, that Beliſarius found the Emperour ungratefull, and in other things accuſing the Government as unjuſt.

Though a wicked man.

28. Euphemia over-joyed at her Diſcourſe, as troubled with the Government and fear of the Empreſs, told her that they (meaning her Husband and her) were the Cauſes; who having the Power in their hands, would not uſe it. Antonina replied, that they were not able to ſtir in the Camp, if ſome in the Court concurred not in the Action, but told her that if her Father would, they might eaſily effect the matter. Euphemia promiſed the thing ſhould be done, and departing related the matter to her Father; who pleaſed with it, and conceiving it led the way to the fulfilling of his Prophecies, and the Empire, without any pauſing upon it conſented, willing his Daughter to treat for a meeting the next day, that he might give her his Oath. Antonina deſirous to prevent his Suſpicion, ſaid that to give him a meeting now would cauſe a Jealouſie, and hinder all; but ſhe being to follow Beliſarius, when ſhe had left Conſtantinople and was in her Houſe in the Suburbs, thither he might come to take leave and bring her on her way, where they might confer, and both give an Oath and take it. The Night before ſhe was to begin her Journey he came accordingly, and the Emperour being informed by his Wife of his Attempts to uſurp, ſent thither Narſes the Eunuch, and Marcellus, who commanded the Palatine Guards, with many Souldiers, and direction, to ſearch out the buſineſs, and if they found John in any Plot to kill him, and ſo return. It was reported, that the Emperour advertiſed of this Courſe of proceeding, ſent to John that he ſhould not meet with Antonina ſecretly, but he neglected the Advice, it being his fate to be ruined; and about Midnight met Antonina under an Hedge, behind which ſhe had placed Narſes and Marcellus, to hear what was ſaid. There did he in plain Words conſent to the Conſpiracy, and confirmed it with moſt terrible Oaths.

He aims at the Sovereignty.

29. Then did Narſes and Marcellus break in upon him, but at the Noiſe, John's Lanciers came preſently in, and he eſcaped and ran to the City. If he had had the Heart to repair preſently to the Emperour, Procopius verily believes he had received no harm, but by taking Sanctuary in a Church, he gave full ſcope to the Empreſs to advance her Deſign againſt him. Therefore of a Prefect he was made a private man, and being removed out of that to another Church, ſtanding in a Suburb of Cyzicum called Artace, was compelled to enter into the Orders of Prieſthood, and named himſelf Peter. Yet did he not execute the Function of a Prieſt, leſt it ſhould hinder his promotion to greater Offices, being unwilling to quit his hopes. His Eſtate was Confiſcated, but the Emperour remitted much of it, and was ſtill inclined to ſpare him. And he had opportunity to uſe his pleaſures without Controll, and with moderation to eſteem his Eſtate happy, at which all men repined, that being the wickedeſt Devil in the world, he ſhould thus live happier than he did before. But God would not ſuffer his puniſhment to reſt here, but prepared this greater ſcourge for him. Euſebius Biſhop of Cyzicum was as harſh a man as John himſelf, and was accuſed to the Emperour by the Citizens, but having the better of it, ſome young men way-laid, and killed him in the Forum. John having great differences with this Euſebius, was ſuſpected to be guilty of the Fact, and ſome Senatours being ſent to inquire into it, put him in the common Priſon, and ſtript him naked like a common Thief, who had been ſo powerfull a Prefect, inrolled amongſt the Patritians, and had ſate in the Conſuls Chair, than which dignity none was greater in the Roman State. Tearing his Back with many ſtripes, they forced him to reveal his own Life, of the guilt of the Murther there was no great argument, but the Juſtice of God made him ſuffer for abuſing the whole world. Depriving him of all he had, they put him into a Ship naked, ſave that he had on one courſe Coat that coſt not much. Thoſe that had the charge of him, whereſoever the Ship put in, made him beg his Bread, and ſmall monies for his ſubſiſtence; and ſo begging all the way, was he brought to Antinoë in Ægypt, where in all this Affliction he quitted not his hope of the Empire, but fell to accuſe ſome Alexandrians, for Arrears to the Treaſury. Thus much writes Procopius concerning this John, in the firſt Book of his Perſian Hiſtory. In the Secret we are told farther as to Theodora, that though ſhe had thus got him into Ægypt, yet would ſhe never make an end of perſecuting him, nor of ſuborning witneſſes for that purpoſe. In the fourth year after his Baniſhment, ſhe got into her power two young men of Cyzicum, of the Faction of the Praſini, and thought to be of their Number that killed Euſebius. Upon theſe ſhe ſet both by bad and good Uſage, and one of them out of fear accuſed him of Paricide; but the other though ſo cruelly handled, that he was in danger of Death, refuſed to lye. Being therefore not able to doe any thing more againſt John by their Teſtimony, ſhe cut off both their right Hands, becauſe one refuſed to bear falſe witneſs, and leſt her Villany ſhould be revealed by the other, deſiring to keep cloſe thoſe things, which were done publickly in the Forum. Thus much concerning John.

He is compelled to be Preiſt.

Forced to beg his Bread.

30. Next our Authour reſumes his confuſed Declamation againſt Juſtinian, ſaying, the miſchiefs brought by him upon Mankind, ſufficiently made him appear not a man, but a Dæmon in humane ſhape, as he ſaid before. None but God himſelf was able to give an account of the men deſtroyed by him, or to aſſign their Number, no more than that of the Sand. Yet conſidering all thoſe Countries, which he had made Deſolate, and without an Inhabitant; he affirms, two hundred and ten times an hundred thouſand men to have periſhed by his means. To make this out, he gives you that account concerning Africk we formerly mentioned, after the Regaining of that Province. And what extravagance he committed in Africk, the ſame he ſaith was he guilty of in Italy, where he ſpoiled all by the Impoſers and Gatherers of Taxes which he ſent into that Countrey. Before the Italian War, the Dominion of the Goths extended from the ſeats of the Galls, as far as the Borders of Dacia and the City Sirmium. But when the Roman Forces were in Italy, the Germans ſeized on a great part of the Gallican and Venetian Territories; and Sirmium with the adjoyning Countrey, was poſſeſſed by the Gepidæ. All this Tract of ground, ſaith he, is utterly unpeopled, partly by War, partly by the Plague and other Diſeaſes incident to Armies. Illyricum, all Thrace, together with Greece, the Cherſoneſus and all the Regions lying from the Bay of the Ionian Sea, as far as the Suburbs of Conſtantinople, after that Juſtinian came to the Government, were depopulated by the Incurſions of Hunnes, Sclabeni and Antæ, ſo that I believe above two hundred thouſand Romans either periſhed by thoſe Irruptions, or were led away Captive, and the places appear like the Deſarts of Scythia. Beſides, all this while, the Saracens in the Eaſt haraſſed all from Ægypt, as far as the borders of Perſia, ſo that in this ſpace of ground men are very thin, and the ſlain cannot poſſibly be numbered. Three times have Choſroes and the Perſians invaded the Empire, and made the Provinces thereof Deſolate, but in the time they entred Colchos, as well the Lazians as Romans and other Nations received much Damage, for neither did the Perſians, nor Saracens, nor Hunnes, nor Sclabeni, nor other Barbarians, carry home their Armies again intire as they brought them. So that not onely Romans but Barbarians alſo, felt the effect of the bloudy fury of this Emperour Juſtinian.

Vaſt numbers of men deſtroyed by means of Juſtinian.

And vaſt Regions depopulated.

He cauſeth overflowing of Rivers.

31. Choſroes indeed, as was ſaid in a more proper place, was a man of a naughty Diſpoſition; but Juſtinian perpetually gave the occaſion and kindled the Wars. For in doing buſineſs, he never had reſpect to time or place, but did all things unſeaſonably. In the time of Peace and Truce, he would give matter of Jealouſie to his Neighbours; War being denounced, he would fall back again, and out of Covetouſneſs make ſlow Preparations. Inſtead of thoſe matters proper to his Sphere, he buſied his head with things tranſcending his Capacity, too curiouſly ſearching and prying into the Nature of Almighty God. His Cruel and Tyrannical diſpoſition ſtill ingaged him in War, and his Covetouſneſs in preparations hindered him from ſucceſs. During his Reign therefore, the whole world as it were ſwam with the bloud both of Barbarians and Romans. For not onely did the Wars procure the Deſtruction of Mandkind, but thoſe deſperate Factions of the Veneti and Praſini which raged for two and thirty years, to the time that the Authour wrote this Treatiſe. Neither did the Empire ſhed leſs bloud upon the account of the Samaritans and Hereticks, who were put to Death. Such were the miſchiefs which happened to Mankind, this man or Dæmon being Emperour and Authour thereof. Theſe Evils that follow, he effected by a certain ſecret power and Demoniacal Nature, ſome aſcribing them to the miſchievous Genius or Dæmon which accompanied him, though others to the Divine Power which was angry with the Roman Empire. The River Scirtus running by the City of Edeſſa, overflowed and much indamaged the Inhabitants. The Nile alſo did ſuch miſchief to the Ægyptians, as we have formerly related. The River Cydnus roſe to ſuch an height, that the City Tarſus continued many days in water. Antioch the principal City of the Eaſt, Seleucia its Neighbour and famous Anazarbus in Cilicia, were overturned by Earthquakes, and the Ruine and miſeries of the Citizens who is able to relate?

32. Beſides, at this time Ibera, Amaſia the cheif City of Pontus, Polybotus in Phrygia, Philomida in Piſidia, Lychnidus in Epirus, and Corinth all populous and flouriſhing Cities were deſtroyed together with almoſt all their Inhabitants. Then happened that dreadfull Peſtilence, which conſumed well nigh half of thoſe men that out lived the former Calamities. But to ſpeak more concerning the exactions and oppreſſions of Juſtinian. His Uncle, when he came to the Government, found the Treaſury very full. For, Anaſtaſius the moſt provident of all Emperours, fearing that his Succeſſour might burthen the People, had by this ſupply as he thought prevented that Inconvenience. All this did Juſtinian preſently conſume, partly upon fortifications of Banks and Havens, partly in gaining the friendſhip and

Alliance

Sect. 3.

His laviſhments.

Alliance of the Barbarians. He waſted ſo much money, as it hardly could be imagined, that any the moſt diſſolute Nephew of an Emperour could make an end of in an hundred years time. For, the Officers of the Revenue affirmed, that in the ſpace of about twenty ſeven years, ſo long as Anaſtaſius lived, were laid up in Bank, three hundred and twenty thouſand pounds of Gold, of which he left not a farthing before his Uncle Juſtin Died. Now what horrid courſes he took to ſupply the want and Debts he contracted is impoſſible to be related, the Wealth of his Subjects being all ſwallowed up by him, which he preſently vomited forth upon Barbarians. Such as were Rich, he cauſed to be accuſed of feigned Crimes, as Paganiſm, Hereſie, Sodomy, Inceſt, Sedition, adhering to the Faction of the Praſini, or Treaſon, and ſeized on all they had.

His Courſes to get money.

33. There were other courſes he took to get money. He invented a ſort of Magiſtrate, which at certain Rates ſhould give licence to ſell ſuch and ſuch Wares. And there the People was compelled to buy, though three times dearer than formerly; neither was there any remedy to be had for any exactions, part of the profit coming to the Emperour's Coffers, and part to the purſe of the Magiſtrate. He ſet up many Monopolies. And whereas the Prefect (a) of the City, had anciently ſole authority to examine and Judge Malefactours, he made other two Officers, that he might have more Accuſations, and conſequently greater opportunity of ſeizing the Eſtates of innocent Perſons. One of theſe he named Prætor (b) Plebis, who was to prevent and puniſh Roberies. The Romans called him Præfectus vigilum, and the Greeks Νυκτέπαρχος, and before the time of Juſtinian, this Office was performed by the Vicomagiſtri and Collegiati, who had the care of the ſeveral Regions of the City, having received their Inſtitution from Auguſtus Cæſar. The other he called Quæſitor (not Quæſtor, as ſome (c) eminent Lawyers have miſtaken it;) to whom was committed the Cogniſance of Sodomy, Whoredom, Hereſie and Superſtition. The Prætor daily brought ſtoln Goods to the Emperour, pretending there was none that owned them. The Quæſitor proceeded without examination of the Cauſe be it what it would, and Condemned the Parties unheard, whoſe Eſtates and Fortunes were then preſently confiſcated to the uſe of Cæſar. Thus this wicked man committed to thoſe two, and the Prefect of the City, all Cauſes without any Diſcrimination, commanding them to deſtroy as many men, and as ſoon as poſſible, and to ſtrive who ſhould doe moſt. Being asked whoſe Sentence ſhould ſtand, in caſe the matter ſhould come before all three, he anſwered His, who ſhould give Judgement before his Fellows.

(a) Eſt in Græco ἡ τῷ δήμῳ ἐφεστῶσα ἀρχὴ, Magiſtratus Plebi præfectus. Quod vero in urbe quæſtionem haberet Juſtinianus vocat in Novel. 13. πολιαρχίαν, eadem ratione alii πολιοῦχον. Juſtinianus ibid. Ἔπαρχον τῆς πόλεως. Sic paſſim diſtinguitur ab ἐπάρχου τῶν πραιτωρίων. Sæpiſſime per excellentiam à bonis Authoribus vocatur ἔπαρχος.

(b) De hujus Magiſtratûs Inſtitutione vide Novel. 13.

(c) Antonius Auguſtinus ad Novel. 80. & Cujacius, ſed ipſe Juſtinianus rem evincit, Novel. 80. Vide Aleman. in Notis pag. 3. de his rebus, quas obſervat.

His Queſtours.

34. The Queſtorſhip of which all good Emperours had ever a mighty care, to place learned and honeſt men in this Office, which had ſo great influence into the State, he exceedingly abuſed. His firſt Quæſtor was Tribonianus, of whom much has been already ſpoken. He being Dead (about the twenty firſt year of Juſtinian,) and part of his Eſtate confiſcated, though he left a Son and many Grandchildren, Junilus Apher ſucceeded him, a man to whom the Laws were not as much as known by hearſay, that never was matriculated amongſt the Gown-men; and though he underſtood Latine, yet never learnt Greek, which he ſo odly pronounced, as his Servants could not forbear laughing. So Griping and Covetous, that he ſet the Emperour's Letters publickly to Sale, and for a Golden Stater would doe any thing. He dying after he had diſgraced his Employment ſeven years, Conſtantinus procured it, one not unskilfull in the Laws, but very young, that had never practiſed at the Bar, and the moſt thieviſh and arrogant of all men. But to Juſtinian he was moſt dear, being the Prefect of his Rapines and his Judge, by which means he got abundance of money. The Præfectus Prætorio beſides the uſual Revenue paid into the Treaſury above three * thouſand pounds of Gold every year, without any Law or Cuſtome, but as if it came out of the Air, which made him call it Aereum, as our Authour believes, whereas he ought rather to have named it the work of his own Diſhoneſty. By this and other means, thoſe that in his time obtained this Dignity, grew on a ſudden to vaſt Wealth, which he permitted, till being ſwoln ſo much as they were ready to burſt, he could then give it a vent, and let it all run into his own Coffers. † But out of this Number are to be excepted Phocas, and Baſſus his Succeſſour, men of too good Conſcience to keep their Office any conſiderable time.

Principis πάρεδρον ſive Aſſeſſorem paſſim vocat Procopius, qui quod ex legum præſcripto faciendum eſſet Principem moneret. Eum primus ſic vocavit Conſtantinus ſi fides Zozimo, apud Spartianum in Hadriano mentio fit de quodam qui quæſturam gerens orationem imperatoris in Senatu agreſtiùs pronunciavit, unde Quæſtor, στόμα Βασιλέως dicebatur. Alii ſunt Quæſtores urbani & caſtrenſis ærarii Præfecti. Sunt & minorum Magiſtratuum Quæſtores & πάρεδροι, ut Proconſulis Cappadociæ, concilii Iſauriæ, Prætoris Piſidiæ, & aliorum in Novellis. Procopius ipſe Beliſarii fuit. Alem.

* Fortaſſe hoc eſt tributi genus illud quod jam olim abolitum revocavit deinde Michael Pophlago Imperator, de quo videndus Cedrenus ut Alemannus innuit.

35. So dealt he with all the Magiſtrates of Conſtantinople. Throughout other Cities he ſold Offices and Employments to the worſt of men, and having received his money, delivered into their hands the Provinces to be handled at their pleaſure. They ſtood in no fear of the Laws, but hoped to get greater Glory by the Immanity of their Slaughters and Rapines. He had made a Law, that Magiſtrates when they entred their Offices or Provinces, ſhould take an Oath that they would not be Rapacious, nor give nor take any thing for, or by virtue of, their Places, who ſo did they uſed great Imprecations againſt them. But ſcarcely had one year paſſed from the making of this Law, but he forgetting, at leaſt neglecting both his own Decree, the Imprecations and all Modeſty, not obſcurely, but openly in the Forum, and with the greateſt Impudence imaginable, ſold Dignities, to ſuch as with greater licentiouſneſs than ever offered money for them, not conſidering how they could diſpence with the Oath. The Law here mentioned by this Writer is his eighth Novel, in publiſhing whereof he much applauds himſelf, ordering it to be expoſed to view in the Feaſt of Eaſter, as a moſt gratefull object of the Peoples Eyes, and to be cut in ſtone to remain in the Walks of the Churches, as a perpetual monument. The Copy of it he will have kept amongſt the Veſtments of Churches, and excites all People to give thanks for it to Almighty God, adding a Reproof of his Predeceſſours, for their ſolicitude about money in this Affair; whereas Theodoſius made a Law concerning this very matter, and ſo did Martianus as ſome do teſtify, and Anaſtaſius alſo practiſed the very ſame thing, conferring theſe Offices gratis which had been formerly wont to be expoſed to Sale. But as for the Oath, the forme of it is expreſſed in the ſaid Novel concluding thus: Which if I do not obſerve, may I receive both here and hereafter, the terrible Judgment of the Great Lord God and our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, and let me have part with Judas, the Leproſie of Giezi and the trembling of Cain.

He ſold Offices contrary to his own Law.

Theodorus Lector. Vide Aleman. quo ſuprá.

36. Another thing Juſtinian deviſed, which is almoſt impoſſible to be believed. He grew weary of ſelling the chiefeſt Offices about Conſtantinople and other places, and hired certain Fellows to diſcharge them, who receiving certain wages, all the Profits ſhould redound to the Emperour. This he held as his greateſt Maxim, to confer Offices on as great Knaves as himſelf, and ſo it happened, that ſeldom or never came better, but thoſe that ſucceeded were far worſe than their Predeceſſours. It often happened, that the Hunnes invading the Roman Territories, inſtead of being beaten back as they eaſily might have been, were Courted and ſent away with rich preſents, and the Title of Allies, beſides the Booty they had gotten; and ſuch Countreymen as could not endure to ſee their Goods taken away, and their Wives and Children led Captives, but purſued them, and ſeized upon their Carriage-Beaſts, that they might have wherewith to redeem their own, were cruelly beaten and wounded, and conſtrained to make Reſtitution to the Barbarians of what they had taken from them. After the fall of John the Cappadocian, Juſtinian and Theodora were at a loſs to find a man fit enough for their purpoſe to ſucceed him, and in the mean time employed (a) Theodotus who was none of the beſt, but not ſo bad as fully to comply with their humour. At laſt, having in their thoughts obſerved all men, and ſearched all Corners, they met with one (b) Peter a Syrian by birth, ſirnamed Barſames the Numularius, who ſitting at the Receit of money, often by the lightneſs of his Fingers, cheated the Collectours at their Payments, and that with ſuch Induſtry and Impudence, that he would face them down, and outſwear them when he was caught, and boldly aſcribe it as an accident to a miſtake, excuſing the fault of his Fingers, by more than a ſlip of his Tongue. But the Ladder by which he aſcended to this Dignity, was his egregious ſlattery of Theodora, and being her Inſtrument in the execution of her wicked Deſigns.

Hires men to execute Offices.

37. For a proof of his future deportment, he endeavoured to defraud the Souldiers of their Pay, and more ſhamefully than ever, expoſed the places of Truſt and Dignity to Sale, abating ſomething in the price to thoſe who would undertake any Peter a knaviſh Prefect.

---

† Nomina Præfectorum hujus temporis diligenter conquiſita & ad notas Coſſ. digeſta proponit tibi Alemannus, in Notis. p. 95. Illorum certa notitia multam & huic hiſtoriæ lucem affert & Juſtiniani Conſtitutionibus, quæ nonnullarum tum ejus tum Juſtini falſæ Inſcriptiones obſervantur.

(a) Ad Theodotum extant aliquot Juſtiniani Novel. nempe 112. de litigioſis & 5 huic proximæ quæ datæ ſunt Juſt. Aug. Ann. 15. Baſilio V.C. Conſ. eodem ſcil. quo Joannes in exilium pulſus eſt qui fuit decimus ejus præfecturæ. Alem.

(b) Ad Petrum plurima Juſtiniani Reſcripta habemus. Bis Præfectum Prætorio, bis Comitem largitionum fuiſſe diverſi Novellarum tituli demonſtrant. Præfecturam Ærarii eum adminiſtraſſe paulò pòſt Procopius commemorat. Veterem Eccleſiam Sancti Petri ædificavit ut ex πρατείως, C. P. docet Aleman.. p. 99.

impious or unconſcionable Employment. To the Luſt of theſe Creatures he expoſed the Lives and Fortunes of the Provincials, and the Bargain being once made, they were ſent down under the Name of Collectours, to tear in pieces the Bowels of the poor People, and to rage with implacable cruelty againſt them, that they might have wherewithall firſt to reimburſe themſelves, and then to ſpend upon their Luſts, or heap up Treaſure for the occaſions of Cæſar, when he ſhould be pleaſed to call. But, not onely he, but the Prefects before him, and all other Officers under this Tyrant, employed under them the greateſt Knaves they could procure. It hapned that the greateſt part of the Corn that was brought to Conſtantinople, was putrified and naught; yet this did he compell the Cities of the Eaſt to purchaſe at dearer rates than they were wont to buy that which was good, and the Citizens having it delivered, after the payment of their Money, caſt it either into the Sea, or the Sinks and Chanels. That which was good, and kept up in great quantities at Conſtantinople, he ſold to ſuch places as were in want, for double the Tribute which was impoſed upon the Corn Countries. When a leſſer Fleet than uſual arrived, he cauſed Corn to be brought by the Husbandmen themſelves out of Bithynia, Phrygia and Thrace, and conſtrained them to accept ſo mean and inconſiderable prices, that they had better have given away the Corn, and paid double as much as it was worth to boot. This burthen was known by the Name of Annona. But ſo much Corn as this way was imported, not anſwering the Neceſſities of the City, great Complaints were made to the Emperour againſt Peter, and he purpoſed to deprive him of his Office, and more, underſtanding that he was grown very wealthy; till Theodora, his Wife, took him off, being exceedingly enamoured of Peter for his Charms and magical Tricks, whereby, as was reported, ſhe wrought more upon Juſtinian, than by any other means. And he was very eaſie thus to be wrought upon, for Reaſons formerly mentioned, which this Authour here again repeats, to the trouble and diſtaſte of his Reader, who cannot but be wearied with his endleſs Tautologies, and confuſed Allegations.

He is removed, and ſet over the Treaſury.

38. Yet did the Emperour at length, and with much difficulty, remove Peter from his Pretorian Prefectſhip; but then ſet him over the Treaſury, through the importunity of Theodora, having put out of that Employment one John, a Man of great Integrity, whom the People much eſteemed upon this account. Peter being placed in his new Power, cauſed as much miſchief as ever, making away the Money which was aſſigned to many uſes, ſo that thoſe concerned in it were ready to ſtarve, which, ſo long as the Prince had what belonged to him, and the Treaſurer could but fill his own Coffers, was never regarded. The Coin alſo he cauſed to be made leſs than formerly. Farther, whereas it was a very ancient Cuſtome for the Emperours to remit the ſmall Remainders of publick Taxes, leſt ſuch as were not able to pay, ſhould be oppreſſed, and opportunity given to the Collectours to exact more than was due. Juſtinian, in the ſpace of thirty two years, never vouchſafed his Subjects ſuch a grace and favour, which, as it deſtroyed the poor, ſo ſuch as were as yet able to pay, being never at reſt, and not ſo much grieving to pay new Levies, as fearing to be unjuſtly perſecuted for pretended Arrears of vaſt long continuance, choſe rather to forſake their Grounds. Notwithſtanding all the Havock that was made in a great part of Aſia, by the Perſians and Saracens, and in Europe, by the Inrodes of the Hunnes, Sclabeni, and the Gothick War, the Inhabitants being reduced to the greateſt extremity, yet would he remit nothing to them of the ancient Impoſitions, except to thoſe that dwelt in Cities taken by the Enemy, and that but onely for a year.

Juſtinian never remits Arrears.

39. And yet had he, as Anaſtaſius formerly did (he means to the Citizens of Amida) remitted all publick payments for ſeven years, he had done little in reſpect of the great Calamities they underwent; for Cabades retired, leaving Houſes, and Churches, and all ſtanding and intire, whereas Choſroes waſted all before him with Fire and Sword. But the miſerable People found Juſtinian worſe than the Barbarians themſelves; for no ſooner was the Enemy gone, but he would come with his Annona, and his Decrees of Impoſitions and Taxes, after this manner. The Poſſeſſours of Lands were, according to their proportion, to find Proviſions for the Roman Souldiers at a certain Rate, and ſuch as had not of their own, both for Man and Horſe, were forced to buy, and fetch out of other Countries, and ſatisfie the Optiones, (Officers of the Army ſo called) who often were very unreaſonable in their exactions: This was the Annona. This Impoſition was a ſudden and unexpected Plague, falling on the Poſſeſſours of Lands, whom it deprived utterly, as it were, of all hope of Life. For on the grounds whoſe Owners or Tillers were ſlain, or had fled their Countrey, and now were deſolate, and over-grown with Weeds, Juſtinian was ſo mercifull as to lay it. The Deſcriptions or Taxes were laid alſo upon the Countrey, for repairing thoſe Cities that were ſpoiled or waſted by the accidents of War, the Cauſes and Events whereof, our Authour tells us, it would be infinite in this place to deſcribe. But the miſchief ſtaid not here. For the Peſtilence having conſumed the Husbandmen, and Owners of the Lands which lay untilled and out of order, the Tax thereto belonging was exacted of the next Neighbours, who were alſo forced to lodge and entertain the Souldier in the beſt Rooms and Appartments they had, while they themſelves muſt be content to thruſt their Heads into any hole or corner.

He impoſeth the Annona.

De Optionibus exercitus vide Novellam 130. Diſtinguendi ſunt ab Optionibus Fiſci, & ab Optionibus Domeſticis quorum ex Procopii, lib. 1. Belli Vandal. antea mentionem fecimus. Optionibus qui Annonam militibus erogabant πέντε ϗ δεκάτην μοῖραν, quintam decimam partem conſtituit Juſtinianus, ut eſt in Novella 130. Alem.

Sect. 3.

He oppreſſeth Souldiers by the Cenſitores.

40. But foraſmuch as mention is made of Houſes and Lodgings, our Authour eſteems it a thing not to be paſt by in ſilence, that ſometimes no fewer than ſeventy Thouſand Barbarians have been quartered at Conſtantinople, in receiving and lodging of whom the Citizens have been extraordinarily ſtraitned. Neither is to be paſt over what Juſtinian did againſt Souldiers. He ſet over them certain Officers, named Cenſitores, or, as in Greek they called them, Logothetæ, who were empowered to fleece them of as much Money as poſſible, of which, for their pains, they were to have the twelfth part. And whereas by Cuſtome, and the Laws of the Camp, all Souldiers had not equal pay, but thoſe newly liſted had leſs, thoſe of a middle ſtanding more, and the Veterani, or old Souldiers, greateſt of all, that after their Miſſion they might have ſomething to live on, and reap ſome fruit of all their labours, now it was ſo ordered, that when the Emeriti went out, others that were next them did not ſucceed, nor were admitted to their Privileges, as the manner had been; but the Cenſitores forbad the Names of ſuch as were ſlain to be omitted in the Roll, or any new Rolls to be made. Hence it came to paſs that the Armies were exceedingly leſſened, and the Souldiers utterly diſcouraged, the Emperour treaſuring up that Money, which they of courſe ought to have received as an augmentation of their Wages. Several other ways were the Military Men injured, and reduced to that meanneſs, that the Name of Grecian became diſhonourable, as if Greece brought not forth any ſtout or valiant Man. Here by Greeks he ſeems to mean all that ſpoke that Language. And the Reader may take notice, that now in Juſtinian's time the Roman Empire began to be called the Empire of the Greeks by the Romans themſelves, who ſtomached at, and diſdained the Domination and Pride of that People.

Λογοθέτην ἑλληνίζοντες τὴν τιμὴν ταύτην καλοῦσι Ῥωμαῖοι. Eum qui publicarum Rationum curam gerit Logothetam Græco vocabulo Romani vocant. Procop. bell. Goth. l. 3. Alem.

41. Some Souldiers were caſhiered, as being liſted without any order from the Prince, the Commiſſions of others were ſaid to be counterfeit, others were blamed for being from their colours, and certain Searchers were ſent into all the Provinces, to ſee what Souldiers were unfit for War. Some Aged Men, who deſerved good rewards for all their time and ſtrength ſpent in ſervice, were turned out, and forced to beg their Bread openly in the Forum of Religious Perſons, affording a lamentable Spectacle to all that paſſed by. Others, to ſave themſelves, were conſtrained to bribe the Searchers, and ſo was the Souldier weakned, and deſtitute of Neceſſaries, and ſo much aliened in his Mind from his Employment, that the Roman Affairs generally all over, but eſpecially in Italy, were much indamaged. Alexander, whom we ſaid formerly to have been nicknamed Forſicula, being the great Inſtrument of this Oppreſſion, laid many frivolous things to the charge of the Souldiers in Italy, and the Inhabitants themſelves he fleeced of great ſtore of Wealth, under pretence of revenging the Injuries offered by Theodorich and the Goths. In times paſt the Emperours were wont to place certain Bands and Companies of Souldiers upon the Frontiers and Limits, who were thence called Limitanei, eſpecially in the Eaſtern parts, to prevent the Inrodes of the Perſians and Saracens. Theſe Juſtinian preſently ſo ſlighted, and neglected, that their four or five years pay was ſhuffled off by the Queſtors, and whereas during the Truce betwixt the Romans and Perſians, they ought to have enjoyed the benefit of the Ceſſation, with their whole Wages, Juſtinian moſt injuriouſly disbanded them, by the ſame Fact expoſing the Souldiers to penury and begging, and the Frontiers to the inſolence of Invaders.

He cheats the Scholarii.

The Emperour's Court in former times was wont to be guarded by Three thouſand five hundred Men, whom they called Scholarii, who had more pay than other Quaſi σχολάζοντας, bellico ab opere vacantes & feriatos milites.

Horum in Palatio uti munia diverſa, ita & nomina. Alii ſtipendia merebantur, alii Codicillares. Horum ordines modo appellantur Officia, unde eorum Præfectus Magiſter Officiorum vocatur, & à Græcis, μάγιστρος τῶν ἐν παλατίῳ τάξεων: modo Scholæ, σχολαὶ, atque inde σχολάριοι. Vide quæ ex Agathia tranſcripſimus ſuprà hujus Cap. Paragr. 234, Men, in duty, and were wont to be choſen out of the moſt ancient and ſtout Souldiers of the Armenians. But in the time of Zeno, any one was in a capacity to compaſs this Employment, even Scullions themſelves, if they brought but money. When Juſtin was Emperour, Juſtinian his Nephew, for great ſumms of Money paid him, filled up the Rolls, and to the former number added almoſt Two thouſand more, who were called Supernumeraries. Theſe, as ſoon as he came to the Government, he diſbanded, every one, and kept their Money to himſelf.

42. When there was an Expedition to be made into Africk, Italy or Perſia, orders were given out to theſe Men, though utterly unfit, to march as well as to others. They then muſt buy off their Service, and be content to be fleeced by Peter, the Magiſter Officiorum, and the Murtherer of Amalaſuntha, a Man of a mild and calm temper, but to be reckoned with the inferiour ſort of covetous and rapacious Perſons. In the Emperour's Court there were other Souldiers, as they were termed, of an higher Rank, who purchaſing their places at a greater rate, had anſwerably greater Salaries allowed them. Theſe they called Protectours, and Domeſticks, having no skill in matters belonging to War, but ſerving to ſet out the grandeur of the Palace; ſome of them lay in Conſtantinople, and others quartered in Galatia, or other Provinces. By the ſame tricks Juſtinian frighted theſe men, and made them quit their pretenſions to their ſtipends. There was an ancient and moſt certain Law and Cuſtome, that every five Years the Emperours ſhould give a Donative to the Souldiers, for which purpoſe every fifth Year the Queſtors were ſent about, and paid to every Man five golden Staters. But after Juſtinian came to the Government, he quite aboliſhed the Cuſtome, inſomuch, that in the thirty ſecond Year of his Reign, the time when Procopius is pretended to have written this Secret Hiſtory, it was almoſt quite forgotten. Farther, whereas in all Employments, either under the Prince or Magiſtrates, Men aroſe by degrees, and ſucceeded each other, till thoſe that formerly were of the loweſt, at length arrived at the higheſt Rank, and ſuch as were come to this pitch of Honour, had large allowance, as a reward of their former diligence, amounting to above Ten thouſand pounds of Gold yearly; he took this allowance away, reducing them to want and miſery, as he did all other mortals. So did this Tyrant vex and diſquiet theſe ſorts of Men. Now I come to ſhew, ſaith our Authour, what he did againſt Merchants, Mariners, Artificers, Men relating to the Law, and other ſorts of People.

As alſo the Protectours and Domeſticks.

43. There are two Straits lying upon each ſhore of Conſtantinople, the one of the Helleſpont, betwixt Seſtus and Abydus, and the other at the mouth of the Euxine Sea, where there ſtood a Church, conſecrated to the Mother of God. In the Helleſpont the Emperours permitted no Publicans to receive Toll or Cuſtome, but had their Prætor at Abydus, who watched all Merchandiſe carried into the Port of Byzantium, and ſuch as ſet ſail thence without licence of the Officer appointed to grant Paſs-ports. This Prætor could not demand any thing of the Mariners. But Juſtinian placed Publicans upon both the Straits, and two hired Officers, who were commanded to have a ſtrict Watch, and raiſe as much money as poſſibly they could by way of Cuſtome. At the Haven of Conſtantinople he appointed a certain Syrian, called Addæus, one of his Creatures, to raiſe as much as he could out of imported Wares, and he permitted not ſuch as came in to return out of the Haven, but conſtrained the Mariners either to carry goods into Italy or Africk, or pay for the freights to others, that were hired, which burthen ſome, that they might ſhun, ſet fire to their Veſſels, and went their ways. Merchants by this means were conſtrained to pay three times as much as uſual for Tranſportation of their goods, and to make themſelves ſavers, raiſed the prices of every Commodity, ſo that it became a publick grievance and a burthen to all the People.

How he oppreſſed Merchants.

Hoc dictum eſt ab omnibus pæne Scriptoribus Eccleſiaſticis Templum in Blachernis, de quo nomine inter Græcos minimè convenit. Vide Alemann. ad Procop. Arcan. Hiſt. p. 15.

44. Formerly the Numularii, or Money-Changers, were wont for every Stater of Gold to give two hundred and ten Obuli or Pholes. But Juſtinian conceiving it would make for his profit, brought down the Exchange to an hundred and eighty, ſo that the ſubject loſt the ſixth part of the value of every golden Stater. Having laid a Monopoly upon every thing but wearing Apparel, at laſt he deviſed a way to reduce ſuch as dealt therein to an equal condition with their fellows. In times paſt the Manufacture of Silks was confined to two Cities of Phœnicia, Berytus and Tyre, whence they were tranſported all the World over. Now the Merchants at Byzantium, and other Cities, who traded in this Commodity, raiſed the price, pretending that they paid more than formerly had been uſual in Perſia, and were burthened with the tenth part in the Roman Territories. He therefore made a Law, that a pound of Silk ſhould be ſold for eight Aurei, under pein of Confiſcation of Goods, to any one that ſhould offend againſt it; which burthen the Merchants not able, or not willing, to bear, gave over the Trade, and what remained of their Wares, paſſed away privately, and by ſtealth; of which Theodora getting an inkling, made them pay her down an hundred pounds of Gold, and beſides that, to loſe their Goods. Afterward this Manufacture was aſſigned to Peter Barſama, the Emperour's Treaſurer, who exerciſed all Villany in this, as other things under his Hands. All other Artificers, but ſuch as he conſtrained to work for himſelf, he plagued by execution of the lately mentioned Law. And not by ſtealth or privately, but publickly, in the Forum, did he ſell an ounce of that Silk, which was dyed with a more ordinary colour, for ſix Aurei, and that which had the Royal dye, which they called Holoverum, for above four and twenty, whereby he got great Wealth for the Emperour, and more for himſelf.

Ergo Holoverum tinctura Serici & color eſt non Sericum, ut ad hanc diem multi exiſtimârunt inanibúſq; rationibus id aſtruere conati ſunt, inquit Alemannus.

45. By this means multitudes were undone, and all the Artificers of Tyre and Berytus, who had lived upon this Manufacture, were either compelled to ſtarve, or to beg their Bread; and ſome of them fled into Perſia. Here it will not be amiſs to add what Alemannus hinteth, that Silk had been much dearer in former times, than when it was thus ſold by Peter. For, as Vopiſcus writes in the Life of Aurelian, Gold and Silk, in the days of that Emperour, were exchanged weight for weight, (as was once Verina Tobacco here for Silver) viz. a pound for a pound, as the Rhodian Law alſo witneſſeth. Now if a pound of Silk was ſold for a pound of Gold, a pound of Silk muſt have been worth an hundred Aurei, from which if you ſubtract eight and twenty, ſeventy two will remain, for which a pound was ſold in thoſe days of Peter; for ſo you muſt reckon, if with this Authour you ſet every ounce at ſix Aurei. But Silk was grown much cheaper in the days of Juſtinian, in whoſe time, as the Reader may remember, we formerly told him out of an Authentick Book of Procopius, that Silk-Worms were brought by certain Monks out of India to Conſtantinople, and other parts of the Empire. But to what an height is the Silk Manufacture now advanced, and what difference is there betwixt our days and the Reign of Aurelian! Silk is now grown nigh as common as Wool, and become the cloathing of thoſe in the Kitchin, as well as the Court; we wear it not onely on our Backs, but of late years on our Legs and Feet, and tread on that which formerly was of the ſame value with Gold it ſelf. Yet that magnificent and expenſive Prince, Henry the Eighth, wore ordinarily Cloth-hoſe, except there came from Spain, by great chance, a pair of Silk Stockins. K. Edward, his Son, was preſented with a pair of long Spaniſh Silk Stockins by Sr. Thomas Greſham, his Merchant, and the Preſent was taken much notice of. Queen Elizabeth, in the third Year of her Reign, was preſented, by Mrs. Montague, her Silk-woman, with a pair of black knit Silk Stockins, and thenceforth ſhe never wore Cloth any more. Nine and thirty years after was invented the weaving of Silk Stockings, Waſtcoats, and divers other things, by Engines, or Steel Looms, by William Lee, Maſter of Arts of St. John's College in Cambridge, a Native of Notingham, who taught the Art in England and France, as his Servants in Spain, Venice and Ireland, and his Device ſo well took, that now in London his Artificers are become a Company, having an Hall and a Maſter, like as other Societies. But this were an unpardonable Digreſſion, were it our cuſtome to make the like.

Ὁλοσηρικοῦ ὅμοια τῷ χρυσίῳ.

How others profeſſing Sciences.

46. Next our Authour comes to ſhew how Juſtinian endeavoured the ſubverſion of Advocates, Phyſicians, and others, profeſſing the liberal Sciences; and for proof alledges what we have formerly ſaid of this Subject. The publick Monies of any City or Town, which the Inhabitants, out of good Husbandry had laid up, either for publick payments, or their Recreations, he feared not to ſeize on, ſo that all ſtipends of Phyſicians and Schoolmaſters ceaſed, no care was had of publick Buildings, no lights were ſet out in the Streets, and no Merriments, or innocent Divertiſements, were now to be thought of; and as for Stage-plays, thoſe of the Circus, and Huntings, amongſt which exerciſes Theodora, his Wife, had been born and bred, they were utterly laid aſide. At Conſtantinople he would have all Spectacula to be left off, that he might ſpare Money, to the undoing of an infinite multitude that had their livelyhood out of them. Therefore, ſaith he, all Men now are in ſadneſs, no appearance of any mirth or chearfulneſs, either publickly or privately; Neighbours and Friends, when they meet, relating onely their Miſeries and Calamities, and ſome Diſaſter or other which has lately hapned. Every Year there were wont to be two Conſuls created, one at Rome, the other at Conſtantinople, who were wont to ſpend each of them above two thouſand Pounds of Gold, not of their own, but moſt beſtowed on them by the Emperour. This was laid out upon Shews and poor People, but eſpecially upon Stage-Players, and very much inriched the Cities; but ſince Juſtinian became Emperour, there is no time determined for theſe things, one keeps the Conſulſhip a long time, and there is hardly any ſuch thing to be ſeen as the Comitia Conſularia. Now whereas this Authour ſaith, that every year two Conſuls were created, this is to be underſtood ordinarily, and in courſe, for often, as we have before hinted, a Conſul has been in the Eaſt, and in the Weſt, without a Collegue. And this moreover is obſervable, that the Epiſtles of the Ancients, and other publick Monuments, are uſually ſigned with the Name but of one Conſul, in theſe years wherein two were created, as appears manifeſtly from the Faſti; the reaſon is this; becauſe ſome conſiderable ſpace was required to have their Names communicated through the Empire, and in the mean time the Provincials made uſe of his that firſt came to their knowledge, as they inhabited nearer to Rome or Conſtantinople. In the publick Tables mention was made of him whoſe Name they knew not, in this manner; Marcianus, and he that ſhall hereafter be declared, being Conſuls.

He lays an Impoſt upon Bread.

47. Upon the very Bread which the poor People and Cripples were compelled to buy, Juſtinian laid ſuch an Impoſt, to the value of three Centenaries of Gold, that the Sellers made it almoſt all of Chaff, or Bran at the beſt; to ſo great impiety and ſordidneſs did his covetous Humour deſcend. The Officers herein employed got vaſt Wealth, and brought a kind of Famine upon the Poor; for it was not lawfull any otherwiſe to provide themſelves, but all their Bread they muſt buy after this manner. The Watercourſes were ſo broken, that the Inhabitants could not be ſupplied, and many were every day ſlain at the Fountains in a contention to get Water, yet was no care taken to repair the Pipes, and all for ſaving of Money. The Baths were alſo ſtopt up, and yet could the Emperour, in the ſuburbs, lay out a vaſt deal of Treaſure on the Houſes ſeated towards the Sea ſide, as if that Court were not good enough for him and his Wife, which had given ſo great contentment to the former Princes. But not onely at Conſtantinople did he thus afflict the Poor, who ate nothing but Bread, and drank nothing but Water onely. His cruelty reached thoſe that lived in other Countries. Theodorich having conquered Italy, that ſome remains of an Empire might appear at Rome, maintained in pay the Pretorian Companies, which were very numerous, as thoſe of the Silentiarii, Domeſtici and Scholarii, who, if they enjoyed nothing elſe, to be ſure had the privilege of Souldiers, and the Annona, or Proviſions, which he permitted to deſcend to their Children, and Children's Children. And to the Poor that lived near St. Peter's Church, he yearly gave out of the publick three thouſand Medimni of Wheat; all which Alexander Forſicula took away, and for that was much commended and eſteemed by Juſtinian.

Fortaſſe intelligit de Adrianæo aquæductu, quem initio ſui Imperii Juſtinianus reſtauraverat. Sic opinatur Alem.

48. At Thermopylæ, the Greeks that lived thereabout kept a conſtant Garriſon, and for fear the Barbarians ſhould make Inrodes into Peloponneſus, kept watch by their turns, at the Wall built on the top of the Mountains. Alexander, as though he took eſpecial care for the Affairs of the Peloponneſians, affirmed there was no truſting to the Fortreſſes maintained by Countreymen, and placed there two thouſand Souldiers, to be maintained by the ſeveral Cities of Hellas, the publick Revenues of which, under pretence of maintaining Garriſon-Souldiers, he brought into the Treaſury; and by theſe means it came to paſs that neither in Hellas, nor at Athens, were there any publick Buildings, or any publick conveniences of Corporations regarded; and ſo were matters ordered by Alexander Forſicula, to the great contentment of Juſtinian and his Wife. Things went as ill with the Poor of Alexandria, amongſt the Advocates of which was one Hephæſtus, who, being promoted to the Government of the place, appeaſed indeed Tumults in the City, but being more ſavage and cruel than the ſeditious themſelves in effect, brought the Citizens into all ſorts of Calamities. For by a Monoply exerciſed by himſelf, he hindred all others from trading, and ſet what rates he pleaſed upon all Commodities, as he did upon all Corn tranſported from Egypt, having obtained the like privilege as to that Countrey. Juſtinian perceiving the Inhabitants took theſe oppreſſions with moderate Patience, reſolved to lay on as much burthen as they would carry, and more highly eſteemed his formerly beloved Hephæſtus, who, to bind him more firmly to him, deviſed yet another way to gratifie his Humour. The Emperour Diocletian ordained, that a great quantity of Corn ſhould be yearly given by the People of Alexandria to the Poor, which Cuſtome had continued down unto this time. Of this Corn Hephæſtus brought twenty hundred thouſand Medimni into the publick Granaries, writing to the Emperour, that the Alexandrians managed the buſineſs neither according to Juſtice nor Diſcretion. Juſtinian readily confirmed what he had done, and was mightily pleaſed with a Miniſter ſo proper for his turn.

He oppreſſeth the Poor of Alexandria.

Sect. 3.

49. But ſo numerous were the wicked Actions of Juſtinian, that to recount them no time would be ſufficient, but out of many I will gather a few Inſtances, ſaith our Authour, from which it may evidently appear to Poſterity, what an egregious Diſſembler he was, how prone to deſpiſe Almighty God, the Prieſts, the Laws and the People, how Loyal ſoever, having neither reſpect to Modeſty, to the good of the Commonwealth, nor at all regarding to colour his wickedneſs by any ſpecious pretences, but onely intent how to ſcrape up Money, and pillage the whole Roman World. The Reader is to know, that he made one Paul Biſhop of Alexandria, one Rhodo, a Phœnician, being at that time Prefect of the City, to whom he wrote, that upon all occaſions he ſhould give aſſiſtence to Paul, by whoſe means he hoped to bring the Primates of that Countrey to eſtabliſh the Chalcedonian Council. There was a certain Phœnician, Arſenius by name, of a moſt wicked diſpoſition, but a great confident of Theodora, the Empreſs, by whoſe countenance he roſe to that Wealth and Authority, that he mounted at laſt into the Senate. By Religion he was a Samaritan, but he complied out of fear, as alſo did his Father and Brother, who yet making uſe of Arſenius his Intereſt did great miſchief to the Chriſtians of Scythopolis, who were exaſperated to ſuch a degree, that they put them to a cruel death, and thereupon much miſchief aroſe to the Inhabitants of Paleſtine. Arſenius though he had been the occaſion of all theſe miſdemeanours, was no otherwiſe puniſhed than by a ſingle baniſhment from the Court, and that becauſe of the importunity of Chriſtians. But as intending to doe the Emperour ſpecial Service he went down, not long after, with Paul to Alexandria, the Inhabitants whereof he hoped to draw to his purpoſe, and during his abſence from Court, he buſied himſelf in Chriſtian Controverſies; and thereby offended Theodora, who drove on a Deſign that ſeemed to be contrary to that of her Husband. For Explication of this we ſhall onely hint to the Reader, an Opinion which in it's proper place may be more largely diſcuſſed, that as Juſtinian ſtood ſtifly for the Council of Chalcedon; ſo Theodora ſeemed to reject it, imbracing with great kindneſs the Acephali, Monophyſitæ, Theopaſchitæ, and other Hereticks of that time.

Scythopoli à Chriſtianis Incendio interierunt uti Hiſtoriam narrat Cyrillus Scythopolitanus, ex quo apparet Arſenii patrem fuiſſe quendam Sylvanum. Alem.

50. But Paul coming to Alexandria, procured Rhodo the Prefect to kill Pſoës a Deacon, alledging that he was the onely man, that hindred him in the Execution of the Emperour's commands; and by frequent Letters indeed Juſtinian commanded him to be beaten, the Torments of which Nature not able to bear he dyed under the Laſh. Yet when the thing was noiſed abroad, Juſtinian being earneſtly moved ſo to doe by his Wife, laid all the Load upon Paul, Rhodo, and Arſenius, and conſtituting Liberius a Patritian of Rome, his Præfectus Auguſtalis ſent ſeveral Prelates down to Alexandria to inquire into the Fact, amongſt whom went Pelagius Archdeacon of the Roman Church, who repreſented the Biſhop. Paul being convicted of Murther was deprived. Rhodo flying to Conſtantinople was there by the Emperour's Command put to Death, and his Goods were ſold, notwithſtanding he produced no fewer than thirteen of Juſtinian's Letters, wherein he was again and again with all poſſible importunity, urged to follow and fully obey the Orders of Paul, without the leaſt Contradiction, as one who had certain Precepts to purſue in point of Religion. Arſenius at the command of Theodora, was by Liberius his Order nailed to a Croſs, and her Husband ſeized on his Eſtate, pretending no other reaſon than that he had been intimately acquainted with him. But here was the jeſt: It was not long e'er Paul came to Conſtantinople to Petition the Emperour, and offered ſeven hundred pounds of Gold to be reſtored to his Office, of which as he ſaid, he had been unjuſtly deprived. Juſtinian took his Money, entertained him with great Reſpect, and promiſed to reſtore him to his See, though it was already full; and he had lately ſo ſeverely puniſhed his Complices and Aſſociates in the Murther. He buſied his Head ſo much about it, that every one expected when it would be done; but Vigilius Biſhop of Rome, hapning at this time to be at Conſtantinople, flatly refuſed herein to comply with him, or to reverſe that Sentence which he had given by Pelagius. But thus was Juſtinian intent upon his Grand deſign, of ſcraping up Money.

Vide hac de re Liberatum in Breviario, ubi rem altiùs petit ut innuit Alem.

Particular ſtories.

He ſcrapes up Money.

51. Another thing gave as ample Demonſtration, which he Practiſed toward one Fauſtinus, who though a Samaritan diſſembled his Religion, and accommodated himſelf to that of the times. Being choſen into the Senate, he alſo obtained the Honour and Employment of Proconſul, which once paſt, he was accuſed at Conſtantinople by certain Clergy-men, of being ſecretly a Samaritan, and of Cruelty and Impiety exerciſed againſt the Chriſtians, that had been ſubject to his Juriſdiction. The Emperour was wonderfully concerned, that the Cauſe of Chriſtianity ſhould ſuffer during his Government, and the matter was brought before the Senate, where at the inſtance of Cæſar he was baniſhed. But ſee the Ingenuity, and Piety of the Prince. Juſtinian corrupted with a great ſum of Money (as much as he would ask) reſcinds the Judgment given in Senate, and Fauſtinus maintains himſelf in his accuſtomed Port, frequents the Court, manages the Affairs of the Emperour in Paleſtine and Phœnicia without Controll, and according to his own Luſt and Pleaſure. Thus much in ſhort ſaith our Authour, to give the Reader to underſtand how Juſtinian at his Pleaſure broke the Sanctions or Canons of Chriſtians: As for his reſcinding of Laws, out of no other Conſideration than for filthy lucre; I come now to declare it, in as few words. There was one Priſcus amongſt the Emeſeni, exceedingly dextrous in Counterfeiting another Man's hand. And this muſt alſo be remembred, that many years before one Mammianus a man of Patritian Dignity, of great Nobility, and as great Riches, had made the Church of the ſaid Emeſeni his Heir.

He reſcinds Eccleſiaſtical Sanctions and Canons at Pleaſure.

52. Afterward when Juſtinian came to the Empire, it hapned that this Priſcus being to take a Roll of all the Families in that City, obſerved well ſuch as were Wealthy amongſt them, and in thoſe noting their Anceſtours, he counterfeited many Bills, as written with their own Hands, whereby they acknowledged that Mammianus had depoſited very much Money with them. By this means he ſcraped together no leſs than an hundred Centenaries, or ten thouſand pounds of Gold; but here was not all. He ſo counterfeited the Hand of a certain publick Notary of great Repute, and as great deſert, who had been wont in the days of Mammianus to draw Inſtruments for the Citizens, that he delivered thoſe pretended Bonds, into the hands of the Solicitours of the Church, who had bargained with him for part of the Money to be received. But the thing could not take by reaſon of that Law, which confined all Actions within the Preſcription of thirty Years; and as for the Hypothecarii and certain others, it barred them by an Exception which pleaded above forty Years continuance. Preſſed with this Inſuperable difficulty, they go to Conſtantinople; they get Admiſſion to the Emperour, whoſe Authority alone could ſurmount it, and Preſenting him with a great ſum of Gold, beg he would be their Friend, and ſtand by them in their buſineſs. He takes the Money, and preſently makes a new Law, whereby he inlarges the time of proſecuting Actions in Church matters, to the term of one hundred Years; not onely at Emeſa, but throughout the whole Empire. This being as the Authour relates it, we ſee the occaſion of the Centenary Preſcription granted by him to Churches; and hence it appears, that it was not onely granted to the Church of Rome, as ſome would gather from his ninth Novel, but to all others diſperſed through the Roman State.

The Preſcription of an hundred years for Churches.

53. According to the Tenour of the new Law, he ſends one Longinus an Induſtrious man, and one of a ſtrong Conſtitution to act at Emeſa, before whom the Procuratours accuſe the Emeſenians, by the feigned Bonds of owing no leſs than two hundred pounds of Gold; and being not able to trace the Truth in ſo large and dark a ſpace of time, they were preſently Condemned. Moſt of the Citizens were like to be utterly undone by this Courſe of proceeding, when it pleaſed Almighty God by his Providence to moderate it. Longinus commands Priſcus the Inventour of this Miſchief to bring all his Papers to him, which when he refuſed to doe, he gave him ſo ſound a blow on the Ear, that the man fell down, and in great Fear and Aſtoniſhment, thinking that Longinus had ſmelt out his Villany, confeſſed the whole Cheat, and ſo a ſtop was put to their Proceedings. But this we muſt add to this Relation; that Juſtinian aſhamed it ſeems of his Centenary Preſcription, and having it beaten often into his Ears, that the great diſtance of time exceeding the Age of man rendred it impoſſible, again revoked it; of which it's a wonder our Authour ſhould take no notice. But poſſibly the Emperour might retract his former Edict, after the two and thirtieth year of his Reign, beyond which the ſecret Hiſtory doth not extend.

Habes in Edicto quinto cui falſus eſt titulus de Litigioſis. Ecce rationem. Ἐπειδὴ γὰρ διὰ τοσούτου διαστήματος τοῦ αἰῶνος μᾶλλον ἤπερ τοῦ χρόνου, οὔτε ἡ ἀκεραιότης τῶν ἀποδείξεων, οὔτε ἡ πίστις τῶν πεπραγμένων, οὐδὲ ἡ ἡλικία ἰσχύει βοηθῆσαι τοῖς μάρτυσι.

But he revoked it.

54. Not onely did Juſtinian handle, almoſt every day, the Roman Laws in this manner, but indeavoured alſo to deſtroy thoſe which the Hebrews imbrace and Reverence. For in Caſe their Paſſover happened before the Chriſtian-Eaſter, they were not ſuffered to perform the Ceremonies at their due and uſual time. And moſt of them were grievouſly fined for eating Lambs fleſh at that time, contrary to the uſual Practice, and the Chriſtian Canons. From theſe Inſtances, our Hiſtorian conceives he hath ſufficiently proved the Emperour's naughty diſpoſition; and having now almoſt tired himſelf, he talkes of making an end, after he ſhall have but a little ſhewn his Craft and Diſſimulation. But here before we go any farther, we ſhall add what Alemannus hints to us, out of Theophanes touching this matter of Changing days, that not onely did Juſtinian deal thus with the Jews, but with Chriſtians alſo in the Celebration of Eaſter. For in the nineteenth year of his Reign, the People began to abſtain from Fleſh on the fourth day of February. But the Emperour commanded that Fleſh ſhould be eaten another Week, and accordingly the Butchers killed and expoſed it to ſale, but no Body either bought or taſted it. Yet Eaſter was begun as the Emperour commanded, and the People faſted one Week ſuperfluouſly. Now for Proſecution of the Argument of Diſſimulation, we are to know, that Juſtinian put Liberius the Patritian lately mentioned out of his Government, which he beſtowed upon John an Ægyptian, Sirnamed Laxarion. This being known by Pelagius, who was a great Friend of Liberius, he deſires to be ſatisfied of the Emperour, if the Report concerning Laxarion were true? He utterly denies it, and gives his Letters into the Hands of Pelagius, whereby was confirmed to Liberius his former Charge, and affirms he had no Intention at preſent to diſplace him.

Ἐγένετο διαστροφὴ περὶ τοῦ ἁγίου πάσχα καὶ ἐποίησαν οἱ δῆμοι τὴν ἀποκρεώσιμον μηνὶ Φεβρουαρίῳ τετάρτῃ. ὁ δὲ βασιλεὺς, &c.

His Diſſimulation.

55. But at this time reſided at Conſtantinople, one Eudæmon the Uncle of John, a man of Conſular Dignity, very Wealthy and Cæſar's Steward, who hearing what had lately paſſed betwixt the Emperour and Pelagius, demanded of him whether he continued firm in his Reſolution as to his Nephew's preferment. Juſtinian diſſembling what he had written to Liberius, ſends alſo his Letters to John, bidding him to look to his Charge and mind his buſineſs, for he had nothing otherwiſe determined concerning him. Hereupon John commands Liberius as a man out of Office, to remove himſelf out of the Palace, which he denied, ſhewing alſo his Commiſſion from Cæſar. They both arm and fight: Many are ſlain on both ſides, and John falls amongſt the reſt. Then doth Eudæmon importune the Emperour that Liberius may be ſummoned to give Account of his Nephew's death, which is accordingly done, and the matter being brought before the Senate, he is abſolved, as having done what neceſſity conſtrained, and in his own defence; but the Emperour would not acquit him, till he had fleeced him of a round ſum of Money, ſo great a Patron was he of Truth and Friendſhip. But it happened that not long after, Eudæmon dies Inteſtate, leaving a numerous kindred behind him, and much about the ſame time, Euphratas chief of the Palatine Eunuchs, leaving alſo a great Eſtate, and a Nephew by his Siſter; but no Teſtament. Of both theſe Juſtinian makes himſelf Heir, not beſtowing one Farthing on thoſe, whom the Laws called to the Succeſſion. In like manner did he deal with the Relations of Irenæus, who was dead long before.

56. About the ſame time, Anatolius chief of the Senatours of Aſcalon married his Daughter to Mammilianus the moſt Noble of all the Cæſareans. There was an Ancient Law, that when the Senatours of any City died without Iſſue-male, the fourth part of their Eſtate ſhould come to the Senate, and the reſt be enjoyed by their Heirs: Now Juſtinian makes a Law quite contrary, that in ſuch a Caſe their Heirs ſhould have but a fourth part, and all the reſt ſhould remain to the Senate and publick Treaſury, although it never had been formerly known, that any Goods of the Senatours came either into the publick Treaſury, or that of Cæſar. But ſuch being now the Law, Anatolius dies and his Daughter pays what was due by the late Law to the Treaſury and the Senate, receiving Diſcharges both from the Emperour and the Senate of Aſcalon. At length Mammilianus dies too and leaves a Daughter, which being married to a Noble-man, dies alſo at length without Iſſue, leaving her Mother alive. Juſtinian preſently ſeizeth on all they left, openly ſaying, that by no means the Daughter of Anatolius being now grown old, ought to enjoy the Fortunes of her Father and Husband: Onely to keep her from begging or ſtarving, he allowed her for her Life a Golden ſtater a day, adding this in the Inſtrument of this Rapine; We beſtowed on her this Stater, out of our innate Piety and Clemency, for by our Actions it is our Cuſtome, to expreſs the Holy and Pious diſpoſition of our mind. This is enough, ſaith our Authour, more would be Irkſome; but I believe it impoſſible for any man to remember all.

Ὡς τὸν στατῆρα προεῖται τῆς εὐσεβείας ἕνεκα τοῦτον, ἔθος γὰρ μοι τά τε ὅσια καὶ εὐσεβῆ πράττειν.

57. Yet he cannot make an end, but conceives it material to add that in Reſpect to his Covetouſneſs, the very Faction of the Veneti, however addicted to him, were very little regarded. Malthanes a Cilician, Son-in-Law to Leo, a Referendary formerly mentioned, was ſent into Cilicia, to Compoſe all Seditions ariſing in that Countrey. Taking advantage of the time, he handles unmercifully very many Cilicians, and ſome of the Money he Charges upon the Tyrant; another part he himſelf doth own. All others bore the miſchief as Perſons conſtrained ſo to doe: Onely ſuch as were of the Faction, of the Veneti at Tarſus, hoping well from the Aſſiſtence of the Empreſs, openly reviled Malthanes in the Forum. He having notice of it, gathers together a band of Men, and coming to Tarſus by Night, ſends his Souldiers by break of day to plunder the Town. The Veneti looking upon it no otherwiſe than as the Invaſion of an Enemy, every one ſtood upon his Guard, and in the dark many being killed, amongſt the reſt fell Damianus a Senatour, and chief of the Faction of the Veneti at Tarſus. The News of his Death no ſooner came to Conſtantinople, but the Veneti began to make diſturbance throughout the City, and heavily to Rail at Leo and Malthanes, whom they loaded with all Indignities and Threats, which Words could not but offend the Emperour; pretending to be very much diſpleaſed, with what was laid to the Charge of Malthanes, by an Edict commanded Inquiſition to be made. But Leo by a vaſt ſum of Money extinguiſhed both the violence of the Edict, and the Emperour's Good Will toward the Veneti; who having given Order, that the Proceſs ſhould fall, received Malthanes at his coming to Court, with all poſſible kindneſs. Yet the Veneti ſet upon him, and wounded him as he came out of the Palace: And had certainly ſlain him, but that Leo hired ſome of the Company to ſtop the proceedings of their Fellows.

58. A Noble piece of Juſtice! To ſuffer ſuch violence to be committed in his own Court under his Noſe, and Sacrifice all things, how pretious ſoever, to his covetous and ſordid Humour. But behold yet farther, what affection he bore, like a true Father of his Countrey, to the publick Good. The former Princes, that they might have a ſpeedy Account, what was done or Practiſed in each Province, either by their Enemies, or their Turbulent and ſeditious Subjects; how their Officers behaved themſelves; that they might be advertiſed of any Accident or memorable Occurrence, as alſo, to convey up quickly and ſafely the Annual Tributes and Impoſitions, ordained certain Poſts or Carriers after this manner. Betwixt every ſtage, or in an whole days Travelling, they cauſed to be made eight Inns or places of Refreſhment; ſometimes fewer, but never under five. In each Inn were kept nigh forty Horſes fit for Service, and as many Men to manage them, who ſucceeding to one another, and ſtill taking freſh Horſes; ſometimes would Letters or any other things be conveyed in one day, as far as ordinarily they could paſs in ten. This beſides the Convenience of paſſage, tended much to the Inrichment of the Inland Countries, the Inhabitants whereof put off their Proviſions, both for Man and Horſe at very good Rates to the Quæſtors. Such as ſerved the publick in this Employment, brought the Money they received to the Treaſury, thence received their Wages, and ſo the whole buſineſs was managed to the great Convenience and advantage of the State. But Juſtinian took away the Poſt, that lay between Chalcedon and Dacibiza, and compelled all Paſſengers in little Boats, to go from Conſtantinople as far as Helonopolis, though in paſſing the Straits they were in great Danger to be caſt away. The Poſt lying toward Perſia he left as he found, but throughout the other parts of the Eaſt, as far as to the Borders of Ægypt, he left not ſo much as one ſingle Inn, or Stable of Horſes in a whole days Journey, but ſome of Aſſes. Whereupon the deſign of Intelligence was almoſt quite daſhed, and Proviſions lay upon the Hands of the Countreymen; who as we ſaid, were formerly wont to put them off at very good Rates.

He takes away Poſts.

59. He dealt in the ſame manner with the Intelligencers or Spies, who had been wont to be employed, at the publick Charge, under pretence of Merchandizing to paſs into the Enemies Countrey, and even into the Court of Perſia, where having covered their Intentions, they returned with all Convenient ſpeed, and made Report to the Prince; who by this means was ſecured from a ſurprize on all occaſions. But he ſuffered Choſroes the Perſian King, to outdoe him in this point, who giving better Penſions, had ever his Spies reſident at Conſtantinople, and carried it ſo cunningly, that though they ſtill diſcovered all to the Perſians; yet were the Romans quite in the dark, as to the matter of Lazica, and which way Choſroes would take his Courſe. A great number of Camels alſo were wont to be maintained at the publick Charge to follow Armies, and convey the Baggage, that the Souldiers might have all Neceſſaries, and the Countrey might not be burthened by preſſing of Carriages. But Juſtinian took them all away to the great hindrance of his Expeditions. Now the Authour ſays, he will tell you ſomething of his Ridiculous Tricks. There was one Evangelus an Advocate of Cæſarea, a man of good Repute, who grew very rich both in Land and Monies, and at laſt bought Porphyrio a Maritime Village for three Centenaries, or three hundred prounds of Gold.

Diſcourages Spies.

And Camels.

---

* Ὕστερον δὲ καὶ κώμην ἐπιθαλασσίαν Πορφυρείωνα ὄνομα τριῶν χρυσίων κεντηναρίων ἐπρίατο. Etiamſi pagum vocet tamen talis fuit ut Epiſcopi eſſet Sedes. Nam Juſtiniani tempore Theodorus eam rexit Eccleſiam, cui ſucceſſit Chriſtophorus qui Concilio Conſtantinopoli à Menna celebrato interfuit. In Actis Synodicis ſubſcribit, Χριστόφορος Πορφυρεῶνος φοινίκης παραλίας. Unde notat Alemannus ſcribendum Πορφυρεῶνα non Πορφυρειῶνα eſt nomen δεικτικόν. Ibi fortaſſe Tyrii purpuras piſcabantur.

Juſtinian coming to know it, gave him a very little and inconſiderable piece of Money, and took it from him, ſaying it was a ſhame, that Evangelus an Advocate ſhould be Maſter of ſo conſiderable a Village.

Requires ſervile Reſpect to be paid him by Senatours.

60. At length this Bundle of Accuſations, our Authour wraps up in a farther Account of ſome things, wherein Juſtinian and Theodora were Innovatours. In times paſt, the Senatours ſaluted the Emperour after this manner. Thoſe of Patritian Rank bowed down, and did Reverence as low as his right Pap, and Cæſar as he ſo drew back kiſſed him on the Head; the reſt kneeled down on their right Knee and departed: As for the Empreſs, there was no certain Courſe of paying Reſpect to her. But when they came into the Preſence of Juſtinian and Theodora, as well Patritians as others, preſently they fell on their Faces, and with Feet and Hands ſtretched out, kiſſed each Foot and ſo withdrew. She alſo gave Audience to Ambaſſadours, a thing never heard of before, and preſented them at their Departure, as being Miſtreſs of the Roman Empire. Of old, ſuch as ſpake to the Emperour or Empreſs, called them by thoſe Names and no other, and other Princes as their Order, and Dignity required. But ſuch as ſpake with either of theſe, and called not him Lord, and her Lady, and themſelves their Slaves, were accounted Rude and Sawcy, and rejected as Uncivil. Formerly very few, and that rarely came to Court; but now as well as Magiſtrates, all others ſpent their time there. And whereas Judges gave Sentence, and buſineſs was done for Clients either at home or in the uſual places of Judicature without moleſting the Prince, who left all to their own Freedom; Juſtinian and his Wife to the utter undoing of their Subjects, called all their matters before themſelves, and tyed them to this ſlaviſh Attendance. The Tribunals and the Forum, one might ſee almoſt every day without a man in them, but Cæſar's Palace Crowded with perpetual Attendants. Their greateſt Familiars there paſſed all the day, and much of the Night ſpent with Watching and Hunger. Such as were freed from theſe Cares, were wont to talk and enquire amongſt themſelves, what was become of the Wealth of the Romans, and affirm that part of it was taken away by Barbarians, and the reſt thruſt into Holes and Corners by the Emperour. But when Juſtinian ſhall once dye (if ſo be he be a man) whether the Prince of the Dæmons ſhall deſtroy mankind, they that are then alive by experience will find.

The ſecret Hiſtory, a Fardel of ſtuff.

61. So concludes at length the pretended Anecdota, or ſecret Hiſtory of Procopius, a work as extravagant in its Form and Compoſition, as is the matter therein contained. Incredible it is, that a man who had digeſted his other Hiſtories into very good Order, according to the Variety of their Subjects, ſhould patch up ſuch a Fardel of Accuſations with the greateſt Confuſion imaginable, joynting them onely, a Company of Tautologies with trifling Obſervations, and twenty times repeated Exclamations. The ſtyle of it is ſlanting, and nothing ever was ſo full of Oſtentation. Nothing can the Authour relate, but with a Periphraſis. No Sentence but full of ſuperfluous Particles, nothing becoming the Gravity of an Hiſtorian; but the Inſinuations of a Sophiſt. His frequent Tranſitions, Epilogues, and an hundred times reiterated Obſervations upon divers particulars, and thoſe of the ſlighteſt moment imaginable, cannot but Nauſeate the Reader. In this Libel you have one word no ſeldomer than ſix hundred times repeated, to ſpeak of no more; and indeed ſcarcely is there one ſtory or paſſage told, with any moderate Art, Care or Circumſpection. There are thoſe that excuſe him, becauſe he wrote Anecdota, or a ſecret Hiſtory, which they accuſe as generally Obnoxious to ſuch impertinences and diſadvantages, as Tully himſelf pleaded in his own behalf. But let any one ſhew ſuch a Fardel of indigeſted ſtuff, Fathered upon any Man, but of tolerable Abilities: Certainly a man of Reaſonable parts, though he wrote that which he would have concealed, could not have his thoughts ſo broken or diſordered, as to obſerve no Order, Method or Rule whatſoever. His Fears and Jealouſies muſt be mighty high to put him into ſo much diſorder. And he muſt have been as puſillanimous as Beliſarius himſelf, whom he will have to have carried himſelf with that baſeneſs or dejectedneſs of Mind, upon apprehenſion of Death. His opportunities elſe of ſecrecy muſt have been very little; his Locks and Bolts very weak, or the Man ſo poor that he could not purchaſe any cloſe Cabinet, wherein to lay his Papers as he wrote them. Doubtleſs his Perturbation of mind was very high, or his Art was exceeding mean and deſpicable.

Ut τόδε γινέσθαι ξυνηνέχθη, ξυνέβη, ξυνέπεσε, τετύχηκε.

Ἀηίζομαι.

Alemannus.

Publiſhed by Alemannus.

62. Such as he is, he appeared not in Print, till Alemannus (whoſe learned Notes make amends for his rude ſtory) publiſhed him out of the Vatican Library, in the ſixteen hundred and twenty third year of our Lord. In that Library he found two moth-eaten Copies, the one tranſcribed from the other; but both of them them without either Names of the Authour, or Title of the work; both of them without beginning, and the more Ancient without Concluſion, and each of them full of Gaps and void places; in which the Authour often promiſes he would tell many things, he never tells, and diſcovers ſo many Defects, that as it were through the Crannies, you may diſcover Procopius writing in ſtealth and haſte, or forgetting himſelf out of Perturbation of mind, ſaith the Publiſher. For to come to the point, he concludes the Book was written by Procopius, and gives it the Title of ἀνέκδοτα from Suidas, who ſignifies that he wrote a Book under this Name, concerning the matters of Juſtinian, wherein were contained Accuſations and Cenſures of him, and his Wife Theodora, as alſo Beliſarius, and Antonina his Wife. He farther informs us, that there were two other Copies of this Book (the uſe of which in ſetting forth this of the Vatican, he much wanted and deſired) viz. One brought by John Laſcaris from Conſtantinople to Lawrence de Medicis, which as was reported Catharine de Medicis, the Queen, carried with her into France, which yet the French-men enquire after in Foreign Libraries; and another belonging to John Vincentius Pinellus, which was loſt at Sea in a Voyage to Naples; but ſome Fragments were taken out of it by Peter Pithæus, and Guidus Pancirollus, who alſo affirm, that the Title of it was Anecdota. Now by this name Authours were wont to call, ſuch Hiſtories as they intended to conceal from the Age in which they lived; as Cicero calls his Hiſtory, which he began of the Roman ſtate (derided by Q. Fuſius Calenus, as Dio tells us) wherein he Cenſured the Actions, Manners and Diſpoſitions of the Great men of his time, and wrote it for his own Satisfaction, and the Information of Pomponius, and Poſterity.

Sect. 3.

Who will have Procopius the Authour.

Τὸ βιβλίον Προκοπίου τὸ καλούμενον ΑΝΕΚΔΟΤΑ, &c.

Ἀνέκδοτα, ſive ἀνέκδοτος ἱστορία. Quam ſcil. in Abditiſſimo loco Author recondidit, neq; ut reliquos libros ἐξέδωκεν, Evulgavit.

63. Nicephorus indeed it's owned, reckoning up the works of Procopius, mentions one that was written againſt Juſtinian, but he calls it not ἀνέκδοτα, but ἀντίῤῥησιν, or a Detractation of thoſe Commendations whereby he had formerly ſo much extolled him. Hereby, as Alemannus gathers, it ſufficiently appears that he never ſaw this Secret Hiſtory. Neither, you are to know, did any of the ancient Hiſtorians, who though they accuſe Juſtinian of divers things, yet cite nothing out of this Book, nor the later Writers, as Alemannus confeſſeth, who write things quite contrary to it; onely Suidas, as appears by his Collectanea tranſcribed the better part of it, and by a Collation of his Collections with the Text of this Hiſtory, Alemannus would have his Readers believe, that his and the Edition of Suidas were the very ſame. To make us of this mind, he endeavours to poſſeſs us with as evil an opinion of Juſtinian as poſſibly he can, heaping up all the hard ſayings he can meet with in all Writers, if not more than all. For example, Euagrius mentions and deteſts his exceſſive Avarice, and Rapine, and the vexing of his Subjects, of all Ages and Conditions by moſt ſecret and moſt different Arts, and as vile and Impudent Inſtruments. He adds, that places of Magiſtracy, Governments, and other Offices he Sold, and built his Churches, Hoſpitals, and Monaſteries out of the Spoils of private men. He affirms that he nouriſhed the Faction of the Veneti, permitting them to make ſlaughter of the Praſini, and to fill all places with Murthers, Rapines and Devaſtations. In the beginning of his Reign, he preſerved the Grandeur and Dignity of the Roman Empire, to his great Commendation, but when he grew old, he ſo failed of his Duty or Abilities, that he ſuffered it to decay, and made it Tributary, as Menander writes, not onely to the Perſians, but the Hunnes, Saracens, and other ſorts of Barbarous People. Heſychius Mileſius, an Hiſtorian Contemporary with Procopius, derided Juſtinian's Levity, for believing what Tribonianus flatteringly told him, that he ſhould be taken up alive into Heaven. Concerning his Frauds and Deceits, Agathias hath written more largely than Procopius, inſtancing in his Tricks, and producing the Copies of his Letters written to the Leaders of the Hunnes, whereby he ſet them together by the Ears, and cauſed them to deſtroy each other by inteſtine Wars. He mentions alſo his cruel, unjuſt and impious Rapines, committed againſt both the Children living, and the deceaſed Parents.

Nicephorus Calliſti. l. 17. c. 10.

From Suidas. And other Teſtimonies againſt Juſtinian.

64. Farther, Gregory the Biſhop of Tours, and the Hiſtorian of the Franks, tells a very good ſtory how Juliana Amica, a moſt choice and Noble Matron, deluded his Avarice. Victor Tunnenſis relates, that Vitalianus General of the Army, was made away by his Faction. Liberatus mentions his Cruelty and Tyranny againſt the Biſhops of the Eaſt and Weſt, and the Popes of Rome. On the contrary he incouraged the Patriarchs of Conſtantinople in their ambitious practices, and firſt of all Emperours gave them the title of Oecumenical or Univerſal, they arriving at that impious boldneſs, through his Countenance and favour, as to bear up with the Roman Biſhop, and hardly to give place to the Head of the Church. And to this great wickedneſs he added this Crime alſo, that he indeavoured to confirm and eſtabliſh by his Sanction, the Canons of the Conſtantinopolitan and Chalcedonian Councils, whereby prerogative was given to the Biſhops of that City. As for Theodora his Wife, her wicked practices both againſt God and Man were ſo notorious, that Alemannus thinks he needs not cite any Authours for Confirmation of his Aſſertion, onely brings the Irreſragable Teſtimony, and Infallible Judgment and Sentence of Cardinal Baronius founded upon the Reports of ancient Hiſtorians, though he never ſaw as he confeſſeth the Anecdota of Procopius. By this Book he affirmeth that the writings of the later Hiſtorians are to be corrected. Yet where they ſpeak againſt Juſtinian, their Teſtimonies by all means are to be imbraced. For many though they ſaw not this Book, yet recite and confirm the report of his wicked Life. Theophanes tells ſomething, and ſo do Iſaurus an Holy man, the Authour of the Alexandrian Chronicle, Johannes Antiochenus and Suidas: Something alſo Anaſtaſius the Vatican Library-keeper, Paulus Diaconus and Aimoinus: but Zonaras, Cedrenus, Nicephorus, Euphræmius and other Chroniclers give us them by bundles. All theſe had their materials from thoſe Writers that were the Contemporaries of Procopius, and wrote the ſame things of Juſtinian as he did. Theſe were Heſychius, Agathias, Menander Protector, Euagrius, Johannes Epiphanienſis, Cyrillus Scythopolitanus, Theophilus the School-Maſter of Juſtinian, Innocentius Maronianus, Euſtathius Byzantius; and of the Latin Authours, Victor Tunnenſis, Flavius Creſconius, Corippus, Gregorius Turonenſis, Liberatus Afer, Facundus Hermianenſis and many others.

65. But there's no need, ſaith he, of urging their Teſtimony in this matter, there being Domeſtick witneſſes enough to convince the world, that Procopius was no Lyer. Theſe are Juſtinian himſelf, Juſtin his Uncle, and Juſtin the younger his Siſters Son, who being ready to be deſtroyed by the Seditious Veneti and Praſini, reſtrained their Rage by words, which ſhewed Juſtinian to have been Authour of all theſe miſchiefs. Behold Citizens, ſaith he, let an end be put at laſt to theſe publick Calamities. Know ye Veneti, that Juſtinian is Dead as to you; and ye Praſini, that as to you he ſtill liveth. As for the Infamous Courſes of Theodora, her Life and Education, there is yet extant a Conſtitution of Juſtin the Elder, whereby it is made lawfull for Senatours to marry Women of baſe Condition. And for the third part of the Hiſtory concerning Juſtinian's Crimes, though he himſelf confeſs them not, yet he openly acknowledgeth, and ſeriouſly declares the ſource of all theſe miſchiefs, owning that he had taken her to be a Partner of his Councils, who was given him by God, his moſt pious Wife. All Writers plainly affirm, that his Reign had been fortunate, if he had not been Counſelled and Governed by her in the management of his Buſineſs. But Alemannus farther urgeth, Procopius by his other Books, ſufficiently eſtabliſheth the truth of his Secret Hiſtory; for therein he jejunely commends Juſtinian, but lays large Foundations of cenſure and reproach, mentioning more and greater Crimes than he lays to his charge in this Treatiſe, and ſufficiently diſcovering his Cruelty, Avarice, unfaithfulneſs to his Friends, breach of Faith toward his Enemies; his hatred of good men, his love of wicked men, his violating of all Law, Divine and Humane, and ſubjecting all things to the Imperious Humour and Luſt of Theodora.

Hæc omnia apud nos Cogitantes & hic quoq; participem Concilii ſumpſimus eam, quæ à Deo data eſt nobis, Piiſſimam Conjugem.

66. For inſtance, he durſt not take John the Cappadocian out of her Hands, nor prevent the effects of her Implacable Malice, but though moſt dear to him, was forced to baniſh him, and could not reſtore him till after her Death. Though he had concluded Peace with Choſroes, he hired Alamundarus and the Hunnes to make War upon him, to the great detriment of the Empire. The Garriſon Souldiers for want of Pay he cauſed to Revolt. Beſides thoſe at home with him, in the Camp he had two eminent Inſtruments of his covetous Practices, viz. John the Quæſtor of his Army, who, to ſpare the Emperours money, with naughty Bread deſtroyed a great multitude of Souldiers; and Alexander Forſicula, out of hatred to whom, they induſtriouſly ſuffered themſelves to be worſted in Italy. Out of Covetouſneſs he inſtituted his Logothetæ, and aboliſhed all Degrees of Honours at Rome. He preferred the moſt wicked of men to places of Truſt and Dignity, as Acacius and John Zibus. Theſe things and many others he publiſhed in thoſe Volumes, which he gave Juſtinian himſelf to reade, who was not offended with them; and afterward he publiſhed an eighth Book, in which he no more ſpared him, than he had done in his former. For he again inſiſts upon the Souldiers want of Pay, complains that due preparations for War were neglected; again Condemns Juſtinian's prodigality in the entertainment of Iſdigunas, the inſolent Perſian Ambaſſadour. Declares that the affairs of the Empire were come to that paſs, that a yearly Tribute was paid to the Perſians, and great gifts were given to the Hunnes, who made perpetual excurſions into the Roman Territories. And he reprehends Juſtinian's unſeaſonable Levity and Indulgence to his Officers, eſpecially to his Commanders, which brought very much prejudice to the Commonwealth. To conclude this point, ſaith our Publiſher, leſt we be tedious; Procopius ſeems ſo to have compoſed his Anecdota and his other Books which he preſented to Juſtinian, that ſcarcely is there any thing in his ſecret Hiſtory, which by his own confeſſion you may not prove out of his former works.

His Arguments examined.

67. Theſe are the Arguments by which Alemannus will move us not to queſtion the Authority of this Book. But firſt it's no ſmall wonder that it ſhould lie concealed ſo long, and never appear till almoſt the other day. That others of the Ancients ſhould not have as good opportunity to ſee it as Suidas, and that ſo many that have ranſackt the Vatican Library, ſhould never light of it in any Age; for although Baronius was not able to know it, though it lay before his Eyes, he was ſo ignorant of the Greek Language, yet it's a matter nigh to a Miracle, that his Holineſs ſhould neither have a Library Keeper, nor any other Learned Attendant nor Student, who could underſtand that Tongue till Alemannus chanced to ſtumble upon it. Certainly the fortune of the other two Copies was almoſt Prodigious, that the one ſhould be drown'd, and the other loſt and never to be found; that France ſhould be ſo barren of Learned men in the time of Catharine de Medicis, that none ſhould be ſenſible of the worth of ſuch a Jewel, but ſuffer it utterly to periſh. Is there not a ſhrewd ſuſpicion that Cujacius or ſome other Learned Lawyer met with it, and burnt it as a ſcandalous Libel againſt Juſtinian? But in truth, whoever wrote it, it may be termed a ſcandalous Libel againſt Procopius, doing almoſt as much prejudice to his Reputation, as it hurts the memory of the Emperour; So pitifull a piece of ſtuff it is, that the Writer muſt either have been very weak in his Intellectuals, or not himſelf when he wrote it. And can Alemannus excuſe the matter by the Authour's fear and apprehenſion of Danger? Could his Procopius, a man of ſuch freedom and boldneſs, who durſt preſent to Juſtinian himſelf, Books wherein ſo ſevere cenſures of his Actions were contained, be guilty of ſo great puſillanimity? Could he who durſt look a Tyrant (as this Treatiſe makes him) in the face, and tell him his faults to his teeth, degenerate into ſo much Cowardiſe, as neither to truſt to the Juſtice of his Cauſe, the goodneſs of the Fact, nor privacy of his own Cabinet? but as he ſtories it of Beliſarius, at every word to peep and look if any body ſaw him, and to be ſeized with ſuch perturbation of mind, as not to be Maſter of his own thoughts, nor to write a Diſcourſe with any tolerable method, or other qualifications except that of bitterneſs?

68. That which carries moſt ſtrength with it is, that Suidas mentions a Book written by him under ſuch a name, and that as well he as Euagrius ſay the ſame things, as the Authour of this private Hiſtory doth concerning Juſtinian. This indeed makes it ſomewhat probable, that Procopius wrote ſuch a Book, and that if we conſider what manner of Book that of Suidas is, its Teſtimony again will be very much weakned. For firſt, ſome Copies of it tell us, that Juſtinian was 'Αναλφάβητος or void of all Learning, which is moſt falſe, as we ſhall ſee hereafter, even by the Confeſſion of Alemannus. Then if we may credit Poſſenine the Jeſuite, very many things are falſely inſerted into Suidas, as à Sciolis & Schiſmaticis, by Smatterers and Schiſmaticks, and thoſe things are repugnant to Evangelical truth and Hiſtorical ſincerity. But admit Suidas for the Authour of ſuch Stories, as there we find concerning Juſtinian, he is in no caſe of equal Authority and Credit to thoſe Authours, which make contrary Relations to thoſe of his. He was an earneſt defender of very groſs Errours, and ſided with ſuch as were given to Lies and Fables. But rather to give you the Jeſuite's Judgment of him, he tells you he was heretical, and that the Book going under his Name is full of Errours, Fables and Lies; as for inſtance thoſe amongſt many others; That the World was made of the Poetical Chaos; that it ſhall continue twelve hundred thouſand years; that the Sun and Stars are fiery Subſtances, fed and perpetuated by terreſtrial humours; that Paradiſe is Hortus Penſilis, or a Garden hanging in the Air far above the Earth; that Cain was begotten of the Devil; that the Jews worſhipped the Head of an Aſſe, and every ſeventh year Sacrificed a Stranger: In his Narration in the word Nero, touching Annas and Cajaphas, Peter, Pilate and Simon Magus, he forgeth many things: His ſtory in the word Julianus, he calleth mendacium flagitioſiſſimum, or a moſt lewd Lie. As alſo his ſlandring Conſtantine the Great as baſe born, and his Son Criſpus as Inceſtuous: His commending of Acatius and Aceſius two Hereticks, to which he adds, that he writes many things againſt the truth of Hiſtory.

What Credit is to be given to the Book of Suidas.

In Appar. verb. Suidas.

69. In his Relation in the word Apollonius, he praiſeth many things which are monſtrous and utterly to be exploded, and ſeemeth to allow the impious art of Magick and of Divinations. He approves of Apollonius and Danis two wicked Magicians, who are both Condemned to Hell. And to omit very many of this kind of Impieties and Fables which abound in Suidas, his Narration (in verbo Jeſus), Baronius not onely rejecteth, but Pope Paul the fourth for that cauſe beſides ſome others, exploded the Book of Suidas, and placed it in the Rank and Number of prohibited Books. Such a worthy Witneſs is Suidas, concerning whoſe reviling Juſtinian, Gothofrid makes little account, eſteeming his words no ſlander, and imbracing the quite contrary Opinion. As for Euagrius, where he follows Authours of better Note, he is not to be Contemned; but in very many things he is too credulous, fabulous and utterly to be rejected. As what Credit can be given to his ſtory of the Monk Barſanuphius, whom he reports to have lived in his Cell, wherein he had mewed himſelf up for the ſpace of above fifty years, and neither to have been ſeen by any, nor to have received any Nouriſhment? What a worthy Saint doth he deſcribe Simeon Moros, or Saint Fool to have been? How doth he commend Syneſius who as was formerly ſhewed, though he was perſwaded to be baptized and enter into Orders, yet would not believe the Reſurrection was poſſible. We might farther inſtance in the bloud of Euphemia, and ſeveral other idle ſtories; but two there are eſpecially which demonſtrate him, either to have been extremely negligent in the ſearch of truth, or very malitious in perverting it. One is that, Maximianus ſucceeded in the Biſhoprick after the Death of Neſtorius; an untruth ſo palpable, that none can think Euagrius to have been ignorant of theſe manifold and undoubted Records which teſtifie the contrary. The other concerns the Fable touching the Epiſtle and Image of Chriſt, ſent to Abgarus, which Euagrius points out at large, and commends rhe Epiſtle as a true writing of Chriſt, and celebrated by the Ancients, of theſe two paſſages in their proper places. Here it ſufficeth to ſay that Pope Gelaſius, and with him the whole Roman Council, having made a long Catalogue of fabulous Writings, and particularly this Epiſtle of Chriſt to Abgarus, paſſeth this cenſure on them all: Theſe and all like unto them, we confeſs to have been not onely refuſed, but caſt out of the Church, by the whole Roman Catholick and Apoſtolick Church, and we confeſs as well theſe Writings, as the Authours and the followers alſo of them, to be Eternally condemned under the Indiſſoluble bond of an Anathema. Such an untrue and fabulous, yea, according to his own Principles, miſerable and accurſed witneſs hath Alemannus choſen, to confirm the Authority of his ſecret Hiſtory in conjunction with Suidas.

Quæ omnia monſtroſa ſunt & prorſus explodenda.

In Indic. lib. prohibit.

Ante lib. Inſt. valeant calumniæ nos ſinceriora ſequamur.

Lib. 4. c. 32.

70. But beſides the invalidating the Teſtimony of theſe Witneſſes, by making them appear infamous upon Record in his own Court, it's eaſie to bring others in behalf of Juſtinian, who in point of fame and eſtimation even with Alemannus are without exception, and do with a loud and conſenting Voice proclaim that Faith, Piety, Prudence, Juſtice, Clemency, Bounty, and all other Heroical and Princely Vertues were reſplendent in him: Many of theſe being Eccleſiaſtical, we may produce them in a more proper place, where are to be conſidered the Calumnies of Baronius againſt this Emperour; for upon ſeveral accounts there to be mentioned, thoſe of that party labour with all their ſtrength to blaſt his memory, and make him appear odious to Poſterity. Yet their Pope Gregory and others, in whoſe days the ſame Intereſt and Reaſons which now prevail were unknown, give him vaſt Commendations. Gregory often calls him a man of Pious memory, and the Legates of Otho of Divine memory: ſo doth Conſtantine the Emperour, and the whole ſixth General Council, which a dozen times or more calls him a perſon of pious or Divine memory, and moſt Holy Juſtinian. But here Alemannus excepts and tells you in his Notes, how in that reſpectfull manner of ſpeech all Writers are wont to mention the Chriſtian Emperours. They ſpeak in the ſame terms of Anaſtaſius, who was a notorious Heretick. The Fathers of the ſixth Council give the ſame reſpect to Theodora. Andrew the Biſhop of Epheſus in the tenth Act of the Chalcedonian Council, adds to the name of Theodoſius Junior ἐν ἁγίοις, and the Authour of the Life of St. Nilus, to that of Theodoſius Senior ἐν ἀγγέλοις, beſides the Roman Council to Theodorich King of the Goths, though an Arian, gives the addition of Sanctus Princeps. The Emperours all ever are called Sacratiſſimi, and Diviniſſimi. They of themſelves uſe theſe phraſes Numen Noſtrum; their Letters are called Sacræ, Divinæ Literæ, their Court Sacrum Palatium, Domus Divina, and their very Footſteps Sacra Veſtigia. That round kind of Ray or Diadem which Gentiles put about their Gods, and later Chriſtians about the Heads of Saints, are to be ſeen alſo about the Heads of Emperours in their Coins, as a Prerogative not of

Lib. 2. Indict. 11. ep. 10. & lib. 3. ep. 4.

Cent. 6. Act. 3. &c.

Vid. p. p. 12. & 73.

of Merit but of Imperial and Royal Dignity. Nay that moſt Holy Martyr Dionyſius of Alexandria, as Euſebius tells us, gave to Valerianus and Gratianus both Pagan Princes, the very appellation of Sanctiſſimi.

71. It muſt not be denied, but ſuch terms of Reſpect and Honour were given to Emperours, who were wont to aſſume thoſe and ſuch like to themſelves, viz. Divinitas noſtra, & Numen noſtrum, which though ſome later Authours ſo much diſlike and reprehend, yet our Biſhop Mountague in conſideration of their high Place and Office, (in which reſpect, he, who beſt may, hath ſaid they are Gods,) excuſeth the Cuſtome. But will Alemannus ſay it was a thing of courſe alſo, when Councils or other prudent Perſons would exhort Princes to follow the ways of Deceaſed Emperours, who by flattery could neither be obliged nor diſobliged by downright dealing, to propound to them ſuch baſe and profligate Perſons as this Hiſtory makes Juſtinian; or when they would commend their Emperours, to compare them with thoſe who for all manner of Villanies could not but be odious, and ſeemed Devils Incarnate, (ſuch did this Authour think Juſtinian really to be,) rather than men? Now the ſixth General Council to expreſs the great Honour they had for Conſtantine the Emperour then preſent with them, Proclaimed him to be a new Conſtantine, a new Theodoſius, a new Martian, and a new Juſtinian, wiſhing him eternal memory, or praiſe under this Name. A moſt miſerable Praiſe and Commendation had this been, had Juſtinian been ſo notorious a Villain; for then the whole General Council had not onely diſhonoured Conſtantine, but had wiſhed Honour and Immortal Glory to Tyrants and the Devil himſelf, which kind of Praiſing and Praying as Dr. Crackenthorp obſerves, is not very ſuitable to the Piety and Faith of that General Council. If it be ſaid that the Council meant onely in Religious matters, it's eaſie to anſwer that Alemannus, Baronius and the reſt of that Party, condemn him as much in relation to Church buſineſs, as that of the State, and moſt loud Complaints do they make of great Injuries offered by him to Prelates and their Popes eſpecially, which the Authour of their ſecret Hiſtory as one concerned, now and then Inculcates and promiſes he would declare in particulars; but either the Conſternation of his mind, or Conſciouſneſs that he had already done too much, or want of matter was the cauſe that he proved not ſo good as his word. Had Juſtinian been ſo infamous in either reſpect, the ſmell of his memory muſt have been too ſtrong and Rank in the time of the ſixth Council, to have made a perfume wherewith the Fathers intended to make themſelves acceptable to Conſtantine there preſent in their Aſſembly.

Novo Juſtiniano æterna memoria. Act. 16, 17, 18.

72. But if Councils be fallible, let us come to Popes, and let Alemannus and Baronius put both ſorts of Teſtimonies together. Pope Agatho one of their Canonized Saints, in his Epiſtle to the Emperour Conſtantine Pogonatus, to prove out of the Fathers, that two Natures are in Chriſt, adds; And above all theſe, Juſtinian the Emperour of Holy memory, a zealous Defender of the true and Apoſtolical Faith teacheth this, whoſe Integrity of Faith did as much exalt the Chriſtian Commonwealth, as by the ſincerity thereof it was pleaſing unto God: and whoſe Religious memory is eſteemed by all Nations worthy of Veneration, ſeeing the Integrity of his Faith ſet out by his Imperial Edicts, is ſpread abroad and praiſed in the whole World. So Agatho with whom conſented and joyned the whole Roman Synod, conſiſting of one hundred twenty five Biſhops, in a Synodal Letter written to the ſame Emperour Conſtantine, wherein they exhort him to imitate the Piety and Vertue of Conſtantine, Theodoſius, of Martian and Juſtinian the Great, the laſt indeed but the moſt excellent of them all, whoſe Piety and Vertue reſtored all things into better order. Thus is Juſtinian ſet forth in the Letters of Agatho and his Synod, which the ſixth General Council hath approved in theſe words: Peter ſpake by the mouth of Agatho: We all conſent to the dogmatical Letters of Agatho, and to the ſuggeſtion of the Holy Synod under him, conſiſting of one hundred twenty five Biſhops. Conſtantine in the name of the whole Council ſaith, We all with one heart and voice believe and profeſs, and admire the Relation of Agatho, as the Divine voice of St. Peter. And of his Epiſtles Domitius Biſhop of Pruſias adds. I receive and imbrace the ſuggeſtions of the moſt bleſſed Agatho, as inſpired by the Holy Ghoſt, as uttered by the mouth of St. Peter, and written with the fingers of Agatho. Thus by the Teſtimony of Pope Agatho, and an whole Roman Synod, confirmed by the ſixth General Council, to be as certain and true as if St. Peter or the Holy Ghoſt had uttered the ſame; Juſtinian is declared to have been not onely for Faith Orthodox, but for Vertue and Piety renowned, and held in veneration by all Nations, and praiſed of all the World; and to have been more excellent than even Conſtantine, Theodoſius and Martian. It's an even wager thoſe Fathers had never ſeen our Secret Hiſtory.

Præ omnibus æmulator veræ & Apoſtolicæ fidei piæ memoriæ Juſtinianus Auguſtus, &c.

Extat apud. Act. 4. Concil. General. 6.

Ibid. p. 21.

Extremi quidem præſtantiſſimi tamen omnium.

Act. 18. Serm. proſph.

Et Act. 15. 8. 6.
Act. 18. p. 93.

Act. 8. p. 29.

73. Of Authours who wrote in later times Aimonius giveth him this farther teſtimony, that He was for Faith Orthodox, for Piety renowned, a marvellous lover of Equity, and therefore all things co-operated to his Good, and he governed the Empire in an happy manner. The true Paulus Diaconus ſaith to the ſame purpoſe, that Juſtinian governed the Empire in an happy ſort, and was a Prince for his Faith Catholick, in his Actions upright, and juſt in Judgment; and therefore all things concurred to his Good. Others (that we may not be too tedious) give him large Epithets for Piety and Vertue, but Wernerus his words are to be taken notice of, who writes, that He was in all things moſt excellent, for in him concurred three things which make a Prince truly glorious, viz. Power, by which he overcame his Enemies; Wiſedom, by which he governed the World with juſt Laws; and a Religious Mind towards God's Worſhip, by which he glorified God, and beautified the Churches. Platina ſpeaking of Juſtinus his Succeſſour, ſaith, He was in nothing like to Juſtinian, for he was covetous, wicked, ravenous, and a Contemner both of God and Men; Whence it muſt follow that according to him Juſtinian was bountifull, juſt, religious, and one that had regard both to God and good Men. The Chronicon Reichſpergenſe teſtifies, that He performed many things profitable to the Commonwealth, and ſo ended his Life. Munſter writes of him, that He was a juſt and upright Man, and in finding out matters ingenious. And we ſhall conclude with Sigonius, a man as diligent in ſearching out truth, and as induſtrious in turning over the Libraries of Italy, as the beſt of Juſtinian's Ill-willers, who ends the Story of his Life, and of the Weſtern Empire, with this teſtimony of him, that He was a Man deſervedly to be reckoned amongſt a few, (or, that there were but few ſuch Men) for he was a Prince renowned both for War and Peace, a famous reſtorer of the ancient Roman Glory, and without doubt the laſt as well of the Good as the Valiant Emperours of the Eaſt.

De geſtis Francorum, lib. 3. c. 8.

De geſtis Longobardorum, l. 1. c. 25.

Ann. 504.

Ann. 565.

Coſmogr. lib. 4. in Juſtiniano.

Vir inter paucos meritò numerandus, quippe Princeps bello, paceq; inclytus ac veteris Romanæ gloriæ Inſtaurator eximius, ac ſine dubio bonorum ſimulac fortium Imperatorum Orientis extremus.

74. And yet his Friends muſt not deny, but that many Faults were committed during his Government. His Dominions were ſo vaſt, that various Accidents muſt needs fall out, and his Reign ſo long, that often neceſſarily muſt they have been repeated. Thoſe that ſee by the Eyes, and hear by the Ears of others, have the leaſt ground to pretend to Infallibility. Therefore no very great wonder it is, if one go about to reconcile the paſſages, which at firſt ſeem to have been very diſſonant, if not contradictory. He might be good himſelf, and yet have the fortune amongſt ſo many various Employments as the Empire afforded, to be ill ſerved. His inclinations might be right and juſt, but diverted by the importunities and petulancy of an evil Wife, even good men, who are unfortunate in that kind, yielding often to that for quietneſs ſake, which, if left to themſelves, they would never have practiſed. At ſuch diſtance it's impoſſible to aſſign and mention thoſe particular Cauſes and Reaſons of his Actions, which might poſſibly be juſtified, were they known. And for other Authours, whoſe Teſtimonies Alemannus produceth to ſtrengthen the Character given by this Secret Hiſtory, Suidas and Euagrius, moſt of them wrote after, and received their Intelligence from them. Agathias doth induſtriouſly apologize for Juſtinian, and affirmeth, that the decay of Diſcipline amongſt the Scholarii, or Pretorian Bands, began before his time, in the Reign of Zeno the Iſaurian. Whereas the Secret Hiſtorian talks ſo much of his ſavage Cruelty, it appears rather, that he was too mercifull, from the Authentick Writings of Procopius, who affirms, that he ſuffered the ill Officers of his Armies to go unpuniſhed, and relates how Artabanes and his Complices, though they had conſpired againſt his very Life, were diſmiſſed without any great harm received. As for Theodora, he tells us, that ſhe was alway inclinable to aſſiſt diſtreſſed Women. And that ſhe was ſo beautifull, that no skill of Man was able to ſet it forth in words, nor by any Image or Reſemblance to declare it. If therefore Juſtinian was overcome with her Beauty, and ſometimes let her reign as the Miſtreſs of his Affections, he is to be blamed, but no man will ſay he ſubmitted to her humour out of malice, or for want of good Nature.

Goth. Hiſt. l. 3.

Ἡ μὲν εἰκὼν εὐπρόσωπος, ἀλλὰ τῆς Βασιλίδος τοῦ κάλλει ἐλάσσων, ἐπεὶ αὐτῆς τὴν εὐπρέπειαν λόγῳ τε φράσαι καὶ ἰνδάλματι ἀπομιμήσασθαι ἀνθρώπῳ γε ὄντι παντάπασιν ἀδύνατον. Procop. Edific. l. 1. de ſtatua Theodoræ à Byzantiis poſita.

75. Theſe things may juſtly move ſome doubt, whether indeed Procopius was Authour of this Secret Hiſtory. We have little for it but the Teſtimony of Suidas, ſuch as it is. There is neither Name nor Title to encourage us to believe it. Nicephorus cephorus indeed ſaith, he wrote a Retractation of ſome things, wherein he had too laviſhly commended Juſtinian; but this is ten times more than a Retractation, ſuch a ſtreightning of his Pen as makes it more crooked on the other ſide. Such a rude, unpoliſhed and diſorderly piece of ſtuff, ſeems rather the brat of ſome Sciolus, and Pretender of thoſe times, ſome Corner-creeper that was very much diſpleaſed with the Emperour. Upon the account of Religion, and the three Chapters elſewhere to be ſpoken of, ſome learned and judicious Men do conclude, that Euagrius beſpattered him in that manner, as we find in his Hiſtory. And here we find our Writer ſometimes complaining of Juſtinian's ſiding in Religion with the adverſe Party, his ſticking to the Council of Chalcedon, and perſecuting thoſe that were not of his Opinion. But be the Authour of it Procopius, or any other, this particular Cenſure following muſt ſtick to the Book. Part of the matter therein contained (of the manner or contexture we have already ſpoken) is true, and inexcuſable. Part of it is true, and may admit of Excuſe. Some of it is utterly falſe, ſome of it inconſiſtent and contradictory, and ſome of it extravagant, and out of all meaſure ridiculous. For the firſt, it may be granted that Juſtinian was too much addicted to his Wife, and that he too much favoured the Faction of the Veneti. What in private Men may be called indulgence, in this kind, in Princes is great Injuſtice, when the Paſſions of Women come to have influence into Affairs of State. That he ſuffered Theodora to perſecute John the Cappadocian in that manner, he is to be blamed, becauſe poſſibly he did it more out of compliance with her deſires, than for the merit of the Man; and yet this is the cenſorious Judgment of Procopius, and we muſt take his word for it, who though he grants the Man did deſerve as much or more than he ſuffered, yet affirms Juſtinian to have had a more than ordinary kindneſs for him. His too much ſiding with the factious Veneti cannot be excuſed, although it was the cuſtome of his Predeceſſours to addict themſelves to one of the Parties. Vitellius was of the ſame Humour, who ſlew ſeveral of the common ſort, becauſe they had curſed the Venetian Faction, taking for granted that they did it in contempt of himſelf, and out of hope of ſucceſs of ſome new Deſign. On the contrary, Caligula as much favoured the Praſini.

A Character of the Secret Hiſtory.

Suetonius in Vitell.

Lib. 59.

76. Beſides, the demeanour of the Praſini was ſufficiently petulant and provoking. Tumultuouſly and ſaucily they demanded Juſtice againſt Calopodius and Spatharius in the open Cirque, as appears by what Theophanes wrote concerning the Sedition called Nica, which Alemannus * hath publiſhed out of the Vatican Library. His laviſh expences of the publick Treaſure both upon Buildings and the Barbarous Nations, ſeem deſervedly to be cenſured. His Buildings were vaſt, and highly magnificent, and could not be the product of ſo baſe and ignoble a Spirit, as the Secret Hiſtorian makes his to have been, however it be very true, that great Spenders muſt be one way or other great Scrapers, for nothing is more deceitfull than Building, wherein we ſee it commonly happen, and even to wiſe Men themſelves, that the Expences at length double or treble the value of what they firſt deſigned. Indeed he left infinite Monuments, either of Piety or Magnificence, in this kind, and that firſt in Building new, or repairing old Churches decayed: The Church called Sophia, built by him at Conſtantinople, was the mirrour of all Ages. Of this Procopius, ſo great an Hiſtorical Saint with Alemannus, for his Liberty, Veracity and Hatred of Flattery, as an Eye-witneſs, teſtifieth, That the Magnificence thereof amazed all that ſaw it, and was incredible to thoſe that ſaw it not. That the Height of it mounted up to Heaven, the Splendour of it was ſuch, as if it received not light from the Sun, but had it in it ſelf; the Roof was decked with Gold. The Pavement beſet with Pearl. The Silver of the Choire alone amounted to four Myriads, and it was thought to have excelled the Temple of Solomon. Beſides this, he built every where throughout the Empire ſo many Houſes, to the Honour of the Bleſſed Virgin, ſo ſtately and ſumptuous, that Procopius tells you, ſhould you but view and conſider onely one of them, you would think his whole Reign to have been employed in building that alone. At Conſtantinople he built three of this ſort, one in Blacherius, formerly mentioned, another in Pege, and a third in Hierio; beſides others, built in Honour of Anna, of Zoa, of St. Michael, of St. Peter, and Paul, and of Sergius, and Bacchus, (both of which, in the brightneſs of Gemms, excelled the Sun) of Andrew, Luke, Timothy, Acatius, Mocius, Thirſis, Theodorus, of Tecla, and Theodota, all which he raiſed from the very Foundations, with that at Conſtantinople, the Beauty and Dignity of which cannot by words be expreſſed, nor by the Eye ſufficiently diſcovered.

Πολλῶν ὕϐρεων γινομένων μεταξὺ τῶν μερῶν Βενέτων τε καὶ Πρασίνων, καὶ πολλὰ λοιδορήσαντες τὸν Βασιλέα κατῆλθον οἱ Πράσινοι.

Vide Aleman. in notis, p.* 61, &c.

Juſtinian's Buildings magnificent.

As Churches.

De Ædif. Juſtiniani, l. 1. & Glicas Annal. part. 4.

Templum hoc deſcripſit verſibus Paulus, Cyrus, Florus nobiliſſimus Poeta de quo videndus Agathias, lib. vet.

77. He built like magnificent Churches alſo in other Cities, as at Antioch, Sebaſtia, Nicopolis, Theodoſia, Tzani, Juſtinianea, where he was born, at Epheſus, Helena, Nice, at Pythia, and one at Jeruſalem, ſo wonderfull rich and ſtately, that none other might compare with it; beſides, at Jericho, Mount Gerizim, Mount Sinai, at Theopolis, at Ægila, (where even to that time they had ſacrificed to Jupiter Hammon and Alexander the Great,) at Boreion, Tripolis, at Carthage and Gades, or Hercules Pillars, the utmoſt border of the known World, in thoſe days. We ſhould be too tedious, if to theſe we added the many Xenodochies, Noſodochies, and other like Hoſpitals, which he not onely erected, but enriched with large Revenues, being for number equal, and for Expences, it may be ſuppoſed, greater than the former, the particulars whereof the Reader may at his leiſure peruſe, and conſider, in the Books of Procopius, written on this Subject, who, meditating on theſe and other Works, affirms of Juſtinian, That He was never weary or ſatiate with honouring God; quite contrary to what the Secret Hiſtorian alledgeth, that he was never ſatiate with tormenting, perſecuting and deſtroying of Mankind, for which yet as it appears, he took great care in providing Hoſpitals and places of Refreſhment for the diſtreſſed. But beſides the vaſt expences made in theſe Buildings, certainly whatever the Secret Hiſtory alledgeth of his ſtarving his Wars, the recovery of thoſe great Nations the Empire had loſt, put him to infinite charge.

Hoſpitals.

78. For he built and repaired their ruinated Cities, erected Caſtles, Forts and places of Munition, which he furniſhed with the Commodities of Water, Walls, Promontories, Havens, Bridges, Baths, goodly buildings, and other matters, ſerving either for the neceſſity or pleaſure of Habitation. In Media he fortified Daras, in Perſia Siſauranon, in Meſopotamia Baros, in Syria Edeſſa and Callinicum, in Commagena Zenobia, in Armenia Martyropolis, in the other Armenia Theodoſiopolis, in Tzani Burgunocia. He made, as Procopius tells us, all Europe inacceſſible or unconquerable by Enemies. Taureſium, where he was born, he exceedingly inlarged beautified and fortified, calling it Juſtinianea; the like he did to Vlpiana, which he called Juſtinianea ſecunda, and near to it built Juſtinopolis. He repaired all Epirus, Ætolia, Acarnania, and fortified all Greece, as he did Theſſalia and Eubœa, which he made abſolutely inexpugnable and unconquerable, as our Authour affirmeth. The like he did in Thrace, Miſia, Scythia, Libya, Numidia, and at the very Gades; in the recounting of which, and other Buildings, time would fail; but they may be read in Procopius, who concludes, that None ought to doubt, but that Juſtinian fortified the Roman State with Forts and ſtrong Holds, from the Eaſt to the Weſt, and the very utmoſt borders of the Empire. In admiration of theſe works he calls him, The Repairer of the World, and adds this remarkable ſaying, that There hath not been in any Age, nor among all Men, one more provident and more carefull for the publick good than Juſtinian, unto whom nothing was difficult, no not to bridle and confine the Seas, to levell the Mountains, and overcome thoſe things which ſeem impoſſible unto Man. Euagrius who upon the Account of the three Chapters, is rationally thought to have born him malice, ſumms up all thus: It's reported of him that he reſtored an hundred and fifty Cities, which were either wholly overthrown, or exceedingly decayed, and that he beautified them with ſuch and ſo great Ornaments, with Houſes both private and publick, with goodly Walls, fair and ſumptuous Buildings and Churches, that nothing poſſibly could be more magnificent.

Cities and Caſtles.

Vide Procop. ubi ſuprà, lib. 2, 3, 4, &c.

Lib. 4. c. 18.

79. The other great Expences he made were the Gifts beſtowed on the Barbarous Nations, and this the Authour of the Secret Hiſtory exceedingly urgeth, as a demonſtration of his mad Prodigality, Cowardiſe and Baſeneſs of Mind. But Agathias looks upon it as a good expedient, for ſaving both Treaſure and the Lives of his People. And whereas that Authour exclaims ſo much againſt his Cuſtome of ſetting them together by the Ears, and making them ſufficient work at home, he ſeems to pretend not onely to wonderfull accurateneſs and refinedneſs in Piety, but in Policy alſo, which he would have ſo ſtrait laced, as no Princes or Souldiers would ever endure the like. He might have known this was no new Invention of Juſtinian. Tacitus, that judicious Hiſtorian, long before him, affirmed, that the beſt way to conquer the Germans, the Nations beyond the Rhine, was to ſet them at odds amongſt themſelves, and their quarrelling would be the preſervation of the Roman Empire in its greateſt difficulties. What our Corner-creeper ſo much inculcates of his unnatural cruelty, and a venomous or peſtiferous Nature, in being the death of ſo many People, as well Barbarians, as his own Subjects, nay of exceeding herein all men that ever were upon the face of the Earth, raiſes at the firſt view ſufficient cenſure and indignation. If he procured the Diſtraction of the Hunnes, was it not the deſtruction of thoſe Hunnes who endeavoured to deſtroy both him and all his People, and made ſuch Slaughters and Devaſtations in all his Provinces, by their frequent and conſtant incurſions? As for the great Depopulations

Other Expences not inexcuſable.

Duret gentibus (tranſrhenanis) ſi non amor Romanorum at certè odium ſui quando urgentibus Imperii fatis nihil præſtare fortuna majus poſſit quàm hoſtium diſcordiam, lib. de Mor. German.

lations that were made in Africk and Italy by occaſion of his Wars, had it been any other Prince that had made theſe Wars, no doubt but our Authour would have in part excuſed him. Theſe Provinces were lately Members of the Roman Empire, and Juſtinian is generally extolled and magnified for recovering them to the Body; neither could the Vandals or Goths plead any legal preſcription. What he ſo much rails at in Juſtinian, he would ſcarcely have blamed in Alexander the Great, or Julius Cæſar. If he muſt be accounted a common Plague, a Dæmon incarnate, and a bloudy Tyrant, for making ſuch Wars, and upon ſuch grounds and occaſions as he did, what would become of the Memories of moſt of the warlike Princes, that have been ſince the World began, upon ſo ſevere a ſcrutiny? Becauſe in all things he was not an accurate Saint, our Writer for this very Reaſon will have him a perfect Devil.

Vide teſtimonium Alemanni in præfat. initio.

80. If the Nature of our deſign permitted us to examine all particulars, though the great diſtance of time, and want of perfect Intelligence, forces us upon great diſadvantages, yet it might be eaſie to diſcover the falſeneſs of his Allegations, and the extreme Malice of the Writer; we ſhall inſtance in a few. Firſt for Amantius, whom our Authour will have put to death by procurement of Juſtinian, onely for ſpeaking abuſively of John the Patriarch; it appears evidently from others, that being an Eunuch, and ſo incapable of the Empire, he endeavoured to compaſs it for Theocritus, his familiar, and thereupon, as guilty of Treaſon, was executed by command of Juſtinus the Emperour. Some add farther, that he was a notorious Manichee, and thereupon by the Tyrians was called the Rebel againſt the Trinity, and by the Inhabitants of Conſtantinople was ſirnamed Zummas, from an eminent Manichee of that Name. Alemannus his Conſcience would not ſuffer him but he muſt needs acknowledge ſo much, and he onely makes a frivolous excuſe, that perhaps occaſion was taken from this injury offered to John to put him to death, as if ſome words ſpoken againſt a Biſhop, which could be no Treaſon, could afford a more warrantable excuſe for his death, than the Conſpiracy of a deſigned Uſurpation. As for Vitalianus, whom Juſtinian ſo perfidiouſly ſlew, as our Secret Hiſtorian inculcates, Euagrius lays the whole matter upon Juſtinus, his Uncle, never mentioning Juſtinian in the caſe. But this was that Vitalianus who had endeavoured to uſurp in the days of Anaſtaſius, and therefore Euagrius tells us, he ſuffered puniſhment for the heinous offences he had unadviſedly practiſed againſt the Empire of Rome. Theophanes therefore aſcribes his death to the People of Conſtantinople, of whom he had ſlain many, at ſuch time as he rebelled againſt Anaſtaſius. Here it cannot ſeem ſo impertinent to put in our Perhaps, as the Reader may judge it was for Alemannus. Perhaps he who had once a vehement thirſt after Sovereignty and the Imperial Power, might relapſe into his former Diſtemper, and Relapſes, as we ſee, are often deadly, and always dangerous.

Particular falſities in the Secret Hiſtory.

Marcellinus. Euagrius.

Ἀντάρτης τῆς Τριάδος.

Hujus Amantii domus erat quæ deinde S. Thomæ Eccleſia fuit Conſtantinop. ut eſt apud Autorem Originum C. P. & Zonaras confirmat. Vide Alemannum ipſum in notis, p. 22.

Lib. 4. c. 3.

81. How malitious an Inference our Writer makes in the caſe of Juſtinian's falling in love with, and marrying Theodora, let any man judge, eſpecially ſuch as have been themſelves ſubject unto that Paſſion. To grant ſhe was a Woman of the Profeſſion he makes her, yet, by the Teſtimony of the undoubted Procopius, ſhe was a Woman of unparallel'd Beauty and excellent Wit, which the Secret Writer cannot but confeſs, though, good Man, as modeſtly as poſſible. But is the extravagancy of that Paſſion incident to none but the worſt of Natures, to the moſt profligate Diſpoſitions? If a Man cannot conquer that, muſt he needs be the ſlave of all other the moſt brutiſh whatſoever? So he, like a great Philoſopher, concludes, that this ſufficiently declared Juſtinian's Mind and Diſpoſition, without any other token. For whoſoever, ſaith he, refuſeth not ſo to diſgrace himſelf, and is content to appear ſo odious to the World, is in the ready rode to all villany, and having got a brazen Face, ruſheth headlong into the greateſt wickedneſs. But one would think the reflexion of the Rays of Theodora's Beauty could not have neceſſarily produced ſuch an effect upon the Face of Juſtinian, though poſſibly they might have dazled the Eyes of as vertuous a Perſon as the Writer, without any ſuch malignant Influence, if what Procopius (ſo ſevere an Authour) writeth of her be true, that he muſt have been more than a Man (perhaps Juſtinian, who was an incarnate Dæmon, might have done it,) that could either in words expreſs her Beauty, or ſet it forth by any Image or Repreſentation. The Man's Malice is as great in laying the Epibole, or Impoſition, upon Juſtinian, as if he had been the Inventour and firſt Impoſer of it, whereas other Emperours had uſed it long before, and Anaſtaſius being once inclined by the Intreaties of Sabas to remit it, was again perſuaded to continue it by Marinus, the Præfectus Prætorio. Of this we have written abundantly in our Second Part.

Ἀλλὰ τί μοι ἐνδεῖν ἤθους περιμνημονεῦσαι τοῦδε τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, οὐδ᾽ ὁπουοῦν οἶμαι· ἅπαντα γὰρ αὐτοῦ τὰ τῆς ψυχῆς πάθη, &c.

Ἐπεὶ αὐτῆς τὴν εὐπρέπειαν λόγῳ τε φράσαι, καὶ ἰνδάλματι ἀπομιμεῖσθαι ἀνθρώπῳ γε ὄντι παντάπασιν ἀδύνατον.

82. The

Sect. 3.

82. The Reader is farther to underſtand, that in this Tribute, (which was laid upon the Neighbouring parts, when any place by reaſon of Depopulation or adverſe Fortune, was diſabled to pay it's own ſhare in the publick Taxes) Churches were alſo concerned. It happened about Anaſtaſius his time, that the Collectours of Paleſtine wanting an hundred pounds of Gold of their wonted ſum, which was to be raiſed of ſuch indigent Perſons, as were not able to pay it, were forced to exact it of the Inhabitants of Jeruſalem, and the Church of the Holy Reſurrection, as well as other Religious Houſes was conſtrained to bear it's ſhare. But in the Reign of the pious Emperour Juſtin, ſaith the Authour, at the Intreaties of Sabas and others, part of the Tribute was remitted. And at length the Reſidue was fully forgiven, through the Interceſſion of Euſebius the Prieſt, by Juſtinian the Emperour now Reigning. A Notorious piece of Injuſtice both for our ſecret Writer at firſt, and Suidas his Ape from him, as Alemannus believeth, to inſinuate, as if the Epibole was never practiſed till the Government of Juſtinian. The Writer yet in Concluſion tells us, that this ſort of Impoſition moſt prevailed in the time of Juſtinian, and ſo ſecretly muſt grant that he was not the Authour of it, though he had ſaid plainly, that in this Reſpect he was more cruel to his Subjects, than the very Barbarous Nations. Alemannus his Annotatour ſenſible of the Injury, and convinced that in this particular he was rather more mercifull than the other Emperours, (as appears in what he remitted to the places of Jeruſalem, though he had much more Religious occaſion for Money than they) ſtrives yet to mince the matter, and diminiſh his Reputation in point of Clemency; alledging that the Epibole was remitted to the Eccleſiaſticks of Jeruſalem onely. And how knows he this? No Authour affirms it. Onely becauſe no Writer mentions any other place or Perſon, to which it was remitted; therefore he worthily concludes, there was no ſuch thing. But what if the Writings of Cyrillus Scythopolitanus had been loſt, or he had never mentioned this particular of Jeruſalem, would Alemannus thence have concluded that, becauſe Juſtinian in general doth Inculcate the Payment of the Epibole, therefore he never remitted it to any place or Perſon whatſoever? It ſeems he would.

Vide Simeonem Metaphraſtam & Cyrillum Scythopolitanum apud Alemannum in Notis, p. 100.

Lege Novell. 17. & 128.

83. We ſhall onely inſtance in another thing of this Nature which joyned with others, ſhews the falſeneſs and Malice of this Corner-creeper, and that is, Juſtinian's neglect of the Aqueducts, which gave occaſion to the many Slaughters which were committed while the People contended about Water. He aſcribes the want of Water to the decay of the Pipes, and the Covteouſneſs of the Emperour, or rather his Cruelty, and the delight he took in the Death and Deſtruction of his People. But Theophanes tells us another Tale, and writes expreſly; that Water failed through want of Rain in the Month of November, and this cauſed Fights and Contentions about the Fountains, as alſo that in the ſame Year (viz. the thirty ſixth of Juſtinian's Reign,) there was ſuch ſcarcity of Water, that the publick Baths were ſhut up, and Slaughters were committed at the Fountains. And what if we bring proof, that Juſtinian did repair thoſe Pipes? Alemannus produceth it for us, and cites an Anonymus Authour of a Chronicon, who writes that he made new, or repaired Adrian's Aqueduct; which that Prince had made in this City, long before the Seat of the Empire was thither tranſlated. Although he did this at the beginning of his Reign, yet the ſecret Hiſtorian blaming him for this Fault in general, and making no exception, but deſcribing him as wicked both in his beginning and afterward, cruel as well at the firſt, as at the laſt; griping and ſcraping ever, betrays ſufficiently both his want of Charity, and Sincerity.

Μηνὶ Νοεμβρίῳ ἀβροχία πολλὴ ἐγένετο καὶ λεῖψις ὑδάτων, ὥστε γίνεσθαι πολλὰς ἐν τοῖς ὑδρείοις. Γέγονε λεῖψις ὑδάτων, ὥστε σφαλισθῆναι τὰ δημόσια λουτρὰ καὶ ἐγένετο φονοκτονία εἰς τὰ ὕδατα. Vide apud Alem.

Ἰουστινιανὸς ἀνενέωσε τὸν τοῦ Ἀδριανοῦ ὕδατος ἀγωγὸν, ὃν πρὸ τοῦ τὸ Βυζάντιον βασιλεῦσαι Ἀδριανὸς βασιλεὺς ἐποίησε τοῖς Βυζαντίοις χαριζόμενος.

It's contradictory Aſſertion.

84. Now a Taſte of his Contradictory Aſſertions; one will ſuffice, and that's about Juſtinian's Intellectuals. He affirms, he was wonderfully or ſupernaturally fooliſh, and like a dull or ſlow Aſs, was eaſie to be led by the Bridle, moving or ſhaking his Ears alſo, as doth that kind of Animal: Yet all over his Book doth he ſpeak of his extraordinary Sagacity and ſharpneſs of Wit. Alemannus comes in at this dead Lift, and to ſolve the difficulty, diſtinguiſheth of times, and ſaith, he means he was ſo ſtupid and fooliſh toward his latter end, as other Writers do teſtifie; having in his Youth been ſufficiently active and ſprightly. But this will not ſerve his turn: The words of his Writer, who pretends to have written his Hiſtory, ſeven years before Juſtinian's Death, give not the leaſt Ground for this Diſtinction. On the contrary he ſpeaks there in general of his Parts, and Diſpoſition, and upon occaſion of his behaviour toward the Praſini and Veneti, betwixt which Factions fell out the great Tumults, and Diſorders he mentions long before his old Age. And the better to paint him out, he compares him with Domitian, both for his outward Features and inward Diſpoſition. He adds, that he was both wicked and eaſie to be gulled, Fooliſh and naughtily diſpoſed, the greateſt Diſſembler alive, and yet expoſed to the Frauds and Deceits of all Men. Then again after his confuſed Cuſtome, he inculcates that this was his Temper, mixed of Folly and Naughtineſs, being that which he knows not what Peripatetick Philoſopher of old deſcribed, when he affirmed that as in the tempering of Colours, ſo in the Nature of man, things quite contrary might meet and be united. He affirms, that he was the moſt abſolute Artiſt alive, in diſſembling the Truth, concealing his Frauds, his ſecret Indignation, his double dealing, and his private Opinion, having Tears at command, upon any preſent occaſion. And he had need call a Philoſopher he knows not who to his Aſſiſtence, and to mix he knows not what, Stupidity or Stolidity with Sagacity, and the higheſt Art of diſſembling imaginable: Certainly the humour of a Proteus, and the Temper of an Aſs are no way agreeing. This Diſpoſition of a Creature ſo dull, is not pliant enough for ſuch turnings and windings, fit onely for a beaten Path, and a ſlow dreaming Pace. But can black and white both be mixed, and yet in the ſame parts, the ſame thing continue both Black and White, to as intenſe a Degree, as the Colours were before their mixture? By what Peripatetick Philoſophy? It ſeems Stupidity and Sagacity, Sottiſhneſs and ſharpneſs of Wit both flowed in the Brain of Juſtinian, as ſeveral ſorts of Waters are ſaid to do in ſome Rivers, without any mingling or Communication. For a man to be very Wiſe and very Fooliſh, very Prudent and very Imprudent; as to his Habit and Diſpoſition, of very good natural parts, and very pityfull, mean, ordinary parts, half Witted like an Aſs, or almoſt a natural Fool; is ſuch Philoſophy, as could proceed from no Brain, but one ſo confuſed, and immethodical, as was that of our great Juſtiniano-Maſtix, or the Secret Hiſtorian.

Ἠλίθιός τε γὰρ ὑπερφυῶς ἦν καὶ νωθεῖ ὄνῳ ἐμφερὴς μάλιστα καὶ οἷος τῷ τὸν χαλινὸν ἕλκοντι ἕπεσθαι. συχνὰ σειομένων τῶν ὤτων.

Ἦν γὰρ οὗτος ἀνὴρ κακοῦργός τε καὶ εὐπαράγωγος, ὃν δὴ μωροκακοήθη καλοῦσιν, &c.

Its Ridiculous Aſſertion.

85. But it ſeems, he never Traded with the more ſublime parts of Peripatetick Philoſophy; elſe he had better underſtood the nature of Intelligences. So are wont to be ſtyled, what others call Dæmons or Spirits, ſuch as our Writer thought Juſtinian the Emperour to be Incarnate. Now poſſibly one may have heard of a wicked, but ſeldom of dull and ſtupid Intelligences: It's to be feared, that the Incubus begat him not all, but Sabbatius had alſo his ſhare in the Generation, and that one part of his Brain was to be Fathered upon one, and the other part upon the other, which cauſed two ſo contrary Qualities in his Intellectuals. Had he been Prince of the Dæmons, as the pretty ſtory of the Monk, and of Theodora's dream, would make him, certainly they would never have choſen ſuch a Log to their King, if the Election had been at their Diſpoſal. A Prodigy indeed that an Head of Air (as it ſeems his was, for he walkt often without any on his Shoulders) ſhould have ſo much of Earthly Dregs and Droſs in it: And that a Dæmon who had Power to change his own ſhape, and order his aſſumed Body as he pleaſed (ſo it ſeems he did his Face and Countenance) ſhould ſo frame the Organs thereof, as to hinder the Operations of the underſtanding. And the wonder is increaſed if we conſider his high place and calling; for ſurely that Dæmon who was condemned to ſit at the Helm of the World, and enjoy the Sovereignty, and Magnificence of the Roman Empire, could not be of any of the lower Ranks, but an Arch-Dæmon, as our Writers fine ſtories tell us, or one of Ariſtotle's Intelligences, which turn about the Orbs, and with the Heavens give motion alſo to all ſublunary Bodies. To be ſerious, Reader, although the Subject merits nothing but Laughter, and Merriment, it's evident enough, that our Writer thought him an Evil Dæmon, or Devil incarnate, a Fury, an Evil Genius, and that Plagues, Earthquakes, and Inundations he procured by ſome kind of ſupernatural Power, and Malignant influence; judge therefore of the Extravagancy, and Conſequently of the Worth, Credit and Eſtimation of his writing, compare it with the Authentick Books of Procopius, and ſee if thou canſt allow it to be his, in thy moſt inward and retired Thoughts. The Aſiatick and ſlanting ſtyle indeed, ſhews it compoſed by one that lived either near his time, or by ſome other, very able in the Art of Imitation, but compared with that of his other Books, demonſtrates, that if it was his, he either doated for Age, or was tranſported with Anger, and other unſeemly Paſſions. There's Ground enough to ſuſpect it the work of ſome Perſon incenſed againſt Juſtinian, upon the Account of the three Chapters, which raiſed him many Enemies, as we ſhall ſee when we come to handle the Eccleſiaſtical matters of theſe times. If Procopius was the Authour of it: I ſhall not onely ſay with Alemannus, that methinks I ſee him through a Cranny writing in great Fear, ſtarting and looking about him at the end of every Sentence, leſt any body ſhould ſee him; but before that, in the Habit of a Patritian proſtrate at the Feet of Theodora, and beſeeching her to afford him Juſtice in a matter of Debt, owing him by one of her Familiars. Then methinks I ſee her flouting him, and her ſelf ſaying, Patritian, I hear her Eunuchs ſinging out, Thou art troubled with an Hernia, as ſhe had appointed them; after which he retires home in diſcontent, breaths nothing but Anger and Fury, and not being able to doe any thing elſe, takes this Courſe to be revenged both on her, and Juſtinian her Husband, who it's probable, did alſo ſome other way diſoblige him.

Repete Hiſtoriam ex p. p. 69, 70. Secret.

86. Whoſoever was the Authour of the Book, from his Malice, and the miſtake either of Suidas or his Tranſcriber, another Scandal hath riſen concerning Juſtinian, which muſt by no means be paſſed over in ſilence. As he malitiouſly compares him to an Aſs, ſo he hath been reported ſo ignorant that he was not able to reade, that he knew not ſo much as his very Alphabet. Several learned Lawyers as Alciate, Budæus and others have ſwallowed this down, and Baronius glad of ſuch an advantage againſt him, without any Examination of the Truth thereof, runs away with it, and improves it to Oſtentation. Such an one as Juſtinian make Laws of Faith? An Abcedary Emperour, an illiterate Divine; utterly unlearned, who knew not how to Reade: Who could never reade ſo much as the Title of the Bible, no not the very firſt Elements, not his Alpha Beta. He on a ſudden to become a palliated Theologue? He to preſcribe Laws to the Church? And ſo he goes on in the ſame ſtrain. But that this is a moſt lewd Lye, appears by ſeveral particulars. Firſt its evident, that he uſed conſtantly the Converſation of the learnedeſt Biſhops, or Prieſts of his time, † Every Night ſitting up late, and Diſcourſing with them in his Study concerning the points of Chriſtian Religion; which Converſation could not leave him ſo Rude and Illiterate. Then Liberatus who lived about his time, and bore him no Good Will; yet hath recorded that he writ a Book againſt the Acephali or Eutychian Hereticks, in defence of the Council of Chalcedon, and that Theodorus ſeeing him ſo toyl himſelf in writing againſt Hereticks, told him, he ſhould not trouble himſelf with writing Books, but maintain the Faith by publiſhing Edicts. Iſidore teſtifies, that he publiſhed certain Books concerning the Incarnation of our Lord, and made a Reſcript againſt the Synod of Illyricum, and the African Biſhops, wherein he condemned the three Chapters: It would be too tedious to reckon up all the Teſtimonies of Writers, who ſpeak concerning his Books written, and his Diſputations in matters of Religion; and that he wrote himſelf, and uſed not the hands of other men, the Pontifical acknowledgeth as it is cited by Tritemius in theſe words: Juſtinian the Emperour a Religious man, ſent unto the Apoſtolick ſee his Profeſſion of Faith written with his own Hand, teſtifying his great Love to the Chriſtian Religion. In regard of theſe (it ſeems excellent) Writings both Pope Agatho, and the whole Sixth general Council, which ſate in the next Age of Juſtinian, reckon him in the ſame Rank, as we ſhewed before; not onely of Eccleſiaſtical Writers, but of venerable Fathers, with St. Cyril, St. Chryſoſtome and others.

Juſtinian was not an Analphabetus.

† Κάθηται ἀφύλακτος ἀεὶ ἐπὶ λέσχης τινὸς ἀωρὶ τῶν νυκτῶν ὁμοῦ τοῖς τῶν ἱερέων ἐσχατογέρουσιν, ἀσχέτως ἀνακυκλεῖν τὰ χριστιανῶν λόγια σπουδὴν ἔχων. Procop.

Appar. Sacr. in verb. Juſtinianus.

87. But not onely was he skilled in Theology, but in the other Arts and Sciences, which are Hand-maids to that Sovereign knowledge. Agapetus Deacon of the Church of Conſtantinople, and his Contemporary, affirms, That happy time to be fallen out in his days, which one of the Ancients had predicted, when either Philoſophers ſhould be Kings, or Kings turn Philoſophers: Then ſaith he, In reſpect of your Philoſophy, you are eſteemed worthy to Reign, and by Reigning you have not loſt your Philoſophy. That this was not mere flattery, other Teſtimonies make more than probable. As for Example, to ſhew that he was skilled in Muſick; Theophanes inſtanceth in a Greek Hymn, concerning the Divinity and Oeconomy of Chriſt, compoſed by him according to the Church notes, and ſung at this day by the Greeks in their Service. In Architecture he was ſo expert, that as Procopius witneſſeth, he himſelf deſigned and delineated the Models of many Buildings, and gave Rules and Directions to the Artificers; as in the Temple of St. Sophia, the Palaces in Heræum, and the Haven at Conſtantinople; the Church of the Bleſſed Virgin at Jeruſalem, the City of Daras and others. For his skill in the Laws, not to ſpeak of the Compiling of the Pandects, Code and Inſtitutions, which may be objected was done to his hand by others, he himſelf compoſed many of his Novel Conſtitutions. This the ſecret Hiſtorian ſufficiently teſtifieth, though without any Intention of doing him the leaſt right in this Point, affirming that ſuch Reſcripts as were to be made in Anſwer to any Conſultation or Petition, he did not commit to the Quæſtor as the Cuſtome was, but compoſed himſelf; and indeed many more were compoſed, both by himſelf and others, than are now extant in our Books. That which was made at the inſtance of Sabas againſt the Samaritans (mentioned in the 129th, as now we have them) he and Tribonian framed at the third hour of the day, in his Palace called Magnaura. Indeed his ſtyle is ſomething harſh and ſa-vouring,

In Paræneſi. Vide Alemannum in Notis, p. p. 87, 88, 89. qui Juſtinianum his argumentis ab hac Calumnia liberat.

De Ædif. l. 1. 5.

Vide quomodo Alemannus id probat in Notis p. 78.

Ut Cyrillus Scythopolitanus probat.

Sect. 3.

vouring of Illyricum his Countrey; they are full of Words and, like the other Conſtitutions made in theſe times, have not that Elegancy which abounds in the writings of the Ancient Lawyers, yet extant in the Pandects, but have a Taſte of the Aſiatick ſlanting kind of Speech, peculiar to theſe Ages and Places. But although in Compiling other Laws, he uſed the help and Induſtry of learned Men; yet when they offered the Books to him, he ſaith, Et Legimus & Recognovimus, which the Gloſs explaineth by a Nos ipſi, we our ſelves have Read and peruſed them.

Proœm. ad Inſtitut.

88. Therefore Alemannus here forſakes the Cauſe, and tells you it is a great miſtake, that Juſtinian was an Analphabetus. That this Opinion had obtained for an hundred and twenty years, and no more, after the Milan Impreſſion of Suidas, which yet was amended by Demetrius Chalcondiles, a man who very well deſerved of the Greek Tongue. All the Vatican Copies, he ſaith, have 'Ιουστῖνος, and not 'Ιουστινιανὸς, and indeed there are many and groſs miſtakes committed in Books, in confounding theſe Names of Juſtin and Juſtinian, as appears from Euagrius, the Epiſtles of Caſſiodorus and others. Juſtin was Analphabetus, and being towards his latter end grown Childiſh and ſtupid; this as well as other things might by miſtake be aſcribed to Juſtinian his Nephew, who for his excellent Endowments by Theodahatus King of the Goths, is deſervedly ſtyled Sapientiſſimus Imperator and Princeps Doctus, and as Alemannus witneſſeth in an Ancient Vatican Manuſcript, there is this to be Read: The fifth Holy Synod of Conſtantinople in the time of Juſtinian, Doctiſſimi Imperatoris, The moſt learned Emperour. To leave this therefore, and come from his inward to his outward Lineaments: He was of Stature more Tall than ordinary, of a Ruddy and pleaſant Countenance, lookt cunningly, had large Eyes, and uſed the Razor, having a ſmooth Chin, as all the Pagan Emperours had till Adrian; who, as Dion Caſſius ſaith, firſt began to wear a Beard, as afterward Julian the Apoſtate again broke the Cuſtome, and for that was jeered by the Antiochians, againſt whom he wrote a Book called Miſopogon. Yet after Juſtinian, the Greek Emperours generally wore Beards. The ſecret Hiſtorian tells us, he was very like the Emperour Domitian, whoſe Statue was ſtanding in his time. But we know not how to truſt him, becauſe he makes the Wife of Domitian very unlike her ſelf. He tells us, ſhe was a good and honeſt Woman, that ſhe injured or troubled no Man, and never approved the unjuſt Actions of her Husband, and that being mightily beloved, ſhe was called into the Senate, and bid ask what ſhe pleaſed: Whereupon ſhe prayed the Fathers, that ſhe might have leave to bury her Husband's body, and erect him one Crown Statue where ſhe thought fit, which was granted her. Now the ſtory of her Goodneſs, is contrary to what other Authours, both Greek and Latine, have written of her; who affirm her ſo good Natur'd and Honeſt, that ſhe was privy to Domitian's her Husband's death, as not onely Dion Caſſius, but Sextus Aurelius, Philoſtratus, Georgius, Syncellus and others, of both ſorts have related. And as for that other paſſage of her gathering his pieces together, into which the inraged People had torn him, Suetonius making a Narration for his Funeral ſpeaks not one word of theſe things; but tells us, his Body was carried out in an ordinary Biere by the Veſpilones, and buried in the Via Latina, by Phyllis his Nurſe, in her own Suburb. But ſee the Ingenuity of the ſecret Authour: Domitian, he ſaith, had a very good Wife that oppoſed his Villanies, and yet was a cruel Tyrant: Juſtinian had a very bad Wife, which incouraged him in doing ill, nay provoked him to it; yet Juſtinian was as ill as Domitian, nay the crueleſt Tyrant, and Monſter that ever lived under the Sun.

Vide Aleman. Notas, p.p. 18. 36, 37, 122, 124, 125.

Vide Procop. Bell. Vand. l. 1. & Auth. Hiſt. Secr. p. 29.

Apud Caſſiod. Epp. variar. lib. 10. Epp. 9. 22.

Vide formam Juſtiniani, apud Aleman. in Notis, p.p. 28. 77. Ubi hæc.

89. When he ſigned any thing, he was wont onely to write the Letter I, which thereupon is called Juſtinianus Apex by Corippus the Poet. Yet his Uncle not able to write his own Name, as the ſecret Hiſtory aſſureth us, had four Roman Letters cut in Wood, wherewith he was wont to ſign, being firſt moiſtened with that Colour, which the Emperours uſed in ſuch Caſes. This was purple, called in our Books Sacrum Encauſtum (at this day in Italy, Enchioſtro) which was kept in a Standiſh, in Figure repreſenting a little Dog; from which he that had the Cuſtody of it, and brought it ſtill to the Prince, was ſaid to be à Caniculo, being ordinarily one of his moſt inward Councellours, and a near Kinſman. But although Juſtin ſigned with four Letters, as the Ancient Romans, ſome Names with three, others with two, and ſome but with one, as Juſtinian, yet afterwards the Eaſtern Emperours uſually put to their whole Names; but the Letters thereof were folded in ſtrange and ſecrets Knots and Implications, as appears in their ancient Diploma's, like to thoſe which our People have lately got upon their Coaches. But to make an end with Juſtinian, as it's more than time, by his Wife Theodora he had a Daughter, of which was born, as ſeems from the ſecret Hiſtory, Anaſtaſius whom his

C. l. 6. de diverſ. Reſcript.

Vide Alem.

Una litera. ut. M. T. C. duabus ut Cn. tribus ut Ser.

Sect. 3.

Grandmother privately married to Jannina the Daughter of Beliſarius, without Conſent of her Parents. He had alſo a baſe Son called Theodorus Zirus, born after the death of Theodora, if we may believe Theophanes a Byzantine Hiſtorian in Photius; and yet Conſtantinus Manaſſes hath written, that he neither had Sons nor Daughters, nor any to ſucceed him. He was born on the fifth of the Ides of May, in what year is uncertain, as alſo how long he lived, but the moſt probable Opinion is, that he died about eighty. His death fell out on the Ides of November, after he had Reigned nine and thirty Years, ſeven Months and thirteen Days, reckoned from the Calends of April, in the Conſulſhip of Mabortius, when he was declared Auguſtus by his Uncle, and his Collegue in the Empire. Concerning the manner of his Death, there is nothing extant in any ancient Authour. Some later Writers tell a ſtory, that he died diſtracted; but the Ancient Hiſtorians affirm the ſame thing of Juſtin his Nephew, and ſo his Memory is ill treated amongſt them, ſome aſcribing to him the Ignorance and Dotage of Juſtin the Elder, and others the Madneſs of Juſtin the younger, by reaſon of the likeneſs of their Names. But what he was in his Life, we have given an Account more large than we deſired, and more out Reſpect to Truth, and Impartiality than him; although Alemannus thinks Lawyers to be partial to his Memory. His Reign was very full of Action, and the particulars of his Wars ſo remarkable, that they were not to be ſlightly touched. For his Morals, the utmoſt that can be ſaid, for or againſt him; the Reader hath before his Eyes, and let him make ſuch a Judgment and paſs Sentence, as he ſhall think moſt ſutable to the Subject. Here with him we are to take leave of Procopius his Hiſtoriographer, an Account of whoſe Perſon and Writings we deferred to this place; becauſe of the ſecret Hiſtory ſaid to be written by him.

What iſſue he had.

His death.

Vide Alem. quo ſuprá.

Sabellicus & Octavius à Roſbergh.

Ut Menander Protector illius ætatis Hiſtoricus, l. 2.

90. Procopius was born at Cæſarea a City of Paleſtine, and came to Conſtantinople, in the days of Anaſtaſius the Emperour, where he was preſently taken notice of, being a Perſon of very good parts, general learning, and of ſingular Prudence. Juſtin the Elder being in great ſtraits, by reaſon of the Perſian War, preferred him as a Councellour to Beliſarius the General. Suidas ſtyles him his Secretary, but he himſelf who had beſt reaſon to know his own Employment, ſaith he, was his Aſſeſſour. Of what Profeſſion he was, for he arrived at this and other places of Truſt and Honour, Writers do not agree. Blondus and Sabellicus of later times, have fanſied him a Phyſician. But Euagrius, Agathias and Photius call him a Rhetour, an Oratour, or a Pleader of Cauſes; and indeed he was a Lawyer, Men of this Profeſſion being uſually preferred to be Councellours or Aſſeſſours to Generals of Armies and others of the greater ſort of Magiſtrates. Juſtinian coming to the Government continued him in his Employment, being hardly permitted to remove from the Elbow of Beliſarius, either in the Expeditions of Africk or Italy, ſo highly was he valued. No ſooner was the General recall'd out of Africk, but he was ſent to Carthage to Solomon, the then Commander in chief, to ſecure and ſettle the late Conqueſts. How he was particularly employed in Perſia and Italy, at Rome, and Naples, he himſelf tells us; though indeed very modeſtly and onely as by the way, yet theſe and other Managements of Affairs purchaſed him ſuch Repute in the Commonwealth, that being firſt made Illuſtrious, and then a Senatour, at length having publiſhed his Hiſtories of the Wars, he arrived at the Prefectſhip of the City, in the five and thirtieth Year of Juſtinian's Reign.

An Account of Procopius.

Vide Alemann. in Præfat. & Notis ad Secr. Hiſt.

Ὑπογραφεύς.

Πάρεδρος.

Ῥήτορα.

Ille eſt Latinis orator qui cauſas in concione in foro in Snatu agit; hic Rhetor qui in Scholis docet Artem Oratoriam ut benè innuit Hoſchelius.

91. It hath been the fate of his Writings in later times, to be expoſed naked and maimed to the World, though doubtleſs Correct enough when he firſt preſented them to the view of Juſtinian and his Subjects, who received and Read them with extraordinary Favour and Applauſe. The firſt that committed any of them to the Preſs, was Leonardus Aretinus, who publiſhed his Hiſtory of the Gothick Wars, but put a Trick upon the World very much unbecoming a Learned man. For he ſuppreſſed the Greek Copy, and concealing the Authour's name, ſet forth a Latin Tranſlation of his own, pretending it was a Collection made by himſelf out of many Authours, and ſtyled it De bello Italico, dedicating it to Julianus Cæſarinus. The Greek Copy, Blondus Flavius ſaith, was by his Induſtry firſt brought into Italy. But it wants ſome Paſſages, which have been ſince ſupplied, and he inveighs againſt ſome which are now found to be accurate and juſtifiable, and therefore was impoſed on either by the old Manuſcript, or by the Perſon that Tranſlated it for him; and his Cenſure he might well have ſpared, ſeeing, as he Confeſſes himſelf, he was altogether Ignorant in the Greek Tongue. Chriſtophorus Perſona conceiving great Indignation at the Carriage of Aretinus, tranſlated the Hiſtory out of the Original, and did Juſtice to the Authour in publiſhing his Name; but his Edition is very Lame and out of Order. After them Raphael

His works.

Volateran publiſhed in Latine, the remaining Books of the Perſian and Vandal Wars, but from as imperfect a Copy as Perſona; for neither of them, though they were Library Keepers of the Vatican, made their Tranſlations out of the Vatican Copy, which as Alemannus tells us, is complete in all Degrees.

92. In what years the ſeven Books concerning the Perſian, Vandal and Gothick Wars were publiſhed by the Authour himſelf is not certain, although he tells us, they were commonly known throughout the Roman Empire: Yet that a good part of them were come abroad, before the two and twentieth year of Juſtinian, and the Death of Theodora is evident, and all of them before his ſix and twentieth year as he himſelf relates at the beginning of the eighth Book, which he wrote in the twenty ſeventh. But the eighth Book, or the fourth as it's called of the Gothick War, hath no proper Title; for in it he comprizeth whatſoever happened to the Romans, as well from the Perſians and Vandals, as the Goths; and therefore it deſerveth rather the Name of a Miſcellaneous or various Hiſtory, as he ſtyleth it. He Ποικίλη. publiſhed it well nigh as ſoon as it was finiſhed, and afterward as Alemannus will have it, ſet his mind to Writing his Secret Hiſtory; which yet for what cauſe we know not, he deferred till the two and thirtieth year of Juſtinian, in which year he finiſhed it (as well he might) and kept it concealed till the Death of the Emperour full ſeven years. But Juſtinian being much delighted with the Hiſtories of the Wars, enjoyned him to Write another Treatiſe concerning the Buildings, Περὶ τῶν κτισμάτων. which he did at the latter end of his Reign, and wonderfully celebrates him for his Magnificence therein; however the Secret Hiſtory doth beſpatter him. Theſe are the Books of Procopius now extant, of which Nicephorus his Partition is to be blamed, and it were to be wiſhed, we had had Photius his Account of them in his Bibliotheca concerning his Religion, and his heterodox Opinions; the Reader if he pleaſe may conſult Alemannus in his Notes upon the Secret Hiſtory, on which he hath made a very good Comment, and thereby deſerved well of Poſterity, be the Text what it will.

93. But ſee where are we now? What a Proſpect doth here preſent it ſelf. What a vaſt Empire have we beheld, what large Provinces, what Variety of Affairs relating both to Peace and War? Great Armies, great Performances, Strategems and Variety of Accidents, by which the Grandeur and Glory of the Roman Empire hath been revived. Behold what a Precipice! We are deſcending into low, mean and narrow Tracts, and ſhall find the Empire but ſhort, and our ſelves ſtraitned; the farther we paſs, little of Action, and leſs of Performance. Whatever thou waſt, the Greatneſs of Empire, the Glory of Majeſty, the Power of Arms, the Efficacy of Laws, the Renown and Splendour of the Roman Name, in a manner died and was buried with thee O Juſtinian.

CHAP. III.

From the Death of Juſtinian the Great, and the Promotion of Juſtin the Second, to the Death of Heraclius, when the Saracens began to grow terrible to the World.

The ſpace of ſeventy five years.

Juſtin ſucceeds his Uncle.

1. J*VSTINIAN* being Dead, Juſtin ſucceeded him, the Son of Vigilantia his Siſter, and Dulciſſimus; in the fourteenth Indiction, the ſeventh of John the Roman Patriarch, in the fifty firſt of Clotarius King of the Franks, in the DLXV year of our Lord.

Vigilantiæ nomen latinè inflexum Exiſtimat Alemannus ex Illyrico nomine Bigleniza, quod Juſtiniani Imp. matris vocabulum fuit. Procopius Græcorum more eam Biglantiam vocat; ſic apud Mauritium in ſtrategicis Βίγλα & Βιγλίζειν vigilia, vigilare. Errores quos in Juſtiniani genealogia texenda commiſerunt Arnoldus Panvinius, Trithemius, vide tibi in diagrammate ob oculos poſitos apud Alemannum in Notis, p. 67. De initio Juſtini vide Baron. Quis memorare poteſt tanta miracula pompæ?

2. His Uncle dying about midnight, he was raiſed out of his Bed by Callinicus the Præpoſitus Excubitorum, and adviſed to beſtir himſelf for the Imperial Diadem. Coming then to Court, he found the Senate very ready to accept him for their Prince, and took immediately the Government upon him, while in the mean time his Relations take care of the dead Body of his Predeceſſour. Sophia the Neice of Theodora and her ſucceſſour alſo in the Imperial Dignity, as the Wife of Juſtin, covers it with a very rich Cloth, wherein are imbroidered the Actions of the Deceaſed Emperour, and at length it's carried forth to Burial, with miraculous pomp, as Corippus the Poet phraſeth it, who hath excellently deſcribed the manner thereof. But e'er the Body was Buried, Juſtin had taken the Enſigns of Majeſty which he performed in a Religious manner, firſt making his Prayers to his Saviour, and then receiving the Benediction of John the Patriarch of Conſtantinople, with the Crown from his Hands. This Ceremony over, and the Acclamations made, he now ſeated in his Throne, makes a ſpeech to the People, and perceiving ſome amongſt them to make complaint of the Debts owing them by his Uncle, ordered them preſently to be paid. He appeaſed the factious Veneti and Praſini with a courageous Meſſage, bidding the Mandator (who was the Emperour's Officer in the Cirque, as the Quæſtor was in the Senate,) tell the Veneti that Juſtinian as to them was Dead, and the Praſini that as to them he ſtill lived, which having received, they became quiet and ſo remained afterward. But to pleaſe the People in general, he promiſed to reſtore the Conſulſhip, and accordingly when the firſt of January came, he took upon him that Title, and gave a donative to them according to the ancient cuſtome, going to Church there to worſhip Almighty God after the Chriſtian manner, as the Pagan Conſuls were wont to aſcend into the Capitol.

Pontificum ſummus plenáque ætate venuſtus
Aſtantem benedixit eum, cælique parentem
Exorans Dominum ſacro diademate juſſit
Auguſtum ſancire caput, ſummóque coronam
Imponens apici, &c.

Theophanes Vide Alem.

He appeaſes the factions of the Cirque.

Takes the Conſulſhip.

Vide Corippum.

3. Such was the beginning of Juſtin, who ſo ſeemed to have eſtabliſhed himſelf, that he feared not the Incurſions of the Barbarous Nations. Not long after his entrance upon the Conſulſhip, he gave audience to the Ambaſſadours of Gaganus King of the Avari, who came to demand the Penſion formerly paid them by Juſtinian, to purchaſe the quiet of his Provinces; but Juſtin flatly refuſed to pay them any, and ſent them home as empty as they came, threatning to chaſtiſe their Inſolence with War, if they preſumed to offer any violence to his Subjects. This perhaps he might be more bold to ſay, becauſe Photius hath it in his Bibliotheca from Theophanes an Hiſtorian of Conſtantinople, that the Turks a people inhabiting the parts lying upon the Tanais toward the Eaſt, (of old called Maſſagetes, but by the Perſians in their own Language Chermichiconæ,) ſent their Ambaſſadours to him with Preſents, deſiring him that he would not patroniſe the Avari their greateſt Enemies. What ſucceſs this Courage and Confidence of Juſtin had we ſhall ſee hereafter. His beginning was very good, had he but continued in the ſame courſe of Vertue, but he preſently began to fall off into a voluptuous ſort of Life, and to maintain and nouriſh the fire of his Luſt and brutiſh appetite, ſcraped money together in any unlawfull manner whatſoever, ſelling and making money of all things, and without reſpect to that God he had at firſt pretended ſo much to honour, expoſing to ſale the Church preferments, even to the vileſt ſort of the People. And he preſently gave the world a notable ſign of his intemperate mind, in publiſhing in his very firſt year ſeveral Conſtitutions concerning Marriage. By one he repealed the penal Laws of Juſtinian made againſt unlawfull Marriages, refuſing to ſeparate ſuch as had contracted them. This bears date on the firſt of January; But a worſe followed the next September, which made it lawfull to break any Marriages, the conſent of the Parties firſt obtained.

Euagrius l. 5. c.

Juſtin. Novel. Conſt. 3. apud Julian.

Apud Novel. Juſtiniani 140. tit. 23.

4. “ In this Conſtitution he begins with a commendation of Marriage, as a venerable thing in reſpect of the procreation of Children, without which all Countries and Cities muſt at length turn Deſolate, and all Commonwealths come to “ nothing. Therefore he wiſhes it were always ſo fortunate, that without juſt “ cauſe it need never be diſſolved. But foraſmuch as amongſt ſuch multitudes of “ people, it's impoſſible but that ſome times vehement and irreconcileable differences “ muſt ariſe, he thinks fit to find out a remedy for this Diſtemper, eſpecially in “ ſuch a caſe where the hatred betwixt Man and Wife are ſo great, that there is no “ means to be found for a Reconciliation. Now the ancient Laws permitted ſuch “ to be divorced, provided it were done by conſent of both Parties. And many “ ſuch Laws there were, ſuch a diſſolution of Matrimoney was alſo ſaid to be “ made bonâ gratiâ in the vulgar Tongue. But afterward that moſt Sacred Prince “ his Father, (who in Piety and Wiſedom excelled all Princes that ever Reigned,) “ out of his own benign and conſtant temper and inclination, and a ſenſe of the “ miſerable and puſillanimous condition of others, made a Law that forbad Marriages to be diſſolved though by conſent, which he wiſhes heartily might remain “ in it's force and vigour. But many he ſaith had addreſſed themſelves to him, “ and ſignified a great hatred and averſion they had to the matrimonial bands “ wherewith they were naturally incumbred, and (which is worſe and ought ſeriouſly to be lamented,) great Bickerings, Quarrels, and Strifes, had already ariſen “ as both Parties complained in way of Accuſation, and therefore deſired their “ Marriages might be nulled, although they could not alledge any Cauſes or Reaſons allowable in Law for ſo doing. He tells us, he had ſometimes lovingly admoniſhed, and ſometimes threatned, endeavouring to compoſe theſe differences, “ and end theſe diſtractions in an amicable way, not ſuddenly condeſcending “ to what they deſired. But he nothing profited thereby, it being a thing exceeding difficult, to reconcile ſuch as have conceived an inveterate hatred; for the “ breaches grew ſtill wider, and ſome proceeded from Quarrels to Conſpiracies, “ and at length it came to poyſonings and other miſchievous devices; ſo that ſometimes it happened, that Children which ought to be Pledges of mutual Love, “ could not reduce them to a good underſtanding.

He makes it lawfull to diſſolve Marriages by conſent.

Hæc conſtitutio extat in Conſt. Juſtini quam non poſſis niſi injuſtam & injuſtiſſimam dicere. l. 8. c. de Repudiis. Reducitur Jus Vetus, l. 60, 61, 62. D. de donat. inter vir. Nov. 22. c. 4. abrogata. Nov. 17. c. 10.

*Bonâ gratiâ dicitur matrimonium diſſolvi, quoties diſſolvitur volentibus conjugibus. Bonâ gratiâ idem eſt apud Tertul. lib. de Monogamia, amicâ ſeparatione viduari. Sed ex bona gratia Matrimonium diſſolvitur aliquando ex cauſa ut d. l.*60,61,62. interdum ſine juſta cauſa ut hic.

5. “ Foraſmuch therefore, he ſaith, as theſe things are not at all convenient for “ the times wherein he Reigned, he betakes himſelf to this preſent Conſtitution, “ whereby he decrees and ordains that it be lawfull, as formerly it was, to diſſolve “ Marriages by conſent, and Repeals what formerly his Father by his Sanction had “ ordained againſt ſuch as ſo ſolemnized them. For if mutual affection cauſeth “ Matrimony, with good reaſon the contrary Inclination by mutual conſent diſſolveth it; provided this be declared by bills of Divorce ſent for the ſame purpoſe. “ Provided alſo that what by other Laws, eſpecially by the ſacred Conſtitutions of “ his Father, had been ordained concerning free Marriages, and the cauſes by “ which it was permitted to diſſolve Matrimony, as alſo concerning them, who “ without any cauſe ſeparated themſelves, and the penalties inflicted upon them, “ by virtue of this preſent Conſtitution, retain their full effect, power and virtue. “ Then follows his Epilogue, whereby he enjoyns that, what by this Law he had “ declared and publiſhed, ſhould after the wonted manner be expoſed to the view “ of the people in the City of Conſtantinople, and he dates it on the eighteenth of “ the Calends of October. Now the Reader muſt know, that formerly this Conſtitution was taken for Juſtinian's being crowded amongſt his Novels, but later Interpreters have diſcovered the miſtake, and Baronius being in a very good mood, tells you he is wronged; foraſmuch as Juſtin teſtifieth that the contrary to it had been decreed by Juſtinian. He tells you that you may nothing doubt hereof, you have the edition of Julianus the Anteceſſor, wherein this Conſtitution being recited is aſcribed to Juſtin and not to his Uncle. And this he was obliged to ſay, to vindicate Juſtinian from the Calumnies which ſome have faſtned upon him.

Jure veteri inter volentes quavis de cauſa permiſſum repudium.

Sed vide C. de Repud. l. 8.

Ad Ann. 566. num. XI.

He turns Cruel.

Lib. 5. c. c. 1, 2.

6. However Juſtin pleaſed the ordinary people by this new Law concerning Marriages, he diſguſted all ſober Perſons by his bloudy Actions the year following, putting to Death ſeveral men of extraordinary Eminency. The principal of theſe was Juſtin his Kinſman, of whom being employed much in the Wars we have often heretofore made mention. Euagrius writes, that Juſtin the Emperour being intangled with two contrary Vices, Foolhardineſs and Cowardiſe, firſt commanded Juſtinus his Kinſman to come to his preſence, a man of great Honour and Eſtimation, both for his great Abilities in War, and other rare accompliſhments of his Perſon, who then reſided about the River Danubius, to reſtrain the Incurſions of the Abari. Theſe Abari he tells us were a People of Scythia, and part of thoſe called Amaxobii, inhabiting the Regions beyond Caucaſus, but being driven out of their Countrey by the Turks their Neighbours, and variouſly infeſted by them, they came firſt to Boſphorus, and thence quitting the Coaſts of the Euxine Sea, (inhabited by Barbarians, though the Cities and ſtrong Holds were in the hands of the Romans,) they held ſtreight on their Voyage, and ſubdued all Barbarous Nations before them till they came to the Danube, whence they ſent Ambaſſadours to Juſtinian the Emperour. Hence now was Juſtin recalled to reap the benefit of the Agreement, as was pretended, made formerly betwixt him and Juſtin now Emperour; for ſeeming both to be of equal fame, and as well the one as the other, capable of the Empire, after long debates had about the Imperial Power, they covenanted betwixt themſelves, that whetherſoever of them were Crowned Emperour, ſhould make the other the ſecond Perſon in Honour, and though ſecond in reſpect of the Emperour, yet he ſhould be firſt in reſpect of all others. At firſt therefore that Juſtin who was preferred to the Empire, imbraced the other with counterfeit kindneſs, but by little and little forged Crimes againſt him, took from him his Guard and Train, commanded him to keep his Houſe, and at length ordered him to be hurried away to Alexandria, where about midnight he was cruelly Murthered in his Bed, and received this recompence for the love he bore to the Commonwealth, and the notable Service he had done in the Wars. And yet by this were not the Fury and Rage of the Emperour and his Wife mitigated, but they muſt ſee his Head after it was cut from his Shoulders, and kick it with their Feet in an inſulting and ſcornfull manner.

Turcas veteres non ignoramus ſiquidem eorum meminit Plinius & adnumerat eos inter eas gentes quæ circa Mæotidem paludem habitarunt, horum etiam meminit Agathias, lib. 1.

Murthers Juſtin his Kinſman.

Puts to Death Ætherius and Addæus.

7. Not long after Juſtin called to Judgment Addæus and Ætherius two Senatours, and in great place and eſteem with Juſtinian, accuſing them both of moſt heinous Crimes. And Ætherius confeſſed he had deſigned to Poyſon the Emperour, and that Addæus was of his Council herein, and conſcious to all his Purpoſes. But with ſolemn and dreadfull Oaths, Addæus proteſted he was altogether Innocent, yet both of them loſt their Heads. Addæus at his Execution confeſſed freely, that though he was not guilty of that Crime for which he was Condemned in the leaſt, yet he had deſerved that puniſhment from the juſt hand of Almighty God, who both ſees and puniſhes wicked perſons; For he had by Inchantments made away Theodotus, Prefect of the Palace. Whether theſe things were ſo Euagrius is not able to ſay, but affirms that both theſe were wicked Perſons, for Addæus was a Sodomite, and Ætherius deviſed all ſorts of Calumnies againſt Innocent men, and under colour of ſerving the Emperour in his Office of Prefect of his Court, ſpoiled both the Living and Dead in the Reign of Juſtinian. So went matters at Conſtantinople, while all things were thought to be in repoſe in the Weſtern parts, and eſpecially in Italy, where the Goths and Franks had been lately defeated, ſo that no danger at all ſeemed to threaten that Countrey. But a great Noiſe was preſently heard of Barbarians, that again were crouding and ruſhing into it, filling all places with terrour and amazement, and putting to ſilence all other motions, as great Thunders and Concuſſions are wont to ſuppreſs leſſer ſounds. Theſe were the Lombards who were now making their expedition into Italy; upon what Inducements, and in what manner we come to ſhew after that we have firſt made ſome ſhort Obſervations concerning the Original of this People, which grew afterward ſo conſiderable in Italy, and the name and fame of which is not extinct at this very day, their name ſticking to their Countrey.

The Lombards invade Italy.

The Original of them.

8. As for their Original then, it may without much difficulty be gathered out of ancient Writers, that the Vandals, Oſtrogoths, Weſtrogoths, the Gepidæ, and Lombards, all owe their deſcent to the Iſland or rather Peninſula of Scanzia. As alſo that the Goths properly ſo called, and the Gepidæ and Vandals were of the ſame Gothick ſtock, and that the Longobards, or Lombards, or Longbeards, (for none doubts but that from the length of their Beards they had their Name,) were deſcended from the Gepidæ. Theſe Gepidæ were ſo called, becauſe when the Goths made an expedition expedition out of Scanzia in three Ships, they ſailed ſlower than the reſt, and ſtaid in an Iſland of the River Viſtula. Yet from their roving and wandring abroad were they alſo named Winili, the ſame as to ſignification of the word with Wandali, a diverſe pronunciation of the ſame word, which uſually happeneth in proceſs of time making it be taken for ſeveral. Theſe Winili or Langobards being grown in the Iſland to ſuch a multitude, that it could not maintain and nouriſh them all, divided themſelves into three parts, one whereof, on which the Lot ſhould fall, muſt ſeek themſelves out new Habitations. Forced therefore to quit their Native Countrey, they choſe two Brothers for their Captains Ibor and Ago, the Sons of one Gambara, a Woman very eminent for her Wiſedom, and came into a place called Scoringa, where they remained for ſome years. At this time it happened, that the Vandals infeſted all the Countries adjoyning, and puffed up with their ſucceſs, ſent to the Winili requiring them either to pay Tribute, or inſtantly prepare themſelves for War. Ibor and Ago the two Captains, by the advice of their Mother, returned anſwer they would fight rather than live in Servitude, conſidering that although their followers were not many in number, yet active and courageous, being as themſelves in the flower of their Age. Acted by this natural heat and vigour and a conſideration of their liberty they fought ſo ſtoutly, that they obtained a Victory over the Vandals; but being ſorely diſtreſſed with Famine, they reſolved to quit Scoringa, and find out ſome better Seat.

Plinio dicitur Scandinavia, Ptolemæo Scandia, Jornandi Scandza, Procopio Thule. Continet partem Norwegiæ & Daniæ. Gepait Germanis Is qui moram trahit.

Vide Grotii Prolegom. in Hiſtor. Goth. Vandal. & Langobardorum.

Paulus Warnefridus Langobardi filius Diaconus Forojulienſis de Geſtis Langobard. lib. 1. c. c. 1, 2, &c.

Under Conduct of Ibor and Ago they fall into Scoringa.

9. Making then for Mauringa, the Aſſipitti denied them paſſage through their Territories, at which being much troubled, and fearing their ſmall Numbers would not be able to make good the Attempt, they betook themſelves to a Strategem, and raiſed a rumour amongſt thair Enemies that they had amongſt them, Cynocephali or men with Heads like to Dogs, who fed on Man's bloud, and when an Enemy was wanting, on their own. To ſtrike a greater terrour into the Aſſipitti, they inlarge their Camp, and kindle many fires, which with the other report ſo terrified them, that they had not the Courage to Ingage, but having one amongſt them of great eſteem for ſtrength and Courage, offered him to fight with any one of the Lombards whom they ſhould pick out; if their Champion overcame, the Paſſage ſhould be denied, but if the Lombard ſhould be Victour, then ſhould it be granted free and without moleſtation. When the Lombards conſidered who to chuſe, a certain Slave offered himſelf, deſiring that in caſe he overcame, the ignominy of Slavery might be taken away both from him and his Family, which granted, he fought and overcame his Adverſary. Then did the Lombards paſs into Mauringa, where to increaſe the number of Warriours they manumitted many Slaves, and making no long ſtay there, they proceeded to Gotland, where having ſtaid alſo ſome time, they poſſeſſed themſelves of Anthabet, Bathaib and Vurgundaib for ſome years, which Paul conjectureth to be names of certain Towns or Places. In this mean time Died Ibor and Ago, who firſt brought them out of Scandinavia, and had governed them till now.

They Paſs into Mauringa.

10. They being Dead, the Lombards reſolved to have no more Captains, but a King to govern them after the manner of other Nations. They made choice therefore of Agelmund the Son of Ago, who exerciſed this Office three and thirty years. At this time it happened that a certain Strumpet was delivered of ſeven Boys, which ſhe caſt into a Fiſhpond, and thither by chance in his way came King Agelmund, who eſpying the Children ſtopt his Horſe, and ſtirring them with his Spear, it fortuned that one of them took faſt hold of it with his hand. The King amazed thereat, foretold he would be a more than ordinary man, and commanded him to be taken up and delivered unto a Nurſe, calling him Lamiſſio, from Lama, which in their Language ſignified a Fiſhpool. When this Lamiſſio was grown up, they reported that the Amazons forbad the Lombards to paſs a certain River, whereupon it was agreed, that the moſt valiant amongſt them ſhould fight with him in the Water ſwimming, on condition that if the Amazon overcame Lamiſſio, the Lombards ſhould withdraw, but if he got the better, they muſt then have free paſſage. He fought with her and got the Victory, as the fable went, and the Lombards paſſing the River, ſtill made farther progreſs, till growing ſecure through their conſtant Succeſs, the Bulgares fell upon them by Night, and wounding many killed ſome, amongſt whom fell Agelmund their King, and his onely Daughter was taken Priſoner. Yet the Lombards taking Courage choſe Lamiſſio for their King, who being a ſtout and active young man, thirſted after nothing ſo much as to revenge the Death of his Predeceſſour, but at the firſt encounter, his men were worſted and beaten diſgracefully to their Camp.

They chuſe Agelmund for their King.

Lamiſſio quaſi Lamis ſohn, Piſcinæ filius.

After him Lamiſſio.

11. Lamiſſio exceedingly concerned at their flight, teſtified his reſentment thereof both by words and geſture, putting them in mind of the Infamy they contracted by not revenging the Death of their King, and the Captivity of his Daughter deſigned by them for his Wife, and partly by threats, and partly by good Language and rewards, he ſo wrought upon them that they fell violently upon the Bulgares, and after a moſt bloudy Conteſt, gave them a great Overthrow, which done, they beſtowed a Royal Funeral on the King's body, and being inriched with Plunder, became more hardy and reſolute to endure the labours of War. After Lamiſſio's Death, Lechu Reigned almoſt fourty years, and then his Son Hildehoc who was followed by Gudehoc. In thoſe days there was War betwixt Odoachar, (ſo Paul the Hiſtorian calls him,) who Reigned ſome years in Italy, and Feletheus or Fema King of the Rugi inhabiting then on the other ſide of the Danube, which ſeparated thoſe Coaſts from the borders of Noricium. Feletheus and his Wife Giſa not being reclaimed from their wicked Courſes, by all that Severinus a Religious Perſon, having a Monaſtery in their Dominions, could ſay unto them, Odoachar muſtered up all his Forces conſiſting of Turcilingi, Heruli and ſuch Rugi as he had already brought under his Dominion, beſides the people of Italy, and came into Rugiland where he deſtroyed both Feletheus and his followers, which done, he returned into Italy, carrying with him in triumph great numbers of Captives. The Lombards, as no Land is loſt for want of Heirs, then came into Rugiland, and finding it a fertile Countrey, made their ſtay there for certain years.

Then Others.

They paſs into Rugiland.

Gudehoc, bonum Latibulum. Giſa in voc. Alem. Giſo. Gizo Contract. ex Giſelbreht, Comitum copioſus, in vocab. Allem. Giſalbert, Giſalbret, Giſalbreht, Giſelbertus. Inde Contract. Gilbert. Ruge-lant hirſuta terra nos hodie Rough & Ruggid pro Ruge.

12. In the mean time their King Gudehoc dies, to whom ſucceeds Claffo his Son, and after him Reigned his Son Tato the ſeventh King in order. The Lombards alſo now departed out of Rugiland, and inhabited in open Champions in the Barbarous Language called Feld, where making their abode for three years, a Quarrel and War aroſe betwixt Tato, and Rodulphus King of the Heruli. The Brother of this Rodulphus being ſent upon an Embaſſy, for procurement of Peace and a good underſtanding, as he returned home again, chanced to paſs by the Houſe of Rumetruda the King's Daughter, who ſeeing a great train and equipage, asked who it was that paſſed by, and receiving for anſwer that it was the Brother of Rodulphus, invited him to drink a glaſs of Wine. In he came, but being a man low of Stature, and of a mean Preſence, ſhe derided him, which not able to bear, he returned her as biting Language, and this ſo netled her, that diſſembling her malice, and inviting him to ſit down with his Head to a Window, ſhe thence cauſed him to be killed with Lances. His Brother Rodulphus at the News grew very impatient, and denouncing War to Tato, their Armies faced each other in the open Field. Rodulphus orders his men to be ready for Battel, but ſits at Play in his Tent deſpiſing his Enemies, and being confident in the ſtrength of his own Souldiers, who of late had been very Victorious, and either that they might be more Nimble, or out of contempt of Danger, were wont to fight without any other covering than onely ſomething tied about their privy Members. One of his Attendants he commanded to climb a Tree near at hand, and as ſoon as he ſaw the Lombards run, to tell him, threatning to cut off his Head if he brought him News of the flight of the Heruli. The Fellow therefore out of fear, though he ſaw them give ground, durſt not let the King know ſo much, but ever as he asked him what he ſaw, anſwered that the Heruli did gallantly demean themſelves, and concealed their fortune till ſuch time as they were abſolutely routed; and he cried out woe be to thee O miſerable Herulia, againſt whom Almighty God is incenſed, or to this purpoſe. At theſe words the King ſtartled, demanded of his Watchman if his Heruli fled, to which he replied 'tis not I, but thou O King that ſayeſt it. Confounded hereat, he and his Courtiers knew not what courſe to take, and the Lombards coming upon them made great ſlaughter, killing King Rodulphus amongſt the reſt.

They inhabit Champion Countries.

War with the Heruli.

Rodulphus their King ſlain.

Claffo contract. ex claf-maer reſonantis famæ. Taſo, Tato, Tazo, Trazo apud Procop. in voce Allem. Taſſo, Tatto coacervator. Feld nunc noſtratibus Field propriè campus patens. Rume-trud, celebratæ fidei. Cum rebus pugnant nomina ſæpe ſuis.

13. The Heruli were ſo diſtracted through fear, or from ſome higher cauſe, that they took the green fields for water, and ſtretching out their Armes and Bodies to ſwim, were miſerably cut in pieces by the perſuing Enemy. The victorious Lombards then divided the Plunder, and Tato for his ſhare took the Standard of Rodulphus, called Bandum, with the Helmet he was wont to wear in Battel. The Valour of the Heruli became extinct, together with Rodulphus, after whom they refuſed to have any more Kings. But the Lombards on the contrary took ſuch courage, that increaſing their Armies by the ſeveral Nations they had ſubdued, they ſought after all occaſions of Trophies and Glory. But not long after the Triumph Tato was ſlain by Wacho, the Son of his Brother Zuchilo. Hildichus, the Son of Tato, endeavoured to revenge his death, but was beaten out of the Countrey, and fled to the Gepidæ, amongſt whom he ſpent the remainder of his days, and ſowed

After him they refuſe to have any more Kings.

Bandum vexillum à Binden vincire. Binden Angl. to Bind.

ſeeds of Diſſentions betwixt the two now different Nations. At the ſame time (a) Wacho ſubdued the Suevi, and made them ſubject to his Commands. He had three Wives; the firſt (b) Ranicunda, Daughter of the King of the Turingi, after which he married Auſtrigoſa, the Daughter of the King of the Gepidæ, which brought him two Daughters, viz. (c) Wiſegarda, married to Theodebert King of the Franks, and (d) Walderada, Wife to Cuſwald, another King of that Nation, who having no kindneſs for her, beſtowed her on Garipald, one of his Subjects. Wacho's third Wife was Salinga, the Daughter of the King of the Heruli, and on her he begat his Son (e) Waltari, who ſucceeded him in his Kingdom. All theſe were called (f) Lethingi, by which name were ſignified ſuch as deſcended of a noble Race.

(a) Wachi-lap, viæ curſor, Wacho idem contractè.

(b) Ranigunda, pura benevolentia.

(c) Wiſegarda, Sapientiæ collectio.

(d) Wal-rade, benè conſulens, in voc. Alem. Walerat, & Soni mitioris cauſa Waldrada.

(e) Wald-har, Nemoris Dominus.

(f) Etheling, Edeling Nobilis Saxon.

14. Waltari reigned ſeven years, and then gave place to Audoin, the ninth King in order, who, not long after, led the Lombards into Pannonia. Now the grudges formerly conceived betwixt the Gepidæ and them broke out into an open War. Both ſides fighting ſtoutly, and it being uncertain to which the Victory would incline, it happened in a fight, that Alboin, the Son of Audoin, met Turiſmodus, the Son of Turiſendus, and ſtriking him from his Horſe with his Sword, preſently ſlew him, which the Gepidæ perceiving, their King's Son, who had been the great fomenter of the differences, being now dead, took them to their heels. The victorious Lombards, when they returned home, deſired their King that he would admit his Son Alboin to dine with him, who had been the procurer of ſo great a victory. But he anſwered, that he could not violate the Cuſtoms of his Nation, which did not admit the King's Son to eat with him, except he had firſt received Arms from ſome foreign King. Hereupon Alboin takes along with him onely forty young Men, and goes ſtreight to Turiſendus, whoſe Son he had lately ſlain, and tells him the reaſon of his coming. He kindly receives and admits him to his Table, placing him on his Right Hand, where his late Son was wont to ſit. Yet when he conſidered with himſelf whoſe place that had been, and called to mind the death of his Son, he could not contain himſelf, but deeply ſighing, ſaid, that ſeat he loved well, but he could not well brook the Perſon that now poſſeſſed it. Hereupon his other Son being preſent, began to affront the Lombards, ſaying, they were like Mares that had white Feet, becauſe their Legs were bound about with white bands, or fillets. One of them bad him go along with them to the place called Asfeld, and there he ſhould feel how theſe Mares could kick, where his Brothers bones were ſcattered as were wont to be thoſe of ſome vile Carriage-beaſt. This provoked the Gepidæ exceedingly, and the Lombards laid their hands on their Swords, which the King perceiving, leapt from the Table, and putting himſelf betwixt them, rebuked his own Son and Servants, threatning ſeverely to puniſh him that ſhould firſt ſtrike a ſtroke, and affirming it were a Conqueſt not at all pleaſing to Almighty God, to kill one's Enemy in his own Houſe. The fray being appeaſed, they went on with their Dinner, and Turiſendus taking the Arms of his late Son Turiſmodus, beſtowed them on Alboin, and diſmiſſed him in ſafety. Alboin coming to his Father, was now admitted to his Table, where he told all that had paſſed in the Court of Turiſendus, to the admiration of all thoſe that heard it, who commended much Alboin for his Courage, and extolled the generoſity of the King.

Aud-vin, Vetus vincendi, in voc. Alem. Autoin, Aut-vin.

Audoin King.

Albe-vin, omnia regens.

Thoris-mod, ferox animo.

Thoris-mund, ferox ore.

15. At this time, ſaith Paulus Diaconus, Juſtinian governed the Roman Empire in an happy manner, being in War proſperous, and wonderfull in Civil Affairs. For by Beliſarius, a Patritian, he overcame the Perſians, and utterly deſtroyed the Nation of the Vandals, having taken Priſoner Geliſmer, their King, and reſtored all Africk, after a ſeparation of ninety and ſix years, to the Roman Empire. By the means of the ſame Beliſarius he overthrew the Goths in Italy, taking alſo Priſoner Withicis their King. After this he reſtrained the Moors, who made Incurſions into Africk, and with incredible dexterity uſing the ſervice of John the Exconſul, defeated their King Attila. Other Nations he alſo maſtered by War, and deſervedly obtained the ſeveral Sirnames of Alamannicus, Gothicus, Francicus, Germanicus, Anticus, Alanicus, Wandalicus and Africanus. He adds, that he admirably contracted the Roman Laws, which were formerly too prolix and diſagreeing. For all the Conſtitutions of Princes, contained formerly in many Volumes, he contracted into twelve Books, which joined together, he commanded to be called by the name of Codex Juſtinianeus. Farther he reduced into fifty Books of Digeſts or Pandects the Laws of all Magiſtrates, which anciently made up near two thouſand Volumes. He compoſed four Books of Inſtitutions. New Laws alſo he enacted, which he called Romanum Imperium felici ſorte regebat, qui & bella proſperè geſſit, & in cauſis civilibus mirificus extitit.

Novels. This ſame Prince alſo built a Church in Conſtantinople to Chriſt the Lord, who is the Wiſedom of his Father, which in Greek he named ῾ΑΓΙ΄ΑΝ ΣΩΦΙ΄ΑΝ, or Holy Wiſedom, a work which ſo far excells all other Buildings, that in the whole world its like is not to be found. For this Prince was in Faith Catholick, in his works upright, juſt in Judgments, and therefore all things concurred for good. In his time lived Caſſiodorus, a man famous at Rome, as well for ſecular as divine knowledge, who, amongſt other things excellently written, hath in an eminent manner opened the Myſteries of the Pſalms. He was firſt Conſul, then a Senatour, and at laſt a Monk. At this time alſo Dionyſius, an Abbat, by a wonderfull kind of reaſoning, compoſed the Paſchal Calculus at Rome, and at Conſtantinople Priſcian of Cæſarea ſearched to the bottom of the Art of Grammar. Arator alſo, a Subdeacon of the Church of Rome, an admirable Poet, wrote the Acts of the Apoſtles in Hexameter Verſe.

Erat enim hic Princeps fide Catholicus, in operibus rectus, in judiciis juſtus, ideóq; ei omnia concurrebant in bonum.

16. After this and another digreſſion concerning St. Bennet, Paul, our Hiſtorian, returns to King Audoin, whoſe Wife Rodelinda brought him his Son Alboin a Man every way accompliſht for warlike Enterpriſes. Having ſucceeded his Father with the univerſal conſent and approbation of his People, Chlotarius, King of the Franks, beſtowed on him in Marriage his Daughter Chlotſiunda, by whom he had onely one Daughter, Alpſiunda by name. In the mean time dyes Turiſendus, King of the Gepidæ, whoſe Succeſſour Gunimundus, deſiring to revenge old Injuries, renewed the War. Alboin, to ſtrengthen himſelf, contracted a perpetual League and Amity with that People, which formerly being called Hunnes, came afterward to be known by the Name of Avares, which they received from one of their Kings. By virtue of this Confederacy, when the War was begun, the Avares invaded the Territories of the Gepidæ, which News coming to the Ears of Gunimund, he was exceedingly perplexed, but thought fit firſt to engage the Lombards, whom having once defeated, he could eaſily drive away the other. But in a bloudy Battel he was ſlain, with almoſt all his Followers. Alboin killed him with his own Hand, and of his Skull made him a Cup to drink in, called in the Language of the Lombards, Schala, and Patera, by ſuch as ſpake the Latine Tongue. Yet his Daughter Roſimunda, whom, together with an infinite multitude of all ages and conditions, he took captive, he married, his former Wife, Clotſiunda, being dead. The Lombards grew rich, the booty was ſo great, but the Nation of the Gepidæ was ſo diminiſhed, that thenceforth they had no King, but ſuch as eſcaped were either ſubject to the Lombards, or Slaves, in effect, to the Hunnes, who poſſeſſed their Countrey. As for Alboin, he became exceeding famous, both amongſt the Nation of the Baioarii, the Saxons, and others that ſpake the ſame Language; his Proweſs and Vertue being celebrated in their Poems. And many reported, even to the time of Paulus Diaconus, that the chiefeſt ſorts of Weapons were invented by him.

Rode. lindc, quies tranquilla, in voc. Alem. Ruadlind, Ruoadlind, Rudlind.

Alboin

In voce Aleman. Alf-ſuind. Halfſchunte, media forma.

Overthrows the Gepidæ.

Schala facta olim ex calva interfecti hominis quæ ſchele, & hooftſchele dicebatur, nobis etiamnum skull. Poſtea facta eſt ex alia materia ad illius modum.

17. The Fame of the victorious Lombards flying now every where, Narſes, the Imperial Chartulary, who had the charge of Italy, and was to ingage in War with the Goths, ſent to Alboin, deſiring his Aſſiſtence, being as King of the Lombards, already his Confederate. He ſent him a band of choice Men, who paſſing into Italy by the Adriatick Gulf, did him ſervice in his Wars, which being finiſhed, they returned home richly rewarded; And ſo long as the Lombards inhabited Pannonia, they gave aſſiſtence to the Roman Emperour, upon all occaſions. But Narſes, after all his Services, was envied for his Wealth and Authority, by ſome great ones, who ſent to complain of him to Juſtin, now Emperour, and Sophia, his Wife, alledging, that the Romans had better have ſerved the Goths, than the Greeks, under this Eunuch, who held them in no better a condition than that of Slavery, their moſt pious Prince being altogether ignorant of their Sufferings. They deſired in concluſion, that he would deliver them out of his hands, or elſe they would put both the City of Rome, and themſelves, into the Hands of other Nations. Narſes, when he underſtood it, anſwered onely in ſhort. If I have ill treated the Romans, let me be ill treated my ſelf. But the Emperour was ſo much moved againſt him, that he ſent Longinus into Italy, to take his place; and now he knows not how to diſpoſe of himſelf, for ſtanding in great fear of Sophia, the Empreſs, he dares not return to Conſtantinople. Being an Eunuch, ſhe had bidden them put him into a Gyneceum, and make him diſtribute to the Women that ſpun their Portions of Wool, which, when he heard, it's reported that he ſaid, he would ſpin ſuch a Thread as ſhould find her work as long as ſhe lived, and moved both by diſdain and fear, he ſends preſently to the Lombards, inviting them to forſake the poor and beggarly Countrey of Pannonia, and come into Italy, a fertile ſoil, which abounded with all things.

Paulus Diaconus de geſtis Langob. l. 2.

Sends aſſiſtence to Narſes,

Who is envied, and Longinus ſent to take his place.

He calls the Lombards into Italy.

things. And he ſent them ſeveral of the beſt Fruits the Countrey afforded, as Baits to draw them on.

18. This is the Account that Paulus Diaconus gives us of the Motives which brought the Lombards firſt to invade Italy. But there are ſome that doubt much the truth thereof, and conceive it no abſurd thing to queſtion a Report made by one that lived at ſuch a diſtance from this Invaſion, as did our Writer. And they produce another, that both lived and wrote at the very time this Invaſion hapned, viz. Corippus, a Grammarian of Africk, from whom it appears, that Narſes was e'er this recalled to Conſtantinople, where he was highly eſteemed by Juſtin, at whoſe Inſtallment he was preſent, and attended him when he gave Audience to the Ambaſſadours ſent from the Avares. If he was then at Conſtantinople, it cannot be imagined he ſhould be about the ſame time in Italy, and call in the Lombards, who the year following broke into that Countrey. Neither can it be pleaded on the other ſide, that though he was then at Conſtantinople, yet the Emperour might ſend him back into Italy, with the ſame Power and Employment as formerly, becauſe all Authours agree, that after his Return Longinus was ſent to ſucceed him. But upon what account, or by what Motives ſoever induced, into Italy they came, and made there ſuch Devaſtations, and brought ſuch Miſeries upon the People, (which had ſcarcely had time to take a little breath, ſince the Gothick Wars) that the great miſchiefs they wrought, were to be uſhered in with dreadfull Prodigies. For in the night time were ſeen in the Air, to the Northward, Armies of Men, and Spears of Fire, gliſtering, as it were, with the colour of Man's Bloud, which e'er long was to be ſhed in ſuch abundance.

Some do not believe this report of Paulus Diaconus.

In laud. Juſtin. lib. 3.

Armiger interea domini veſtigia luſtrans,
Eminet excelſus ſuper omnia vertice Narſes
Agmina & Auguſtam, &c.

Prodigies uſhering in the Lombards.

19. Alboin reſolving to invade Italy, ſent to the Saxons, his old Friends, and confederates for aid, offering them their ſhare in the Conqueſt for their pains, with which Propoſals they cloſed, and ſent him above twenty thouſand Men, with their Wives and Children. Beſides the Saxons he ſtrengthened himſelf alſo by the aids of ſeveral other Nations, as the Gepidæ, Bulgari, Sarmatæ, Pannonians, Suevi, and others, all which had afterwards Lands aſſigned them in the Countrey. Moreover he had contracted a ſtrict Alliance with the Hunnes, to whom he left Pannonia, with this condition, that in caſe the Lombards ſhould return, they ſhould reenter and enjoy their former Seats. And being alſo joined in League and Alliance with the Franks, his Intereſt became the more conſiderable; for he was not onely the Son-in-Law of Clotarius, whoſe Daughter Chlothoſinda he had married, but thereby near allied alſo to four Kings of the ſame Nation. Animated by his own natural Courage, and theſe Aſſiſtences, he removes from Pannonia, with all his Lombards, their Wives, Children, and all they had, to poſſeſs Italy, (which he had already devoured in hope and expectation.) After fourty two years ſtay in Pannonia, in the Month of April, juſt after Eaſter, which fell out that Year on the firſt day of that Month, in the firſt Indiction, in the third Year of the Emperour Juſtin the younger, the Ninth of John the Roman Patriarch, and the five hundredth and ſixty eighth year of our Lord. Why Baronius ſhould write, that this was done after that Alboinus had ſeized on Pannonia, and there ſtaid fourty two years, who alſo came with his People out of the Iſland of Scandinavia, (ſeeing he was, as Paulus Diaconus counts, the tenth King that reigned over the Lombards, after the death of Ibor and Ago, the Captains that led them out of that Iſland, and not he, but Audoin, his Father, brought them into Pannonia,) let others enquire.

Other Nations joined with them.

20. Alboin having with his Army, and promiſcuous multitude, arrived at the Borders, went up into an high Mountain adjacent, to take a proſpect of Italy. The Hill was from this occaſion called Mons Regis, on which many Buffes were bred, it reaching as far as Pannonia, which abounded with that ſort of Beaſt. Having without any oppoſition entred Venetia, the firſt Province of Italy, and come to the bounds of the Foro Julian City, or Caſtle rather, he began to conſider whom he could truſt with theſe Territories, and at laſt conferred the charge on Giſulphus, his Nephew, a man very fit for ſuch an Employment, who ſerved him now as his Strator, or Maſter of his Horſe, in the Language of the Lombards called Mar-hais. Yet he refuſed to accept of the charge, till he granted him ſuch Faras, Generations or Families of the Lombards, as he ſhould chuſe, which being done, he became the Captain of them; and obtained alſo a number of Mares of an excellent breed. This Year fell in Winter ſuch a vaſt quantity of Snow in the Plain, as was wont to fall on the Alpes themſelves; and the following Summer afforded ſuch plenty of all things, as no Age could parallel, if we believe our Hiſtorian. In the ſame Year died Narſes the Eunuch, as ſome write, though concerning the place, manner and time of his Death, there are different Relations. The Latin Writers ſay, he returned from Naples to Rome, and repenting what he had done about the Lombards, died there, and that his body being put into a Coffin of Lead, was, together with all his Wealth, carried to Conſtantinople. But the Greek Authours will not allow him to have ſtaid at Naples, but to have returned to Conſtantinople, and there to have raiſed magnificent Buildings. Cedrenus writes, that being moſt dear to the Emperour, he built an Houſe called by his own Name, beſides a Manſion for the Cathari. The Hiſtoria Miſcella relates, that in his Houſe he cauſed to be made a great Ciſtern, and having therein depoſed many thouſand Centenaries of Gold and Silver, killed all that knew of it, one old Man excepted, to whom he recommended the Treaſure, receiving from him an Oath of Secrecy. If ſo, he muſt have lived ſeveral years after the Invaſion of Italy.

Alboin prefers Giſulfe his Kinſman.

Giſel-ulph, Comitum adjutor.

Mar-hais Strator, qui imperat Equis ita meliores Codices, pro Marpahis. Fara, generatio, familia, à verbo Faren, quod eſt progredi; poſt Chriſtianiſmum dicta ſic Parœcia, unde Far-her, nos etiamnum a Sea-faring Man.

Vide Baronium ad Ann. 568. num. 10.

21. And that we give credit rather to the Greek than the Latin Writers, in this point, the Teſtimony of Corippus, lately mentioned, doth perſuade us. Beſides, Anaſtaſius writes how Narſes died at the ſame time as died John the Roman Biſhop, and it's certain that John lived four years after this, and in the Letters of John is mention made of the Conſulſhip of Narſes, which he bore with Juſtin, being now Conſul the ſixth time, whereas in this Year, wherein they will have him to have died, Juſtin was Conſul onely the ſecond time. Then who can once imagine, that the Body of ſo grand a Malefactour, as the Betrayer of Italy, ſhould be carried to Conſtantinople, and have honourable Burial, which ought rather to have been hung on a Gibbet, or caſt to Dogs, or in ſome other ignominious ſort to have been treated? The Latin Writers ſeem therefore to have been but ill inſtructed in this particular, and neither had the Greek Authours full intelligence, as to circumſtances, when they ſpeak of his great Piety and Charity, and yet mention another thing wherein he cannot be excuſed from exceſſive Covetouſneſs and Cruelty. This is his hiding the Treaſure where it could doe no good, and killing thoſe that were privy to the hiding. Procopius, Agathias, Euagrius, and others, give him large Commendations, and had ſuch a thing been committed after the Glory obtained by his former Actions, Euagrius would probably have mentioned it, or at leaſt not ſo largely commended him. But whereas this Authour brings down his Narrations as low as Mauritius the Emperour, and yet makes no mention of Narſes his death; ſome ſuſpect he was ſtill alive when he wrote his Hiſtory.

Whether one or two of the name of Narſes.

22. And that which much ſtrengthens this ſuſpicion, is, that there was one Narſes in the time of Mauritius, a Patritian, in Dignity, and renowned for his Counſels and Actions, relating as well to Peace as War, General of the Army alſo, and very remarkable for his Piety. If it was one and the ſame Perſon, he muſt have lived thirty years longer, which if any count improbable, let them conſider whether this doth not carry a greater ſhew of Improbability, that almoſt at the ſame time there ſhould be two of the ſame Name, Order, Dignity and Piety, and both of them renowned for their Victories, both Generals of the Imperial Armies, and yet no remark hereupon made by any Hiſtorian, no diſtinction at all, either by Major and Minor, Senior and Junior, or the Firſt and Laſt. This Narſes that lived in the time of Mauritius, who overthrew Barames, that uſurped the Kingdom of Perſia, and reſtored Choſroes the younger, loſt his Life under the Tyrant Phocas, as we may ſee hereafter. Let us leave Narſes therefore, either in his Grave, or elſewhere, and attend the Motions of Alboin into Italy, who being come as far as the River Alpis, was met by Fœlix, the Biſhop of Tarniſium, to whom he granted, as he was moſt bountifull, all that belonged to his Church, and confirmed by his Pragmaticum what he deſired. He took Vincentia, Verona, and the reſt of the Cities of Venetia, Padua, Mantua and Monteſilice onely excepted. Here Paul tells you, that by Venetia he means not onely thoſe few Iſlands, then called in the plural number Venetiæ, at this day Venice, but that Countrey which reached as far as from the Borders of Pannonia to the River Addua. He proves this to be Venetia, from ancient Hiſtorians, who affirm Pergamus to be a City of Venetiæ. The Lake Benacus is alſo called Lacus Venetiarum, out of which iſſueth the River Mintius. In Greek he ſaith, Eneti, to which the Latines add one Letter, ſignifieth Laudable. To Venetia was alſo joyned Hiſtria, (ſo named from the River Hiſter,) which he affirmeth from the Roman Hiſtory, to have been in old time larger than it was in his days,) and both theſe were accounted for one Province. Of Venetia Aquileia was anciently the Head, but in Paul his time Forum-Julii was advanced to that Honour, being ſo called, becauſe Julius Cæſar there appointed a Mart, or Forum Negotiationis, as our Authour words it.

Alboin takes ſeveral Towns in Venetia.

He enters Milan.

Pavia holds out three years.

23. Alboin having invaded Liguria, entred Milan, at the beginning of the third Indiction, on the third of the Nones of September, in the time of Honoratus the Archbiſhop. Then took he in all the Midland Cities, but thoſe upon the Sea ſtood out, and Ticinum, or Pavia, reſiſted his violence three years. In the mean time he over-runs all as far as Tuſcia, Rome and Ravenna excepted, beſides certain Caſtles, ſeated on the Sea ſhore. There was not any courage or ſtrength now left in the Romans, to make any effectual reſiſtence, multitudes having periſhed by the Plague in the time of Narſes, and after that Year of Plenty a grievous Famine having invaded and oppreſſed all Italy. At length Pavia, after it had ſtood out three Years, and ſome Months, yielded to Alboin and his Lombards. The King making his entry at St. John's Gate, at the Eaſtern part of the City, his Horſe fell under him in the middle of the Gate, and by ſpurring and beating could not be raiſed, which being taken notice of by one of his Followers, he adviſed him to break that cruel Vow he had made, and then he ſhould enter the City, which was inhabited by a truly Chriſtian People. He had vowed to put all the People to death, becauſe of their ſtubbornneſs in holding out ſo long, but now breaking his Vow, and promiſing Indempnity to the Inhabitants, his Horſe preſently aroſe, and then paſſing on to his Lodging, he kept his word, the People flocking to him in the Palace built by Kind Theuderick. In Italy Alboin reigned three Years and five Months, and then was ſlain by the Treachery of his Wife upon this occaſion. Being very merry, as he was feaſting at Verona, he commmanded Wine to be given her in the Cup made of the Skull of Cunimund, her Father, as with whom he commanded her to drink merily. That this may not ſeem impoſſible, Paul religiouſly profeſſeth, that he himſelf had ſeen the very Cup.

Helm-gis, galeæ fortis.
Schilt-forer Scutiger, Schilt, nobis hodie ſhield.
Pered-eu, Latè patentis legis.
eſt & in voc. Alem.

Alboin killed by procurement of his Wife.

24. Roſemunda at this was wonderfully incenſed, and preſently conſulted how to revenge her Father's Death, with Helmichis, the King's Armour-bearer, or Schilpor, as the Lombards called him. He perſuaded her to take into her Council Peredeo, a moſt valiant Man, who refuſing utterly to conſent to the Murther of his Prince, ſhe knowing he was wont to lie with one that belonged to her Wardrobe, placed her ſelf in her Bed, received and lay with him, when he not at all ſuſpected ſuch a matter. But the Queen demanding of him, before he aroſe, if he knew her Name, he affirmed ſhe was his Sweet-heart; ſhe told him he was miſtaken, that ſhe was Roſemunda her ſelf, and that he had now done ſuch a deed, that he muſt either kill Alboin, or expect to be killed by him. He conſented then to join in the Murther, to facilitate which, as the King lay aſleep on his Bed at noon, his Wife bound his Sword ſo faſt in his Scabbard, that it could not be drawn. Then was Peredeo brought in, and Alboin awakened by the noiſe, after he had in vain attempted to draw his Sword, which lay at his Beds-head, defended himſelf valiantly with a Footſtool for ſome time, but was at length overpowered and ſlain by the wicked device of a Woman, whom many Armies had not been able to deſtroy. His Body, with great Lamentations of the Lombards, was buried under a certain pair of Stairs near to the Palace. He was tall of Stature and every way fitted for Warlike Actions. In our days, ſaith Paul, Giſelbert, Duke of Verona, opened his Grave, and taking away his Sword, and all his other Ornaments, after his uſual Vanity, boaſted to ſilly People, that he had ſeen Alboin.

She flies to Longinus, the Roman Exarch.

Her deſerved End.

Cleph choſen King in the room of Alboin.

Cleph, idem ac Claffo.
Maſſe-na, Modo congruens. Maſſe & Maſe idem. Dialecto differunt, ut Waſſer, Water, & mille alia.

25. Alboin being dead, Helmichis attempted to make himſelf King, but the Lombards oppoſed it to ſuch a degree, that they endeavoured to call him to account for the death of the deceaſed. Roſemunda perceiving no good was to be done, ſent to Longinus, the Governour, or Exarch, of Ravenna, deſiring him with all ſpeed to diſpatch away a Ship to fetch them, which he readily did, and they two being now Husband and Wife, fled away by night, taking along with them Albſuinda, the King's Daughter, and all the Treaſure of the Lombards. Longinus having got them to Ravenna, perſuaded her to kill Helmichis, and take himſelf to her Husband, which ſhe, without any great heſitation, conſented to doe, out of a deſire of being Lady of that City, and gave a Cup of Poiſon to him when he came out of the Bath. Having drunk it almoſt off, he perceived what it was, and then drawing his Sword, compelled her to pledge him with the reſt, which having done, by the moſt juſt Judgment of God, both theſe Murtherers received the Reward of their Vilany at the ſame moment. They being dead, Longinus ſent Albſuinda, with the Treaſure, to Conſtantinople, whither ſome ſay Peredeo was alſo ſent, having accompanied Helmichis and Roſemunda to Ravenna. But the Lombards, into the place of Alboin, elected one Cleph, a Man of great Nobility, who having ſlain many of the chiefeſt Romans, and baniſhed others, was, after he had reigned a Year and ſix Months, with Maſſana, his Wife, killed by a Boy of his own Family.

The Countrey ſhared.

Zab-an, Lorica indutus. Gloſſ. Zaba Lorica ſcribitur & Zanæ in Legibus. Al-gis, omnino fortis. Euin aliter Eui æquus.

26. After his Death Paulus Diaconus tells us, that the Lombards for ten years were without a King, and were onely governed by their Leaders, of whom every one enjoyed his own City. In particular, Zaban made himſelf Maſter of Pavia; Waillari of Bergamum, Alachis of Brixia, Euin of Trent, and Giſulfus of Forum-Julii, beſides thirty others, whereof each held his peculiar Town. Having thus ſeated themſelves at their Pleaſure, they deſtroyed the Roman Nobility, or thoſe that remained they made Tributaries, exacting a third part of their Revenues. They pulled down Churches, killed the Prieſts, demoliſhed the Cities, and deſtroyed the People all over, thoſe parts which Alboin had taken excepted, and in ſeven years time in a manner ſubdued all Italy. Yet did they not take the City of Rome, though they entred the Suburbs, and demoliſhed ſeveral Monuments of the Martyrs, carrying away their Relicks; and they raiſed a great Perſecution againſt Pious and Religious Perſons. But thus was the Roman Empire rent in the Weſt, and thoſe Limbs again torn from it's Body, after the former Wounds ſeemed to be quite healed up. And in the Eaſt, it was in little better Condition, where the Head being crazy and out of Order, the inferiour Members could be leſs ſecure, and in a Capacity to defend themſelves. For Juſtin the Emperour was taken with a Vertigo, and ſuch a diſtemper in his Brain that he could not ſtir abroad, nor receive any Addreſſes; which advantage ſome of the Great ones taking, fell with violence upon the ordinary ſort, and ſpoiled them of all they had. As ſoon as he recovered and went to Church, the diſtreſſed People followed him with Cries and Lamentations. Hereupon he ſummoned ſuch as had been Criminals before him, and admoniſhed them to forbear ſuch Practices, but they were ſo far from making Reparation for what they had already done, that they oppreſſed the poor People worſe than formerly. Then called he the Senate together, and more ſharply reprehended them, telling them, it onely became the Nature of Fiſhes, for the greater and ſtronger to devour thoſe of a leſſer ſize; if he were their Lawfull Emperour, he Commanded them to yield obedience to his Orders, and if they refuſed, bade them chuſe themſelves a new Prince whereſoever they pleaſed.

Juſtin the Emperour taken with a Vertigo.

Cedrenus.

Thereupon the People oppreſſed.

27. At this one Nobleman amongſt the reſt ſtands up, deſires him but to make him Prefect of the City, and all ſhould ſpeedily be amended, provided he would Command him to deal impartially, and give him free Acceſs upon all occaſions. This is readily granted, and the next day he ſits in Judgment. A certain Widow comes and complains that a Great man had ſpoiled her of all ſhe had. He ſends him a Summons to appear by the Woman; but he ſends her onely back well beaten, and deals little better by an Officer, diſpatched afterward on the ſame Errand. While the Prefect ſits expecting his coming, the Man is invited to Dinner by the Emperour, which the Prefect hearing, goes alſo to Court and demands of Juſtin, whether he did continue of the ſame mind and reſolution, as when he firſt made him Prefect of the City; ſeeing he entertained at his Table guilty Perſons. The Emperour anſwers, he would ſooner quit his Throne than be guilty of ſuch a Crime, and thereupon the Prefect takes away his Gueſt, and carries him into the Court called Arca, where hearing the whole matter betwixt him and the Widow, and perceiving how greatly he had injured her, he cauſed him to be beaten, and then having his Head ſhaven, to be ſet naked upon an Aſs and ſo carried through the midſt of the City, having decreed his whole Eſtate unto the Woman. This Example ſo wrought upon all others, that a thorough Reformation was made, and within thirty days no more Complaints were heard of this Nature, which the Prefect making known to the Emperour, he rewarded him with the Dignity of a Patritian, and the Government of the City during Life. This year which was the third of Juſtin, was not onely ſignalized with this notable piece of Juſtice, but with as eminent Acts of Charity performed by Sophia the Empreſs. For ſummoning in ſuch as were in Debt, ſhe paid her ſelf the Money to the Creditours, and reſtored all Pledges to their former owners.

A Reformation.

Cedrenus.

The Avares defeated.

Victor Tunnenſis in Chron. Corippus in Carm.

Ὁ ἐχθρὸς φεύγων ϗ πάλιν μαχήσεται.

28. As a reward for theſe good Deeds, the following Year Juſtin had a great Victory over the Avares, who were defeated by Tiberius, (the Comes Excubitorum at preſent, but afterward Emperour) and forced ſubmiſſively to beg Peace. But as he was not conſtant to the ways of Mercy and Goodneſs, ſo his Proſperity forſook him again, and as the Proverb is, an Enemy though he flies, may again rally and renew the Charge. For five years after in the ninth of his Reign, when all Italy in a manner was loſt to the Lombards, theſe Avares, or Abari, as the ſame Authour tells us, came as far as the Danube, and to be even with them defeated the Romans. It ſeems that Tiberius was again diſpatched againſt them, but his men would not now as much as look the Barbarians in the Face, and he wonderfully wonderfully eſcaped being taken Priſoner, having by following the raſh and heady Advice of Juſtin, indangered the whole Commonwealth of Rome, at leaſt it's greateſt Honour and Reputation. But beſides this defeat received from the Avares, the Perſians the old Enemies of the Empire recollected themſelves, and were up again upon a Quarrel, which at firſt proceeded from Religion. The People inhabiting Perſarmenia or Armenia the Great (which Philip the Succeſſour of Gordianus had delivered up to Sapor) being Chriſtians were grievouſly perſecuted for their Religion and Conſcience by the Perſians. This cauſed them to ſend to Juſtin the Emperour privately, deſiring they might turn Subjects to the Empire, and ſerve God without any let or hindrance. He accepted of their Petition, and Articles being ſworn betwixt them, they (contrary ſure to Religion and Conſcience) ſlew their own Princes, and put themſelves into the hands of Juſtin, which Example was followed by their Neighbours, who with Vardan their Captain profeſſed their Service and obedience to the Roman Empire.

Defeat the Romans.

Euagrius, lib. 5. c. 11.

Euagrius, lib. 5. c. c. 7, 8, 9. &c.

The Perſarmenians revolt.

29. Choſroes preſently received the Alarm, and Charged the Emperour with theſe Clandeſtine and injurious Proceedings. Juſtin anſwered poſitively, that the Date of the League was expired, and that it became not the Profeſſours of Chriſtianity to reject ſuch as ſuffered for their Conſcience, and fled to them in the time of War: Yet made he no Preparation for what he muſt needs conclude would follow, wallowing in his wonted Senſualities and Delights. He ſent indeed Martianus his Captain into the Eaſt, but without Souldiers, Arms, or any proviſions for War; and he came into Meſopotamia not without manifeſt danger to the State, picking up onely a few naked Fellows, of which number ſome were Tributary Pioneers, and Waggondrivers. An inconſiderable party of Perſians yet he chanced to defeat before the reſt could be in readineſs, and beſieged Niſibis, the Gates of which the Inhabitants would not ſhut, reviling the ſtout Roman Army, and eſteeming of them no otherwiſe, than as if they had been ſet there to keep ſheep. But by this time Choſroes was furniſhed for a Battel, and bringing his General Aduarmanes, as Euagrius calls him, or Artabanus, as we reade him in Cedrenus, on his way as far as the other ſide of Euphrates, which was within his own Dominions; ſent him into the Marches of the Roman Empire, and Commanded him to ſeize on the Town of Circeſium, which ſituate in the fartheſt parts of the Roman Dominions was fortified with ſtrong Walls, and more than that with the two Rivers Euphrates, and Aboras ſtanding as it were in an Iſland. He himſelf with another Army paſſed over Tigris, and made ſtreight for Niſibis; while Juſtin pleaſed himſelf with idle Reports, that Choſroes was either already dead, or mortally ſick, and was ſo incenſed againſt Martianus for prolonging the ſiege, that he ſent to reproach him, and to require him with all ſpeed, to bring the Keys of the City to his Preſence.

Martianus his Exploits.

30. Becoming exceedingly Ridiculous to all men, for theſe extravagant Conceits: Gregory Biſhop of Antioch wrote the whole State of Affairs to him, both how impoſſible it was with ſuch an handfull of inconſiderable Men to take ſuch a City, and that Choſroes had with all expedition invaded thoſe Countries. But he, drown'd in the filth of his wonted Luxury, gave no heed to Gregory's Letters, thinking that onely to be true, which his own ſick Brain had conceived, and like other intemperate and Riotous Perſons, unwilling to believe any thing that would diſturb them in their Pleaſures. He wrote back to the Biſhop and rejected his Letters for falſe Reports: If they were true, he affirmed the Perſians ſhould not win the City, and raiſe the ſiege before his Power came, and in caſe they ſhould win it, they ſhould yet be met with e'er they left the Countrey. Afterward he ſent one Acacius, a proud and diſdainfull Man to Martianus who meeting him on the Confines according to his Commiſſion, deprived him of all Martial Dignity unknown to the Army. The Officers after the watch was over, underſtanding that their Captain was Caſheired, caſt away their Arms, ſtole into Corners, and quitted the Siege to the great Laughter of all Men. Aduarmanes in the mean time paſſing by Circeſium with a great Army of Perſians, and Barbarians called Scenitæ, waſted all the Roman Territories with Fire and Sword, without any Mercy or Compaſſion. Caſtles and Towers he took without any oppoſition, both becauſe the Romans had none to Head them, and Choſroes had as it were beſieged all ſuch Souldiers as lay about Daras. His men alſo ſet upon Antioch, but beyond all Expectation were repulſed, when very few remained in the City. For the Biſhop flying away with the Holy Treaſure, the City was in a manner left deſolate, the greater part of the Wall lying flat with the Ground, and the People as in ſuch Caſes falling into Diſorder and Tumult; ſo that there was none that either deviſed Engines to repell the Enemy, or was much diſpoſed to reſiſt him any other way.

Acacius ſent to Caſheir him.

31. However

Heraclea burnt, and Apamia.

31. However the deſign of Aduarmanes againſt Antioch not taking, he burnt the City Heraclea, afterward called Gagalica, and marched to Apamia built by Seleucus the Son of Nicanor; a City ſometime flouriſhing, but now through the Injury of time faln to decay. Having received it upon Articles, he burnt it alſo contrary to Agreement, plundered it, and deſtroyed all, which done he uſed the Countrey adjacent in the ſame ſort, and carried away with him the Biſhop and the Governour. Having done very much miſchief in his paſſage, he returned to his King, who as yet had not taken the City he beſieged. Now joyning their Powers, they made a very conſiderable Army, and quite diſcouraged thoſe within, although the City was very well fortified, ſo that it was taken by Force in the Winter ſeaſon after above a five Months ſiege, ſome ſaid through the Careleſsneſs, others through the Treachery of the Governour. Many he put to the Sword, many he took Priſoners, and having fortified the place which ſtood exceedingly convenient for him returned home. Juſtin was now at length convinced; and perceiving, that indeed his Dominions were invaded in ſuch a ſort, took it more heavily than his Conſtitution could bear, and fell diſtracted, ſo as he had no Senſe or apprehenſion of any buſineſs. Tiberius therefore a Thracian born, one that was in greateſt Authority about him, and had made a fruitleſs Journey againſt the Avares, undertook the management of publick Affairs. By his Advice, that what had been loſt by raſhneſs and folly, might be redeemed through ſobriety, Trajan, a man of great Eſteem for his Age and Wiſedom, was ſent Ambaſſadour to Choſroes, it if be Lawfull to give him that Title.

Choſroes takes Niſibis.

Thereupon Juſtin falls diſtracted.

32. For, his Embaſſy was not from the Perſon of the Emperour, nor in the Name of the Commonwealth of Rome; but onely a Meſſage from Sophia the Empreſs. She wrote Letters to Choſroes, wherein ſhe lamented the wofull plight of her Husband, and the lamentable Eſtate of the Empire, now wanting an Head, and ſhe inſiſted that it ſtood not with his Honour, to triumph over a ſilly Woman, to inſult over an Emperour that was ſick and Bed-rid, and invade a State utterly deſtitute of defence and Succour; that he in times paſt being ſick, had not onely the like Humanity ſhe now asked ſhewn unto him, but the beſt Phyſicians which the Roman Empire could afford, ſent to eaſe him of his Grief. Good nature ſo wrought with Choſroes, upon Conſideration of theſe particulars, that although he had determined ſpeedily to invade the Roman Dominions, yet he made a Truce for three years, reſpecting the Eaſtern Countries, and conſented that Armenia ſhould enjoy the benefit of it. This accord was made in the tenth year of Juſtin his Reign, who in his thirteenth, through the Advice of Sophia his Wife, took Tiberius to be his Collegue in the Empire. Euagrius tells us, that at the Promotion he uttered ſuch Words, as no Hiſtory whatſoever can Parallel; God of his mercy granting him ſo much time, as might ſuffice both to confeſs his own ſins, and declare ſuch things as were for the benefit of the Commonwealth. John the Biſhop with his Company, the Princes and Magiſtrates, and all the Prætorian Souldiers being now aſſembled in the open Hall, where of old ſuch Solemnities were uſually celebrated, Juſtin inveſted Tiberius with the Imperial Robe and Cloak, ſaying to him aloud as followeth: Let not the Splendour of this Garment lead them into miſtakes, neither be thou deceived with the Glorious ſhew of ſuch things as are ſubject to the Senſes, wherewith I being intangled, have brought my ſelf into grievous Miſeries. But in Governing the Empire by great Moderation and mildneſs of Spirit, redreſs what I have Fooliſhly committed. Then, pointing to the Magiſtrates with his Finger. Thou muſt by no means, ſaith he, be ruled by theſe Men, for they are they that have brought me into this ſad Condition, wherein thou ſeeſt me. Theſe with other ſuch like words he uttered, which ſtruck all the Aſſembly with great wonder and Admiration, and drew from the Auditory abundance of Tears.

A Truce made with him for three years.

Ubi ſuprà, c. 13.

Juſtin makes Tiberius his Collegue.

An excellent Prince.

33. Tiberius was a man of a wonderfull goodly Stature, and of a Preſence altogether compoſed unto Majeſty. His mind was as richly adorned with mildneſs and Courteſie, which allured all Men at the very firſt Addreſs to love him. For he eſteemed that to be Riches, which ſufficed every man to give not onely for neceſſity, but alſo for plenty and abundance. He was of Opinion, that not onely ſuch as wanted were to receive Relief; but that it became the Emperour of Rome to be Munificent, and he took that Gold to be Counterfeit, which was gathered with the Tears and Lamentations of the Subject. Moved by theſe Conſiderations, he remitted one whole years Tribute, and ſuch Lands as Aduarmanes had loaden with heavy Taxes, he reſtored to Liberty, and made full Reparation to thoſe that had ſuſtained the loſs; moreover ſuch Exactions as had been made by former Princes, (for which they uſed to deliver, and as it were ſell the People to their Officers, to be abuſed at their Pleaſure,) he forgave and by Laws forbade, all ſuch Practices for the time to come. Having well beſtowed ſuch Moneys, as had been ill gotten, and ordered his matters at home as true Prudence, and the Duty of his place required, againſt the expiring of the Truce with Perſia, he made all Preparations poſſible for War. He made great Levies on both ſides the Alpes, and about the Rhine; liſted in his Army, many Maſſagetes, and ſeveral other Scythian Nations out of Pæonia, Myſia, Illyricum and Iſauria, and having got together near an hundred and fifty Troops of choice Horſe every way well appointed, he gave the Foile to Choſroes, who immediately after the winning of Daras in Summer, had over-run Armenia, and marched toward Cæſarea the Metropolis of Cappadocia. Choſroes was ſo puffed up with his Succeſs, and the natural haughtineſs of his Humour, that he refuſed to give Audience to the Emperour's Ambaſſadours, but diſdainfully bade them follow him to Cæſarea, and there he would hear what they had to ſay. But when he ſaw the Roman Army (commanded by Juſtinian the Brother of Juſtin, that was ſo baſely murthered at Alexandria) ſhining all in Armour; when he perceived the Trumpets ſound to Battel, the Armies ready to joyn, and the Clamour of the Souldiers which pierced the very Skies: Laſtly, when he beheld ſuch a Body of Horſe, as before none of the Emperours had ſo much as thought of, he was utterly aſtoniſhed and ſurprized at ſuch an unexpected ſight, ſighed heavily, and would not Charge.

Choſroes abaſhed.

Is miſerably overthrown.

34. Suſpecting his ſtrength, he betook himſelf to Craft, and indeavoured to ſpend time; but Curs a Scythian, who led the Right-wing of the Roman Forces, fell upon him with ſuch violence, that the Perſians gave Ground, and great Execution was done upon them. He ſet upon the Rere, where their Baggage and all their Preparations for War lay, took all the King's Treaſure and Jewels, all his Ammunition, great ſums of Money, and drove away the Beaſts with the burthens on their Backs; wherein lay the Fire which Choſroes adored for his God. All this while the King ſtirred not, ſo fearfull he was to ingage with Curs, and onely ſome Skirmiſhes followed till Night came on, and then he cauſed a mighty Fire to be kindled; and the Roman Army being divided, he ſet upon that Party which lay toward the North, which giving back upon the ſurprize, he went forward, and took Meletina a City forſaken by its Inhabitants, which having ſet on Fire, he purpoſed to croſs the River Euphrates. The Roman Armies uniting and following him cloſe in the Rere, in great fear he mounted an Elephant, and ſo paſſed the River; but the greater part of his Army in Swimming and conveying themſelves over, was drowned in the deep Water. Hearing of this misfortune, he got him away with all ſpeed, with all the Company he had left, and returned into the Eaſt, where as yet the League was of Force, and none could aſſault him. Juſtinian after this over-ran the Borders of Perſia, where he continued all Winter without any diſturbance, and about the latter end of June returned back without any loſs of Men, but with great Reputation. Choſroes being exceedingly diſcouraged, and out of meaſure diſcontented at this Succeſs, languiſhed under the change of his Fortune, and ſwallowed up in the Gulph of diſpleaſure, died after a lamentable ſort, leaving a Law behind him, that the King of Perſia ſhould never after that day take Arms againſt the Romans; which was an everlaſting Monument of his flight and overthrow. Thus much Euagrius; from whoſe Speech concerning the League yet in Force in the Eaſt, it appears that this his Invaſion was made preſently after the taking of Daras, and not after the expiring of the Triennial Ceſſation, as Baronius imagined. His deſpiſing the Truce, and yet expecting ſecurity from it, diſcovers to us that inſolent and faithleſs Humour, of which Procopius accuſeth him, to whoſe Character of the Man, and this Relation of Euagrius, we muſt add ſome things obſervable out of Agathias, who lived alſo at this time whereof we Write.

Dies in diſcontent.

Agath. Hiſt. l. 4.

35. This Authour makes him Superiour to all Kings that ever Reigned in Perſia, for Succeſs and Felicity of Government, not excepting Cyrus, or Darius Hyſtaſpis, nor that Xerxes, who, as he words it, rode on Horſeback over Seas, and ſailed over Mountains. But as great as he was in his Life, he had a miſerable and inglorious Death, moſt contrary to the Splendour of his Reign. For making his abode at that time about the Carduchian Mountains, he retired into a Village of the Thamani, convenient to refreſh himſelf in after his Labours in the heat of Summer, Οὐδὲ μὴν Ξέρξην ἐκεῖνον τὸν ἱππήλατιν μὲν δεικνύντα τὴν θάλατταν ἐν δὲ τοῖς ὄρεσι ναυτιλλόμενον.

Μαυρίκιος δὲ ὁ Παύλου, ὑπὸ Τιβερίου Κωνσταντίνου τοῦ Ῥωμαίων Βασιλέως ἄρχειν τῶν κατὰ τὴν Ἕω ταγμάτων προστεταγμένος. Hoc ſic interpretatur Vulcanius. Mauricius Pauli filius à Tiberio Conſtantini Romanorum Regis filio Legionibus Orientalibus ut præeſſet juſſus: Peſſimè; non enim Tiberius fuit filius Regis vel Imp. Romani. Thrax fuit, atque Agathias non ſcripſit Τιβερίου τοῦ Κωνσταντίνου, ſed Τιβερίου Κωνσταντίνου. Tiberio enim Cognomen erat Conſtantinus, atque id vulgare Principibus aſſumere nomen alterius qui rerum geſtarum Gloria claruit, vide infra parag. 47.

The manner of his Death.

where making ſome ſtay, it happened, that Mauricius the Son of Paul, who by Tiberius Conſtantine the Emperour was ſet over the Armies of the Eaſt, made ſudden irruption into the Countrey of Araxes, which joyned to the Territories where he lay, and proceeded ſo far, that he paſſed the River Zirina, plundering and waſting all places with Fire and Sword. He went on in this terrible manner, ſo far till Choſroes himſelf ſaw the Flame, who never having beheld ſuch a Spectacle, was with fear and ſhame together confounded, ſo as he could make neither oppoſition nor defence, but by immoderate Grief, falling into Deſperation from the Anguiſh of his Mind, contracted a grievous and incurable Diſeaſe, and being in a Litter ſpeedily conveyed to his Palaces of Selucia and Cteſiphon; not long after this Receſs, or flight rather, ended his days: Concerning the falſe Report raiſed of his great Learning, the Reader if he pleaſe may conſult this Authour, who ſhews the Ground and occaſion of the miſtake in a Digreſſion not proper for us to inſert. But we muſt obſerve, that either Agathias or his Tranſcriber was miſtaken, in joyning the fifth year of Choſroes, with the twenty eighth of Juſtinian, as if he had begun his Reign in the twenty third of that Emperour, ſeeing that he Reigned eight and forty years. For if Cabades died, and Choſroes made a League with Juſtinian in this fifth year; then could he not begin his Reign in the five and twentieth; and foraſmuch as it is plain that he died in the Reign of Tiberius, had he begun to Reign in the twenty third of Juſtinian, and Reigned eight and forty years, he muſt have reached the Government of Mauricius, which things cannot hold together; we conclude therefore with Baronius, that he begun his Reign in the fifth year of Juſtinian, and ended it in the ſecond of Tiberius, though not juſt after the defeat given him by Juſtinian, but after Mauricius was ſent into the Eaſtern parts (for as we ſaid, the expedition of Juſtinian was made before the end of the Triennial Truce, and muſt be caſt back two or three years) in the fourteenth year of Juſtin, A.D. 579.

Euagrius lib. 5. c. 17.

36. The year following being the third of Tiberius, about Noon happened ſuch an Earthquake at Antioch, and Daphne adjoyning to it, that all Daphne with the Force thereof fell to the Ground, and many both publick and private Buildings within the City were much ſhaken and diſ-joynted. There happened alſo both at Antioch and Conſtantinople, as Euagrius relates, other Calamities which require a long Diſcourſe, and cauſed great Tumults and Sedition; but ariſing, as he ſaith, from Godly Zeal, and being of Eccleſiaſtical concernment, we ſhall with him defer their Proſecution at this time, and return into Italy to ſee how the Lombards there behave themſelves. And here we could complain of the Injury of time which hath deprived us of the Monuments of their Actions, having little left us, but what Paul has written of this Subject, who not handling it with that Accurateneſs as Procopius doth that of the Goths, hath paſſed by many things of great Concernment; for he was not an Eye witneſs, but lived two hundred years after in the days of Charles the Great. But from the Hiſtory of Gregory the Biſhop of Tours, he tells us, that after the Captains had cantonized the Countrey, ſome of them invaded Gall, which waſting and rifling, they defeated and ſlew Amatus the Patritian, the Subject of Guntramnus King of the Franks, who oppoſed them with an Army, and having made great Slaughter of the Burgundians, returned into Italy inriched with ineſtimable Booty. This incouraged them to make a ſecond Attempt, and they pierced as far as Muſciæ Calmes, near to the City Ebrodunum; but there they were met with and incompaſſed by Ennius, called alſo Mummulus, who with a party of Burgundians fell upon them, and killing many took the reſt Priſoners, whom by his Kings order he diſtributed here and there all, except ſome few that eſcaped into Italy with the News.

How matters went in Italy.

Gregor. Turon. lib. 4. c. 36.

Paulus Diaconus de geſt. Long. lib.

37. The Lombards, as we ſaid before, beſides other ſorts of People, brought ſome Saxons with them into Italy; it being accorded betwixt them, that the Saxons ſhould have lands aſſigned after the Conqueſt. But they could not well agree together; it ſeems the Saxons would not truckle under the Lombards, and the Lombards would not permit, that they ſhould be a Body Independent of, and diſtinct from themſelves; therefore they reſolved to return to their own Countrey, by the way of Gall. In their firſt Attempt, they were ſore diſtreſſed by Mummulus, who killing a great number of them, and taking many Priſoners forced them back into Italy. Yet for all this, they returned with their Wives and Children, and all they had, purpoſing by the leave and aſſiſtence of King Sigibert to return home, and for this purpoſe they divided themſelves into two Parties; whereof one took the way of Nicæa, and the other paſſed on by Ebrodunum the very ſame way they had retreated. They maintained themſelves by Corn that was now Ripe in the Fields, ſome Cattel alſo they took, and did not altogether abſtain from rifling and burning the Towns. When they were come to the Rhone, Mummulus again meets them with a great Force, but permits them with Money to purchaſe their paſſage, and ſo at length they came to Sigebert; cheating the People in their way by Counterfeit Gold, and returned to their former Seats, which they now found ſeized by the Suani, and other ſorts of People. In great Indignation they fall upon them, and will drive thoſe Intruders out. They offered them firſt the third part of the Countrey; affirming there was room enough for them all, and after, when this would not be accepted, the half, nay two parts of three. Nay rather than Quarrel, they would give them both their Lands and all their Cattel; but the Saxons would not be ſatisfied with any thing but fighting, and they agreed before hand, how the Wives of the Suani ſhould be diſtributed. But ſee how they reckoned without their Hoſt. They loſt twenty thouſand Men in one Battel, and the Suani, remained Victours, miſſing but four hundred and eighty of their number. Six thouſand of thoſe Saxons that remained, bound themſelves by a vow never to cut their Hair nor Beards, till they ſhould be revenged upon the Suani: But all would not doe; they were again defeated, and at laſt content to ſit down and be quiet.

The Saxons return home.

Defeated by the Suani.

The Lombards make a Fruitleſs expedition into Gall.

38. But to return to the Lombards, three of their Captains, Amo, Zaban and Rhodanus following the example of the Saxons, made alſo an Irruption into Gall. Amo taking the Road of Ebrodunum, came as far as Machovilla, a Town beſtowed upon Mummulus by his Prince, and there pitched his Camp. Zaban by another way came to Valentia, and Rhodanus ſet upon Gratianopolis, or Grenoble. Amo waſted the Province of Arles, as far as the City of Marſeilles; and his two other Friends were not leſs buſie in plundering, waſting and burning all places wherever they came. Mummulus having Intelligence of their motions, firſt fell upon Rhodanus buſie in the Siege of Gratianopolis, and killing many of his Men, drove him up into the tops of the Mountains wounded, as he was, with a Lance. Thence with five hundred men through unknown Tracts he paſſed to Zaban, who then beſieged the City Valentia, and gave him an Account of all that had happened. They joyned their Forces together and waſted the Countrey as far as Ebrodunum, where Mummulus met with them, and by a notable defeat reſtrained their farther Rapines. Then did Zaban and Rhodanus return into Italy, and came to Secuſium; which City Siſinnius the Magiſter Militum held for the Emperour. Hither Mummulus ſent a Youth with Letters, ſignifying he would be with him ſpeedily, which Zaban and Rhodanus underſtanding departed without any more to doe, to their own Cities. Amo informed of what had happened with all his Booty, took the way again for Italy, but being ſtopped by the great Snows that fell, was forced to leave a great part of it behind, and paſſing the Alpes with much difficulty at laſt got home.

And the Franks into Italy.

Ralig, Conſilii patiens; aliter Raleigh, & in vocab. Allem. cum Augmento, Perahtlo.

Juſtin the Emperour dies.

39. To be even with the Lombards, not long after, the Franks invaded their Borders, and took by ſurrender a Fort called Anagnis ſomething above Trent, which being looked on as a great affront by Ragilo, or rather Raligo a Comes of the Lombards, he waſted all the Territories about it, and in his return with his Booty, was encountred by Charamnichis a Captain of the Franks, who ſlew him with many of his followers, and paſſing to Trent, rifled and waſted all places about it. On his back came Euin the Captain, or Duke, if ſo you will call him, of Trent, and in the place called Salurnis in way of Retaliation, cut him off with all his Men, and recovered the Booty; which done, and having expelled the Franks from all his Territories; he married afterward the Daughter of Garibaldus, King of the Baioarii. About this time, that we may now return and viſit the Eaſtern parts, died Juſtin the Emperour, after he had Reigned ſixteen years nine Months and an half. Being near his end, he called Tiberius his Collegue to him, and in the Preſence of the Senate, and Eutychius the Patriarch gave him this Advice that follows.

His Advice to Tiberius.

Cedrenus & Hiſt. Miſcella.

40. “ Behold, ſaith he, God Almighty thy Benefactour beſtowed this Habit on “ thee, and not I. Honour alſo thy Mother (meaning Sophia the Empreſs) for- “ merly thy Lady, for thou knoweſt thou was firſt her Servant, and then her Son. “ Rejoyce not in Bloud, have nothing to doe with Murther, neither render Evil “ for Evil, leſt thou imitate me in the Evil of Malice. For I being a Man, have “ offended and am a guilty Perſon, and have received according to my deſerts; “ but ſtand in Judgment with thoſe, who have ſo rewarded me at the Tribunal “ Seat of Chriſt. Let not the Habit thou weareſt puff thee up. Have as great a “ Care of all committed to thy Charge, as of thine own Concernments. Conſider “ what thou waſt, and what thou art like to be. Avoid pride, and thou ſhalt not “ ſin. Thou knoweſt well what I have been, and what I am. All theſe are thy " Children, as well as Servants. Thou knoweſt I have conferred this Honour up-

" on thee, out of Reſpect to thoſe, that are as near and dear to me as my Bowels.
" When thou ſeeſt them, conceive that thou beholdeſt the very Commonwealth.
" Take a ſpecial Care of the Army: Admit into it neither effeminate nor impru" dent Men; neither ever regard thoſe that ſay, the Emperours that Reigned before " thee, were ſuch and ſuch. Theſe things I give thee in Charge, and having dear-
" ly experienced the Truth and Conveniency of them, adviſe thee to act accord" ingly. Such as are Rich let them enjoy their Wealth, and ſuch as are poor Re" lieve. Then the Patriarch going to Prayers, all the Company concluded with Amen; and Cæſar falling at the Emperour's Feet ſaid unto him. " I am at your Di-
" ſpoſal, both Life and all I have: To which the Emperour replied; That God who made Heaven and Earth, put into thy Heart, what I have forgotten, and proceeding in Words to this purpoſe, he drew abundance of Tears from all the Aſſembly. Not long after, his Diſeaſe returned upon him with violence, and he died. His Body was depoſited in the Heræum of Juſtinian, in a Proconneſian Coffin, and by him was afterwards laid his Wife Sophia. Paulus Diaconus gives us his Character in ſhort thus: He was addicted to all ſort of Covetouſneſs, a deſpiſer of the Poor, and a ſpoiler of the Senatours; ſo greedy of Wealth, that he cauſed Iron Cheſts to be made, wherein to beſtow the Coin he had ravenouſly ſcraped together. This man deſpiſing the command of God was deprived of Reaſon, and fell mad. Yet if he made ſuch ſober and pious Diſcourſes, both at the Promotion of Tiberius, and at the time of his Death; what general Character ſoever is given him by theſe Writers, we muſt think he had his Lucida Intervalla, not onely as to his Intellectuals, but his Morals too.

De geſt. Longobard. lib. 3. 11.

41. Tiberius now after his Death was, according to the Cuſtome, to go in State to the Shews of the Circus, and there many expected his coming, who were of the Faction of Juſtinian, the ſuppoſed Nephew of Juſtinus, with intention to doe him a miſchief. But he went from Church to Church, and paſſed ſtill through Sacred places, where having performed his Devotions, he ſent for the Biſhop of the City with the Conſuls and Prefects, and ſo entred the Palace. Then being clothed with the Purple, Crowned with a Diadem, and Seated on the imperial Throne; he was confirmed in the Government with great applauſe. The Factioniſts then, who expected his coming to the Circus, hearing what was already done, ſtole away, and after a few days Juſtinian himſelf came and caſt himſelf at the Emperour's Feet, bringing with him as a Preſent fifteen Centenaries, and he, according to his wonted patience, received and commanded him to attend him in the Palace. Thus he eſcaped this danger in the Circus, but not long after, was intangled in greater Difficulties created him by Sophia the Widow Empreſs, who forgetting her Ingagements formerly made to him, attempted to promote Juſtinian to the Throne, while he according to the Cuſtome of the Emperours, was to paſs thirty days in the Countrey, at the time of Vintage. He having timely notice, returned with all ſpeed to Conſtantinople, took her and all her Treaſures Cuſtody, leaving her onely ſo much, as would ſupply her wants. He removed her Attendants, and placed others about her, whom he could truſt; Charging them that the other ſhould never come in her Preſence. He ſorely rebuked Juſtinian, and that was all, for he ſhewed he had great kindneſs for him, promiſing to marry his own Daughter to his Son, and that his Son ſhould marry Juſtinian's Daughter; although theſe croſs Matches never took Effect.

Tiberius eſcapes a Danger.

Secures Sophia the Empreſs.

Gregor. Turon. lib. 5. c. 30. & Paulus Diacon. de geſt. Longob. l. 3. c. 12. Vocato ad ſe urbis Papa cum Coſſ. ac Præfectis.

42. Why Sophia the Empreſs ſhould be thus changed in her Eſteem and kindneſs for Tiberius, other Hiſtorians ſupply us with ſome Womaniſh reaſons. She took it heinouſly, that at his Coronation he named Empreſs his Wife Anaſtaſia, whereas ſhe imagined he had no Wife at all, but intended to marry him after her Husband's death, and for that purpoſe procured him to ſucceed him. Thus fruſtrated of her Expectations in a great Huff and diſdain, ſhe quitted the Court, and went to live by her ſelf in the Palace called by her Name. The Latin Writers tell us a ſtory how Tiberius for his Piety, and eſpecially his Charity to the poor, had the Treaſure of Narſes diſcovered to him by the old Man, that was Conſcious to the hiding of it; but it's much ſuſpected, becauſe the Greek Hiſtorians ſpeak nothing of any ſuch Matter. However, ſuch was his Reputation abroad, that Ambaſſadours were ſent to Court him from ſeveral Princes, and amongſt others, from Chilperick the King of the Franks, to whom Tiberius ſent ſeveral Preſents, amongſt which were remarkable, ſome Medals weighing pounds a piece, having the Emperour's Image with this Inſcription about it; Tiberii Conſtantini, Perpetui Auguſti, and on the reverſe a Chariot with four Horſes, and a Driver with theſe Words, Zonaras & Cedrenus.

Mauritius made General.

Lib. 5. c. 19.

Gloria Romanorum. As for Juſtinian it's certain, he was put out of Command (Euagrius ſaith, becauſe he had not ſuch Succeſs, as formerly againſt the Barbarians, but we know the Throne brooks no Rival) and Ma[illegible]icius was made General of the Eaſt, who by Birth and Name was of old Rome, but becauſe of his Anceſtours and Parents, he owned Arebiſſus a City of Cappadocia for his Countrey.

His Character.

43. Mauricius was, as Euagrius ſets him forth, a very wiſe Man, very diligent and exact in buſineſs, of a firm and conſtant mind, and of a very good Life and Converſation. He ſo bridled his fleſhly Luſts, that he not onely abſtained from ſuch things as provoked to Luſt and Senſuality, but even from neceſſaries themſelves. He would not lend any Ear to ſtories, nor hearken to every Man's tale. He ſtopped his Ears not with Wax (as the Poet hath it) but with reaſon, which he uſed as a Key to open and ſhut them as there was occaſion. Ignorance the Mother of boldneſs, he baniſhed far from him, knowing that in raſhneſs there is Peril, and in Adviſement and Deliberation great Security. Fortitude and Prudence bore in him ſuch ſway, that all buſineſſes he accommodated to time and place, and ſo reſtrained his Appetite, that in all things he never exceeded Moderation; ſuch being his Diſpoſition, with great ſucceſs he made War in foreign Countries. He took both Cities and Caſtles, ſuch as ſtood moſt convenient for the Perſians, and ſo great Booty, that with Captives he filled Iſles, Towns and Countries that had lain a long time deſolate and not inhabited, cauſing the Land to be tilled and brought into order. Of theſe men he had numbers ſufficient to make up Armies, which fought ſtoutly againſt other Nations, and furniſhed all Families with Slaves. He waged War with the cheifeſt of the Perſians, as Tamochoſroes and Aduarmanes who brought great Armies into the Field; but after what manner, and how proſperouſly, ſaith our Authour, let others relate, or we in another work perhaps may ſhew, becauſe in this preſent Volume we promiſed to treat of other matters. But neither he nor any other performed this part of ſervice to Poſterity, or if they did, ſome unlucky accident hath deprived us of the fruits of their Endeavours.

His ſucceſs againſt the Perſians.

44. Therefore what we our ſelves have not, we cannot give, and the Reader muſt be ſatisfied, though we do not relate all actions with the ſame clearneſs and enumeration of Particulars. For as where we have matter, we ought as fully to inform him as the nature of this Deſign will bear, ſo on the other ſide, we do not pretend to write Romances; But thus much Euagrius tells us, he will now ſay, that Tamochoſroes was defeated not through the valour of the Roman Souldiers, but by the onely Piety of their Captain and his Faith in God, and as alſo that Aduarmanes was overthrown by plain force of Arms, and after a great ſlaughter of his men put to flight, and that this was done not onely when Alamundarus Captain of the Scenitæ had betrayed Mauricius, by not coming over Euphrates, and fighting againſt thoſe Scenitæ that were of the contrary Faction, but alſo when Theodorich who commanded the Scythians durſt not venture within Bow-ſhot, but fairly took him to his heels, and with his men ran away. What Euagrius here relates in ſhort, ſome aſſign to the third year of Tiberius preciſely, yet doubtleſs it took up ſeveral years in acting.

Miſcella Hiſt.

Tiberius Dies.

Hiſt. Franc. l. 6. c. 30.

Mauricius ſucceeds.

L. 18. c. 6. Vide Baron.

45. The next year was the laſt of Tiberius the Emperour, who died in Auguſt, after he had Reigned four years alone, and as much with Juſtin, a month onely excepted. An excellent Perſon, and worthy of a longer Reign, the Empire flouriſhing under his Government. Gregory of Tours aſſures us, he left the People in Tears and Lamentations becauſe of his Departure, for he was mighty good, very Charitable, juſt and wary in Judgment, deſpiſing no man, but bearing every one good will, being loving to, and extremely beloved by all men. To his Title and Dignity of Emperour ſucceeded Mauricius, who had three years before been created Cæſar very ſolemnly, and adorned with a Diadem. At the ſolemnity, as Nicephorus Writes, was preſent John the Patriarch, and another John, a Rhetour or Oratour, made a ſhort ſpeech to Mauricius in the Emperour's name. "He exhorted him from " his Government, to raiſe a beautifull Monument to his Predeceſſour, to adorn " his Sepulchre with his Vertues, and not fruſtrate the expectations of thoſe who " were committed to his Truſt, neither to forget his own Morals, nor quit the " wonted generoſity of his Spirit. See thou reſtrain, ſaith he, by force of reaſon " that Inſolency to which power is ſubject, and by the Arts of Philoſophy wiſely " ſteer the Veſſel of thine Authority. For Empire is an high and lofty thing, puffing up ſuch as are exalted, and obliterating what was formerly well conceived " and intended. Becauſe thou art in Fortune, do not therefore think thou art in " Wiſedom advanced above all others. Endeavour to procure the love of thy Subjects, rather than to keep them in fear and awe, and eſteem downright dealing “ better than flattery and diſſimulation; for Power will hardly admit of Admonition and Reproof. Let Juſtice be ever before thine Eyes, as that which is able “ to reward all our Actions.

46. “ Let the ſtudy of Philoſophy move thee to account of this Purple, no otherwiſe than as of the vileſt Ragg, and to imagine that the Crown wherewith “ thy Brows are circled, differs nothing from the Pebbles that lie on the Sea-ſhore. “ The ſad colour of the Purple ſeems to hint unto Princes, that moderation of mind “ which they ought carefully to retain in their proſperous Eſtate, that they be not “ too much exalted or be proud in theſe Mourning weeds of Monarchy; for the “ Sceptre tells them not, that they exerciſe any immoderate power, but rather undergo a ſplendid ſervitude. Reſtrain thine Anger by humanity and mercy, and “ all arrogance by fear. For Nature to Bees hath aſſigned their Leaders, and armed “ their Kings with a ſting, as a natural faculty to prick him forward that will not “ doe his Duty, but this ſting is not Tyrannical but Juſt, and accommodated to the “ general utility, and the common good; let us imitate them herein, for reaſon “ it ſelf cannot ſuggeſt to us better Councils. Theſe things ſpeak I to thee as thy “ Parent, and for a witneſs of mine Intentions, thou ſhalt have Authority free from “ all prejudice and Corruption, which rewards Vertue and puniſhes and reſtrains “ whatſoever is contrary to it. This Oration of the Emperour was followed by the tears of the Spectatours, and he adorned Cæſar with the Crown and purple Robe, and great Acclamations were made, teſtifying the ſatisfaction of the People in what was done, and their acknowledgment of the merits of him whom they ſaw preferred, but eſpecially of the Wiſedom and forecaſt of their Emperour. Thus was Mauricius inaugurated Cæſar, but enjoyed not the title of Emperour till the Death of Tiberius, which fell out in the fourth Indiction, the eighth year of Childebert King of the Franks, the ninth of Pelagius the Second, the Roman Biſhop, and the five hundred eighty ſixth of our Lord, as is commonly computed, but rather in the DLXXXII.

Lib. 5. c. 22.

47. Euagrius tells us, that when Tiberius was ready to yield up the Ghoſt, he aſſigned to Mauricius his Daughter Auguſta in Marriage, with the Empire for her Dowry, and Proclaiming him Emperour, beſtowed on them alſo his own Names; for Mauricius he called Tiberius, and Auguſta he named Conſtantina. Mauricius being ſetled in his Throne, made great preparations for Celebration of his Marriage, whereat were preſent his own Father and Mother a circumſtance which, if our Authour obſerve right, never happened to any Emperour before. He affirms that a more Royal and Magnificent ſhew never had been formerly made; and whereas Plutarch wrote, that both Valour and Fortune joyned in advancing the grandeur of Rome, he is bold to ſay, that true Piety and Felicity ſo concurred in Mauricius, that Piety ſuffered Felicity to be joyned with her, and would not permit her to be baffled or overthrown. The Emperour not onely adorned his Head with the Crown, and his Body with Purple, but his mind alſo with pretious Ornaments. For in a manner, he was the onely Emperour who ever commanded himſelf, who baniſhing from his mind all popular Perturbations (ſo he words it,) and ſetling the Dominion of Ariſtocracy in the Seat of Reaſon, made himſelf a perfect Pattern of Vertue for his Subjects to imitate. And our Authour profeſſes he ſaith not this to flatter him, ſeeing he could not poſſibly know what he now wrote, but merely conſtrained by that evidence which the real effects of his proſperous Government carried with them, being abſolutely the bleſſings of Almighty God. He adds, that this Emperour was above all others mercifull, not permitting thoſe to be put to Death that had well deſerved it, as Alamundarus Captain of the Scenitæ in Arabia, who had betrayed him, but was for puniſhment onely baniſhed into Sicily. Moreover Naamanes his Son who had done infinite miſchief to the Empire, who had waſted the two Phœnicia's, and Palæſtine he kept onely in free cuſtody when all men deſired his Head, inflicting on him no other puniſhment. And the like clemency he ſhewed to infinite other perſons.

Euagrius his high Commendations of him.

His Generals and their Exploits.

48. One John a Thracian, he made General of his Forces in the Eaſt, who ſome times did well, but otherwhiles ill, and deſerved no great Commendation. Into his place then he choſe Philippicus who had married his Siſter. He made great ſpoil in the Perſian Dominions, and killed many of their great men: The Souldiers alſo he brought to exact Diſcipline from Riot and Pleaſure, making them practiſe ſobriety and temperance. He was ſucceeded by one Priſcus a man ſo ſupercilious, that none muſt ſpeak with him except upon ſome very weighty matter, being conceited that the leſs familiarity he uſed, the eaſilier ſhould he compaſs his Deſigns, and the Souldiers would more ſtand in awe, and with more readineſs obey him.

The Army Mutinies.

The Perſians utterly defeated.

On a time having ſet himſelf into as ſevere and haughty a poſture as he could, with high and diſdainfull looks, and arrogant geſtures, he made them a ſpeech of the patience and perils they were to undergo in War, concerning the neatneſs of their Armour, and of the Rewards they were to receive for their Travel and Service. They heard his impertinent diſcourſe with great Indignation, fell into a Mutiny, and running to his Tent, robbed him of all his Treaſure, and had certainly killed him, had he not ſpeedily taken Horſe and fled to Edeſſa. Yet this City they beſieged, commanding Priſcus to be delivered up to them, and when the Citizens refuſed to doe it, they laid hold on Germanus a Captain in Phœnicia, and proclaimed him their General and Emperour beſides. He refuſing to comply with their ſeditious humour, they threatned to kill him; when threats would not doe, they proceeded to whip him and to tear his body, which torments forced him to yield, and with an Oath to promiſe his compliance with them. All other Officers they diſplaced, and put others in their room, and behaved themſelves in their Quarters with all Inſolency, and without any regard to the Laws. Mauricius having notice of this Mutiny, ſent Philippicus to reduce them into order, but him they rejected, and threatned with Death and Deſtruction thoſe who propounded to liſten to his advice. The Barbarians took heart at theſe diſorders in the Roman Army, and in their wonted manner Invaded the Province adjoyning. Yet Germanus oppoſed the Perſians with ſuch ſucceſs, that if Euagrius be to be credited, there was not one of them left to bring home the news of their Defeat.

The Abares infeſt Thrace.

The Mutiny appeaſed.

49. But the Abarian Avares came twice as far as the long Wall, and waſting the Countrey before them, took Singedon, Anchialus, and all Hellada with other Cities and Caſtles, the Romans having a great Army lying in the Eaſt to no purpoſe. The Emperour then ſent Andreas the Captain of his Guards, to perſwade them to return to Obedience, and take again ſuch Officers as had commanded them before, but they giving no ear to what he ſaid, at length he pitched upon Gregory the Biſhop of Antioch, the fitteſt man alive to be employed in this buſineſs. For he was both a prudent man, and had got a mighty intereſt in the Souldiers by his great bounty to many of them, both in Meat, Drink and Apparel, which knowing, he ſent to the chiefeſt of them, and procured them to give him a meeting at Litarbis, a Town three hundred furlongs diſtant from Antioch. Being met, he fell down on his Knees before them, and with gentle rhetorick, inforced by many Prayers and tears ſo wrought upon them, that all their minds on a ſudden were changed, and they went out to deliberate with themſelves what was to be done. Being after a while returned, they told him they would yield to his requeſt, and then he named Philippicus whom they ſhould ask for their Captain. They told him they could not petition for him, becauſe they and the whole Army had made an Oath never to doe it, to which he replied, that the Prieſt hath power to bind and looſe in Heaven and in Earth, and recited to them the ſaying of Chriſt to this purpoſe out of the Goſpel. They were perſwaded herein alſo to conſent unto him, and then he fell to his Prayers to appeaſe the wrath of Almighty God, and diſtributed to them the Immaculate Body of Chriſt, it being then Maunday-Thurſday, or the day before the Paſſion. The number of them was two thouſand, yet he entertained them all that night, Couches being made them on the Graſs, and the next day returned home, permitting them to aſſemble where they pleaſed. Philippicus who then reſided at Tarſus in Cilicia, he informed how things ſtood, and adviſed him to repair to Conſtantinople, whither he ſent an account alſo of his Tranſactions with the Army, and what they had reſolved concerning Philippicus. Shortly after, Philippicus came to Antioch, and the Souldiers meeting him, deſired the Chriſtians to intercede to him in their behalf. They fell at his Feet, and he giving them his Hand, told them, all old Offences were forgiven, which ſaid, they received his Orders and followed him in the Wars.

Antioch ſhaken with an Earthquake.

50. While this Mutiny of the Armies threatned with Ruine the State of the Empire in the Eaſt, the City of Antioch was again ſore diſtreſſed by an Earthquake, in the ſix hundred thirty and ſeventh year after it was ſo called, and the ſixty firſt year after that Earthquake which had laſt happened. Euagrius tells us this ſtory, that when as he himſelf had on the laſt day of September, taken to Wife a Virgin of tender years, and the City therefore kept Holy-day, and flocked to his Houſe with great pomp and ſolemnity; about the third hour of the Night came ſuch an Earthquake, as with great violence ſhook the whole City. It ſo diſjoynted the Foundations, that all the Buildings about the Church tumbled to the Ground, the Hemiſpherical Roof which Euphræmius had made of Bay-Trees excepted, which had been ſo ſhaken with the Earthquake, both in the time of Juſtin and afterward, that it leaned much to the North, and had thruſt out of their place the mighty great Beams which fell with marvellous noiſe, but now again the Roof ſhrunk to it's own place, and ſtood as it had done before, without bowing to either ſide. The Buildings of St. Mario Church were quite overthrown, all but one middle Porch that was miraculouſly preſerved. The places of Oſtracina and Pſeplicum, and all the parts called Briſia were alſo ruinated, with other Churches and the publick Baths. The people periſhed confuſedly together about threeſcore thouſand perſons, as was conjectured by the Bread which was ſpent in the City. But the Biſhop was wonderfully preſerved, with thoſe alone of his Family that were near to him, though the whole Lodging he was in fell to the Ground; for when the Earthquake the ſecond time ſhook the place, and as it were opened the Room, they lifted him up with all ſpeed, and by a Rope let him down to the Ground. God Almighty mixed mercy with his Juſtice in this reſpect, that no hurt by fire followed, though in Kitchins, Baths, and other places there were many kindled, as well for publick as private uſes. In this Earthquake died many Noble and famous Perſons, but the Emperour ſupplied money for the repairing of the City. Thus Euagrius of the Earthquake, who had too great cauſe to remember it from a notable circumſtance.

Sixty thouſand Perſons periſh.

Martyropolis betrayed to the Perſians.

51. Not long after that the Souldiers returned to obedience, Sittas one of the Senatours of Martyropolis took advantage at the abſence of the Garriſon, and betrayed the City to the Perſians. Philippicus upon notice marched thither, but wanting neceſſaries for a Siege, after ſome vain attempts made to regain the place, the Army drew off, and could not be perſwaded by Gregory the Biſhop, whom the Emperour again employed, to return, becauſe they wanted Engins. Care therefore was taken by fortifying the adjacent Caſtles, to intercept all ſuccours that ſhould come from the Perſians, and the Souldiers were diſpoſed of into their Winter Quarters. The year following yet the Perſians ſent a ſupply, and Philippicus ingaging with this party had the better, but ſo many eſcaped into the Town, as ſufficed to reinforce the Garriſon which was their chief deſign. The Romans then perceiving there was no winning of the Town by plain force, went and built a Fort upon the top of an Hill at ſeven furlongs diſtance, there to prepare Engins and make all things ready for a Siege, and not long after was Comentiolus a Thracian Born, ſent to ſucceed Philippicus in the command of the Army. He though with danger to his own Perſon had proſperous ſucceſs againſt the Perſians, of whom ſuch as were left alive, having loſt all their Captains ran away to Niſibis, and fearing to return to their King who had threatned them with Death, except they brought their Captains home in ſafety, began to enter into Conſpiracy againſt his Life. In the mean time Comentiolus having beſieged Martyropolis, left there the greateſt part of his Forces, and with the reſt went and took a Caſtle called Ochas, which ſtood upon the farther Bank overagainſt Martyropolis on a ſteep Rock, whence he had a proſpect of the whole City. This being taken in, the Perſians deſpaired of holding Martyropolis any longer.

Who deſpair to hold it.

Hormiſda ſucceeded his Father Choſroes.

52. The preſent King of Perſia was Hormiſda, who had ſucceeded his Father Choſroes according to his appointment. And he ſucceeded him it ſeems in his Vices as well as his Kingdom, though not in his long and proſperous Fortunes. Euagrius calls him the moſt wicked and unjuſt of all others; for he not onely robbed his Subjects of their Goods, but plagued them with ſundry kinds of Deaths. Theophanes to what Euagrius hath written concerning the Conſpiracy againſt this King's Life, adds, that Barames his General having had ill ſucceſs againſt the Romans, after the King had in diſgrace ſent him the Habit of a Woman was deprived of his command. Inraged hereat, he Conſpires againſt him, ſtirring up the Souldiers by counterfeit Letters, and draws to his Party Ferrochanes, whom Hormiſda had lately put into his place, with Bindois a Noble Perſian newly delivered out of Priſon, who ſuddenly entring the Court, pulled the King down from his Throne, ſnatched the Diadem from his Head and committed him to Cuſtody. After this the Nobility commanding Hormiſda to be brought out of Priſon, ſawed in pieces one of his Sons and his Wife before his Eyes, then deprived him of his Eyes, and thruſt him into a Dungeon. Yet Choſroes his Son treated him very civily, and gave him a large allowance of Diet, which kindneſs he ſo little acknowledged, that he trampled all under his Feet that he ſent him. This inraged Choſroes ſo much, that forgetting all obligations of Nature, he commanded him with Cudgels to be beaten to Death.

Vide Baron.

Depoſed.

And killed by Choſroes his Son and ſucceſſour.

53. This unnatural action of Choſroes ſore troubled the Perſians, and procured their hatred againſt him, which was increaſed by his putting ſeveral Noblemen to Death, on ſuſpicion that they ſided with Barames who uſurped, which cauſed the Souldiers to revolt from him, and take the Party of Barames. Being now forſaken by all men he fled for his Life, in great doubt whether he ſhould betake himſelf to the Chriſtians or the Turks, in which humour he alighted from his Horſe, and laying the Reins on his Neck, reſolved to follow him whitherſoever he ſhould go, and ſo he brought him to the borders of the Roman Empire. This account we have from Theophanes. Euagrius relates that Hormiſda being killed by the Perſians for his Wickedneſs, and Choſroes his Son being Crowned his Succeſſour, Barames took Arms againſt him. Choſroes with a ſmall Army intended to Ingage him, but perceiving his men fell away from him, he fled to Circaſium after he had called upon the God of the Chriſtians, that his Horſe ſhould carry him to a moſt convenient Place. Being arrived there with his Wife, two young Children and certain Noble men of Perſia, he ſent and craved favour of Mauricius the Emperour, who, after mature deliberation of the matter, conſidering how fickle and inſtable all humane things are, accepted of his ſuit, and inſtead of a baniſhed Man, made him his Gueſt, inſtead of a ſorrowfull Fugitive, his loving Son, and beſtowed on him divers things in a Royal and munificent manner, the Empreſs ſhewing the like bounty to his Wife, and their Sons to the Children he had brought along with him. Moreover Mauricius aſſiſted him with his whole Force in the recovery of his Kingdom, ſending a Captain with him, to conduct the Army whitherſoever he ſhould deſire. He ſupplied him with an incredible ſumm of Money, and thus furniſhed he was brought out of the Roman Dominions as far as Martyropolis, where Sittas the Traitour was delivered into his Hands, and being ſtoned by the Citizens, was hanged on the Gallows. The City of Daras was alſo given up to him, the Perſians being privily ſtoln away, and the Romans having in one battel quite defeated Barames, who fled away alone with great infamy. Then was Choſroes reſtored to his Kingdom, this bloudleſs victory being obtained, as Theophanes writes, by the conduct of Narſes, whom Mauricius ſent General of the Roman Army.

Who is driven out, and flies to Mauricius.

Mauricius ſends him into his Kingdom with an Army.

He is reſtored.

54. This ſame year that Choſroes was reſtored, being the Eighth of the Reign of Mauricius, after the Army returned out of the Eaſt, the Emperour himſelf, in the beginning of the Spring, led it down to Anchialus, to oppoſe the Abares, who, as the Rumour went, were reſolved to waſte the Countrey of Thrace, and all as far as that City. At their demand he had ſent them a golden Table, and many Talents of Money, to purchaſe Peace, but this not taking effect, he paſſed to Perinthus, then called Heraclea, being ſorely diſtreſſed by Tempeſts, and having made Priſcus General of the Forces in Europe, after great loſs received from the Barbarians, he returned again to Conſtantinople. The Abares and Slavini having croſſed the Danube, under conduct of Chaganus, an Hunne, over-ran Thrace, came at length as far as Heraclea, and by ſtrategem took Didymothicum. The violence of theſe Barbarous Nations the Emperour reſtrained, as our Hiſtorian obſerves, by his admirable Art and Policy. He rigged up his Navy, and made as though he intended to invade their Territories, the report whereof ſtruck them with great fear, and in a great perplexity they returned home. After their departure he put ſtrong Garriſons into the places lying upon the Danube, to hinder their paſſage for the time to come, and Priſcus returned to Conſtantinople, where he was called to account about the Plunder, and put out of his Command, which was conferred on Peter, the Emperour's Brother. But he, in the diſcharge of his Office, did nothing anſwer Mauricius his expectation, and therefore he ſoon again deprived him, and reſtored Priſcus to his former Place and Dignity. To this Priſcus is extant a Letter written by Gregory the Great, then Biſhop of Rome, wherein he congratulates his Reſtitution, and gives him very good Advice.

Nicephorus, lib. 18. c. 18. Vide Baron.

Mauricius his ill ſucceſs againſt the Avares.

By his craft he makes them retreat.

Lib. 2. Ep. 51. Indict. 11. Baron.

55. Thus reſtored to his place Priſcus returns to the Danube, to watch the motions of Chaganus, whom finding reſolved to make another Incurſion, he ſends one Theodorus, a Phyſician, to him, to perſuade him to embrace Peace and a good Underſtanding with the Emperour. He finds him exceſſive proud, and full of arrogant Conceits and Expreſſions, uſing this amongſt the reſt, That they ſhould find he would make himſelf Lord and Maſter of all Nations. Theodorus takes him down by an old ſtory, how Seſoſtris, King of Egypt, having ſubdued ſeveral Kings and Kingdoms, cauſed himſelf to be drawn in a Chariot by four of thoſe unfortunate Princes, whereof one, as he was yoked and drew in the Chariot, would ſtill look back, and keep his Eyes fixed upon one of the Wheels. Seſoſtris taking notice of this his conſtant courſe, would needs know what remarkable thing there could be on which he could gaze ſo long together. He told him it was the Wheel, which being ſo unſtable, as in a perpetual ſucceſſion to elevate and depreſs its ſeveral parts, was a perfect reſemblance of the Vanity and Inconſtancy of all things incident to humane Life; which Saying Seſoſtris ſo ſeriouſly weighed, that he would be no more drawn in his Chariot by thoſe Kings. Chaganus ſmiled at the ſtory, and knowing his meaning, ſignified to Theodorus, that he was not averſe to Peace, which Priſcus purchaſed, and the Barbarian drew off his Forces from the Roman Territories. This Year, which was the eighth of his Reign, Mauricius cauſed his Son Theodoſius to be crowned by John the Patriarch on Eaſter-day, and took him to be his Collegue in the Empire, being a Child about five years old.

Peace bought of Chaganus their Leader.

56. Paul, the Hiſtorian of the Lombards, and other Writers, differ concerning the time of the Death of Mauricius, as joyned with other matters, they placing ſeveral things before it, which he ſets after at a good diſtance. That the Sclavi, or Sclavini, ſome time before his death, invaded Hiſtria, Paul affirmeth; but this was in conjunction with the Lombards and Avares. Afterward, about the latter end of Phocas, as he tells us, their King Cacanus, or Gaganus, with an innumerable multitude, invaded the Borders of Venetia, but Baronius placeth that expedition of the Sclavi, and this of Cacanus, in the ſame year. Gregory the Great, in an Epiſtle to Maximus, Biſhop of Salonæ, laments that by the way of Iſtria the Sclavi had already entred Italy; but nothing doth he ſay concerning Gaganus his Invaſion of Venetia, which Paul placeth in the Reign of Adaloaldus, and a good ſpace after the death of that Biſhop. But whatever waſte or deſtruction ſoever the Sclavi, or Sclavini, made in the Weſtern Parts, the diſturbance they wrought in the Eaſt was great, where they put Mauricius into great Fears and Care. In his eleventh Year they roſe up in great multitudes, to croſs the Danube, of which he having notice, ſent away Priſcus, with all the Roman Nobility, to reſtrain them. Their Captain hereat affrighted, ſent to Priſcus to expoſtulate and complain, that the Emperour firſt made War upon his Neighbours. He anſwered, he had no Commiſſion to make War, but onely to reſtrain the frequent Invaſions of the Sclavi; yet perceiving that they carried it cunningly, and that Ardagaſtus was ſending abroad multitudes to forage, at midnight he ſilently paſſed the River, and fell upon him when he expected nothing leſs, cut off many of his Men, and forced him to deſert them, and hide himſelf before ſuch time as he could mount, which done, the Countrey waſted, and many Priſoners taken Priſcus returned in triumph to Conſtantinople, where he was received with extraordinary great joy.

Paul and other Hiſtorians differ.

The Sclavi invade the Eaſt.

Defeated by Priſcus.

57. Three or four years after this Victory was obtained againſt the Sclavi, Mauricius fell deſperately ſick, and, as one leaving this World, diſpoſed of his Empire to his Children in this manner. To his eldeſt Son Theodoſius he gave Conſtantinople, with the Eaſtern Provinces; and to Tiberius, his ſecond Son, Rome, with Italy, and the Iſlands of the Tyrrhenian Sea. The other Provinces he diſtributed to the reſt of his Sons, who being very young, he made Domitianus, his Kinſman, the Biſhop of Melita, a man very diligent and fit for buſineſs, their Tutour or Guardian. But this Diſpoſition came to nothing, the great Diſpoſer of all Empires and Dominions having otherwiſe ordained concerning Mauricius and his Sons, as we ſhall ſhortly find. But the year following his Recovery, to teſtifie his gratitude to his Maker and Reſtorer, as we have ground in charity to judge, he ſent to Rome thirty pounds of Gold to be diſtributed to the poor of that City, with Gowns to be given to the Souldiers as a military Donative, for all which Gregory the Biſhop gives him humble Thanks in a Letter full of Duty and Obſervance to him his Prince. The Meſſenger by whom theſe things were ſent was Julianus Scribo, who entring upon his Office in Italy, oppreſſed the poor People more than did the very Barbarous Nations that invaded their Countrey, having been beaten from Conſtantinople by the multitude for violence offered to the Patriarch of that City, at ſuch time as the Sclavini were on their march thitherward, waſting and deſtroying all things in their paſſage. For that after the defeat given them by Priſcus, they yet returned, and in ſeveral years following haraſſed Illyricum and Dalmatia, with other Provinces, is too clear and evident.

Mauricius being ſick, diſtributes the Provinces to his Children.

Which came to nothing.

Thanks for his Recovery.

Ex Oratione Phocæ, apud Theophylactum. Vide Bar.

Triginta itaq; libras auri, quas conſamulus meus Buſa detulit Scribo, Sacerdotibus egenisq; & aliis fideliter erogavit. Lib. 8. Ep. 2. Indict. 3. Vide Bar.

58. But amongſt the other Barbarians the Emperour rightly judged, that more than an ordinary ſtrict Eye was to be had to the motions of Chajanus or Chaganus, King of the Avares, and therefore Priſcus was ordered to lie at Singedon, and obſerve his Actions, who had taken up his quarters in the City of Sirmium. The Feaſt of Eaſter was now come, but the Roman Army was ready to be ſtarved, no proviſions being to be had in the Countrey adjacent. Chajanus underſtanding ſo much, ſignifies to Priſcus, that if he would ſend his Waggons to fetch it, he would give him what was requiſite to the celebration of that high Feſtival, with ſuch chearfulneſs as became the Chriſtian Profeſſion. Priſcus ſent him forty Waggons with

The Avares waſte Thrace.

Seized with the Peſtilence.

with ſuch Preſents as he could make, and received Proviſions ſufficient for the time of the Feſtival, during which all Acts of Hoſtility ceaſed, and without the leaſt fear or Inconvenience they converſed together. But the Feaſt being over, the Barbarians ſeparated themſelves, and waſted the Countrey of Thrace at their pleaſure, revelling and feaſting ſplendidly one another. They at Conſtantinople were ſo much affrighted, that they conſulted about quitting Europe, and removing to Chalcedon, and other places in Aſia. The Emperour made as good preparations for defence as he could. Having fortified the Wall, he put the ordinary ſort into a poſture of defending the City, and at the requeſt of the Senate ſent one Armazo on an Embaſſy to Chajanus, with rich preſents, and gentle words, to ſweeten the humour of the Barbarian, but the Ambaſſadour chanced to come in a very ill time, when a great Peſtilence had ſeized on the Avares, and in eſpecial manner had afflicted the Family of Chajanus, who loſt no fewer than ſeven Sons in one day, and now in anguiſh of mind, being ready to depart home, deſired God to judge betwixt himſelf, the Ambaſſadour, and his Maſter, and offered to releaſe his Captives for a very ſmall matter to be paid him for every head.

Their King kills his Priſoners, and impoſeth a Tax.

Mauricius incurs the hatred of his Souldiers.

They of Conſtantinople alſo fall into a ſedition.

59. The Emperour refuſed to pay the Money. Chajanus thereupon fell the half in his price, but when Mauricius refuſed to give this alſo, he put all the Priſoners to the Sword, and impoſing a Tax of fifty thouſand Aurei more upon the Roman Territories, went his way. The Emperour, by his carriage in this buſineſs, exceedingly loſt himſelf, and provoked the Fury and Indignation of the Souldiers, whom he otherwiſe alſo incenſed, if we give credit to what is related by Zonaras. For owing ſeveral Companies of them ill will upon the account of ſome ſeditious attempts, when he ſent them againſt Chajanus, he gave ſecret Inſtructions to Commentiolus, their General, to betray them, and expoſe them to ſuch danger as they muſt neceſſarily miſcarry, which taking effect, it ſeems that ſuch as eſcaped the Sword, and had the fortune to be taken Priſoners out of the ſame inveterate malice formerly conceived againſt them, he refuſed to ranſome. The Army mutinies, and ſends certain Deputies to accuſe Commentiolus of treachery, amongſt whom appears one Phocas, who having Audience of the Emperour in his Preſence Chamber, urged the matter with vehemence, and demeaned himſelf with that ſaucineſs and diſreſpect that he was beaten by the Courtiers that ſtood by. And the Petition of the Army was rejected, Commentiolus kept ſtill in his Command, and the Deputies diſmiſſed without ſucceſs, wherewith the Citizens of Conſtantinople now began to be concerned, and aſſembled in a tumultuous manner, and caſt ſtones at Mauricius, who making a ſearch after thoſe that were principally guilty of the Riot, puniſhed them according to their deſert, but unſeaſonably, as now the times ſtood; for both Army and People began to be weary of his Government, and ſuch Plots were laid, as at length accompliſhed the utter ruine both of him and all his Family.

Cedrenus in Ann. 19. Mauricii.

Priſcus notably defeats the Avares.

60. In the mean time the Avares being clear of the Plague, and ſenſible of the advantages they had upon the Roman Empire, betook themſelves to their former practices of waſting the Borders, and Chajanus delivers to four of his Sons ſo many Bands of Men, with orders to keep ſtrict watch upon the banks of the Danube. Yet the Romans got over in Boats, and Priſcus, who was again employed in this expedition, ingaging with the King's Sons in a Battel, which laſted from morning to night, deſtroyed four thouſand of the Barbarians, with the loſs of no more than three hundred of his own Men. Three days after this, getting advantage of the ground, he drove thoſe that ſurvived the former battel into the Fenns, where many of them periſhed in the Water, and amongſt them the Sons of Chaganus, who now himſelf coming againſt the Romans, with a great power of Men, Priſcus gives him battel, and adds a freſh Victory to his former Succeſſes. To purſue the courſe of Fortune while ſhe continued in this good humour, he ſent four thouſand Men over the River Tiſſus, to watch their opportunity, and by a ſudden onſet to doe ſome notable feat againſt the Barbarians in thoſe parts, who, utterly ignorant of what had lately paſſed, were in the greateſt ſecurity imaginable, and paſſed away the time in Feaſts and Merriments. Falling ſuddenly upon them, they ſlew about thirty thouſand of the Gepidæ, and others, and returned to Priſcus, enriched with much booty. Chaganus troubled at theſe things, reſolves to try his fortune with Priſcus another time, and coming to the Danube, again ingaged with him; but Fortune ſtill proved unkind, and he had the worſt in battel, many of his Men being ſlain, and many drowned in the River. Three thouſand and two hundred Avares were taken Priſoners, beſides two thouſand Barbarians of other Nations. Chaganus ſent to Mauricius to deſire a reſtitution of Captives, and ſurprized him ſo, that not having yet received the news of ſo great a Victory, and ignorant what multitudes he had in his Hands, he ordered the Priſoners to be diſmiſſed.

Things portending the Ruine of Mauricius.

Tom. 2. die 22. April. Vide Bar.

Ἀπὸ τοῦ φόρου μέχει τῆς χαλκῆς ξιφήρης διαδραμών. Sic Cedrenus. Ἀπὸ τοῦ φόρου μέχει τῆς χαλκῆς προσελήλυθεν. Sic Zonaras, cujus Interpres vertit hoc modo locum: A foro uſq; ad Chalcenprogreſſus, obſcurè & imperitè.

61. Thus it was clear day with theſe Provinces, when at Conſtantinople a diſmal Darkneſs and Tempeſt was gathering over the Head of Mauricius, while he celebrated the Nuptials of his Son Theodoſius, with the Daughter of Germanus, a Patritian. As the breeding of ill weather is perceived by ſome, who from the repugnancy of their Temper and Conſtitutions, can prognoſticate the effects of that change, which they find already made in the Elements; ſo out of ſome antipathy, or from other ſecret Cauſes, the approach of this dreadfull ſtorm was both apprehended by the Emperour, and others. Surius tells of a religious Man, to whom it was revealed what manner of death Mauricius ſhould die, after that a Lamp which perpetually burned in the Church, went out of it ſelf, and though many times lighted, yet could not be kept in by any endeavours the Monks could uſe. Another Monk holding a drawn Sword in his hand, went as far as from the Forum to the Brazen Gate, crying out all the way, that the Emperour ſhould die by that ſort of Weapon. It was by others told Mauricius, that he ſhould fall by the Hand of one whoſe name began with Ph, which made him ſuſpect Philippicus, his Siſters Husband, who with all Oaths and Proteſtations imaginable, diſavowed all Plots and Conſpiracies whatſoever. Theſe things made him look about him, and reflect upon the paſſages of his Life, which doing, he found himſelf much in fault, as to the Redemption of the Captives, which he had refuſed, and all things conſidered, he deſired rather to receive his puniſhment in this World, than in that to come, for which purpoſe he ſent to all Patriarchs, to all Monaſteries, and to Jeruſalem, to deſire the Prayers of devout perſons. Prayers being accordingly made in his behalf in all places, one night he dreamed, that he ſtood before the Image of our Saviour, erected at the brazen Gate of the Palace, where a great number of Captives accuſed him: That a voice proceeded from the Image, which commanded him to be apprehended, which being done by the Officers attending, it was demanded of him whether he would be puniſhed in this or another Life. He anſwered, he had much rather in this Life, than that which was to come, receive what he had deſerved, and preſently it was decreed, that he, his Wife, his Children, and his whole Family, ſhould be given up into the Hands of Phocas, a Souldier.

62. As ſoon as he awaked he ſent for Philippicus, who knowing the Emperour's jealouſies, feared he might poſſibly never return alive, and therefore received firſt the holy Communion, and then went to Court, leaving his Wife at home, weeping in Sackcloth and Aſhes. The Emperour, when he ſaw him, commanded him that waited to withdraw, and falling at his Feet, beſought him to forgive him, telling him he had done him great injury, in ſuſpecting that he had plotted againſt his Life, whereas now he plainly perceived he was innocent. He deſired him to tell him if he knew one Phocas, a Souldier in the Army, which he ſaid he did, and that it was he who being ſent about the buſineſs of Commentiolus, had demeaned himſelf ſo ſaucily in his preſence. He asked what was the Temper of the Man. He ſaid he was timorous, and yet of a fierce Nature. If he be a Coward, ſaith he, he is a Murtherer, and then told Philippicus the whole ſtory of his Dream. Now this very ſame night appears a Comet in the Air, ſuch as from the ſhape of a Sword they called Xiphius. And as Cedrenus writes, Magiſtrianus, whom he had employed in this affair, returning from holy Men, brought him word that God had accepted of his Repentance, that he would ſave his Soul, and place him, and all his Family, amongſt the Saints; but he muſt loſe the Empire with great Infamy and Damage. Mauricius having received the Meſſage, glorified God exceedingly.

Cedrenus, Zonaras.

The Souldiers ſalute Phocas Emperour.

63. Matters thus ſtanding, he ſent orders to his Brother Peter, who commanded the Army, to paſs over the Danube, and take up their Winter Quarters in the Enemies Countrey. The Souldiers would not endure to hear of any ſuch thing, but fell into a mutiny, and lifting aloft Phocas, the Centurion, upon a Target, with lucky Acclamations ſaluted him Emperour. This as ſoon as Peter perceived, he withdrew, and returning to Conſtantinople, acquainted Mauricius with what had paſſed. The Tidings of the promotion of a new Emperour came to the City almoſt as ſoon as his Intelligence to the Court, and as the multitude is ever greedy of change, and weary even of the beſt things, thereupon they fell into great tumults and diſorders. Mauricius perceiving here he could not be ſafe, takes Ship at midnight, with his Wife and Children, and by Tempeſt was driven to St. Autonomus, being at the ſame time ſeized with great pains of the Gout. He had ſent before his Son Theodoſius to Choſroes, to put him in mind of the good Offices he had done him, and in this time of his extremity, to deſire that he might receive the like kindneſs.

The Praſini joyn with him.

He is Crowned.

kindneſs. But as ſoon as it was known in the City that he was gone, the Tumults increaſed, and the multitude reviled him in the Forum. When word was brought that Phocas drew near to Conſtantinople, thoſe of the Faction of the Praſini went out to meet him, Congratulated with the Tyrant his Promotion; and invited him to take Poſſeſſion of the Hebdomus, or the Palace ſo called. Here Cyriacus the Patriarch, and the Senatours made their Addreſſes, and the Biſhop having received from him a Confeſſion of his Faith, with a Promiſe to preſerve the Peace of the Church, Crowned him with the imperial Diadem, and thus was he declared Emperour in the Church of St. John Baptiſt, to the great detriment of the Roman State, as was afterward found by the Innumerable miſchiefs that followed. Two days after, in an Emperial Chariot he Rode to the Court, and on the fifth day he ſet a Crown on the Head of Leontia, or Leonto his Wife, and named her Auguſta in a great Aſſembly.

The Factions in Tumult threaten Phocas to ſend for Mauricius.

Mauricius and his five Sons ſlain.

64. As the Cuſtome was, he muſt now go to the Circus to be preſent at the publick Shews, and there the Praſini and Veneti not forgetting their old wont fall a Quarrelling. Phocas ſends ſome of his Guard to quiet them, who deal roughly with a Tribune of the Venetian Faction; more turbulent it ſeems than the reſt, which his Friends not enduring cryed out Tumultuouſly to the Tyrant, that he ſhould bethink himſelf, that Mauricius was not yet dead, and they threatned to ſend for him and make him Umpire in the preſent Controverſie. This ſtartled Phocas, and put him into ſuch a fit of Anger and Jealouſie, that he reſolved, that with the Life of Mauricius he would no more be reproached. He cauſed him therefore to be brought to Chalcedon, to the Haven of Eutropius, where firſt he commanded his five Sons to be ſlain before his Face, with which Spectacle he was no otherwiſe affected, than that with great Courage and Submiſſion to the Will of God, he ſaid, Juſt are thou O Lord, and righteous in all thy Judgments. And ſo far was he from any murmuring, or impatience at the ſad Eſtate, wherein he now ſtood, that when the Nurſe hid one of his youngeſt Sons, that his Family might not altogether periſh, and placed one of her own in his ſtead, the Good man would not ſuffer this kind Fraud of hers to take Succeſs, but diſcovered it, and then willingly ſubmitted his own Neck to the Executioner. Their heads were caſt on a heap in the Fields near the Tribunal, where they lay till they putrified, and then the Tyrant gave leave they ſhould be buried with their Bodies. Such a lamentable end had Mauricius after he had Reigned ſixteen years three Months and odd Days; in the Month of November, the ſixth Indiction, the thirteenth of Gregory the Roman Biſhop, A.D. DCII.

Peter his Brother and others.

And Theodoſius, Mauricius his Son.

Chosroes denounces War againſt the Tyrant.

65. Mauricius being thus diſpatched, Peter his brother was put to Death. So was Commentiolus, with George the Son of Philippicus, and Præſentinus the great Boſom Friend and Councellour of Peter. But the Jealouſie and Cruelty of the Tyrant were not confined to Conſtantinople, and the places adjacent; there was one yet alive, who for all this might ſpoil the beſt of his ſport, and hinder him from enjoying the Fruits of his Villanies, whoſe Title to the Purple was much more ancient than that of his. This was Theodoſius, whom his Father had ſent to beg aid of Choſroes, but as Tyrants have long Armes, he reached him e'er he came to the Confines of the Empire, and ordered him to be put to Death, which was Executed at a place called Leucacta not far diſtant from Nicæa, where he was ſurprized. The Youth deſired the Favour, that e'er he died he might partake of the Holy Myſteries, which being granted, he took a ſtone from the Ground and therewith having three times ſtruck his Breaſt, he prayed and ſaid, Lord Jeſus, thou knoweſt I never injured any Man, but however deal with me as thou pleaſeſt, and Glorifie thy Power; which ſaid, his Head was preſently cut off, though others reported, that being ſent by his Father with Letters to Choſroes, he miſcarried ſome other way. However, it happened that trouble aroſe to the Tyrant from that very thing whereon he founded his greateſt Security, for what way ſoever Theodoſius miſcarried, the incertainty of the manner, brought the matter it ſelf into Suſpicion and as is uſual in ſuch Caſes, thoſe whoſe Intereſt it was to have him alive, gave out, that ſome other Perſon was killed for him. And though Phocas ſent according to the Cuſtome to Choſroes, to acquaint him with his promotion, and by good Words and fair Pretences, to draw him to an owning, and Patronage of his Cauſe and Perſon; yet the Meſſenger was ſo unwelcome, (Cilius by Name, who had with his own hands murthered Mauricius) and much more his Meſſage, that the Barbarian moved with a Senſe of Gratitude and Honour, renounced Friendſhip with the Tyrant, and denounced that War which ſhortly after involved the Empire in innumerable Miſeries.

66. But in the mean time, viz. in the Month of April, were the Images of Phocas and his Wife, as the manner was, brought to Rome, where the People rejoycing in Changes, and incenſed by the illegal and violent Courſes of the late Emperour's Miniſters in Italy, received them with lucky Acclamations; and Gregory the Biſhop commanded them to be laid up in the Oratory of St. Cæſarius the Martyr within the Palace, not the Laterane, but another ſtanding betwixt the Via Appia and Latina. This done the Biſhop Writes a Congratulatory Letter to the Tyrant, beginning with "Glory to God on high, who as it is written changeth times, and tranſlates Kingdoms to whom he pleaſeth, by whoſe incomprehenſible Diſpenſation it comes to paſs, that various are the Conditions of humane Life, and ſometimes for the Puniſhment of the ſins of many, one Man is raiſed up, through the hardneſs of whoſe Heart, the Necks of his Subjects are burthened with the Yoke of Tribulation, as we, ſaith he, have in our affliction long experienced. But ſometimes when it pleaſeth our mercifull God, to comfort and refreſh the Hearts of many that are ſorrowfull, in like manner he promoteth one to the Sovereign Power, through whoſe Bowels of Mercy he infuſeth the Grace of his Exultation, or rejoycing in the Hearts of all; by the abundance of which Exultation, ſaith he, we believe we ſhall ſpeedily be ſtrengthened, who rejoyce that the Benignity of your Piety, is raiſed to the imperial Sovereignty. Let the Heavens and Earth rejoyce and all your People hitherto exceedingly afflicted be Exhilarated by your benign Actions. Then he prays that he may have good Succeſs againſt his Enemies; that the Commonwealth may enjoy under him happy times, the Depredations even of Peace, which had been made upon various Pretexts, being now removed: That Deceits and Cheats uſed about Teſtaments, and violent Exactions of Donations might ceaſe; that every one might have the Poſſeſſion of his own-well gotten Goods ſecured unto him, and each one enjoy his Liberty, this being the real difference, that ought to be found betwixt Kings of other Nations, and Roman Emperours, that they are Lords of ſo many Slaves, and theſe not of ſuch, but of free Perſons. Thus he, or to this purpoſe, wordeth his Letter, which being anſwered by Phocas, Gregory ſends another, wherein he again rejoyceth, and giveth God thanks that the Yoke of ſadneſs being removed, they had now arrived at the times of Liberty, under this benign and Pious Emperour. Another of the ſame ſtrain he wrote to Leontia the like Pious Empreſs with Words, if not Clawing them, yet exceedingly reflecting upon Mauricius: But what ſort of Perſons this Phocas and Leontia were, let us now ſee by particulars, ſo far as in theſe obſcure times we can receive light from the Hiſtorians that are ſtill extant.

Imagines Aug. mitti ſolitæ ſunt in diverſas provincias & ad Principum Amicos atque dictæ ſunt Laurata, quaſi Laureata. Greg. lib. 11. Exord. 10. Ind. 6. ep. 38. Vide Bar. & Sigonium.

Gregory Biſhop of Rome, flatters him and his Wife.

Per Cujus miſericordiæ viſcera in cunctorum mentibus Exultationis ſuæ gratiam infundit de qua Exultationis abundantia roborari nos citius, credimus, qui benignitatem veſtræ pietatis ad Imperiale faſtigium perveniſſe. Gaudemus. Lætentur Cœli & exultet terra, &c. Interpretis cura eſt ne vertendo difficilia evertat.

Ep. 45. Edit. Rom.

Ep. 46.

Phocas his Character.

Cedrenus ad Phoc. Ann. 1.

67. Phocas was a Man of mean Stature, deformed, of a terrible Aſpect, had Red hair, his Eye-brows met, ſhaved his Beard, and had a Scar on his Cheek, which when he was angry grew of a blackiſh Colour. He was given both to Wine and Women, was bloudy and ſowre, fierce in Speech, free from all Compaſſion, furious in his Diſpoſition, and an Heretick. He was not unequally Yoked, having a Wife of the ſame Humour and Inclination, and therefore under them Mankind could not thrive, but was overwhelmed as with a Deluge of Miſeries. For innumerable multitudes both of Men and Beaſts, periſhed partly by Plague, and partly by Famine, and the Winters were ſo ſevere, that the Seas were frozen, and the Fiſh died. He endeavoured to pleaſe the People by celebrating the Circenſian Games; but the multitude now in cold Bloud began to think what a Change they had made, and though they had formerly approved the Treaſon, yet now hating the Traitour, they would not be cajolled by him. Having, during the Solemnity of theſe Games, toward the Evening drank abundance of Wine, and delaying to return to the Circus, the multitude commanded him to come forth, bidding him riſe up, and when he came not yet at their Call, they cryed out, Haſt thou again drunk Wine? Haſt thou again loſt thy Senſes? Hereat he was ſo inraged, that cauſing many to be laid hold on, ſome he diſ-membred, and others he put to Death. But the Rabble caſt Fire into the Caſtle where the Priſoners were kept, whereby in the Tumult they all eſcaped. He to provide againſt all ſeditious Attempts, built an Arcenal near to the Palace of Magnaura; and to try his Skill, if by fair means he could get the Love of the People, going as in Triumph to a publick Feaſt, he caſt much Money amongſt them. But he gained nothing.

The People revile him.

68. For ſuch dreadfull Miſeries happened ſhortly after, in the Provinces, as by Sympathy caſt the City into great Tumults and Diſorders. Choſroes ſent a great Army to invade the Roman Territories, being ſolicited to doe it by Narſes; who upon the Murther of Mauricius revolted, and ſeizing on Edeſſa, ſent to the Perſian for Choſroes defeateth the Romans.

Phocas burns Narſes alive.

for Succours. Phocas hearing of the Invaſion, makes Domentiolus, or Domitius his Brother, Magiſter Militum, and ſends Germanus againſt Narſes; whereas the Abares threatned to renew their Rapines and Devaſtations upon his Subjects, he adds ſomething to the Tribute, formerly paid to Chaganus, hoping ſo to quiet him: His great Force there he employs againſt the Perſian, but coming to Battel Germanus receives a Wound, whereof he dies an eleven days after, and Leontius who ſucceeded, having alſo ill Succeſs; Phocas was ſo inraged againſt him, that he cauſed him to be led in Chains in an Ignominious manner. Matters thus ill ſucceeding againſt the Perſians, when Force would not prevail, Phocas betook himſelf to Craft, and left no means unattempted to draw off Narſes from his Confederacy, and by many reiterated Promiſes backed with Oaths, perſwaded him at laſt to forſake the Cauſe and Camp of the Barbarians, and to return to his own Countrey. But having got him into his hands without any regard to Oaths or Promiſes, he burnt him alive, to the great diſtaſte, and diſcontent of the Roman People, to which he was moſt dear for his many good Services, and to the great Satisfaction of the Perſians; who not onely bore him ill Will, for his late forſaking of them, but feared him for his great Abilities in War, with the effects whereof they had ſo ſmarted, that with the Terrour of his Name as a ſufficient Scar-crow, they were uſually wont to fright their Children. The Perſians however reſolved to proceed; and this year took in Daras, moreover all Meſopotamia, and Syria they over-ran and waſted, returning home with incredible great Booty.

Miſcella, lib. 17.

Other Cruelties.

69. Phocas having now poſſeſſed the Throne for the ſpace of four years, thought to eſtabliſh it more by making Alliances with the Nobility. To Priſcus a Patritian, and the Comes Excubitorum; he gave his Daughter Domitia in Marriage, which being ſolemnized in the Palace of Marina for the greater Grace, he appointed a Game, or Exerciſe with Horſes to be held. But the ſport was all ſpoiled, and their Mirth ended with Sorrow. For the People it ſeems ſaluting the Bridegroom, and Bride with the Titles of Emperour and Empreſs; the Demarchi, of both the Venetian and Praſinian Factions, placed their Images at the four Columns by order of the Menſores (or Delineatores as they were called) being thoſe that had the Charge of managing the Solemnity. The Demarchi (Theophanes and Pamphilus by name) he ſends for, and commands them firſt to be ſtripped, and then beheaded. Priſcus trembled to think, what a Caſe he was in, and though without any Fault of his, incurred the Diſpleaſure of the Tyrant; who yet pardoned the multitude upon their Petition. But being now put into a fit of Fear and Jealouſie; it happened, that one Patronia coming to wait on Conſtantina the Relict of the Emperour Mauricius, revealed the Intelligence that paſſed betwixt that diſtreſſed Lady and Germanus, and what hopes they nouriſhed, that her Son Theodoſius was yet living. The Tyrant cauſeth Conſtantina to be tortured, who Confeſſeth in her pains, that Romanus a Patritian was of the Conſpiracy. Romanus by the ſame means was brought to diſcover others; as Theodorus Prefect of the Eaſt, who was put to Death, Helpidius, who had his Feet firſt cut off, and was afterward burnt alive. Conſtantina with her three Daughters, was put to Death in the ſame place, where her Husband had been formerly murthered. Germanus alſo, and his Son were ſent after them, together with John, Ziza a Patritian, Theodoſius and ſeveral others.

Choſroes waſtes the Eaſt.

Glicas in Annal.

70. Theſe diſcoveries increaſed the Rage and Jealouſie of the Tyrant, to ſuch a Degree that like a Wild Beaſt he raged, and fell upon all that he found in his way. Many he caſt into Priſon, upon ſlight and idle Suſpicions, and ſo crowded the Gaol (which having been made rather too little in Conſtantine's time, had never ſince been inlarged) that for want of room, with the Noiſomeneſs of the place ſeveral of them periſhed, which ſo affected a certain noble Matron, that ſhe gave freely an Houſe of hers adjoyning for inlarging the Priſon. While Phocas thus rageth at home againſt the Nobility, Choſroes in the Eaſt paſſeth Euphrates, and makes Havock of the poor People in thoſe Provinces, waſting without controll all Syria, Paleſtine and Phœnicia. And as well the Rage of the one, as Fury of the other continued the year following. For the Perſian Army, if we credit Theophanes, though Cedrenus placeth it in the year following, made another Invaſion, and defeating ſuch Forces as were ſent to oppoſe them, paſſed through Galatia and Paphlagonia, as far as Chalcedon, doing all things that Enemies are wont to doe in ſuch Caſes. Phocas in the mean time, as if he could ſtop the flux of Bloud in the Provinces, by a kind of Revulſion, and opening the Veins of thoſe about Conſtantinople, proceeds in his Murthers of the Nobility, a great Mortality at the ſame time Conſpiring with him, and Choſroes together, to rid the World of poor Mortals. After the ſlaughter of ſuch as were related to Mauricius;

he

Priſcus the Son-in-Law of Phocas Conſpires againſt him.

he put to Death Commentiolus the Governour of Thrace, and many others, and with this conſtant courſe of Cruelty ſo wearied Priſcus his Son-in-Law, that he reſolved to wave all the intereſt he had in him, with all his hopes and pretenſions, and hearing that in Africk a Conſpiracy was hatching, ſent to Heraclius the Patritian, who now governed that Province, deſiring him to diſpatch away with all ſpeed his Son Heraclius, and Nicetas the Son of Gregoras his Lieutenant, with a ſufficient Army againſt the Tyrant.

The Jews riſe againſt the Chriſtians at Antioch.

Chotim iſtum Copanam appellat Cedrenus.

Chaſtized.

The Praſini again revile Phocas.

He diſarmes them.

71. The Tyrant ignorant of theſe Tranſactions to purſue his own maxims, makes choice of ſuch as he thought as cruel as himſelf for his prime Miniſters. For this purpoſe he creates one Bonoſus Comes of the Eaſt, a furious and rugged man, whom he ſends to reſtrain the violence of the Perſians, but as he was on his way, he was recalled to extinguiſh the flames of a Rebellion, which now broke out at Antioch, where the Jews roſe up againſt the Chriſtians. They ſlew Anaſtaſius the Patriarch, which done, they cut off his privy members, and put them into his Mouth, and then dragged his dead Body through the Streets. They killed and burnt many of the Citizens, and proceeded ſtill in their fury till the news being brought to Phocas, he ordered Bonoſus and Chotis the Magiſter Militum to chaſtiſe them, which they did to purpoſe, being not able to prevail by fair means, putting many of them to the Sword, and diſmembring many whom they then baniſhed the City. Thus was this ſedition ſuppreſſed at Antioch, about the time that diſorders of greater conſequence happened at Conſtantinople, where the Heartburnings of the People againſt the Tyrant though for ſome time ſmothered, yet ſo increaſed as to break out into a greater flame. As he was preſent at the Shews in the Circus, the Praſini could not hold but upbraided him with his Drunkenneſs, telling him that he had again drunk in Gabaſta, which was a very large ſort of Cup, and that he had again loſt his ſenſe and underſtanding. In great wrath he cauſed Coſmas an Officer to apprehend many of them, of whom ſome he beheaded, others were diſmembred, and ſome put into ſacks and thrown into the Sea. The Praſini hereat inraged, as much as he, gathered together, ſet fire to the Prætorium, Court, and ſeveral Offices with the Priſons, out of which they let go ſuch as lay in Chains. The Tyrant hereupon in great wrath, cauſed the Praſini to be diſarmed.

Puniſheth a Conſpiracy.

Heraclius comes out of Africk againſt him.

Phocas put to Death.

Lutum Sanguine maceratum.

72. This year, which was the ſeventh of his Reign, happened ſo ſharp a Winter, that the Seas were frozen about Conſtantinople, and now the Tyrant's own Court began to wax too hot for him, where every day Conſpiracies being hatched, for ridding the World of ſo great a Plague. Theodorus a Cappadocian, the Præfectus Prætorio, Helpidius the Captain of his Artillery, and ſeveral others deviſed how they might kill him in the Hippodrome, but the Conſpiracy was revealed by Anaſtaſius the Comes Largitionum, and when upon examination it was found, that they had reſolved to make Theodorus Emperour, he put them all to Death, Anaſtaſius as well as others. But things could not long ſtand in this Condition, though he eſcaped this danger, yet being now ſet againſt all men, and all men againſt him, the controverſie muſt ſhortly be decided. Heraclius is ſaluted Emperour in Africk, and comes with a great Fleet and Army raiſed in theſe Southern parts toward Conſtantinople, while Nicetas marches with a great Land Army by the way of Alexandria and Pentapolis. Heraclius had made a contract with Eudocia the Daughter of Rogatus an African, and ſhe was now at Conſtantinople with Epiphania his Mother, which being told to Phocas, he cauſed them to be apprehended, and ſhut up in a Monaſtery. But Heraclius holds on his courſe and comes to Abidus, which being perceived by Domentiolus the Brother of the Tyrant, who had appointed him to keep the long Walls, he fled with the News of his approach to Conſtantinople. Having at Abidus kindly received ſuch Noblemen as had been exiled by Phocas, Heraclius purſued his Voyage to Heraclea and ſo to Conſtantinople, where in the Haven of Sophia, he ingaged in Battel with the Tyrant and had the better. Phocas being defeated fled to the Court, which being obſerved by one Photinus, whoſe Wife he had Raviſhed, with a party of Souldiers he broke in to him, drag'd him ignominiouſly from his Throne, pull'd the Imperial Robe over his Ears, and putting on him a black Veſt, led him in Fetters to Heraclius, who after he had asked him, If he had not bravely Governed, and he had anſwered, It was his part to doe better, commanded firſt his Hands and Feet, then his Arms and privy Members to be cut off, and at laſt his Head. What was left of his Trunck, the Souldiers Burnt in the Forum of the Oxe, a Market place ſo called, and this end had Baſeneſs and Cruelty, after they had domineered ſomething above ſeven years, in the fourth year of Boniface the Fourth, the Roman Biſhop, the thirteenth Indiction, A. D. DCX.

Heraclius Succeeds.

His Character.

The Perſians invade the Empire with others.

Zona

The birth of a young Prince, and the Death of his Mother.

73. Zonaras writes that the Brothers and Relations of Phocas were alſo put to Death, and that Heraclius being Crowned by Sergius the Patriarch the ſame day, ſet the Crown on the Head of Fabia, whoſe name was changed into Eudocia, and that he conſummated the Marriage formerly contracted. Heraclius was as to his Countrey a Cappadocian, deſcended of a Noble and opulent Family, active and valiant, of a middle Stature, large Breaſted, had ſparkling and grayiſh Eyes, a white Complexion, yellow Hair, and a large broad Beard, but immediately upon his promotion, he both cut his Hair and ſhaved his Beard, as was the cuſtome of Emperours. This year had been very happy in ſuch a change, but that the Perſians turned the Joy thence conceived by thoſe of the Eaſtern parts into mourning, for invading Syria, they took Apamea and Edeſſa, and came as far as Antioch; the Romans oppoſing them with ſo ill ſucceſs, that in a manner the whole Party periſhed in the Attempt, very few eſcaping to carry the News of the Defeat to their Friends and Relations. The Scythians alſo and Abares invaded Europe, which things made the new Emperour very ſolicitous what to doe. For the Legions were quite waſted and gone, very few being found in the Muſter Rolls, inſomuch that of thoſe many thouſands which Rebelled againſt that good Prince Mauricius, and ſaluted Phocas their Emperour, by a remarkable Providence, no more than two Souldiers were remaining. But Heraclius making as good preparations as the weak Eſtate of the Empire would permit, made Criſpus General, and ſent him into Cappadocia, which the following year the Perſians invaded, as well as Armenia, and after great waſte and deſtruction of all things, got Cæſarea into their Hands, which done, they roved up and down at their pleaſure; the Roman Forces being not able to make Head againſt them, at leaſt not any conſiderable oppoſition. While theſe things miniſtred matter of ſorrow at Conſtantinople, ſome diverſion was given to the Court by the Birth of a young Prince, Heraclius the younger, who was afterward called Conſtantine Junior, of which the Empreſs was brought to Bed on the third of May. She had before this brought a Daughter named Epiphania, and not long after the Birth of her Son Died, an unlucky accident happening at her Funeral. As ſhe was carried with Royal Pomp through the Forum, a Girl of ſome Barbarous Nation unwittingly and by accident ſpate upon the Herſe, for which the poor Creature was laid hold on and cruelly Burnt, making thus a lamentable parentation to the Deceaſed Empreſs.

The Saracens invade Syria.

Heraclius indeavours to Eſtabliſh his Family.

Choſroes hopes to make himſelf Maſter of the Empire.

74. This act of Cruelty was not left unrevenged in the Eaſt, where one miſchief ſtill followed at the heels of another, though the Perſians, glutted with bloud and burthened with booty, thought fit to give reſt both to themſelves and the places ſubject to their Invaſions. But the Saracens as it were to play their Game, while they were weary and looked on, made Incurſions into Syria, which they miſerably waſted with Fire and Sword. Heraclius to ſecure in his Family the ſucceſſion of a tottering and uncertain Empire, creates his Daughter Auguſta or Empreſs, and within a year following gives a Diadem to Heraclius his Son, whom he Sirnamed Conſtantine, and cauſed to be Crowned in like manner by Sergius the Patriarch. Having thus given them a Title, he reſolved to uphold it as well as he could, and made as good preparations as he might for an expedition againſt the Perſians. But they prevented him, being now freſh and fit for new Slaughters, for they took Damaſcus, and carried away captive a great multitude of People. Hereupon he ſends to Choſroes to perſwade him to admit of moderate Councils, to put a ſtop to that conſtant iſſue of bloud which he made, and ſatisfie himſelf with an Annual Tribute. But he diſmiſſed the Ambaſſadours with a denial, without any reaſons given for his Reſolution, hoping now to make himſelf Maſter of the Roman Empire. He ſent a great Army into Syria under the command of Raſmizſus, which having ſeized on the Paſſages of Jordan, waſted Paleſtine and took the City of Jeruſalem. Here they committed ſuch outrageous acts, as the horrour of them could not be expreſſed. About ninety thouſand Chriſtians they took and ſold many to the Jews, who out of their inveterate hatred to their Religion, refuſed to treat them as by the univerſal conſent of Nations, Captives were wont to be dealt with, but inventing all ſorts of Torments, put them to moſt cruel Deaths. Zacharias the Patriarch was carried away into Perſia, with ſome wood it's ſaid belonging to the Croſs of Chriſt, and vaſt Plunder. And this is all the account we have concerning this lamentable accident, Hiſtorians having given us but a touch of that which deſerved more largely to have been related.

Heraclius marries his own Neice.

75. In the mean time Heraclius being now a Widower, Marries Martina his own Neice by his Brother, and cauſeth her to be Crowned by Sergius, for which inceſtuous Act he is much blamed by Writers, and ſeverely puniſhed as they obſerve. She brings him a Son who is alſo called Conſtantine, at ſuch time as the Perſians overrun all Ægypt and Africk as far as Carthage, which having attempted to no purpoſe with their uſual Booty and innumerable Priſoners they return home. At this time moſt lamentable was the condition of ſuch as fled from the danger to Alexandria, where there were no proviſions for ſo great a multitude, neither had the Nile overflowed according to the cuſtome; but by the care and liberality of John the Patriarch they were much relieved. Certainly this was a miſerable Age, and the condition of the Roman Empire was moſt calamitous, the Barbarous Nations roving up and down at their pleaſure, and Heraclius ſeeming ſo incapable of any effectual reſiſtence, that he appeared as a man utterly dejected and out of hope. This kindled the heat of Ambition in ſome mens Breaſts, who ſeeing him ſo unable to defend the Roman Dominions, and perceiving all was in danger, reſolved to get a ſhare to themſelves, rather than ſuffer all to be loſt to the Barbarous Nations. In Italy, John, the Governour of the City of Naples, rebells and kills John the Exarch of Ravenna, into whoſe place was ſent from Conſtantinople when his Death was there heard of, one Eleutherius who killed the Tyrant, and reſtored Peace to thoſe Quarters about Ravenna. But being warm in his Seat, he began out of ſuch conſiderations as we lately mentioned, to entertain ambitious thoughts of ſetting up for himſelf, having the greater Incouragement, becauſe the Territories ſubject to his command lay at ſuch a diſtance from the Emperour, who not being able to defend the Eaſtern Provinces, how could it be expected that he ſhould protect Italy, into the Bowels of which the Lombards had alſo inſinuated themſelves? while he contrives in his Head, by what means he may beſt bring about his purpoſe, Italy, as ſeldom having time to breathe betwixt one Calamity and another, is ſorely ſhaken with Earthquakes, and afflicted with a diſmal Plague of Leproſie.

The Perſians overrun all Ægypt and Africk.

76. Heraclius in the mean time, as if he had been ſeized with ſome lethargick Indiſpoſition, and could fright the Enemies of the Empire by glorious names, neglects his preparations for War, and inſtead of triumphs of the Field, makes choice of Domeſtick ſhews and ſolemnities. All his endeavours he bends to the promoting of his Children, in the ſeventh year of his Reign, conferring the Honour of Conſul on Heraclius Conſtantinus his eldeſt Son, who beſtowed on Conſtantine the younger, his Brother by Martina, the Title of Cæſar. Deſirous to be at peace, he ſends now the ſecond time to Choſroes offering to purchaſe it though upon very hard terms, but the Barbarian the more he ſubmitted the more inſulted, and utterly forgetting as well the good offices he had received from the Romans in his late condition, as the viciſſitude of humane Life, aroſe to that height of Arrogancy, as to require the Emperour and his Subjects, if they would be at quiet to renounce their Crucified Saviour, and with him adore the Sun for their God. Yet this Embaſſy or ſome other motive had this effect, that the Perſians ſtirred not the following year, which, notwithſtanding was full of trouble, or fuller than the preceding. For the Avares now again invaded Thrace, whom to divert or ſend back, Heraclius diſpatched away his Ambaſſadours. Chaganus their Leader promiſes Peace, whereupon the Emperour with all his train, goes and meets him as far as the long Walls, and with gentle words labours to perſwade him to continue in ſo good a mind, when ſuddenly the Barbarian contemning the Agreement, aud the Oaths wherewith he had ſealed them, falls upon Heraclius who eſcaping narrowly to Conſtantinople, loſt all his Baggage which he was forced to leave behind with ſome of his men. Chaganus having under ſhew of Peace and Amity, taken and plundered many Towns in Thrace, and inriched himſelf and followers by ſuch perfidious practices returned home.

The Perſian wonderfully inſolent.

Vide Cedrenum ad Ann. 9. Heraclii.

The King of the Avares perfidious.

77. The year following, the Perſians knowing how eaſie a Game they had to play, for their exerciſe and diverſion as well as inrichment, made another Invaſion and took Ancyra a City of Galatia. He muſt have been prodigiouſly ſtupid, whom ſo many affronts could not move to Indignation, exceſſively negligent and bad natured, whom ſo many Cries and Lamentations of multitudes ſpoiled of their Friends and Goods, and others led into Captivity, could not affect, and poor ſpirited above example, that could hear every day of this Town loſt, and the other Province waſted without being exceedingly concerned, and in pain, till an effectual courſe could be taken, both for repelling the Injury, and prevention of the like for the time to come. Whatever was the matter that Heraclius hitherto had ſeemed to be aſleep, yet now he rouzed himſelf and his Animoſity and Reſolution, though hard to be raiſed, yet now raiſed, gave hopes with them that they would not eaſily be laid down. He reſolves to recall if poſſible, the ancient Fortune of the Heraclius reſolves to be active.

Romans, to reſtore their Valour and Conduct, and to make ſuch an expedition into Perſia, as might not onely ſecure the Provinces, but recover the Reputation of the Empire. But it's ill fighting with one Enemy, when a Man has another at his Back, and ingage with two, or more, at the ſame time. He endeavours therefore to take off Chajanus, and if not gain his Heart, yet to tie his Hands, that he might ſtand neuter, and doe him no hurt at home, whilſt abroad he provided for the ſecurity of himſelf and Subjects. He ſends once again to him, and having gently reprehended him for his late unkind dealing, once more exhorts him to embrace Peace, and a good underſtanding with him his Neighbour. The Barbarian promiſes to alter his courſe, and now to obſerve the Peace inviolably.

The King of the Abares promiſeth Peace.

78. Animated by this Report made by his Ambaſſadours, and now, as he thought, ſecure of the Abares, he buckled himſelf to his deſigned Expedition with all Alacrity. His Treaſury was ſo empty that he was forced to borrow Silver and Gold of the Churches, which he ſtamped into Money. He hired the Turks, and other Barbarous Nations, to follow him into Perſia, and in his way made ſuch levies as formed up a new Army. At Conſtantinople he left his Son to command in his abſence, aſſiſted by Sergius the Patriarch, and Bonus a Patritian, a Man of great Wiſedom and Experience. Chajanus by Letters he ſtill exhorted to keep his Word and Faith, ſo religiouſly given, and the next Evening, after the ſolemnity of Eaſter was over, ſet forward for Perſia, training his Men as he marched, and diſciplining ſuch Troops as were raw and unexperienced, being newly raiſed. In the mean time, while he prepares for his Journey, Saes, the Perſian General, ſent by Choſroes, waſtes the Eaſt without controll, and coming even as far as Chalcedon, there ſtays for ſome time, and invites Heraclius, under pretext of a Treaty of Peace, to give him a meeting. The Emperour met with him according to his deſire, and truſting too much to his flattering Language, ſent ſeventy of his Nobles with him on an Embaſſy to Choſroes, whom the perfidious wretch carried bound with great contumely into Perſia, but there being arrived, had his skin pulled over his Ears, for having ſeen Heraclius, and not brought him away Priſoner, and the Roman Ambaſſadours were caſt into Priſon, and ſeverely handled. Choſroes after this ſent another Captain againſt the Romans, called Sarbaras, who entring Aſia with a vaſt number of Men, did anſwerable miſchiefs in the Provinces. But Heraclius now having compoſed the differences riſen amongſt his Souldiers, and animated them with courage and confidence againſt his Enemies, purſued his March, and came to the confines of Armenia. Here he underſtands he muſt fight for his paſſage, a Body of Perſians being ready to give him a ſtop, but there was not much need of troubling himſelf, ſome of his Vantguards eaſily defeating this Party, of which they brought the Captain Priſoner to his Preſence. Winter now drawing on, he held on the way toward Pontus, as if he would there take up his Winter Quarters, and the Perſians imagining no leſs, he ſurpriſed them, and fell into their Territories.

Heraclius cheated by the Perſian General.

79. One of their Commanders had already entred Cilicia, to divert him from his deſigned Invaſion, but now perceiving how the caſe was altered, he retreated to defend his own Countrey, and followed Heraclius in the rere; yet did him little or no prejudice, though he ſeized on the Mountains, and the moſt advantageous places, ſtill coming off with loſs and Infamy. At length other forces drew up, and then they came to a pitcht battel, wherein the Courage and Alacrity of Heraclius ſo animated his Men, that they obtained a notable Victory over their formerly inſulting Enemies, and let them ſee that Fortune had not altogether addicted her ſelf to them and their Cauſe. This done, the Emperour drew down his Forces into Armenia to Winter, and he himſelf returned to Conſtantinople, whence he was conſtrained, after no very long ſtay, to return again into the Eaſt. For Choſroes ſent Sarnabazas, or Sarmanazaris, to waſte the Roman Provinces, as formerly, and being again moved to accept of Peace, and compoſe the differences, for the eaſe and ſecurity of the People for the time to come, he refuſed what was offered, and ſlighted the Meſſage. Heraclius therefore ſees he muſt again invade Perſia, which he did toward the latter end of April, which Choſroes underſtanding, recalls Sarnabazas, and making greater Levies, joins him and Sainus, or Sathis, in command, with orders to find out and ingage the Emperour. Heraclius purſues his March, and having by Arguments, drawn from religious conſiderations, much elevated the courage of his Men, pierced into the inner Perſia, where perceiving that the King himſelf lay at a place called Gazacum, (or Gaza-Cotis) with forty thouſand ſtout and courageous Souldiers, made haſte to ſurprize him. He ſent ſome Saracens before, to eſpie and relate how this might beſt be effected, who fell upon the ſcouts of Choſroes, and killing ſome of them, brought others to the Emperour; but ſome eſcaped, and carried news of Heraclius his approach, with which the King was amazed, and fled away as faſt as his Horſe could carry him.

Heraclius defeats the Perſians.

80. Heraclius ſtill purſues and clears all before him, eaſily conquering whatever oppoſition was made, and takes the City of Gazacum, where was the Temple of the Sun, the Treaſure of Crœſus, King of Lydia, and the Impoſture of Coals. He takes and razeth Gazacum. Entring the place, he found therein Choſroes, ſo repreſented, as if he ſate in Heaven, with the Sun, Moon and Stars about him, which he worſhipped as Gods; Cedrenus. Angels which bore Sceptres encircling him. There were alſo Machines to be ſeen, by which he could imitate Rain, and counterfeit Thunder, all which, together with the Temple, and the whole City, the Emperour burnt to Aſhes, and purſued the King to Thebatman, (where Theophanes placeth the Temple, and the other ſu- Vide Bar. Peirceth through Perſia. perſtitious things now mentioned) and ſo as far as to the Straits of Media, deſtroying many Towns, and waſting all places through which he paſſed. But now he muſt think of Winter, which drew nigh, and his Souldiers muſt be provided for. Three days he ſet apart to implore the Counſel and Direction of Almighty God, and opening the Goſpels, as the manner was, he thought it was injoined him to winter in Albania. In his retreat with much booty he was in diſadvantageous places way-layed, and galled ſometimes by the Enemy but ſtill came off with the better. He was moſt diſtreſſed with Froſt, and hard weather, which moved him to ſuch compaſſion toward his Priſoners, of which it's reported he had no fewer, than fifty thouſand, that he ſet them all at liberty, which ſo affected them, that weeping for joy, they prayed he might not be onely theirs, but the Deliverer of all Perſia from the Deſtroyer of the World, the bloody Choſroes.

81. For the year following, which was the fourteenth of the Reign of Heraclius, Choſroes made one Sarablacas (or Sarablancas) and Sarbazanes his Generals, ordering Choſroes maketh two Generals. them with joint force to ſet upon the Emperour, who with ſuch ſucceſs as could not be paralleľd, and indeed prodigious, if the Fortune of his Predeceſſours, in reference to the Crown of Perſia, be conſidered, had born the Roman Eagle diſplayed throughout his Dominions. To Sarablacas he delivered the Flower of his Army, called Choſroites, and Perozites, and ſent him againſt the Emperour into Albania, who was no whit diſcouraged at it, but deſired to fight him e'er Sarbanazas could join with him. But Sarablacas durſt not fight, but ſeized on ſuch places as were convenient to infeſt him as he paſſed into Perſia. And when Spring came on, and he could get Proviſions for his Army, away the Emperour marched, but his Men, weary with Travel, and fearfull out of the apprehenſion they had of the difficulty of the Enterprize, began to mutiny, the Lazians and Abaſgians eſpecially, who refuſed to march any farther. But as here they made delays, and quarrelled with the tedіouſneſs of their Journey, Sarbazanes came up, and was almoſt ready to join with Sarablacas, which convinced the Roman Souldiers of their folly, and how by their delay they were like to draw at once two Enemies upon their backs in the room of one, they come therefore, and with Tears beg pardon of the Emperour, caſting themſelves at his Feet, and deſiring that they might be led againſt the Enemy, leſt their delay, joined with their deſerts, ſhould bring them to moſt certain Ruine. It hapned however very well, that Sarbazanes purſuing his orders, would not venture to ingage, till he could join his Troops with thoſe of Sarablancas, whom Heraclius, having incouraged his Men, indeavoured by all means to fight, but could not provoke him to a Battel, and therefore leaving both theſe Captains, he led on after Choſroes. Now do two Romans run away to the Perſians, and perſuade them, that the cauſe of the haſte made by Heraclius, was mere fear he had of ingaging, and at the ſame time comes news, that Sais, another of the Perſian Captains, was at hand with a very conſiderable force.

82. Hereupon the other two Captains reſolve to ingage the Romans, leſt a Victory to them undoubted ſhould be taken out of their hands. Heraclius, when he perceived them incamped near to him, and that early the next morning they intended to fight, removed farther in the night, till he came to a place very convenient for him to ingage on, which receſs of his, truſting to the ſtory of the Fugitives, they counted flight, and fell tumultuouſly upon him, as one running away, and Heraclius defeats them. this miſtake of theirs he managed to ſuch advantage, that he defeated them, killing many, and amongſt the reſt Sarablacas. Yet notwithſtanding, the Perſians, by the coming of Sais, were incouraged, who joining with Sarbanazes, rallied the Troops lately diſperſed, and ſtruck no ſmall terrour into the Romans, whom they followed, marching through difficult, and almoſt unpaſſable, ways, into the Territories of the Hunnes. Now the Lazians and Abaſgians, out of cowardly fear deſerted the Romans, and returned home, which once known, the Enemy with more courage and greater expedition purſued them, and it put Heraclius to ſome ſtraits; but by Arguments drawn from Religion he again erected the dejected Spirits of his Men, putting them in mind, that though they ſhould endure the utmoſt, and undergo Death it ſelf, their Death would be the Death of Martyrs, and in regard they fought for the Reputation of their Faith, the ſafety of the Empire, and the preſervation of their Brethren, as ſuch they would be admired and honoured by all poſterity. Having by theſe, and ſuch like words, brought them into the ſame good humour as formerly, with great alacrity he put them into the order of battel, as alſo did the Perſian Captains their Forces; yet in Battalia both Armies continued, without ſtriking one ſtroke, from morning till night, which being come, Heraclius removed, and purſued his Voyage, having the Enemy at his heels, who, to prevent and encompaſs him, went ſomething out of their way, and entangled themſelves in the Fens and Marſhes. By this means he got a ſafe and a quicker paſſage into Perſarmenia, into which Countrey the Perſians ſtill purſued him, with this comfort, that there they could recruit themſelves with additional Forces, and that, as they imagined, the Romans fled in great anxiety and fear.

Gets another great Victory.

83. Yet Winter coming on, they reſolved, after a fruitleſs purſuit, to return home, which being known to Heraclius, he purpoſed in the dead time of the night to fall upon them. He ſent ſome ſelect parties to ſtorm the Caſtle, to the defence of which, upon the Alarm, they came in confuſedly, but all that came were cut off, ſcarcely one remaining to carry the tidings. Sarbanazas himſelf, naked as he was, leapt upon his Horſe, and fled with full ſpeed, leaving many Officers and Ladies, and indeed the Flower of the Perſian Nobility, in the place, who got up to the tops of the Houſes, and there would have fortified themſelves, but he fetched them down, ſetting fire to the Buildings, and ſome he ſlew, others he burnt, and many he took, very few eſcaping his Hands, that had accompanied Sarbanazas, whoſe Arms were all found and taken, as his golden Buckler, his Sword, and Spear, his Girdle, ſet richly with Gems, and his neat and ſpruce Shoes. After this the Emperour ſcoured the Countrey of all Straglers, killing ſome, and taking others, which done, he reſolved here to winter. The Year following he took the way that led by Mount Taurus into Syria, and after vaſt pains undergone in his paſſage, on the ſeventh day came to the River Tigris, and thence to the Cities of Martyropolis and Amida. Here he refreſhed his Souldiers and Captives, and he ſent Letters of his ſucceſs to Conſtantinople, where the news was received with as great Joy as the thing required. But in the Spring Sarbanazas, to be revenged and redeem his Credit, moves againſt him, who, upon the news received, ſends certain Troops to ſecure the Paſſages, through which he muſt march, and he himſelf goes another way, lying toward the Eaſt, by which he intends to find out and ſurprize his purſuing Enemy.

He paſſeth Euphrates.

Defeats the Perſians that oppoſed him.

Choſroes enraged.

84. Having paſſed his Army over the River Nymphius, he came to Euphrates, over which a Bridge had been laid of Ropes and Wool, wrought together, which Sarbanazas had cauſed to be broken, and drawn all up to the other ſide. But Heraclius found out a Ford, and to the Amazement of all men paſſed over his Army in the Month of March, which having done, he ſubdued Samaſatæ, and again paſſing over Taurus, came to Germanicia, and through Adana to the River. In the mean time Sarabazas purſues him, and when he had paſſed the River Sanis, and ſeized on the Bridge, and all the Forts belonging to it, pitched his Camp on the other ſide. The Roman Souldiers were ſo elevated with their ſucceſs, that, contrary to the expreſs command of the Emperour, they would venture over the Bridge tumultuouſly, and charge the Enemy, which brought them into great ſtraits, and they had undoubtedly miſcarried, but that the great Valour and Conduct of the Prince preſerved them, who demeaned himſelf ſo in the battel, that his Enemies admired him, and under covert of the night thought beſt to retire. Heraclius, all being now clear, leads his Men to Sebaſtea, where, having croſſed the River Halys, he reſolved to winter. Choſroes hearing how his matters daily went down the wind, boiled with anger, and in a great rage took away the Wealth of all the Churches within his Dominions, and to vex Heraclius, compelled all Chriſtians, that were his Subjects, to embrace the Hereſie of the Neſtorians.

85. Having been ſo many times ignominiouſly beaten, and forced to take his heels, he conſidered how unlike his fortune had been to that of his Predeceſſours, before whom the Romans had been wont moſt commonly to flie, and impatient of the diſgrace, for the following year reſolved to apply all his Force and Intereſt againſt Heraclius, into whoſe Territories, if he could transfer the War, he thought he ſhould compell him to return home, and ſo doe his buſineſs. He raiſed an Army out of all ſorts of Nations, he could compaſs, and out of all conditions of his own Subjects Slaves or free; the choiceſt of which he committed to the conduct of Sais, and added to them fifty thouſand ſtout Souldiers out of Sarbaras his Army, whom he named the Golden Company. Sais thus furniſhed, he ſent againſt Heraclius, and commanded Sarbaras with the reſt of the Forces to march toward Conſtantinople, and in his way to draw the Weſtern Hunnes, or Avares into ſociety with him, and ſo in conjunction with the Slavini and Gepidæ, to fall upon that City. Heraclius his Intelligence was ſo good, that he fully underſtood how his Plots were laid, and therefore divided his Army into three Parts, whereof one he ſent to defend the City, the ſecond he committed to the charge of Theodorus his Brother, with order to fight Sais, and he himſelf with the third invaded the Territories of the Lazians, endeavouring to procure Auxiliaries alſo from the Eaſtern Turks, called otherwiſe Chazari. Theodorus ingaged and routed Sais, by help, as they report, from Heaven, a great ſtorm of Hail ſorely diſtreſſing the Perſians, with which the Romans, were not at all incommoded. And Sais having received this notable defeat, as the cuſtome is, with theſe Barbarous Eaſtern Nations, fell into the great diſpleaſure of his Prince, and contracted from grief a mortal Diſeaſe, which having made an end of him, Choſroes tyranniſed with ſeveral ſorts of Indignities over the dead Body.

Raiſes a vaſt Army.

Theodorus beats Sais.

Conſtantinople beſieged by the Avares.

The Siege wonderfully raiſed.

86. In the mean time the Chazari, or Turks, break through the Caſpian Gates into Perſia, and pierce as far as the Region of Androega, under conduct of Zeebelus, who was next in dignity to Chajanus. As they waſted the whole Countrey, and roved up and down, Heraclius met them in his March from Lazica, and made an Alliance with them upon ſuch Terms, as Zeebelus therewith ſatisfied, left his Son with the Emperour, and departed home. In the mean while Sarbarazas ſets upon Chalcedon, and the Avares flocking in great numbers out of Thrace, beſieged ſtraitly Conſtantinople, by Sea and Land, bringing many Veſſels out of the Danube. But when they had beſieged the City ten days, a wonderfull thing hapned, which produced full as ſtrange an effect. They thought they ſaw a Lady with a train of Eunuchs iſſue out of the Gate of Blachernæ, which ſuppoſing to be the Wife of Heraclius, and that in the abſence of her Husband ſhe was coming to their General to treat of Peace, they made way for her, purpoſing to fall upon all ſuch Souldiers as ſhould follow after her. But finding that though ſhe had paſſed the Trench, yet ſhe came not towards the General's Tent, they began to purſue her, and followed her as far as the place called The old Stone, where when they had almoſt overtaken her, ſhe ſuddenly diſappeared; but the purſuers immediately fell on quarrelling amongſt themſelves, and from words came to mortal blows, which they laid on till Evening began to part them. The next day the Captain coming to inquire of the Cauſe, found that the moſt part of his Men were deſtroyed by their Fellows, and in great ſhame and diſcontent retired. Then did the Fleet alſo withdraw, and returning homewards, in the Euxine Sea was ſo diſtreſſed by Tempeſt, that few eſcaped. Yet would not Sarbarazas, though he took the thing much to heart, raiſe his Siege from before Chalcedon; but there wintring, haraſſed all the Sea Coaſts, and deſtroyed all the Towns adjoining.

87. In the mean time Heraclius having joined to him the Turks, entred Perſia in the Winter ſeaſon, and terrified Choſroes exceedingly; but the Turks not enduring the ſharpneſs of the weather, and frighted by the many Incurſions and Skirmiſhes of the Perſians, began to ſlip away, and at length all of them deſerted the Emperour, and returned home, yet he, by religious Arguments, comforted his Men, and prepared to encounter Razaſtes, a Man of great Valour and Conduct, whom Choſroes had made General of all the Forces he could raiſe. Having waſted all with fire and Sword in his way, in the month of October he entred the Countrey called Chamaitha, where he refreſhed his Army ſeven days. Razaſtes followed him, but by reaſon that the Romans deſtroyed all things as they went along, his Men were much diſtreſſed for want of Victuals. On the firſt of December the Emperour, having croſſed the River Zaba, ſate down not far from Ninive, and Razaſtes was inſtantly at his Heels. The Emperour ſent out Boanas, his prime Officer, with a choice Party of Men, who light upon the Band or Standard of the Perſians, and having killed all about it but ſix and Twenty, brought thoſe away Priſoners, with the Head of their Leader, and, together with his Dagger of maſſy Gold, they took the Armourbearer of Razaſtes. He told Heraclius, that Razaſtes was reſolved to fight, and that three thouſand freſh Men were ordered him by Choſroes, but were not yet arrived, which made him reſolve to engage e'er theſe ſuccours ſhould join with the reſt of the Army. He himſelf ſhewed the moſt moſt alacrity to fight, killing three of the Perſian Officers with his own hand, one after another, and a bloudy Battel it was, laſting from morning to night, wherein fell Razaſtes, with almoſt all his fellow Commanders, and the greateſt part of the Souldiers; but of the Romans onely fifty. Razaſtes his Body was found, with a Shield and Armour, all of maſſy Gold.

Ὁ δὲ εὗρε Βάνδον τῶν Περσῶν, &c. Cedrenus ad Ann. 17 Heraclii.

Heraclius obtains another great Victory.

88. The Emperour, to make uſe of the terrour which this Victory ſtruck into the mind of Choſroes, preſently led againſt him, intending, if poſſible, to find him out, or force him to recall his Forces from the Parts about Conſtantinople. Paſſing over the Bridges of Zaba the leſs, he came to the Palace of Jeſdemon, and there kept his Chriſtmas. Hence he marched to another Houſe of Choſroes, called Ruſa, which he demoliſhed, and paſſed on to another, known by the name of Beclam, where he found a great number of all ſorts of Beaſts, which he diſtributed to his followers. Here by ſome fugitive Armenians he underſtood that Choſroes, with all his Elephants and his Forces, ſtaid at Dyſtagerda, another of his Manſions, where he expected the coming of the reſt of his Men. Thither therefore he made his way, burning and killing all in his paſſage, and coming to the place, there found the ſeveral Standards which at divers times had been taken from the Romans, with abundance of Spices, Hangings richly wrought, and much Silk, whereof as much as could not be brought away he cauſed to be burnt. Hither repaired to him many Captives taken from Edeſſa, Alexandria, and out of other Nations. All the pleaſant Houſes of Choſroes, of which ſome were admirable for Beauty, and rich Furniture, he burnt to the ground, to let him feel, as he ſaid, what he did when he deſtroyed the Roman Cities. The King, e'er he came to Dyſtagerda, ſtole ſecretly away, with his Wives and Children, having broken an hole in the Wall, and he who formerly in an intire day could not make a Journey of five miles, now could travell five and twenty, and having paſſed beyond Cteſiphon, and the River Tigris, ſhut up himſelf, with his Wife and three Daughters, in a certain Caſtle.

89. While here he reſides, ſome Perſians calumniate Sarbarus, or Sarbarazas, to him, as if he held intelligence with the Romans, whereupon he ſends to Cardarichas, his Collegue, then lying before Chalcedon, that he ſhould kill Sarbarus, and return with the Army into Perſia. He that carried the Letter was intercepted by the Romans, upon the Borders of Galatia, and brought before the Emperour's Son at Conſtantinople, who ſends for Sarbarus, and ſhews him the Letter, with which he was ſo concerned, as to make Peace with him and the Patriarch, and puts into the Letter of Choſroes, that with him four hundred other Officers of the Army ſhould be killed. Then calls he Cardarichas, and all the Armies together, and reading the Letter, demands if they thought it convenient that all thoſe perſons ſhould be ſlain, whereat they were all enraged, and renouncing Choſroes, made Peace on that condition, that they might return home without impediment. About the ſame time Heraclius wrote to Choſroes, and offered him Peace, which he refuſed, and thereby increaſed the hatred his Subjects had already conceived againſt him. He levies another Army, which he commands to join with the remainder of Razaſtes his Troops, and hovering about the River Narba, to break down the Bridge aſſoon as Heraclius ſhould have paſſed over. The Emperour hereof advertiſed, returned to the Region called Siazur, which he ſpoiled and burnt, and here Gunduſundus, who had ſerved under Sarbarus, as a Tribune, with many others, join themſelves to him. He acquaints him that Choſroes had determined to crown King his youngeſt Son Merdaſa, which Siroes his eldeſt oppoſed with all his vigour, and had procured to join with him two and twenty Satrapæ, with an infinite multitude of Men, which now conſpired to make an end of Choſroes, and if that could not be done, all of them would revolt to the Romans. Heraclius approving the deſign, ſends to Siroes, and adviſes him to ſet all the Romans they had at liberty, and lead them againſt his Father, which he did, and eaſily took him, though he attempted to eſcape. Now was he bound in Iron Fetters, and having Gives of Iron alſo about his Neck, was caſt into a Dungeon, and fed onely with Bread and Water. Siroes ſent the Noblemen to ſcoff at him, and ſpit in his Face, and having killed all his Sons in his ſight, cauſed him, after fifteen days, to be ſhot to death.

Choſroes taken and killed by his Son Siroes.

90. This end had Paricide, Inſolence and Ingratitude, by the Hand of him who ought leaſt to have done it, though he revenged the death of his Grandfather, after that Heraclius had waged War againſt the Tyrant with miraculous ſucceſs, the ſpace of ſix years. Siroes preſently ſent to the Emperour, to give him notice how matters ſtood, made a perpetual Peace, and ſet at liberty all Priſoners, together with Zacharias the Patriarch of Jeruſalem, and the wood of the Croſs taken out of that City. By virtue alſo of this Peace the Roman Provinces, on which the Perſians ſians had lately ſeized, were reſtored to the Empire, as all Syria, both the upper and lower, the Garriſons being drawn out of the Cities. Theſe things done, Heraclius returned to Conſtantinople in triumph, and a triumph he deſerved, equal to thoſe of the greateſt Captains, having recovered the Eaſtern parts of the Empire, and reſtored the poor diſtreſſed People to their ancient Liberty, burnt ſo many Cities, waſted ſo many Countries in the Enemies Dominions, fully revenged upon that Infidel Nation all the Indignities offered to the Romans, ſtained the Glory of Choſroes his Family, by cauſing him baſely to run away, by burning his Palaces, and driving his Subjects into Rebellion, and that at ſuch a time when the Empire was in a very low and ſad condition, its Treaſure exhauſted, and its Militia decayed, and quite out of order. The People hearing of his approach, ran out of the City with a greedy deſire of ſeeing him. There wanted no Prayers, Praiſes, Acclamations and Welcomings, they carried out Olive branches in their Hands, with Lamps, which they almoſt extinguiſhed with their Tears of Joy. His Son Conſtantius, accompanied with the Patriarch, fell at his feet, and embracing him, they both watered the ground out of the like Fountains.

Heraclius returns in triumph after his wonderfull performances.

He makes a Progreſs to Jeruſalem.

The Perſian Monarchy ruined.

Heraclius courted by Foreign Princes.

Buſies himſelf with points of Religion, and ſuffers Mahomet to riſe.

91. The following year, which was the nineteenth of his Reign, in the beginning of the Spring, he made a Progreſs to Jeruſalem, where he reſtored Zacharias Patriarch, and the Wood of the Croſs he depoſited in its former place. By an Edict he forbad the Jews to come within three Miles of the City, and having finiſhed his Devotions, made a farther Progreſs into the Eaſtern Provinces. Coming to Hierapolis in Phrygia, he had the news of the Death of Siroes, the new King of Perſia, who was now ſerved in the ſame ſort as he had dealt with his Father, being ſlain by Sarbaras the General, or Adeſer his own Son, who having enjoyed the Title but ſeven Months, received the ſame meaſure himſelf from Barrazas, who continued King for eight months longer. Him the Perſians ſlew, and preferred to the Throne Barama, the Daughter of Choſroes, ſome ſay Barachanes, his Son, who having reigned but ſeven Months, was ſucceeded by Hormiſdas, whom the Saracens drove out of Perſia, and ſubjected this Kingdom to the Arabians, under whom it continues at this day, ſaith Cedrenus. Thus in a ſhort time was brought to ruine a Monarchy which ſo lately had been the moſt potent and dreadfull of all others; and by the ſame courſe of mutability, the ſame wheel of Fortune elevated the Roman Empire, which ſo lately had lain in the loweſt condition to an high pitch of its ancient Glory. Heraclius was now become ſo famous in all Countries, that ſeveral Kings, as well from the Weſt as the Eaſt, ſent to congratulate his good Succeſs, and join in Confederacy with him. As the King of the Indians, who ſent him a rich Preſent of Pearl and pretious Stones, and Dagebert the Son of Chlotharius, King of the Franks. But ſee ſtill the viciſſitude of humane Affairs: Heraclius now at eaſe and leiſure, having ſubdued his Enemies abroad, aſſiſts in a religious Civil War at home, and makes himſelf a great Party amongſt Churchmen, embracing the Hereſie of the Monothelites. As a puniſhment for this grievous crime (as ſome, who take upon them to pry into the ſecret Providence of God, do aſſert) the Empire which had lately been reſtored to ſo high a pitch of greatneſs and reputation, began now again to fall to decay, and ſo by little and little was diminiſhed, till at laſt it came to utter ruine, and into the hands of Barbarians. So that Heraclius is blamed, as in a great meaſure the Authour of this miſchief, and is farther taxed upon this account, that buſying himſelf with Opinions and Speculations not proper for him, he took no notice of the greateſt miſchief which ever roſe in the Eaſt, the greateſt Plague that ever happened to Chriſtendom, which he might have prevented, and cruſhed as a Cockatrice in the very Egg. For now at this time Mahomet was Captain of the Saracens, whoſe Power he much advanced, and inſtilled into them the Venome of a new Religion. He died in the one and twentieth year of Heraclius his Reign.

92. He left for his Succeſſour Ebubachar his Kinſman, who taking occaſion at the low Eſtate to which the Perſian Kingdom was brought, advanced as much as he could the Affairs of the Saracens. But he continued not long in his place, dying in the four and twentieth year of Heraclius, after he had reigned, or been Ameras, as their term was, two years and an half, and was ſucceeded by Humar, or Haumar, who, to improve what Mahomet and Elbubachar had begun, took Boſtra, with ſeveral other Cities, and proceeded in his Conqueſts as far as Gabitha. Againſt him Theodorus, the Emperour's Brother, made head, but was defeated, and forced to fly to Heraclius, then lying at Edeſſa, who made Boanes, or Bahanes, or Habanes, General in his ſtead, and beſides this, ſent Theodorus Sacellarius with an Army againſt the Arabians. Being come as far as Emeſa, there the Ameras meets him him with a multitude of his Saracens, and incamps himſelf upon the River Bardoniſius, the Rumour of which frighted the Emperour ſo that taking away the Relicks from Jeruſalem, he returned to Conſtantinople, ſending Orders to Bcanes to remove from Damaſcus to Edeſſa, to the Aſſiſtence of Theodorus; whoſe Army conſiſted of forty thouſand Men. Yet it ſeems he obeyed not the Order, being forced to entertain more provident Councils, for inſtead of aſſiſting Theodorus, he had need of calling him to his aid; the Saracens in the Spring following, in infinite multitudes flocking to Damaſcus. Theodorus was ready at his call, but engaging with the Arabians, was worſted and forced to retire, after which the Army under the command of Bohanes, fell into a Mutiny, and renouncing Heraclius, choſe him for their Emperour. Hereupon Theodorus Sacellanus withdrew the Forces under his Command, and the Saracens rid of him were in better Capacity to grapple with Bohanes, whom they deſtroyed with all his Men. For when they ingaged, a ſtrong Wind blew all the Duſt into the Faces of the Romans, which made them unfit for fight, and to fly to the River Jerinochte, into which they were driven Headlong by the Enemy, and all periſhed either in the Water, or by the Sword. Then did the Saracens eaſily take Damaſcus with the Regions of Phœnicia, which now they began to inhabit, and ſhortly after, with eaſe ſubdued Ægypt, which they alſo planted with their own Men. Here we are like to meet with a warlike Nation, which for a long time is to act a moſt conſiderable part upon the ſtage of the World. We ſhall therefore make a pauſe, and inquire who this Saracen is, and whence he is deſcended; for all mens Eyes are now upon him, and all the News is concerning his Motions, and the dreadfull Effects of his Victorious Arms.

He is frighted from Jeruſalem by the Saracens, who beat his Officers.

And take Damaſcus with the Regions of Phœnicia.

The Original of the Saracens, which Name was not ancient.

Arabians.

Saracens and Hagarens the ſame.

Iſmaelites.

See Dr. Jackſon upon the Creed, B. I. Ch. 25.

Their Seat.

L. 23.

Cedrenus & Zonaras paſſim eos Agarenos dicunt.

Lib. 16.

93. It's evident out of Ammianus Marcellinus, that the Name of Saracens was not ancient. The firſt certain mention of it is in Ptolemy; who deſcribes a Region called Saracen in the Weſt part of Iſmael's Territories, as they are ſet out by Moſes, and a People called Saraceni in Arabia Fœlix, near to the Mountains which the Scenitæ inhabited. That they were Arabians, is moſt evident out of the Greek Annals, which call them indifferently by the one, and the other Name: But farther, in all the Eccleſiaſtick Writers the Names of Saracens or Hagarens are uſed promiſcuouſly, as Equivalent, and the Saracens to the modern Jews of Spain are beſt known, by that of Iſmaelites. The Reader therefore is to conſider, that of Abraham's baſe Seed, ſome in Scripture are denominate from their Mother, known by the Name of Hagarens; others from her Son their Father, are called Iſmaelites, and ſome take their Names from his Sons, as Kedar, Duma, Naphiſh, Iltur and others, although not any People in Scripture are named from Nabaioth, his eldeſt Son, which adds Probability to their Opinion, who think ſuch as the Heathen called Nabathæi, were in Scripture called Iſmaelites as ſole Heirs to their firſt Progenitour's Name. Their ſeat was in the beſt part of Arabia Patræa, near to the Midianites, as is probable from the ſtory of Joſeph; who in one place is ſaid to be ſold unto the Iſmaelites, in another to the Midianites, theſe being near Neighbours it ſeems, and Co-partners in Traffick. And this is obſervable, that as the Nabathæans are not mentioned in Scripture, ſo neither do we find the Name of Iſmael in any ancient Heathen Writers: All of them it's likely being of Strabo's mind, who profeſſeth that he omits the Names of the Arabians; partly, becauſe in his time they were out of uſe, and partly, for the Harſhneſs of their Pronunciation; to which Exception the Name of Iſmael was very obnoxious.

The Seat of the Hagarens, mentioned in Scripture.

Scenitæ Arabes the general Name of Iſmael's Poſterity.

Vide I Chron. 5, 9, 10.

Ἀγραιοί.

Iſai. 42. 11.

Gen. 25. 10.

94. The ſeat of ſuch, as by the Scripture are called Hagarens, was in the Deſert of Arabia, betwixt Gilead and Euphrates: They were by the Heathen called Agræi (a Word more Conſonant to their Hebrew name הגרר, than the Latine Hagareni) and are rightly placed by Ptolemy in Arabia Deſert, and by Strabo in that very place which the Scripture makes the Eaſtern bounds of Iſmael's Poſterity; their Metropolis in latter times, being Atra or Atre, and the Inhabitans thereof called Atreni, unleſs both Dion Caſſius and Herodian, either miſtook, or have been miſtaken, to have written Atreni for Agreni. But to omit particular Denominations, Iſmael's Poſterity was beſt known to ancient Heathens, from the manner of their Habitation in Tents; for, Scenitæ Arabes, was a Name general and Equivalent to his Race, unleſs perhaps the Midianites, or Idumæans might ſhare with them in this Name, as they were partakers of their Quality, which yet is not ſo to be appropriated unto either, as if they had neither Houſe nor Town, for as the Tents of Kedar are moſt famous in Scripture, ſo in it, The Cities of the Wilderneſs are alſo mentioned, and, The Towns that Kedar doth inhabit; nay, in the very times of Moſes, They were named by their Towns, and, By their Caſtles. There were twelve Princes of their Nations, or twelve Heads of ſo many ſeveral Houſes,

Their Phylarchi.

Sextus Rufus, Jornandes, Ammianus.

Tribes or Clans, which kind of Government continued amongſt the Saracens for four hundred years after Chriſt, or more. For as Moſes Writes of ſuch Princes, or Heads of Tribes, ſo of Heathen Writers, the Greek make mention of ᾽Φύλαρχοι ᾽Αράβων, the Latins of Phylarchi Arabum, and the later Writers of Phylarchi Saracenorum, and Reguli Saracenorum.

Scenitæ Arabes, quos Saracenos poſteritas appellavit, lib. 23.

The Seats of the Scenitæ Arabes proves them Iſmaelites.

Strabo, lib. 2. & lib. 16.

Lib. 22.

95. But to give a more clear Proof, whence theſe Saracens deſcended, theſe two things are evident. Firſt, that the Saracens were the ſame People with the Arabes Scenitæ. Secondly, that the Scenitæ Arabes were deſcended of Iſmael. The firſt is expreſly affirmed by Ammianus Marcellinus, and every one muſt acknowledge, that compares the ancient and later Romans together, that Write the very ſame ſtories: And the ſecond ſufficiently appears, from the Identity of the Habitation, Condition and Quality of the Scenitæ and Iſmaelites. It's clear enough from Pliny and Strabo, that the Scenitæ Arabes were ſeated Eaſtward about the River Euphrates, troubleſome Neighbours to Chaldæa and Meſopotamia, ſome part whereof in Strabo's time they inhabited. On the Weſt they bordered upon Ægypt and Æthiopia, for Ammianus deſcribing the ſituation of Ægypt, ſaith; It bordered on the Eaſt upon the Cataracts of Nile, and the Scenitæ Arabes whom now we call Saracens. And in another place, deſcribing the ſituation of the Saracens, he makes Aſſyria their Border on the Eaſt; and the Confines of Blemyæ, and the Cataracts of Nile on the Weſt. Now Moſes ſaith expreſly, that, The Sons of Iſmael dwell from Shur, which is towards Ægypt, unto Havilah, which is toward Aſhur, in the way from Ægypt thither. The Land of Havilah, or rather (according to the Orthography of the Hebrew) Chavilah famous in Scripture for Gold, retained the ſame Name in Strabo's time, the Inhabitants whereof called by him Chaulotæans, were next Neighbours to the Hagareans, or Agræi, whoſe Countrey Severus ſuſpected to have had good ſtore of Gold.

As alſo their Qualities.

Vide Ammianum, ubi deſcribit mores Saracenorum, lib. 14.

Lib. 16. p. 765.

96. For their Condition and Qualities, Iſmael, as Moſes tells us, was begotten of Hagar an Ægyptian Hireling. And the Marriage of Saracen Women in Ammianus his time was Mercenary, and upon Compact for a time. Hagar conceived Iſmael in Abraham's Houſe, but ready to bring him forth in the Wilderneſs; whither he and ſhe were ſent again, after her return to her Miſtreſs. And the Saracen Women in Ammianus his time married in one place, bare Children in another, and brought them up in third far diſtant; never permitted to live in reſt, and in ſhew of Matrimony, they brought a Spear and a Tent for their Dowry; being a perfect Emblem of their Mercenary roving Life, for theſe by Covenant they might take with them at the end of their Service, and be packing from their Maſters, to ſeek their Food in the Wilderneſs, as their Mother Hagar did before them. As Iſmael in the Wilderneſs, ſo the Scenitæ Arabes were pinched with want of Water, their beſt Drink in Arabia, as Strabo Writes, and after they had inlarged their bounds, ſet them by Moſes even in Meſopotamia it ſelf, they were Confined to dry and barren places. Moſes, deſcribing the manner of Iſmael's Life, ſaith, he was an Archer in the Wilderneſs. Ammianus affirms, he knew many of the Saracens in his time, that neither knew the uſe of Wine nor Corn. None of them ever ſet his hand to the Plough, but got their living for the moſt part by the Bow, having indeed been famous for Artillery throughout all their Generations. As they were, ſuch was their meat, wild Fleſh or Veniſon, Herbs or Milk, or ſuch wild Fowl, as they could catch in the Wilderneſs: For their wildneſs he compares them to Kites, ready to eſpye a prey, but untame withall, that they would not ſtay by it, as Crows, or other ravenous Birds do by Carrion; but preſently flew with what they had caught to their Neſts. So notoriouſly was their Wildneſs incorporated into their Nature, that the more tame they grew, the leſs Right they ſeemed to have to their Names, as Strabo intimates.

And reſembling Abraham in many things.

Synod. Nicena ſecund. Act. 4. in Epiſt. Germani Epiſcopi, ad Thom. Epiſc. Claudiopol.

Vide Dr. Jackſon ubi ſuprá.

Gyraldus de Symb. Pythag.

97. And as they reſembled Iſmael and Hagar in their Conditions, ſo as fully Abraham in their Rites and Religion. Iſmael was about thirteen years old, when God eſtabliſhed his Covenant with Abraham, and for this reaſon was not Circumciſed, till that year. And the Saracens to this day Circumciſe not their Children before that time. Abraham erected Altars, and Jacob anointed the Stone in the place where God appeared to him. And the Saracens celebrated their Sacrifices unto a Stone, with Apiſh and Childiſh Ceremonies. God commanded Moſes (Ignorant it ſeems of that Religious and decent Cuſtome, which his Forefathers in like Caſes uſed) to put off his Shoes when he was to tread on Holy Ground; which Rite was afterwards obſerved by the Jews, in their more ſolemn Vows: And the Saracens to this day have their Nudipedalia Sacrificia. Abraham, if Joſephus may herein be credited from his ſober Contemplation of the Heaven and the Stars, began to deteſt Idolatry, and to adore that Divine Providence,

Dr. Jackſon.

Providence, by which theſe ſuppoſed Gods were guided. And the Saracens falling back to Idolatry, adored Lucifer, or the Morning Star. And ſome Conjecture that their Habitation in Tents, and wandring Courſe of Life was not continued throughout ſo many Generations, ſo much upon Neceſſity, as in Imitation of Abraham's uſing Tents; neceſſary in that time for him that would Travell throughout ſo many Countries, as he was forced to doe.

They take the Name of Saracens from Sarah, becauſe they would be thought free born.

98. For theſe reaſons therefore we may ſafely with Dr. Jackſon conclude, that the Saracens were the Off-ſpring of Iſmael; and the Names of Saracens and Hagarens being promiſcuouſly uſed in Eccleſiaſtick Writers, it ſeems probable that that of Hagarens had ſometime been common to all the Race of Iſmael, and not appropriate to the Agræi, or ſuch as the Scripture calls Hagarites, who after their good Succeſs againſt Trajan, or Severus might propagate their Name to all the Sons of Iſmael; as whole Nations take new Denominations from the Ringleaders unto revolt. But as for the Name of Saracen, both Sozomen and St. Hierome, who lived not long after this People had aſſumed it, affirm without queſtion, that they uſurped it of Sarah, in hope to extinguiſh that note of Baſtardy imparted in their former Name of Hagarens: As Great mens Baſtards in few deſcents, attempt the changing of their Ignominious Coats. Whether this Ambition of theirs gave the firſt occaſion, or the Fertility of the Soil of Arabia Fœlix, into which ſome of them tranſplanted themſelves, as appears from Ptolemy, made this Colony ſcorn their former Name, as it would cauſe them to loath their ancient Seat, or whether given or taken upon other occaſions, the whole Race, as well in Arabia the Deſert, as elſewhere was willing to make a benefit of it, as an Argument to perſwade the World they were free born and true Heirs of that Promiſe, from which the Jews were fallen. For Mahomet as all Writers agree, uſed this plauſible Etymology, as a fair Colour to ſet off his foul Blaſphemies, and the later Saracens in the ſiege of Torutum, which ſtood a Mile from Tyre, uſed this Name derived from Sarah as an Argument to perſwade their Legitimate deſcent from Abraham, for whoſe ſake they hoped for Favour and Reſpect at the hands of Chriſtians.

Krantzius Hiſt. Saxonic.l.7.c.12.

Troubleſome Neighbours to Syria.

Trajan's ill ſucceſs againſt the Atreni.

Dio, lib. 68.

99. Now to ſpeak ſomething of the Eſtate of this People from their Original. It appears from the Prophet that Judgments were denounced againſt them from Almighty God, that the Glory of Kedar ſhould fail, and the reſidue of the number of the ſtrong Archers of the Sons of Kedar ſhould be few. Yet as St. Jerom obſerves, they eſcaped the Rod of God's wrath, better than their Neighbours, by reaſon of their ſpeedy removal from place to place, being never out of their dwelling, whilſt they had Tents and Camels and Waſtes to range in. Afterwards they continued troubleſome Neighbours to Syria, till it was annext to the Roman Empire, by which the ſtrength of theſe Archers was diminiſhed, and the Reign of their Philarchi cut ſhort. Their Countrey was firſt brought into the form of a Province by Trajan, in whoſe time yet the Hagarens growing weary of ſubjection Revolted, and were never again, for what can be known, reduced into perfect Obedience, either to the Romans or to any other People. The deliverance of theſe Agarens from Trajan and Severus, both who beſieged them in their own Perſons, was wonderfull and by ſome eſteemed no otherwiſe than miraculous. As oft as the City was beſieged, the Souldiers were annoyed with Lightnings, Thunders, Whirlewinds and Hail, affrighted and dazled with the apparitions of Rainbows; and Flies corrupted and ſpoiled their Meat, even while they did eat it. Trajan was forced to give over the Siege, which he had followed with danger of his Life, by coming within thoſe Archers ſhot in viewing the City, and ſhortly after as if formerly he had fought with men, but now againſt God, he himſelf fell into a Diſeaſe whereof he Died.

And that of Severus.

100. About eighty years after, the Emperour Severus diſdaining as Trajan had done before, that thoſe Atreni ſhould ſtand out ſtill againſt the Romans, when all their Neighbours had yielded, ſet upon them with all the violence he could, and in the ſecond Aſſault after much loſs ſuſtained, overthrew part of the City Wall. Now out of deſign, he cauſed the Retreat to be ſounded, hoping the beſieged ſenſible of their Danger, would intreat for Peace and Liberty, which he reſolved not to grant, but upon condition they would diſcover the hidden Treaſure, ſuppoſed to be conſecrated to the Sun. But they continued reſolute an whole day, giving not the leaſt Intimation of any Treaty for Peace, and the Souldiers were grown ſo diſcontented, that the Europeans before moſt reſolute would not enter the breach, and the Syrians forced to undertake it, had a grievous Repulſe, ſo as Dio obſerves, God Almighty delivered the City, recalling the Souldiers by Severus when they might have entred , and reſtraining Severus the ſecond day by the backwardneſs of his men. Yet the Conqueſt ſeemed ſo eaſie , that one of the Captains ſo he might have but five hundred and fifty European Souldiers, would undertake to effect it, to which fair profer the Emperour in a diſtracted chaſe, replied where ſhall I have ſo many ? and ſo departed into Paleſtine. Such was the good fortune of the Atreni or Hagarens, who might now communicate their Name to the reſt of their Brethren. But what change ſoever they made of their Name, their Nature they could not change, and the greater they grew in Power , the more exactly they fulfilled the Prophecy concerning Iſmael, that he ſhould be a wild Man , that his Hand ſhould be againſt every man, and every man's hand againſt him.

With whom they joyned of old.

101. For a long time they continued like forward, but poor Gamſters, not able to ſet at more than one at once, and that for no great Stake, without ſome to go halfs with them, untill at length by their treacherous ſhuffling from ſide to ſide, and banding ſometimes with one, and ſometimes with another, as the Reader may remember they did in Juſtinian's time, they durſt ſet at all, and take Aſia, Europe and Africk to task all at once , as we ſhall ſee hereafter. Sometimes they took part with Mithridates , and other Eaſtern Nations againſt Lucullus and Pompey , and yet were ready to joyn with Pompey againſt the Jews. Some of them were for the Parthians againſt the Romans, others for the Romans againſt the Parthians. Some for Peſcenninus Niger againſt Severus, and others againſt Peſcenninus; afterwards one while for the Perſians, and another while for the Romans, as in the times of Conſtantius and Julian, the later of whom they reverenced more than any Roman, yet not ſatisfied in their expectations revolted from him. Afterwards they ſerved the Romans in their Wars againſt the Goths, and yet while the Goths and other Barbarous People graſp with the Eagle in the Weſt, thoſe Harpies pluck at her Train in the Eaſt, and not therewith content , take their flight toward the Weſt, to ſnatch the prey out of the mouths of the other Buſſards , as one words it, and beat them one after another from what they had ſeized in Spain and Africk , attempting the like in Gall, Greece and Germany , diſpluming the breaſts , and ofttimes ready to devour the very Heart, even Italy and Rome it ſelf. But of theſe particularly hereafter, and thus much of their Original, and their ancient Eſtate now let us reaſſume and proſecute the intermitted ſtory of Heraclius.

The Saracens make themſelves Maſters of Ægypt.

102. When the Saracens were on their march toward Ægypt, Cyrus the Biſhop of Alexandria knowing their ravenous Diſpoſition, made a bargain with them for two hundred thouſand Denarii by the year to ſpare the Countrey. And the bargain was kept for three years, but in the mean time , the Biſhop is accuſed for beſtowing the Gold of Ægypt upon the Barbarians. The Emperour makes one Manuel Præfectus Auguſtalis, an Armenian by Birth, to whom when the Receivers of the Saracens came and demanded the money , he derided them ſaying , they ſhould not find him a Prieſt as Cyrcus was, deſtitute of Power , but to all points furniſhed to defend himſelf and not pay Tribute. This anſwer being reported to the Saracens, they preſently armed themſelves , took the way for Ægypt, and by ſtrong hand made themſelves Maſters of the Countrey , having beaten away the Prefect. The Emperour perceiving the miſtake, ſent Cyrus to the Saracens to take the buſineſs upon himſelf, and to offer to ſwear that for the time to come , the money ſhould be duly paid ; but they utterly refuſed to quit their new Conqueſts. And thus Ægypt which had continued a principal member of the Roman Empire, ever ſince the days of Auguſtus , was rent from the Body by the Hands of the Saracens.

Take Jeruſalem and all Syria.

With Antioch.

103. This rich and fertile Province did not ſatisfie them, but they muſt extend the power and effects of their Arms to all Quarters. The following year Haumer invades Paleſtine, and beſieges the City of Jeruſalem , which after two years was ſurrendred to him. In the mean time he ſends another Army into Syria, all which it Conquered, though Sergius a Roman Captain from Cæſarea made ſome oppoſition, who in the very firſt Ingagement loſt his Life. This ſhort account have we from the Greek Annals, of that which deſerved to have been more fully proſecuted, for the Subject muſt needs have been very various, where ſo great matters were atcheived , nor leſs than the ſubduing of whole Nations, alterations of Governments, and overturnings of the whole State and frame of things. But we muſt be content with theſe ſmall Notes, all larger Narrations having periſhed, and ſatisfie our ſelves in this, that now the Saracens domineered over the Eaſt , and made nothing of poſſeſſing the Roman Provinces. For in the following year , being the twenty eighth of Heraclius, having already ſubdued all Syria , they took Antioch the Metropolis of the Eaſt , which they and their Poſterity held four hundred and forty years, till the thouſand and ninety eighth year of our Lord. In the mean time the Perſians quarrel amongſt themſelves, and prepare a way for the Conqueſt alſo of their Countrey. The King of the Indians, to whom it's likely the news of the ſucceſs of the Saracens was not yet come, held Heraclius ſtill in ſuch eſteem for his management of his Wars againſt the Perſians, that he ſends to complement him, and made him very rich preſents of Jewels. This ſomething ſatisfies and diverts the Emperour, who employs himſelf in combats of the Tongue and Pen, about queſtions of Religion, when it would much more have become him to have ſpent his time in ſaving the Provinces committed to his Charge. About this time he had another Son born whom he named David, and was made a Grand-Father by a Son born to his Eldeſt Son Conſtantine on the ſame day, which Son was called after him Heraclius.

Theodorus defeats the Saracens.

But covetouſneſs overbalanceth the Victory.

And the Saracens like a Torrent overrun Perſia and the Roman Provinces.

104. Yet to repreſs the violence of the Saracens, was ſent Theodorus one of the Bedchamber, who had good ſucceſs in one Battel, wherein a great multitude was ſlain, and in the Croud their Ameras or Princes who had joyned their Forces to encounter him. Notwithſtanding an ill fate preſſed upon the Romans, who having this advantage in Battel, loſt it again by covetouſneſs and folly. For there were ſome Arabians that lived on the Borders, and had a Penſion from the Emperour to keep the paſſages of the Wilderneſs, who now demanding their money were paid onely with bad Language, whereupon they joyned themſelves with their Countreymen, whom they conducted into the rich Countrey about Gaza, whence an inlet lay into the Deſert near to Mount Sina. This they plundered and waſted at their pleaſure, and Sergius from Cæſarea in Paleſtine with an inconſiderable party falling upon them, he periſhed with all his followers. Jadus had better fortune upon the Borders of Perſia, where he got Edeſſa by fair means, Conſtantia and Daras by force, and ſo Conquered all Meſopotamia. This was but a Preface to that War which the year following fell upon Perſia, when the Saracens invaded it, and utterly ſubdued it under themſelves, Hormiſdas being run away, and left off all Enſigns of Majeſty: So fickle and inconſtant are the greateſt things in this World. This Kingdom was a very few years agoe ſo mighty, that it in a manner gave Laws to the Roman Empire. By a ſudden change of Fortune, Heraclius invades and haraſſes it at his pleaſure, and then is it torn in pieces by inteſtine differences, which makes it weak and unable to oppoſe any foreign Power. Heraclius as if he had done enough for a whole Age, ſits down and buſies his Head with ſpeculations of Divinity. A Nation before inconſiderable riſes up, and as a torrent overruns Ægypt, Syria and other Provinces of the Empire, and as if it onely came, ſaw, and then overcame, at one caſt wins ſuch ſtakes as other Gamſters could not compaſs in many Ages.

Heraclius dies.

105. Heraclius lives to ſee things come to this paſs, and then as unwilling to expect the Concluſion and the fate of his other Provinces, departs this World in the month of March of a Dropſie, which was accompanied with ſtrange and troubleſome Symptoms. Such an alteration there was in the parts of his Body, that he could not make water but it would fly up to his Face, which our Writers account to have happened as a Judgment to him for having inceſtuouſly Married his own Niece. He Reigned thirty years and ten months with various ſucceſs, but that his Reign was not more happy, he himſelf ſeems to have been in fault, not making uſe in his latter days of his own Abilities, which were many and large enough, as appears from his Conduct in the Perſian War.

CHAP. IV.

From the Death of Heraclius to the Depoſing of Irene, and the Promotion of Nicephorus.

The ſpace of an hundred and ſixty Years.

Conſtantine ſucceeds, and is quickly made away.

1. TO Heraclius ſucceeded his Son Conſtantine, a Man of a weak and ſickly Conſtitution, perhaps through the practices of Martina his Step-Mother, who, to prefer her own Son Heraclonas, plotted with Pyrrhus, the Patriarch, to rid him out of the way, and poiſoned him after he had reigned but four Months. This done, Heraclonas, and his Mother, uſurp the Government, and injoy their ill gotten Power for ſix Months, but then the Senate aſſume their courage, and deprive them of the Sovereignty; his Noſe they cut off, and cut her Tongue out of her Head, and ſo baniſh them from the City. Pyrrhus alſo is depoſed, and another Patriarch choſen in his ſtead. To the Throne they advance Conſtans, the Son of Conſtantine, and Grandſon of Heraclius, who, as he had reaſon, thanked the Senatours for doing Juſtice upon the Murtherers of his Father, and rewarded them liberally. The beginning of his Reign is not characterized with the note of any eminent Action, matter being either wanting, or the Greek Annaliſts very careleſs, who onely tell us, that in his ſecond Year Haumar began to build a Temple at Jeruſalem, (with what ſucceſs we ſhall ſee in its proper place,) and in his Third there was an Eclipſe of the Sun; in his Sixth happened great Tempeſts, which overturned great Trees, and, as it ſeems, were as a Prologue to thoſe great Concuſſions which invaded Africk. For this Year the Saracens got it alſo into their hands, and ſettled it in way of a Province, ordaining what, and how, Tributes ſhould be paid, after they had thence beaten Gregory, who had ſeized on the Government of that Countrey. And as if Fortune had now wholly delivered her ſelf up into their Power, the Year following Mabias, one of their Captains, with a great Fleet, invaded Cyprus, all which he took, with the City Conſtantia; and following on his victorious courſe, he did as much in the next Year by Aradus, which he diſmantled and burnt, waſting the Iſland, ſo that for a long time after it remained without Inhabitant. The Year that follows is remarkable for nothing, except you will take notice, and believe that it rained duſt.

Conſtantius etiam & Conſtantinus dicitur.

The Saracens conquer Africk.

Cyprus and Aradus.

Κόνις ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ κατηνέχθη. Cedrenus.

2. But that which follows, being the twelfth of Conſtans, is famous for Mabias (or Mahunias) his Conqueſt of Rhodes, and his deſtroying there the famous Coloſs of the Sun, full thirteen hundred and ſixty years after the founding of it by Laches. It was an hundred twenty ſix foot high, and ſtood aſtride over the Haven, ſo that Ships ſailed betwixt its Legs, but though it was one of the Seven Wonders of the World, as nothing is ſo wonderfull, but time will at laſt put a period to it, being thrown down by an Earthquake it was now broken in pieces by the Saracens, and ſold to a Jewiſh Merchant of Emiſa, who with the Metal of it loaded nine hundred Camels. While Mabias thus employed himſelf in the Iſland of Rhodes, his Countreymen invaded Armenia, and waſted it far and wide, the Emperour all this while being faſt aſleep, and as if he had received ſome ſecret Inſtructions from his Grandfather, nouriſhing Contentions in the Church, while he ſeemed to have Peace with thoſe that invaded his Territories at their pleaſure, and robbed him of no leſs than whole Provinces at once. Mabias ſeeing and wondring at his deportment, thought it might be worth his pains to make for Conſtantinople it ſelf, it being poſſible he might find him as unprovided there, as he was negligent in the defence of the Provinces, for this purpoſe he commanded a ſtrong Fleet to be rigged at Tripolis in Phœnicia. And he might probably enough have done ſomething remarkable, had not the Zeal of two Brothers, both Chriſtians, and the Sons of a certain Trumpeter, who then reſided at Tripolis, prevented him. For going to the Common Priſon, they made a ſhift to ſet at liberty many Chriſtian Captives, whom they perſuaded then to ſet upon Rhodes.

Inſcriptio ita ſe habuit.

Τὸν ἐν Ῥόδῳ κολοσσὸν ὀκτάκις δέκα Λάχης ἐποίησε πηχέων ὁ Λίνδιος.

Ex Coloſſo Incolæ Coloſſenſes dicti ſunt, ſi fides Cedreno.

Mabias his purpoſe of attacquing Conſtantinople prevented.

upon the Ameras, or Governour of the place, and killing him to deſtroy the Ships, and all Naval Preparations, which they effected, and eſcaped by Ship into the Emperour's Dominions.

The Roman Fleet defeated by the Saracens.

Conſtans defeats the Sclavini.

Cauſeth his Brother to be murthered.

Goes into Sicily.

3. Mabias thus defeated of his purpoſe for attacquing Conſtantinople, went againſt Cæſarea in Paleſtine, giving order to one Abulaures, or Abulathar, to repair the Fleet, who obeyed his Commands, and ſailing to Phœnice in Lycia, there found the Roman Navy with Conſtans the Emperour. They ingaged, and the Romans received a notable defeat. Conſtans was glad to ſhift Clothes with one of his followers, and was conveyed into another Veſſel by one of the Trumpeter's Sons, who fought ſtoutly, and loſt his Life in the Admiral Gally. Being got ſafe to Conſtantinople, he reſolved the next Year to doe ſome thing which might repair his Credit, and made an expedition againſt the Sclavini, of whom he took and ſubdued many, and ſo returned home. In the mean time the Saracens, under Command of Mabias fall into a mutiny, ſo great that it brought him, in a manner, upon his Knees to the Emperour, of whom he begged Peace, on Condition, that the Arabians ſhould pay him a Tribute of a thouſand Nummi by the day, with an Horſe and a Slave. But Conſtans, it ſeems, wonderfully affected with his late ſucceſs againſt the Sclavini, thought of giving what Laws he himſelf pleaſed, and refuſed his Terms, as of ſmall value, in compariſon of the miſchief done by theſe Arabians to the Empire. But what reſpect to the Empire ſoever he pretended, good Nature and Kindneſs could not be Principles on which he moved. For ſhortly after he cauſeth to be murthered Theodoſius, his own Brother, whom he had commanded to be ordained Deacon, and from whoſe Hands he had received the ſacred Cup. But ſee how he is tormented by his own Conſcience, and cauſed to caſt off all thoughts of Empire, and every other thing, of what conſequence ſoever. He dreams that he ſees his murthered Brother ſtanding before him, with a Cup of Bloud in his Hand, commanding him to take and drink it. Being perpetually purſued and terrified with theſe Dreams, he reſolves to quit Conſtantinople, and go into Sicily. He leaves his Wife and three Sons behind him, and having ſet ſail in a Pinnace, turns back in diſdain, ſpits at the City, his Royal Chamber, and the Seat of the Empire.

Vide Baronium.

Some ſay to Rome.

Izod the Saracen takes Amorium.

Which is recovered.

Saporius rebells.

4. From Anaſtaſius, the Vatican Library-Keeper we are aſſured that he took Rome in his way, where he viſited the Churches, being met by Vitalianus the Biſhop, and his Clergy, five miles from the City. But the change of place could not divert the pangs of his Conſcience, his Dreams of his Brother ſtill purſue him, yet to Conſtantinople would he not return, where he was hated by the People for cleaving with ſo much earneſtneſs to the Hereſie of the Monothelites. He reſolves to retranſlate the Seat of the Empire to Rome, and for that purpoſe ſends for his Wife and Children; but the Citizens of Conſtantinople having ſmelt out the Deſign, would not permit them to remove. While Conſtans ſpends his time by night with Terrours, and by day with ſuch Diverſions as he can find, Mabias, who had formerly offered to pay tribute, being now rid of Halys his Æmulator, and reigning alone, began to ſcorn the ſubmiſſive poſture he had lately owned, and now bore himſelf as reſolutely and goodly as ever. He ſent Izod his Son into the Roman Territories, who proceeded as far as Chalcedon, and taking Amorium, a City of Phrygia, therein left a ſtrong Garriſon, and with much ſpoil departed home. But when Winter approached, the Emperour ſent Andreas, one of his Chamber, who by night got over the Walls into Amorium, and put all the Gariſon to the Sword. Conſtans having in vain attempted to diſpoſſeſs the Lombards of Italy, was very troubleſome to the Inhabitants of Calabria, Sicily, Africk and Sardinia, on whom he laid ſuch heavy burthens, as formerly they had never known, and beſides that, robbed the Churches of their ſacred Veſſels and Furniture. While he exceeds in thoſe Acts of Violence and Sacrilege, Saporius, the Governour of Armenia, rebells, and ſends to the King of the Saracens for aid, one Sergius, the Magiſter Militum, who at the Court of Mabias, which was then at Damaſcus, met with Andreas, the Bed-chamber-man, whom the Emperour had ſent on the like Errand.

5. The Saracen gave audience to them both. Sergius inſulted ſo much over the other, and promiſed ſuch vaſt things, that he drew him to his party, and Andrew was ſent away in diſcontent, who yet affirmed, that the Roman Emperour thus affronted would betake himſelf to Almighty God, in whom he had good Cauſe to put his truſt. And that he ſpoke nothing but what was true, the event proved. For as they returned, Sergius fell into the hands of Andrew, who hanged him up. Againſt the Uſurper was ſent Nicephorus, a Patritian, who marching towards Adrianople, where he then lay, it happened, that as the Tyrant expected him, and exerciſed his Men, when, on a time, he was juſt come to the Gate of the City, he gave his Horſe a laſh with his Whip, which not taking in good part, he kicked, and threw him with his Head forward againſt the Gate, and ſo bruiſed him that he died of the Fall. Thus did Conſtans overcome without one ſtroke ſtruck; a favour more due to his Cauſe and Profeſſion, than his own Perſon. Therefore as his Cauſe and Profeſſion was hereby countenanced, ſo his Perſon ſhortly after received a reward, ſuitable perhaps to his merit, though Treaſon, as it proceeded from his hand that did the deed. As he was bathing himſelf at Syracuſe, in the Bath called Daphne, one Andrew, the Son of Troilus, knocked him on the Head with a Veſſel, with which they poured hot water upon him, after he had reigned twenty ſeven years, in the fourteenth Year of Vitalianus, the Roman Biſhop, the eleventh Indiction. A. D. DCLXVIII.

Killed by a Fall.

Conſtans killed in a Bath at Syracuſe.

Conſtantine his Son ſucceeds.

A Conſpiracy prevented.

Zonaras.

6. He being dead, they of Syracuſe, who, as it ſeems, were of the Plot with Andrew, named Emperour one Metius, Mezentius, or Mizizius, an Armenian, a very beautifull Perſon. But Conſtantius, the eldeſt Son of Conſtans, underſtanding how matters went in Sicily, being formerly made Emperour, by his Father, haſtes to the Iſland with a great Fleet, and eaſily ſubdues his Æmulator, with all thoſe of his Party. The Uſurper, though he had been drawn to take the Purple ſore againſt his will, he cauſed to be ſlain with others, amongſt whom was Juſtinian, the Father of Germanus, afterward Patriarch, whom alſo being juſt then come to years of Puberty, he commanded to be gelded. Having ſettled all things in Sicily, he returned to Conſtantinople, where the Citizens beſtowed on him the Sirname of Pogonatus, becauſe having departed thence onely with ſome down on his Chin, he returned to them with a perfect Beard. But at his return he was received with the news of a Sedition riſen amongſt the Nobility of the Eaſtern parts, who cried out, that his two other Brothers ought alſo to be crowned Emperours, and it ſeems they were more zealous Chriſtians, and more orthodox in their Faith, than regular in their Logicks. For they contended, as there are three Perſons in the bleſſed Trinity, ſo there ought to be three Emperours upon the Throne. The Mutineers being allured to Conſtantinople from Chryſopolis, where they had aſſembled under ſhew of being preſent at the Coronation, after he had got them into his Power he put them to death, and cut off the Noſes of both his Brothers, whom yet ſome Authours make his Collegues in the Empire. While theſe ſtirs happened at Conſtantinople, the Saracens invade Africk, and uſing the Inhabitants as they pleaſed, led away eighty thouſand of them into Captivity. For theſe things the firſt Year of Conſtantine was memorable. His ſecond was onely remarkable for this, that the cold of the Winter was ſo vehement, that therewith periſhed many Men, beſides other Animals: And in his fourth appeared ſuch a Rainbow in the Heavens, as they thought, did ſignifie the end of the World to be at hand. Indeed a great miſchief was not far off, for the Saracens, or the Poſterity of Agar, as Zonaras calls them, with a great and ſtrong Fleet, came into Cilicia, and wintered at Smyrna.

The Saracens invade Africk.

Οἱ ἐκ τῆς Ἄγαρ ἀπόγονοι.

And Cilicia with a Fleet.

Approach Thrace.

Retreat, and the Fleet caſt away.

Suphianus the Saracen defeated.

7. The Year that followed, being the fifth of Conſtantinus Pogonatus, they came up to the Borders of Thrace, ſeizing on all that lay betwixt the Hebdomum, or Weſtern Promontory and Cyclobium. Conſtantine brought out his Fleet, and every day they fought from morning till night, betwixt the Brachiolum of the Golden Gate, and Cyclobium; ſo near were they got to Conſtantinople. From the month of April till September, they pertinaciouſly continued their Siege, and then deſpairing of ſucceſs, departed to Cyzicum, where they wintered, and in Spring again renewed the War. And this courſe they held for ſeven years, as the Greek Annals tell us, and yet from them it appears, that in the fourth year a Peace was made. But at length their Courage was quite ſpent, and in great grief they retired, having loſt a great multitude of their Men, after which followed the deſtruction of the whole Fleet, which was in the Winter ſeaſon caſt away near the Syllæan Promontory. There was a new Invention of Seafire, as they called it, which much helped the Defendants in the Siege. It would burn under the Water, being the Diſcovery of one Callinicus, an Heliopolitan of Ægypt, who fled with the Invention to the Romans, and of him was deſcended one Lampras, who made this artificial Fire in the days of Cedrenus. But while one Party of the Saracens thus employed themſelves againſt Conſtantinople, another Captain of theirs, Suphianus the Son of Aphus, ingaged with the Roman Forces commanded by Florus, Petronas and Cyprianus, but to no other effect than that he loſt thirty thouſand of his followers. Within a year or two after the Mardaitæ entred Libanus, and ſeized on all that Tract lying between the Mountain Taurus and Jeruſalem. They got into their their hands, the Watch Towers of Libanus; and upon News of the Exploit, ſuch multitudes of Slaves, Captives and Inhabitants of the Countrey adjacent flocked to them, that in a ſmall time they grew to many thouſands.

The Tract betwixt Taurus and Jeruſalem ſeized.

A Truce for thirty years made with the Saracens.

Which makes the Enemies of the Empire in the Weſt to ſubmit.

The Bulgari invade Thrace.

8. Theſe things ſo terrified the Saracens, that Judging verily, that they contended with Providence; and the Roman Empire was protected by Almighty God, they reſolved to make Peace with the Emperour at any Rate. Manias therefore ſends his Ambaſſadours offering very good Terms, and deſiring a Treaty as to a way to an Accommodation. Conſtantine conceives it his Intereſt to cloſe with them, and for that purpoſe appoints one John a Patritian, Sirnamed Pitigandis, or Pitzicanda, a Man famous for his Nobility and Wiſedom, as his Commiſſioner Plenipotentiary to treat with them. In purſuance of his Powers he goes into Syria, where being Honourably received, he concludes and ſigns an Agreement to this purpoſe, that for thirty years there ſhould be a Truce inviolably preſerved betwixt the Romans and Saracens, in every which year ſucceſſively, the Saracens ſhould pay to the Emperour thirty thouſand Pounds of Gold, fifty Captives, and as many choice Horſes. This Treaty being ratified in the Eaſt, the Enemies in the Weſtern parts grew ſore afraid, as Cajanus, Avarus the Exarchs, and the Caſtaldi; and ſending to the Emperour, purchaſed their Peace in the like manner as the Saracens had done, ſuch Mutability is there in ſublunary things, that theſe who are terrible to day, and ſeem to carry all before them, to morrow fail in their Courſe, and by ſome Accident or other change the Language of an imperious Conquerour, for that of a diſtreſſed Supplicant, and Tributary. But hereby was Peace reſtored both in the Eaſt and Weſt, and the Emperour thought he had leiſure to ſet himſelf to compoſe the Differences in the Church, which for many years had been much out of Order. Yet as there is nothing perfect in this World, no ſuch reſt, but is accompanied with diſturbance; the year following, the Bulgari invaded Thrace, and defeated a conſiderable party that was ſent againſt them. The Emperour who had lately the Honour to give, now muſt beg Peace, and thereby receives a notable Check in the Courſe of his Fortunes.

Conſtantine buyes Peace.

Makes his Son Juſtinian his Collegue.

He dies.

Juſtinian his Succeſſour not like him.

A new Accord made with the Saracens, to the loſs of the Romans.

9. The very next year, ſome of theſe Bulgari ſeparating from the reſt paſſed Danubius, and ſeized upon certain Woods and Mountains. Againſt them Conſtantine himſelf went, with a good Fleet and a land Army; with which Preparations being affrighted at the firſt On-ſet, they fled and retired to a certain Fort, where the Romans were not able for the Difficulty of Acceſs, to doe any thing againſt them. Hereupon they became more daring than ever, and it happened, that the Emperour being very ill of the Gout, retired into Meſembria a Roman Province, to make uſe of the Baths, leaving the ſiege to the Conduct of his Captains. A Rumour was hence raiſed, that the Emperour himſelf fled; and thereupon his Souldiers without any Cauſe begin to run away. This being perceived by the Bulgari out they iſſue, and giving them the Chace kill many in the Rere, which done they boldly enter the Roman Provinces, and return inriched with good Booty. Conſtantine then was glad to take up the Quarrel, and by a Tribute to make Peace with them, which being done, when all things were quiet at home, and no ſtirs likely to ariſe by ſuch an Action, he depoſed his two Brothers, and made his Son Juſtinian his Collegue in the Empire. After this, he lived Peaceably all his time, and died after he had Reigned ſeventeen years, being to be reckoned amongſt the beſt Princes. Juſtinian his Son ſucceeded him according to his deſire, though not at all comparable to him for Parts, nor indeed fit for ſo great an Employment; eſpecially at this time, when the Empire was in ſo tottering a Condition. Yet ſuch was God's Providence, that on ſo weak a Body, over which as infirm a Head was ſet, for ſome time no conſiderable Diſtemper ſeized, though for want of Conduct Foundations of great Diſorders, might be laid for the time to come. In his firſt year, Abimelech Prince of the Saracens, who had ſucceeded Manias lately dead, not taking any occaſion preſented him by his Youth and Folly, ſent and confirmed the Peace made his Father, and farther made a new Accord; that Juſtinian ſhould repreſs the inrodes of the Mardaitæ, which were very troubleſome to the Saracens, who for this Act of kindneſs ſhould make a daily Payment to the Emperour of one thouſand Nummi, an Horſe and a Slave. To ratifie this Accord under hand and ſeal, Paulus Magiſtrianus was ſent, and twelve thouſand Mardaitæ were recalled from Libanus, to the utter Deſtruction of the Roman Power and Authority in thoſe parts, as afterward it happened. For whatſoever the Arabians or Saracens held as far as from Mopſueſtia to Armenia the fourth, was alſo haraſſed by the Inrodes of theſe Mardaitæ, that it became of no value, being deſerted by the Inhabitants: But they being thus repreſſed, infinite loſs hath the Empire continually ſuſtained from the Incurſions of the Arabians, to this very day, ſaith Cedrenus. Juſtinian being not above ſixteen years old, he imputes it to his want of Judgment and Conſideration, though it's a wonder he had no wiſer Men about him.

Leontius recovers ſeveral Countries in the Eaſt.

Conſtantine ſpoils all by his Folly.

10. The Saracens were however ſo wiſe, as both to procure this to be done, and to ſit ſtill till a very convenient time ſhould come, that they could make a good uſe of this advantage. But in other places, the Fortune of the Empire ſeemed alſo to be Superiour to them, for in this firſt year of Juſtinian, Leontius was ſent into Armenia with a power of Men; and having put to the Sword ſuch Saracens as were there ſound, recovered the Countrey, as alſo Iberia, Albania, with Hyrcania and Media, which he ſubjected to Tribute, and brought vaſt ſums of Money into the Emperour's Coffers. But ſee the iſſue, Juſtinian the following year makes a Progreſs into Armenia, and takes the Mardaitæ out of Libanus, breaking thus down the Brazen wall of his Empire in theſe Parts. Yet diſarming himſelf in this manner, he had the Folly and Confidence to break the Peace, made lately with the Bulgari, and having had ſome Succeſs againſt them and the Sclavini in Battel, came to that Madneſs, as to renounce the Truce made with Abimelech; who by this time had Compoſed all matters in Arabia, and brought every Man into Subjection to himſelf, ſo as to be ready for all Foreign oppoſition. Without any reaſon at all, he would ſend a Colony into the Iſland of Cyprus contrary to the Articles, and refuſed to receive ſuch Money as Abimelech ſent for payment of the Tribute; becauſe it was not ſtamped with the Image of any Emperour, but it ſeems coyned after a new Arabian Faſhion. For the Emperours, you muſt know, Challenged to themſelves the ſole Privilege of having their Names and Repreſentations ſtamped upon all Gold Money, though upon cantoning the Empire into particular Kingdoms; the ſeveral Kings had e'er this begun to aſſume to themſelves this Right of Coyning, as we formerly inſtanced in thoſe of the Franks, out of the Hiſtory of Procopius.

Οὐδὲ γὰρ ἐξῆν ἐν χρυσῷ νομίσματι χαρακτῆρα ἐντυποῦσθαι, ἢ τὸν τοῦ Βασιλέως Ῥωμαίων. Zonaras Annal. Tom. 3. ad Imperium Ἰουστινιανοῦ τοῦ ῥινοτμήτου.

Breaks the Peace with the Saracens.

They beat him in Battel.

Armenia delivered up to them.

And the Provinces waſted by them.

11. For carrying on this War, he would not rely upon the Roman Legions, or the Forces already raiſed; but out of the choiceſt of the Sclavini whom he had taken, formed a new Army of thirty thouſand Men, which he called his peculiar, or acquired People. The Saracens now with reiterated Prayers and Complaints beſeech him, he would not break the League calling God to Witneſs, by the Interpoſition of whoſe moſt Sacred Name it had been confirmed. But he ſtopping his Ears againſt all their Meſſages, drew down his Forces toward Sebaſtopolis to begin War, which hearing, they met him e'er he could get into the Bowels of their Countrey, and with the Tables of the League carried as an Enſign on the top of a Spear, ingaged with him in Battel under Conduct of Moamed. In the firſt Encounter they had the worſt, and ſtill were like to have, if Moamed had not by his Tongue ſupplied the defects of their Hands. He ſends to the Captain of the Sclavini, a Quiver over-laid with Gold, and by great Promiſes perſwades him to revolt, and come over to him with twenty thouſand Men. This addition to Moamed's former powers, caſt the Balance quite on the other ſide, with ſuch diſadvantage that the Romans were not able to ſuſtain the leaſt aſſault, but fled away amain; and after a vaſt loſs Juſtinian came to Leucate, where out of Rage he cauſed the reſt of the Sclavini, that had continued with him, with their Wives and Children to be ſlain, and their Bodies caſt into the Sea. But this Succeſs of the Saracens got them ſuch Reputation, that Sabbatius the Armenian, delivered Armenia inſtantly into their Hands, and the following year they ſubdued the inner part of Perſia, called Choroſan. Moamed to be revenged upon Juſtinian, and ſtrike a Terrour into his People, invades his Dominions, taking with him the lately revolted Sclavini, by whoſe directions he haraſſed the Provinces, and after as much miſchief done, as it lay in the Power of an Enemy to doe, returned home with a vaſt number of Priſoners.

Ἐπεὶ κατὰ τὴν Λευκάτην ἐγένετο, ſic Zonaras, at Cedrenus ſic, ἐν τῷ πρὸς Νικομήδειαν Λευκάκτῃ.

12. Juſtinian in the mean time, as one not much concerned, was wholly intent upon Building, repaired the Walls of the Palace, and erected a ſtately Banqueting Houſe toward the Eaſt, which long after retained his Name, being called Juſtinianeum. Surveyor of theſe Works he made one Stephen a Perſian, principal of the Eunuchs, a man Cruel above Imagination, who beat and ſtoned the poor Labourers, without the leaſt ſhew of Mercy, and proceeded to that Impudence, as to Laſh with Thongs, Anaſtaſia Auguſta the Mother of the Emperour in his abſence. If he ſo handled the Mother, doubtleſs he had ſome Confidence in the Humour and diſpoſition of the Son, from which he could be ſecure of, or at leaſt have great hopes of Pardon, or Impunity. And that the Son's diſpoſition was Cruel, even beyond all bounds of Nature, was ſufficiently evidenced in divers particulars. Such Perſons he preferred, as were of the ſame Temper with himſelf, as appears not onely in Conſtantine Cruel.

He pulls down a Church to build a Theatre.

in Stephen; but Theodotus a Monk, whom taking out of his Cell he made his General Logotheta. This Fellow puniſhed many of the Nobility without any Fault at all committed, he ſold their Goods, and took delight to hang them up by the Heels, and then cauſe Straw to be ſet on fire under their Heads to torment them with the ſmoak. The Prefect of the City, by command of the Emperour alſo, thruſt many into Priſon without any Reaſon ſhewn, which raiſed extraordinary Hatred in the minds of the Citizens againſt their Prince. But he took all manner of ways to increaſe it. There was a Church dedicated to our Lady called Metropolitana, which ſtood very near the Palace: This he would have pulled down, and a Theatre or meeting place for the Veneti, to be built upon the Ground; he therefore required the Patriarch that he would ſay Prayers, that the Church might be demoliſhed. Callinicus the Patriarch anſwered with Tears, that they were wont to pray at the Building, but not at the demoliſhing of a Church, but conſtrained to doe it, he uſed this Expreſſion: Glory be to God, who ſuffereth all things, both now and to all Eternity, and then was the Church pulled down, and a Theatre raiſed; the Emperour cauſing another Church to be erected in another part of the City, bearing the ſame Name of Metropolitana.

Gives orders for a Maſſacre.

Ἀνασκαφῆ τὰ ὀςᾶ Ἰȣςινιανȣ͂.

He is depoſed.

13. Juſtinian having by theſe Courſes incurred the extreme Hatred of the People, which was likely, and that in a ſhort time to produce ſome dreadfull Effect, reſolved to be before hand with them, and gave Order to Stephen a Patritian, and Rufius an Officer in the Army to make a Maſſacre, beginning with the Patriarch. At this time it happened, that Leontius a Patritian, who having been general in the Eaſt, had managed his matters with very good Conduct and Succeſs, but had been detained by the Emperour in Priſon, two or three years, upon Suſpicion that he deſigned too great things for himſelf, was ſuddenly ſet at Liberty and made General of Greece, with Orders to ſhip his Men and be gone that very day. But ſtaying all that Night for a Wind, he had an occaſion to Diſcourſe with his Friends about his own matters; of whom ſeveral of them would undertake to foretell, that the greateſt Fortune would at length befall him, two Monks eſpecially, Paul a great Aſtronomer, and Gregory a Cappadocian. He expoſtulating ſomewhat with them, that they ſhould lead him into a Fools Paradiſe, by promiſing ſuch great matters to a Priſoner, and one that every hour expected the Meſſenger of Death; they all deſired him not to let ſlip the preſent opportunity, than which he could not well deſire a better, all the minds of the Citizens, being ſo alienated from the preſent Prince: He was ſo overpowered by their importunate requeſts, that taking with him his own Souldiers, he went in great ſilence to the Court of Guard, where knocking at the Gate, he pretended the Emperour was come about ſome urgent buſineſs, and ſo cauſing the Officer to admit him, he took him into Cuſtody, then opening the Priſons, he armed ſuch Souldiers as had therein been long detained, and leading them into the Forum, made Proclamation that all that were Chriſtians ſhould meet together, at the Church of St. Sophia. Thither the multitude ran in Confuſion, to whom the Patriarch ſaid, that this was the day of the Lords making, and the People cryed out, that the Bones of Juſtinian ſhould be digged up; meaning, it ſeems, that they ſhould pull him out of his Hole, where he had buried himſelf in all Lazineſs and obſcurity. They all ran to the Hippodrome or Circus, and thither by break of day, cauſed Juſtinian to be brought, whoſe Noſe they cut off, and then baniſh him to Cherſona, after he had Reigned near ten years. Theodotus the Monk, and Stephen the Perſian, with Ropes tyed to their Feet, they drag through the Streets to the Forum of the Oxe, and there burn them to Aſhes. Then with lucky Acclamations they ſalute Leontius Emperour.

Leontius made Emperour.

The Provinces invaded, and Lazica betrayed.

Africk over-run, regained, and retaken.

14. In the firſt year of Leontius, all things were in repoſe. In his ſecond, Alidis the Succeſſour it ſeems of Moamed (who in the laſt year of Juſtinian had made great Depredations in Armenia) invaded the Provinces, and returned with great plunder. Sergius alſo the Patritian revolted and betrayed Lazica into the hands of the Arabians. The year that next followed, the Saracens making another Expedition over-ran Africk, which Leontius hearing, ſent John a Patritian a Man of great Valour, with all the Ships he could make to drive them out, and that with ſuch Succeſs, as he retook all the Caſtles and ſtrong Holds of the Countrey, and ſending the Emperour the News, he wintred in theſe parts. But the Prince of the Arabians, their Protoſymbulus, or Preſident of their Council upon notice hereof, with a greater Fleet than ever comes into Africk, and eaſily beats out John again, who not able to make any conſiderable oppoſition takes ſhip for Conſtantinople, to require more Forces. But the Navy touching at Crete, the Officers began to enter into new Councils. They thought it would much reflect on them, to quit Africk in this manner to the Enemy, and fearing the Indignation of Leontius, they perſwaded the Seamen to revolt from him, and ſalute Emperour, one Apſimarus, the Drungarius of the Cipyrrhæotæ, whoſe Name they changed to Tiberius. This new Emperour comes then with all his Subjects (as yet) to Cycæ the Port of Conſtantinople, and found the Favour to be admitted, by ſome Countrey Magiſtrates at the Wall of Blachernæ, then ſeizing on the City, he cut off the Noſe of Leontius, and cauſing him to be kept in a Monaſtery, baniſhed his Friends after he had ſeized on their Eſtates. This Concluſion had the Reign of Leontius, after it had laſted ſcarce three Years.

Leontius depoſed by Apſimarus, who ſeizes on the Empire.

15. Apſimarus or Tiberius, thus ſeized of the Empire, immediately made Heraclius his Brother General of all the Forces, and ſent him into Cappadocia, to watch the motions of the Saracens. He taking his opportunity invaded their Territories, and piercing into Syria as far as Samoſata, waſted all before him, and ſlew as was reported two hundred thouſand of the Arabians, leaving a great Terrour of his Name behind him. In the mean time Abderachman riſes in Perſia, and expelling Chaganus, makes himſelf King of that Countrey in his room, but through the aſſiſtence of Moamed, whether the ſame we laſt mentioned, or another is uncertain, he recovered his former Eſtate, and Abderachman loſt his Life, and Fortunes together. In the third year of Tiberius, Abdelus fell upon the Roman Territories, and beſieged Antaradus; but neither his Force nor Arts prevailing, he returned home and built Mopſuheſtia, wherein he left a Garriſon. In his fourth, Boanes Sirnamed Heptadæmon betrayed the fourth Armenia to the Arabians. And the Emperour baniſhed Philippicus a Patritian the Son of Nicephorus into Cephalenia, becauſe he had ſaid he dreamed, that his Head was over-ſhadowed by an Eagle, as if the Empire was thereby portended to him. But, what was of more Conſequence, in the year that next followed, the Nobility of Armenia roſe up againſt the Saracens, and killing all they could light on, ſent to Apſimarus for his aſſiſtence againſt that Nation; but Moamed timely comes in, and after great ſlaughter on both ſides recovers Armenia, and having got together the Nobility that remained, burnt them all alive together. But that the Saracens might not think to carry all before them without controll; Azar invading Cilicia with ten thouſand Men, Heraclius the Emperour's Brother light upon him, and killing moſt of his Followers, ſent the reſt in Chains to Conſtantinople.

Heraclius his Brother makes great ſlaughter of the Saracens in Syria.

The Fourth Armenia betrayed to the Saracens.

Various Succeſs.

16. Yet did Azidas the Son of Chumeus, the following Summer make War againſt Cilicia, and taking the Caſtle Siſium, demoliſhed it. But Heraclius ingaging with him in a Bloody Battel, ſlew twelve thouſand of his Arabians in the place. In the mean time Juſtinian living at Cherſona, was ſo Confident as to affirm, that for all this one day he ſhould recover his former Dignity, which ſo alarmed the Inhabitants of the place, that they reſolved either to kill, or to ſend him to the Emperour. He perceiving their intentions, ſtole out of the Monaſtery, and coming to Daras deſired to have a meeting with Chaganus the Prince of the Chazari; who received him Honourably, and gave him in Marriage his Siſter Theodora, perſwading them to go and live together at Phænogorea. Apſimarus could not be long Ignorant of ſuch a matter, which as ſoon as he had diſcovered he ſent to Chaganus with vaſt Promiſes, inciting him either to deliver him up alive, or to ſend him his Head. Chaganus promiſed to doe one of them, and ſent a Guard to Juſtinian under Pretence of ſecuring him from all violence, that might be offered him by the Inhabitants of the Countrey; but with ſecret Inſtructions to kill him, when ever they ſhould receive from him ſuch Orders. The deſign was revealed by one of his Servants to Theodora, and ſhe acquainted therewith her Husband, who calling the Guards to him killed them, and then ſending her back into Chazaria, he fled to the Straits, and there taking ſhip came to Symbolum near Cherſona, whither upon notice came to him, Baſbacurius his Brother and others, with whom he ſailed to the Watch Tower of Cherſona, thence to Necropula and the Straits of Danaprium, and Danaſtrium. Here he was ſeized with ſuch a ſtorm, that all that were with him gave themſelves for loſt; whereupon Myaces one of his Domeſticks told him, that he ſaw plainly they were in great Danger of Death, and therefore prayed him to make a Vow, that if God Almighty would but reſtore him to his Throne, he would not revenge himſelf upon his Enemies, to which he anſwered in Anger; Here let God drown me, if I ſpare any of them. Then coming to the Danube, he ſent to Terbelis, King of the Bulgari to deſire aid, offering him great rewards with his Daughter in Marriage. Terbelis with an Oath undertook to aſſiſt him, and armed the whole multitude of the Bulgari and Slavi, with which Juſtinian went to Conſtantinople. Three days he treated with the Inhabitants, till perceiving he was more more and more affronted, with a few Romans he paſſed up the Aqueduct into the City, and digging through it, poſſeſſed himſelf of the Palace in Blachernæ, which being once known, Apſimarus with a great ſum of Money after he had Reigned about ſeven years fled to Apolloneas, and ſo Juſtinian recovered his former Power.

Juſtinian eſcapes out of the Monaſtery.

And recovers his Dignity.

His Cruelty.

17. He diſmiſſed Terbelis with great Gifts and Royal Furniture, and beſtowed on him part of that Roman Countrey, called afterward Zagoria. Apſimarus, Leontius and Heraclius, being betrayed into his hands, he put to Death the two former, after he had Ignominiouſly led them as in Triumph through the City; and had in the Shews of the Circus ſet his Feet upon their Necks; which while he did, the unconſtant multitude repeated: Thou ſhalt tread upon the Adder and Baſiliſck, and that which follows. The Eyes of Callinicus the Patriarch he pulled out of his Head, and then baniſhed him to Rome, preferring one Cyrus to his place, a Monk of the Iſland Amaſtris, becauſe he had foretold his Reſtitution. Then in his revengefull humour, did he proceed to the ſlaughter of an innumerable Company of Citizens and Souldiers, which ſtruck all Men with a Pannick fear. He ſent for his Wife, and Tiberius a Son lately born to him out of Chazaria, and ſet the Crown upon both their Heads. But in the third year of his Reſtauration, forgetting the Benefits he had received from Terbelis, he broke the League made betwixt the Romans and Bulgarians; and with a Party of ſtout Horſe, and a ſtrong Navy invaded Thrace. But his Men either ſo Cowardly or unskilfully demeaned themſelves, that they were quite beaten, and he was forced to betake himſelf to his Rampart, where being beſieged three days when he ſaw the Enemy very pertinacious, he Hamſtringed all his Horſes, and getting his men aboard, with great Infamy returned home. Here he had not long been, when calling to mind how thoſe of Cherſona the Boſphorani, and others had laid in wait for him; he Rigged every ſhip he could make, and on this Fleet ſent an Army with expreſs Order to kill and deſtroy thoſe that lived in theſe parts, and to be ſure not to leave one of them alive.

Breaks the Peace with his Reſtorer, and Ignominiouſly beaten.

Malitiouſly Cruel againſt thoſe of Boſphorus.

18. His Orders were executed as far as poſſible, the poor People not being in the poſture of defence, as utterly ſurprized, onely the Children they killed not; but kept them for Slaves. Two and forty of the principal Men, they ſent to the Emperour. Some they Roaſted alive, and others they caſt into the Sea. Juſtinian was Mad, when he heard they had ſpared the Children, but was comforted when he heard that, no fewer than ſeventy three Thouſand were deſtroyed. But imagining he had not yet done enough, though he had alſo killed the Children, he ſends his Navy the ſecond time with Charge to lay all the Countrey waſte, and deſtroy what ever was remaining of the People. The remainder of the Nation ſeeing there was no end of their Miſeries, ſecured themſelves in their Forts as well as they could, and renouncing Juſtinian, ſaluted Emperour Philippicus the Son of Bardanes, who had been baniſhed by Apſimarus to Cephalenia, but now was recalled, and on his way to Conſtantinople. Elias the Prince of the Countrey had a great hand in this Election; whereat Juſtinian upon notice was ſo inraged, that he killed Elias his Children, then being at Conſtantinople in the Lap of their Mother, and forced her to lye with an Indian his Slave and Cook. Then ſent he his Fleet the third time, with battering Rams, and all Inſtruments of Hoſtility to complete the Ruine of this People, which had been perfected, but that the Chazari upon their deſire came in to their Relief; who made ſuch effectual oppoſition, that the Army not able to doe that for which they were ſent, and fearing the moſt Savage cruelty of Juſtinian, revolted alſo from him, and joyned with the other in the choice of Philippicus, whom, being retired for his ſafety to Chaganus, they demanded might be ſent to them. Chaganus demanded Caution, that they would not betray him, and required a piece of Money from every Souldier, which being given, he diſmiſſed Philippicus, and they willingly ſubmitted to him as to their Prince.

Who ſalute Emperour Philippicus.

To whom Juſtinian's Souldiers revolt.

19. Juſtinian when the Fleet was ſo ſlow in returning, gueſſed what was the occaſion; and getting about him ſome Thracians and others, went as far as Sinope, whence perceiving that it ſailed toward Conſtantinople, for Grief and Indignation he rored out, and made what haſte he could to get thither, but Philippicus prevented him, and then he retired to Damatrya. Philippicus preſently ſent Elias againſt him, and Maurus a Patritian to ſeek out his Son Tiberius, whom he found fled with his Grandmother Anaſtaſia (for his Mother was dead) to a Church in Blachernis, and there Graſped about the Holy Table; but they pulled the Child thence, and dragging him to the little Door of the Gate of Callinicum, there laid him on the Threſhold and cut his Throat like a Sheep. Elias by Promiſe of ſecurity

Juſtinian is ſlain.

Philippicus ſucceeds.

His Eyes pulled out.

Artemius the Secretary made Emperour.

and other mattets, drew all Juſtinian's followers from him, and being thus deſerted, he took him in great anger by the Throat, and drawing the Scimiter which hung at his ſide, therewith cut off his Head, which he ſent to Philippicus, and Philippicus made it be conveyed to Rome. To this end came this furious and implacable Juſtinian, in the eighth year after his Reſtauration. Philippicus the Son of Bardares as Zonaras calls him, or ſirnamed Bardares as Cedrenus will have it, was eloquent in Diſcourſe, and once had the eſteem of a prudent man, but carrying himſelf lightly and careleſly, and being of an evil Life, he quite loſt all his Reputation. Perſwaded by an Heretical Monk, who had foretold him he ſhould be Emperour; he ſet himſelf to aboliſh the Decrees of the ſixth General Council, with which matters while he buſied himſelf, the Bulgari without any Noiſe made an Invaſion as far as to the Golden Gate of the City, and having killed and taken Captives an infinite number of People, returned home without any oppoſition. This happened in the firſt year of his Reign. In his ſecond, when the Praſini had got the better in the Circus, it pleaſed the Emperour to make his Entry on Horſeback, to Bathe himſelf in the Bath of Zeuxippus, and to Dine with ſome of the moſt Noble Citizens, or as others ſaid, with thoſe that were Victours in the Sports. As he took his reſt at the Noon time of the Day, one Rufus Prefect of the Opſiciani, with a company of Thracians entring by the Golden Gate broke into the Palace, and thence taking him out into the Armory of the Praſini there pulled out his Eyes, the thing being utterly unknown. But when it was grown publick, the day after being Eaſter day, the People met together in the Great Church, and John the Patriarch Crowned Emperour, Artemius the principal Secretary, giving him the name of Anaſtaſius. This happened after Philippicus had Reigned but one year and ſix months.

The Fleet revolts and ſalutes Theodoſius Emperour.

Artemius depoſed.

20. Artemius, or Anaſtaſius was a moſt learned man, and extraordinary fit for buſineſs, and the management of the greateſt Affairs. He made General of the Horſe one Leo an Iſaurian, a very fit man, and another as fit as he, he ſet over civil Matters, ſo that all his time, he had not much to concern himſelf about. Of Theodorus and Georgius both Patritians, he cauſed the Eyes to be put out, and confined to Theſſalonica for his better ſecurity. The Arabians now making War upon the Empire both by Sea and Land, and a report going that they would fall upon the City, he cauſed to be Built all the light Ships his Arcenals could furniſh, fortified all the Walls and Places at Land, and filled the Granaries with Corn. But being informed that the Saracens Sailed into Phœnicia with a ſtrong Fleet, there to cut down Timber, he alſo ſet out a Navy to deſtroy the proviſion that they made, commanding the Provincials alſo to ſend their Ships to the General Rendezvous at Rhodes, and joyn with the main Fleet, which he would have Commanded by John the Deacon of the Great Church, and the General Logotheta. Being all aſſembled at Rhodes, the Admiral commanded them to Sail, but the Seamen, and eſpecially the Opſiciani refuſed to obey Orders, and when John more ſeverely than prudently animadverted upon them, they fell into a plain Mutiny and ſlew him, and making an halt after a Conſultation, ſome returned home, and others to Conſtantinople, who in their way when they were come as far as Adramyttium ſaluted Emperour againſt his will, one Theodoſius a Publican, or Collectour of the Revenue, a man utterly unacquainted with affairs of State. Artemius having notice of the Revolt, fortifies Conſtantinople and goes to Nicæa. For ſix months the Fleet of Conſtantinople, and that of Theodoſius skirmiſhed by times. Theodoſius at length goes into Thrace, and there making great Levies, returns with a powerfull Army to the City, where he corrupted thoſe that watched at the Wall and got in. The City is Plundered for the pertinacious humour of the Inhabitants, and the friends of Artemius ſecured, who being brought to him ſtill lying at Nicæa, upon ſecurity given for his Life, he entred into Religion, taking the Habit of a Monk, and was conveyed to Theſſalonica, after he had enjoyed the Title of Emperour near about two years.

Leo the Iſaurian takes the Purple upon him.

Theodoſius reſigns.

21. But Leo an Iſaurian, Captain General of the Eaſtern Forces, refuſed to ſubmit to Theodoſius, having at his Devotion Artavaſdes an Armenian the Captain of his Nation, to whom he had promiſed his Daughter in Marriage. At the perſuaſion of Maſalnias the Prince of the Saracens, who had begun to make War upon the Empire, he took the Purple upon him, and with a great Army marched to Nicomedia, where he fought with the Son of Theodoſius, and defeating him, took both him and the cheifeſt of his Father's Friends Priſoners, aud ſo proceeded till he came to Chryſopolis. Theodoſius ſaw there was no contending, and employed the Patriarch Germanus to Leo, from whom having obtained promiſe of Impunity, he reſigned ſigned the Imperial Dignity, and both he and his Son were ſhaven and entred into Orders, after he had Reigned but one year. He died afterward at Epheſus, where he was Buried in the Chapel of St. Philip, with this word onely ὑγίια, or Health ingraven on his Tomb. But how great a friend ſoever Maſalnias the Saracen was to Leo, it ſeems he was no friend to the Empire, for he ſet upon Pergamus and took it, the Inhabitants by the juſt Judgment of God being delivered into his hands as our Hiſtorians obſerve. For perſwaded by a certain Magician they ripped up a Bigbellied Woman, and ſeething her fruit in a Kettle, as many as would fight againſt the Enemy, dipped the ſleeves of their right Armes in this execrable Sacrifice.

The Saracens take Pergamus.

22. Leo upon the reſignation of Theodoſius was owned for Emperour, and took the Government upon him, on the eigtth day before the Calends of April, in the fourteenth Indiction, the third year of Gregory the Second, Biſhop of Rome, and the ſeven hundred and ſixteenth year of our Lord. He was alſo called Conon, and ſirnamed Iconomachus, becauſe he was againſt the worſhipping of Images. When he was young, there were certain Jews born at Laodicea, a City of Phœnicia, who pretended to foretell that Izeth King of the Arabians ſhould Reign over that Nation forty years, but he died ſoon after, and his Son ſought for the Impoſtours to have them puniſhed. They fled to ſave their Lives into Iſauria, where meeting with Leo then a very Youth, but tall and beautifull at a certain Well, where he was ſet at Dinner, (for he got his living hardly, and had now unladed his Beaſt to give him refreſhment as well as himſelf,) they propheſied that one day he ſhould ſway the Sceptre of the Roman Empire. He expoſtulated with them for uttering ſuch a ſtrange Conceit, but they affirmed it would be ſo, and made him ſwear, that in caſe it ſhould come to paſs, he would grant them whatſoever they deſired. Not long after he was taken into the Army by Siſinnius the Patritian, and was made within a while a Spatharius by Juſtinian, and at length either by Anaſtaſius or Theodoſius was created General of the Eaſt, and ſo in the method and courſe lately mentioned came to be Emperour. In his ſecond year Soliman with an Army invaded Thrace, but died within a while, and Humar was Ameras or Prince in his room, who loſt a great multitude both of his Men and Cattel by the extremity of the Winter. In Spring following Suphiam from Ægypt, and Izeth from Africk in great Fleets paſſed up to Conſtantinople, with an innumerable company of men and quantity of Arms, and the City they beſieged two years, but then all the Ships were partly ſunk by Tempeſts, and partly burnt, and all the men periſhed together with their Veſſels.

Leo owned Emperour.

From what and how he aroſe.

Cedrenus.

Spatharium Cedrenus eſſe Romanis Corporis cuſtodem docet σπαθάριος ὁ σωματοφύλαξ, Spathariorum Princeps à Curopalate inter Magiſtratus Aulæ numeratur, qui & Imp. τὴν σπάθην vel enſem geſtare principem genere proximum ſcribit.

The Fleet of the Saracens loſt before Conſtantinople.

23. Yet did Mardaſane another Saracen Captain from Pylæ or the Straits, make another excurſion as far as Nicæa and Nicomedia, but were ſent back with great loſs received from the Romans, who after the manner of the Mardaitæ lay in Ambuſh and intercepted them. At this time ſo great a Famine fell upon thoſe Arabians, that it compelled them to eat up all their Cattel, and after that to fall one upon another, and feed on Excrements, with the roots of Trees and other unnatural things. And this was followed by ſo great a Plague, as ſwept away an infinite number of men, which were great rebukes, and able if not to deſtroy, yet to weaken and render contemptible very powerfull Nations, yet ſtill they flouriſhed every day, made progreſs in the glory of Arms and Conqueſts, and became more renowned by the poſſeſſion of many, the moſt conſiderable Provinces and Countries of the World, amongſt which they ſet footing in Spain about this very time. Not long after, the Bulgari made War upon them, and ſlew no fewer than two and twenty thouſand, and many other Calamities followed; but they weathered all thoſe Difficulties, and arrived at that Power and Fame in the World, which was included ſecretly in the promiſe made to Abraham about Iſmael's Poſterity. We have heard what ſucceſs they had in beſieging Conſtantinople, but to another thing of conſequence this Siege gave occaſion. Sergius, chief of the Spatharii and Governour of Sicily, hearing the News, ſaluted Emperour one Baſilius the Son of Onomagulus changing his Name into Tiberius. He diſpoſed of places, and ordered matters thereabout as he pleaſed, but Leo having notice, ſends Paul one of his Domeſticks to chaſtiſe him, who coming into the Iſland called the People together, and reading a Writing which expreſſed the thoughts and intentions of the Emperour, ſo improved the opportunity he had got of their Attention, that with lucky acclamations they owned Leo for their Prince, and renounced the Title and pretences of their new Upſtart, whom with his Relations they delivered up bound into his Hands. He cut off their Heads and ſent them to the Emperour, then by promiſe of pardon brought in Paul, who had been the Authour of the Revolt. And ſo the Another miſcarriage.

Great difficulties the Saracens grapple with, yet overcome all.

A Rebellion in Sicily ſuppreſſed.

ſo the Weſt was again ſetled in Obedience. Theſe things happened about the firſt and ſecond years of Leo. In his third his Wife Maria brought him a Son whom he named Conſtantine, and the People ſirnamed Copronymus, becauſe he bewrayed the Font at his Baptiſm, which was taken as a ſign of much miſchief he would doe to the Church. The chief of the Nobility and Senate were his God-Fathers.

Conſtantine Copronymus born.

24. The ſame year Artemius living at Conſtantinople, being perſuaded by Nicetas Xylinites a man of great Authority, went to the Bulgari, and raiſing an Army amongſt them came againſt Leo to Conſtantinople, but the Citizens refuſing to receive him, the Bulgari delivered him up into the Emperour's hands and departed home; Leo put both Artemius and Xylinites to Death, confiſcated alſo the Eſtate of the latter for he was very rich, and cauſed to be Executed very many others that were of the Party, amongſt whom the Archbiſhop of Theſſalonica; neither did ſuch as obtained mercy to live, eſcape utterly without Puniſhment, for many he chaſtized by cutting off their Noſes, and others he ſent into Baniſhment.

Artemius put to death for Treaſon, with his Complices.

Having paſſed the danger of this Conſpiracy, he thought of Eſtabliſhing the Empire upon his Poſterity, cauſing Germanus the Patriarch to Crown his Son now ſcarcely a year old.

Young Conſtantine Crowned.

While theſe things are in hand at Conſtantinople, Humar the Ameras or Prince of the Arabians leaves this World, after he had Governed eleven years and four months and his Principality to Ized. Much about the ſame time another Ized ſirnamed Mualabis ſet up for himſelf in Perſia, and drew in great numbers to defend him, but the Ameras made War upon him, ſlew him and recovered the Countrey. Leo the Emperour from this time forward ſet himſelf to remove Images from Churches, and much ſtir aroſe upon that occaſion, inſomuch as Gregory the Biſhop of Rome rebelled againſt him, and making a League with the Franks, ſtopped the Revenue which had formerly riſen to the Emperour out of Italy.

Gregory Biſhop of Rome Rebells againſt the Emperour.

Ἀποστατήσας οὖν ὡς εἴρηται, τῆς τοῦ Βασιλέως ὑπακοῆς ὁ Πάπας Γρηγόρειος. Zonaras.

While theſe contentions were riſing to an height, in the tenth year of his Reign Maſalnias takes Cæſarea in Cappadocia; and a great Plague rages in Syria. In the Summer of the ſame year, a ſtrange thing happened betwixt Thera and Theraſia, two of the Iſlands Sporades of the Ægean Sea, a great ſmoak for many days riſing from the bottom of the Sea, like to that of a Furnace, which thickning by degrees, at laſt grew to perfect Stones reſembling the Pumice, which covered not onely the Water it ſelf, but in a manner all the continent of Aſia Minor, Lesbus, Abidus and the maritime parts of Macedonia. In the middle of the ſmoak a new Iſland aroſe out of the Sea, and joyned it ſelf to Hieria, even as Thera and Theraſia had formerly appeared on a ſudden, where nothing but water had been ſeen before.

Wonders in the Ægean Sea.

25. Whether thoſe diſturbances in the Earth and Air had any influence upon the brains of ſuch as inhabited the Iſlands Cyclades we know not, who grew ſo hot upon the Emperour's War againſt Images, that they would needs joyn themſelves to the weaker ſide, and making up a Fleet amongſt themſelves, undertook an expedition againſt Conſtantinople, but by artificial fire they and all their Ships periſhed together.

Rebels periſhed by artificial fire.

In the mean time Haumar with fifteen thouſand men lightly Armed, made an excurſion into the Roman Provinces, and beſieged Nicæa the City of Bithynia, where Manias with no fewer than eighty five thouſand joyned with him, and a long time they beſieged the City, but it was protected by apparitions of Saints, as thoſe who wrote in later Ages do tell us. Whether they were diſcouraged from this ill ſucceſs or no we know not, but about three years, for any thing that appears to us, the Saracens continued quiet till the fourteenth of Leo, when Maſalnias made another Inrode into the Provinces, and coming into Cappadocia, took by Strategem the Caſtle of Charſianum.

More Inrodes of the Saracens.

At the ſame time the Emperour's affairs were in no good condition in Italy, where, beſides the Revolt of Rome, and the loſs of his Tributes, there was no good Correſpondence betwixt his Exarch of Ravenna, and Luithprand the King of the Lombards. But he ſo ordered the matter, as to bring this King to his beck, and enter into a ſtrict League and Alliance with him, the conditions whereof were theſe, that Leo ſhould aſſiſt Luithprand in ſubduing the Dukes, or the petty Princes, and ſo promote him to the Monarchy of the Lombards, and he on the other ſide, ſhould uſe his utmoſt endeavour to reduce the City of Rome to the Emperour's Obedience, which yet could not be effected according to their deſires, though Eutychius the Exarch, and Gregory the Roman Biſhop were reconciled, who had ſo far diſagreed formerly, that the Life of the Prelate was exceedingly endangered.

Anaſtaſius.

Agreement between the Exarch of Ravenna, and the King of the Lombards.

26. Leo being rid of the troubles of the Lombards, with whom all things ſeemed now to be ſettled, bent his utmoſt endeavours to ſuppreſs the Worſhippers of Images, and to the eſtabliſhment of his Family. He procured the Daughter of Chaganus, Leo ſcrapes up Money.

The Scythians invade.

A dreadfull Earthquake.

nus, the King of the Scythians, to be given in Marriage to his Son Conſtantine, after ſhe was firſt chriſtened, and named Irene. Againſt the revolted Biſhop and City of Rome he ſent a very conſiderable Fleet, which periſhed by Tempeſts in the Adriatick Sea. He laid heavy Impoſitions upon the People of Sicily and Calabria, to ſupply his empty Coffers, ſeized on the Revenues which belonged to ſome Churches, and Rome, and cauſed Male Children, aſſoon as they were born, to be ceſſed. In the mean time, and afterward, Suleiman, the Son of Iſam, invades the Provinces bordering on the Dominions of the Saracens, and waſtes all with Fire and Sword, carrying along with him in his Expeditions one that called himſelf Tiberius, the Son of Juſtinian, whoſe Title he advanced againſt that of the Emperour. In the three and twentieth Year of Leo's Reign, with no fewer than ninety thouſand Men, he fell upon the Towns and Caſtles of the Eaſt, and having taken many of them, returned home with his Priſoners and Booty without any diſturbance. Theſe Invaſions of the Saracens ſorely afflicted the Eaſtern Parts, and that the more Weſtern might have their ſhare alſo of miſery, and feel the inconſtancy of all humane Comforts, as well as their Neighbours, in the laſt Year of Leo a moſt dreadfull Earthquake falls out at Conſtantinople, which overturns many Churches, Monaſteries and private Houſes, and buried multitudes of Men, Women and Children in the rubbiſh. Several Statues of ancient Emperours it removed from their Baſes, as thoſe of Conſtantine the Great, Theodoſius, Arcadius, and others. In Thrace alſo and Bithinia, ſeveral dreadfull Effects of this Concuſſion of the Earth were to be ſeen. For beſides many Towns and Caſtles, Nicomedia, Prænetus and Nicæa periſhed, with many Inhabitants. The Sea was ſo much diſturbed with theſe ſubterraneous Vapours that thus diſquieted the World for eleven Months together, that it was driven out of ſome of its ancient Poſſeſſions, and forced to make bold with grounds that lay moſt obnoxious to its violence in other places.

Leo makes an advantage of it for getting Money, and dies.

Conſtantine reigns.

27. This ſo publick and a great Calamity, againſt the effects and terrour of which the Emperour ſhould have found out ſome comfort and ſupply, he turned to his own Lucre, and the greater diſturbance and oppreſſion of the poor People, if our Annaliſts may be credited. He diſſuaded them from repairing the Walls of their Towns, but laid a Tax upon them, which being, as they thought, onely deſigned for this preſent occaſion, was (as oftentimes it happens that an Impoſition impoſed laſts longer than the cauſe that procured it,) continued upon them and their Poſterity. Not long after this Leo dies after he had reigned twenty five years, two months, and twenty days, and leaves Conſtantine his Son, and Collegue, to the ſole poſſeſſion of the Empire. He as willing to keep and preſerve to his own Family what was left him, in his firſt Year marches againſt the Arabians, and as he was in his way, ſtudies how to prevent the deſigns of all Competitours. He had a Brother-in-Law whom he moſt feared, one Artabazdus, who married Anne, the Daughter of Leo, and being ſometime Governour of Armenia, aſſiſted him much in obtaining the Empire. Conſtantine, to make ſure work of it, that the Empire might not be transferred from the one Family into the other, reſolves firſt to make away his Sons, whom he kindly invites to his preſence, deſirous to ſee them as his Nephews. But the old Man had ſmelt out the deſign, and reſolving to be beforehand with him, falls upon him at unawares, kills ſeveral of his Friends, and forces him to fly for his Life to the City Amorium, where, with great promiſes, he perſuades Longinus, the Captain of the Eaſt, ſaith Cedrenus, or Lacinus, the Captain of the Thracian Troops, as writes Theophanes, or both, as appears from Zonaras, to undertake his Protection againſt his Brother.

Artabaſdus uſurps.

28. In the mean time Artabazdus ſends to make Theodorus the Governour of Conſtantinople of his Party, one Athanaſius, a Silentiary, who finds him pliable enough, and by telling a Lye, that Conſtantine the Emperour was dead, eaſily perſuaded the People to own Artabazdus for their Emperour, whom they as much extoll as a pious and orthodox Prince, as they deteſt and revile him whom they vainly ſuppoſed to be out of all poſſibility of revenging himſelf upon them. All things ſeeming now to be clear, and Anaſtaſius the Patriarch, who formerly had ſided with Leo againſt Images, but now, to curry favour with the riſing Sun, reviled both him, his Son, and his Opinions, perſuading all Men to receive and own him, Artabazdus enters Conſtantinople, and the firſt thing he does, he ſeizes on the Sons of Conſtantine, then makes them be ſhaven, and clapt up in cloſe cuſtody. But the cheat of Conſtantine being dead could not long continue, and poſſibly the Diſcovery might have a quite contrary Effect upon the humour of the inconſtant multitude. To prevent all ſuch dangers an expedient is found out by the Patriarch, who moſt ſolemnly ſwears, that Conſtantine had uttered moſt horrid Blaſphemies againſt our Saviour, as that he was not the Son of God, but born after the ſame manner of his Mother Mary, as Mary his Mother had born him. The People, by this Depoſition of the Patriarch, was ſo moved, as to depoſe Conſtantine. Now are there two Emperours. Conſtantine is ſtill living in Armenia, and Artabazdus reigns at Conſtantinople, whereupon ſuch a Civil War aroſe, as, if Cedrenus ſhould be credited, the like never happened ſince the beginning of the World.

The People depoſe Conſtantine.

Τούτῳ τῷ ἔτει γεγόνασιν ἐμφύλιοι πόλεμοι οἷοι οὐκ ἐγένοντο ἀπὸ καταβολῆς κόσμου. ad Ann. 2. Conſtantini Copronymi.

29. If ſo, the more to blame he, and other Hiſtorians, who give us ſuch a ſmall ſcantling of ſuch paſſages as deſerved to be related in intire Volumes. This they tell us, that Artabazdus being to march againſt the Emperour, cauſed firſt Nicephorus his Son to be crowned at Conſtantinople. That having made all preparations poſſible, yet he had the worſt in his attempts upon Conſtantine, and at length was forced both with loſs and diſgrace to Conſtantinople, where he ſent Nicetas the younger to try if he could have any better ſucceſs; but he came off with the ſame diſadvantage, and Conſtantine, as it concerned him, improved his Victories, and marched up to the City, which he ſtraitly beſieged in the month of September, at the beginning of the twelfth Indiction, long it was not e'er the beſieged, who made little or no preparations for a Siege, were ſore diſtreſſed with Famine, which cauſed Artabazdus to ſend out Anaſtaſius, one of his Secretaries, and Artabazdus, the Comes Domeſticorum, to procure Corn, and other neceſſaries; but going by Sea, they fell into the Fleet of Conſtantine, who commanded their Eyes to be put out. Thus ſucceeding not, Artabazdus makes a vigorous Sally, but ſtill came off very diſadvantageouſly, and the Famine ſo much increaſed, that he was forced to let the People go out, and provide for themſelves, which they did, ſome in the habit of Women, and others like religious Perſons, becauſe free egreſs was permitted to ſuch. At the beginning of November Conſtantine ſo preſſed upon the City, that he broke it in the Afternoon, having defeated Nicetas, the younger Son of Artabazdus, whom being taken Priſoner, he had bound in Fetters, and ſo preſented him to the view of his Father upon the Wall. Artabazdus eſcaped to a certain Caſtle in the Territories of the Opſicii, but was fetched thence, and had his Eyes put out, as alſo had both his Sons. Many of his Complices were put to death, amongſt whom Boetangius the Patritian was moſt eminent, not onely for the Nobility of his Houſe, but the extravagancy of the puniſhment inflicted on him. Firſt his Hands were cut off, and then his Head, which, with the body, for thirty years reſted in a Grave, wherein they had been decently interred; but then did Conſtantine force the Man's own Wife to dig up his bones, and caſt them into the place where the Bodies of Malefactours were wont to be thrown. The City of Conſtantinople the foreign Souldiers were permitted to plunder. As many of Artabazdus his Friends loſt their Lives, ſo ſome their Hands, and others their Feet. Conſtantine coming into the Hippodrome, to the Horſe-races, led Artabazdus, with his Sons and Relations, in triumph, and Anaſtaſius the Patriarch, having firſt cauſed him to be publickly beaten, he ſet upon an Aſs, with his Face to the Tail, and ſo to be carried up and down in deriſion. Yet did continue this Man in his place, becauſe he could not find out a greater Villain, if you'll believe his Detractours.

Conſtantine takes Conſtantinople.

4. Nonas.

Artabazdus his Eyes put out, and his friends put to death or maimed.

30. Conſtantinus Copronymus having thus in the third year of his Reign recovered his Power and Dignity, that he might ſettle himſelf the faſter in the ſeat of his Empire, which had lately been too hot for him, bent his endeavours to gain the affections of the People, which his cruelty had ſo alienated from him. At the ſame time as theſe Civil Wars made ſuch commotions and diſturbances amongſt Mankind, the ſubterraneous Vapours, as it were, keeping time with them, ſhook the Earth in ſeveral parts of the Eaſt, with ſuch violence, that down fell Cities, Towns and Caſtles, and the Mountains in the Deſert of Saba met, and united themſelves together, to take Counſel, as it were, and make the ſtronger defence. And for ſome time they ſeemed to be in repoſe, but not long after, in the ſixth Year of Copronymus, theſe Vapours, or whatever other Cauſes, doubled their fury. For in the preceding year, from the fourth of Auguſt to the firſt of October, as writes Theophanes, or as Cedrenus more probably, from the tenth to the fifteenth of Auguſt, there was a very great darkneſs, and in the eighteenth of January following happened ſo great an Earthquake in Paleſtine, about Jordan, and all Syria, that innumerable multitudes of Men periſhed, and many Churches and Monaſteries tumbled down, eſpecially in the Wilderneſs near to Jeruſalem. Neither had the Weſtern Parts any cauſe to rejoyce above their Fellows, for a moſt grievous Peſtilence beginning about Sicily and Calabria, as if it had been a devouring Fire, ſpread as far as Monobaſia, Greece, and the interjacent Iſlands. Little croſſes, as it were made with Oil, appeared upon the Clothes of Men, and the Veſtments of Churches, and ſuch as had them on their

More dreadfull Earthquakes.

Vide Baron.

As dreadfull a Peſtilence.

their Clothes, certainly died. The number of the dead was ſo great, that the living were ſcarcely able to bury them, but were forced to invent ſeveral things for the eaſier carriage of the bodies. The Plague continued ſtill raging with greater ſymptomes for three years, being called the Plague of Bubo's, from thoſe tumours which, it ſeems, aroſe in an extraordinary manner.

A Civil War amongſt the Saracens.

Of which the Emperour makes an advantage.

Another Earthquake in Syria.

31. It was a ſingular Mercy of Almighty God, that while theſe inward Diſtempers raged in this manner amongſt Chriſtians, the foreign ſcourge of the Saracens Sword, though it was not ſheathed, yet was employed to the deſtruction of thoſe that handled it. A Civil War brake out amongſt them in Syria, where while they intended nothing ſo much as the deſtruction of one another, Manias reduces to his Obedience Emeſa, Damaſcus, Heliopolis and Jeruſalem. The Emperour thinks this a convenient time to beſtir himſelf, and while they are buſie in one part of Syria, he falls upon another, recovers Germanicia, and makes an Invaſion as far as Dalichia and Aſſyria. Thoſe of the Saracens that lived nearer the Sea, to weaken or divert his Power, rigged up a Fleet, which bent its courſe to Cyprus, with intent to perform ſome great matters; but the Roman Navy there met with them at unawares, and the Admiral having blocked up the Haven, ſo as they could not eſcape, deſtroyed every Ship, except three, which they willingly ſuffered to paſs away with the news of their ſad fortune. The year that followed, being the ninth of Conſtantine, on the twenty fifth of January, Irene, his Wife, brought him a Son, whom he named Leo. And now again are the ſad Calamities which had ſo lately happened in the Eaſtern Parts renewed, as dreadfull an Earthquake as ever falling out in Syria, ſome Cities were quite ſwallowed up, others half ruined, and ſome from their mountainous ſituations brought down to the levell, and removed, without any conſiderable Detriment, ſix miles, or more, from their ancient ſeats. In Meſopotamia a Chaſme was made in the ground two miles long, out of which proceeded a whitiſh and ſandy kind of Earth, and (Theophanes tells you Eye-witneſſes affirmed it) out of it aroſe a certain Animal in the ſhape of a Mule, which ſpeaking with a voice like that of a Man, predicted, that out of the Wilderneſs a certain People would fall upon the Arabians, which accordingly came to paſs.

Vide Baron.

The Bulgari make great Depredations.

They defeat Conſtantine.

A Comet.

32. In the Year that followed, Conſtantine cauſed his young Son Leo to be crowned Emperour by Anaſtaſius the Patriarch. For ſeveral years all Acts of Hoſtility had ceaſed betwixt him and his Neighbours, but in the eleventh of his Reign he raiſed an Army, wherewith he took Theadoſiopolis and Melitena. Conceiving the Provinces which lay towards the Bulgari to be in no good poſture of defence, he built ſome new Forts upon the Borders, whereat they found themſelves concerned, and ſent their Ambaſſadours to complain, and deſire a Confirmation of the former Leagues; but he ignominiouſly treated the Meſſenger, wherewith they were ſo much offended, that they made a ſudden Irruption into the Provinces, and peircing as far as to the Long Walls, with vaſt plunder returned home, without any let or moleſtation. This provoked Conſtantine exceedingly, yet he tempered his paſſion till he could be in a poſture, as he thought, to revenge the Injury, which was not till ſix years after, in the nineteenth of his Reign, and then being, as he thought, ſufficiently provided, he made an Expedition againſt them. But coming to a narrow place, called Beregaba, the Enemy took the advantage of the paſſage, and defeated him, which done, he returned home with great loſs of Men, and a greater of Reputation. The next Year a great Comet, which from the likeneſs of a Beam the Greeks called Docites, appeared in the Eaſt for ten days, and afterward removed to the Weſtern part of the Heavens, where it ſhone for one and twenty more.

Τῷ κ ἔτει δοκίτης ἀςὴρ ἐφάνη κατὰ τ ἑώαν, λαμπρότατος, &c. Cedrenus.

A ſtrange Froſt.

33. The one and twentieth Year of Conſtantinus Copronymus his Reign, the Annaliſts make infamous, for his whipping to death one Andrew, a famous Monk, in Blachernis, for reprehending his Impiety, in reference to Images no doubt, to which our Hiſtorians, as living in later Ages, wherein the practice obtained, were exceedingly devoted. The Reader muſt not think it improper for us to take notice of a violent Froſt, which happened two years after, both becauſe we are too much at leiſure to doe it, and the remarkableneſs of it renders it a fit Subject for an Hiſtorian, though never ſo grave and wary. It began on the firſt of October, and froze ſo hard, that both in the Eaſtern and Weſtern, as well as in the Northern, Parts, the Sea, for an hundred miles from the ſhore, was covered with Ice thirty Cubits in thickneſs. On this Ice fell a Snow twenty Cubits deep, which made it paſſable for Men, and all other ſorts of Animals, no otherwiſe than the firm ground it ſelf. In the month of February a Thaw came, and diſſolved this Ice, and Snow upon it, into many Heaps, or Mountains rather, which being by Winds driven to Dampſia, and the Chapel, crowded through the Straits, and came as far as Con- ſtantinople, nay to Propontis and Abydus, ſurrounded the Iſlands adjacent in the Sea, and filled all the Maritime Coaſts, as Theophanes himſelf was Witneſs, who, with thirty others of his Acquaintance, paſſed down upon one of theſe pieces. One of them did ſome miſchief to the Caſtle at Conſtantinople, another ſhook very much the Wall, and then being broken into three other pieces, compaſſed the Town from Mangana, as far as Boſphorium, being higher than the Walls themſelves. The month following, or that of March, the Stars ſeemed to fall from Heaven, and Doomſday was generally thought to be at hand. And theſe wonders were followed by as ſtrange a Drought, which cauſed both Rivers and Fountains to fail.

Vide eund.

34. Much about this time, or a little after, Conſtantine made Peace with the Bulgari, but it ſeems he did it to ſurpriſe them, for as privately as he could he marched with an Army into their Countrey, but proceeding as far as Tutia, did nothing memorable, burnt onely a few Cottages, and ſo returned home with ſmall Reputation. But the Year following he thought to redeem his Credit, and therefore not onely prepared his Land Forces, but a great Fleet alſo, which he commanded to ſail to Anchialus, but coming to Anchor in the Road of Thoris, ſo violent a North wind ſeized upon it, that it almoſt utterly periſhed, and he commanded Nets to be caſt into the Sea, and as many dead Bodies as could be drawn out to be decently interred. So write Theophanes and Cedrenus, concerning this expedition, to Anchialus, adding, that the Emperour returned with diſgrace to Conſtantinople, but Zonaras tells us quite another ſtory. The occaſion, he ſaith, of this Expedition was taken from a Sedition lately riſen amongſt the Bulgari themſelves, who having put to death all their Leaders, that were deſcended from their Princely Families, advanced one to the Dignity, who was much more meanly deſcended, Telentza by Name. He tells us, that the Emperour at this Inſtant ſet upon them both by Sea and Land, particularly at Anchialus, where the Fight continuing from eleven a Clock till evening, many were ſlain, the Captain of the Bulgari ſaved himſelf by flight, and many Barbarians being killed, and no fewer taken Priſoners, multitudes alſo revolted to the Emperour of their own accord, who, as Conquerour, entred Conſtantinople in ſolemn Triumph, in Armour at the head of his armed Troops, with his Captives in Chains, according to the cuſtome, whom, after the pomp and ſolemnity ended, he put to death.

Different Relations concerning Conſtantine's War with the Bulgari.

He Crowns his Wife and Children.

35. The next Year being come, he cauſed to be crowned Eudocia, his third Wife (for it ſeems he had three) upon a Scaffold of nineteen cubits, and on the firſt of April, being the Monday in Eaſter Week, created Cæſars his and her two Sons, Chriſtopher and Nicephorus. Nicetas the Patriarch praying the while that the Emperours inveſted them with their Robes, and put on them the Cæſarean Helmets. Their youngeſt Brother Nicetas was alſo created Nobiliſſimus, being inveſted with a Robe, and a Golden Crown ſet on his Head, which ſolemnity finiſhed, they went in a ſolemn Proceſſion, caſting ſeveral ſorts of Money to the People, according to the cuſtome. A year after Irene coming from Athens, was alſo crowned, and married to Leo, the eldeſt Son of Conſtantine. Phadalus, Captain of the Saracens, within two years, invaded the Roman Provinces, and took five hundred Captives, but the Inhabitants of Mopſueſtia laid in wait, and killing a thouſand of theſe Arabians, recovered all their booty. The following year Conſtantine undertook another Expedition againſt the Bulgari, but his Succeſs was ſuch, as inclined him to ſubmit to a Peace, which they, it ſeems, never intended to obſerve any longer than they could get a convenient opportunity to break it. For they ſent not long after twelve thouſand Men to make themſelves Maſters of Berzetia, which being made known to the Emperour, he haſted with an Army againſt them, and falling on them at a place called Lithoſorea, cut them all in pieces, and then returned home. He was wont to call this his Noble War, becauſe in it not one Chriſtian periſhed, but it ſeems the Victory was obtained by Treachery, and that could not render it ſo noble, as if it had been atchieved by Valour and good Conduct. For Elerichus, Prince of the Bulgari, found that he was betrayed, but becauſe he knew not the Traitours, he had this device to know their Names. He wrote to Conſtantine, telling him, that he was reſolved to quit his preſent Office, and come to him to Conſtantinople. He deſired therefore he would ſend him his Letters of ſafe conduct, and to ſignifie to him what Friends he had amongſt the Bulgari, that he might commit his Perſon to their Truſt, and with them repair to his preſence. Conſtantine overjoyed at his intimation of a Revolt, ſent him the Names of thoſe that held Intelligence with him, which as ſoon as he knew, he put them all to death, laughing in his ſleeve to ſee how he had cheated the Emperour, who could no otherwiſe amend the matter at the preſent, than in a fury by revenging himſelf upon his

His Noble War.

He is deceived by the Bulgarian King.

his Beard which he plucked up by the roots in the height of his Paſſion.

36. But counting every Day a Year, till he could put himſelf into a poſture to be revenged, the Spring following he marched againſt Elerichus with another Army, but before he could doe any thing of moment, was ſeized with a Carbuncle, or Inflammation of his Thigh, by the Greeks called Anthrax, the anguiſh whereof caſt him into an acute Fever. He returned therefore back to Achadiopolis, and there took his Bed, and in this caſe was conveyed to Selimbria, and thence by Ship to a Caſtle called Strongylum, where in the Territory called Chelandium he died, after he had reigned thirty four Years, two Months and ſix and twenty Days, coming onely nine days ſhort of the Reign of his Father, if we believe Baronius, who in one place will have Theophanes to give thirty four Years, three Months and two days to the Reign of Leo, whereas formerly treating of Leo's Death, he cites the ſame Hiſtorian, reckoning onely twenty five Years, two Months, and twenty Days, of that Emperour. Never was man worſe ſpoken of by Theophanes, Cedrenus, and other later Hiſtorians, eſpecially by Baronius, but how great Credit is to be given to them herein may be impartially examined, when we come to treat of the cauſe of their prejudice, onely ſaying thus much by the way, that where Intereſt and Paſſion bears ſway, Truth uſually truckles to the Pen of the Authour. His Son Leo, begot on the Chazarian Woman, ſucceeded him, without any trouble, and underſtanding that he had intruſted one Theophanes with a great Treaſure, to be employed for the uſe of his younger Children, he ſeized on it all, and left his Brothers deſtitute, and at his own Mercy. This Leo, though of his Father's Perſuaſion, as to Images, yet thought it Wiſedom to comply a little with a thoſe of the contrary party, till he could be ſettled in his Government, which the better to effect, he cauſed his young Son Conſtantine to be crowned Emperour; upon what occaſion, and in what manner, we ſhall tell the Reader from Theophanes.

Conſtantine dies.

Vide Baronium ad An. D. 741. num. 1. & 775. num. 1.

Leo his Son ſucceeds.

Apud Bar.

37. The whole City of Conſtantinople, with all the Nobility, and the People in general were ſo taken with the gentle and bountifull demeanour of Leo, that they came and petitioned him to make his Son Conſtantine Emperour. He told them, (as the Emperours were wont) that he was his onely Son, and that he was in fear, leſt if any thing happened otherwiſe than well to him his Father, they would deliver him into the hands of ſome Uſurper of their own preferring, being yet an Infant, and not able to ſhift for himſelf. They with Oaths affirmed they would ſtick to him, and in caſe he died, none but this his Son ſhould reign, and from Palm-Sunday, till the latter end of the Week, the multitude, in the Hippodrome, flocked together, with great earneſtneſs requiring the thing might be done, and then on Fryday Leo demanded an Oath of Fidelity and Allegiance of them, which as well thoſe of the Army as the Senate took, and all other ſorts of People, ſubſcribing a Paper, whereby they profeſſed they would admit none but Leo, or Conſtantine, or their Iſſue, to reign over them. On the morrow then, or Eaſter-Eve, the Emperour aſcended a Throne, raiſed nineteen Cubits high, where firſt he created Nobiliſſimus his Brother Eudoxius; his other Brother, Anthimius, having already received this honour from their Father. Then, with the other Cæſars, three Nobiliſſimi, and young Conſtantine, he went in ſolemn Proceſſion to the great Church, where changing his Habit, as his Predeceſſours were wont to doe, he, with his Son, and the Patriarch, mounted the place proper to ſuch ſolemnities, and the People being let in, laid down their ſubſcribed Papers upon the Holy Table. This done, the Emperour thus addreſſed himſelf to them: Look, my Brethren, I grant your Petition, and give you my Son for your Emperour; ſee you receive him from the Church, and the Hand of Chriſt. They with earneſtneſs replyed, Be thou our Surety, thou Son of God, as from thine Hand we receive our Lord Conſtantine for Emperour, to preſerve him, and, if occaſion require, to die for him. On the day following, which was Eaſter-day, in the fourteenth Indiction, aſſoon as it was well light, the Emperour and Patriarch went into the Hippodrome, where the Patriarch, in the full view of the People, firſt prayed, and then crowned young Conſtantine, which done, both the Emperours returned with the ſame Train and State, together with the two Cæſars, and the other three Nobiliſſimi, to the great Church, not through the Street of Embolum, but by the brazen Gate, and the Church of Catecumenius, with the Sceptres born by the Scholarii before them. After they were paſt, followed Irene the Empreſs, and concluded the ſolemnity.

The manner of his making his Son Conſtantine Emperour.

8. Cal. Maii.

38. This Ceremony happened at the latter end of April, and in May following Nicephorus Cæſar, the Brother of Leo, his Appetite after Sovereignty, it ſeems, being whetted by ſuch a ſight, conſpired againſt the Emperour, and being convicted, was, with his complices, who were beaten publickly and ſhaven, baniſhed to Cherſona.

His Brother Nicephorus baniſhed for a Conſpiracy.

The King of the Bulgari baptized.

Leo dies.

Cherſona. But the contrary Operation had a good Conſcience, and a Senſe of Religion upon Telericus or Follerigus, King of the Bulgari, who came to Conſtantinople, and was baptized, reſolving to change a temporal Crown, for an heavenly Kingdom. Leo received him with wonderfull kindneſs, and having made him a Patritian, gave him in Marriage the Couſin Germane, or Niece of his Wife Irene by her Siſter. This it's probable, the King of the Bulgari did out of choice, and therefore much more deſerved a kind Reception than Tellerigus (ſo Cedrenus calls him) King of the Lombards, who the preceding year, forced thereto it's to be thought by neceſſity, betook himſelf alſo to Leo, and had kind Entertainment. In the third year of this Emperour, an Expedition was made into Germanicia by the Roman Army; where taking Priſoners a great multitude of the Syrian Jacobites: Leo gave them convenient Habitation in Thrace. Nothing more of moment occurs in his Reign; but that being exceedingly inamoured of Gems, he longed to be Maſter of the Crown of Heraclius, which being very Rich, was depoſited and dedicated in the great Church. His longing was ſo violent, that needs he muſt have it, and having taken it out of the Church, he wore it when he went abroad. But on a certain time, when he was returned home, Carbuncles (they tell us) aroſe on his Head, and he was ſeized with a violent Fever, which exacted his Life as the price of his Sacrilege, after he had Reigned five years and ten days.

Irene with her Son Conſtantine Reigns.

39. On the ſixth of the Ides of September, in the fourth Indiction, and the ſeven hundred and eighteenth Year of our Lord; Irene with her young Son Conſtantine, a Boy of about ten years old began her Reign over the Roman Empire. But forty days were hardly paſt, when the Nobility taking diſtaſte at the Sex of Irene and the Youth of Conſtantine, notwithſtanding the Oath made to him and his Father, began to enter into Councils, how to prefer Nicephorus Cæſar to the Throne, which ſhe in time diſcovered, and after they had been beaten with Rods, baniſhed them from the City into ſeveral Iſlands. Awakened by this danger, to prevent the like for the time to come, ſhe cauſed all her Husband's Brothers, as well the Cæſars as the Nobiliſſimi to take Orders, and on Chriſtmas-day to give the Communion to the People; at which time, ſhe and her Son offered again that rich Crown which Leo had taken out of the Church, While ſhe buſied her ſelf thus about ſettling her Family, the Eaſtern Provinces were in danger, which the Arabians upon News of the Emperour's Death, and the hopes of diſorders thereupon to ariſe, had invaded, but ſuch Forces as could be got together were ſent againſt them, and quite expelled them out of the Coaſts. Fortune thus favouring her on all ſides, ſhe thought fit to procure a ſtrong Alliance by the Marriage of her Son, and conſidering all the Princes, her Neighbours thought none ſo fit to have Amity with, as Charles King of the Franks afterward Sirnamed the Great, and Crowned Emperour of the Weſt. She ſent her Ambaſſadours, to deſire his Daughter might be given to Conſtantine, and the offer was ſo well liked as our Greek Hiſtorians write, that Eliſæus an Eunuch, and Notary was left behind; to teach her the Language, and inſtruct her in the Manners and Cuſtoms of the Roman Empire.

Helpidius rebells and is defeated.

The Empire Tributary to the Saracens.

The Sclavini beaten out of Greece.

40. But the proſperity of Irene was interrupted this ſame year, by the Rebellion of Helpidius the Pretour of Sicily, in behalf of the Cæſars, for the reducing of whom a ſtrong Fleet was ſent, under Command of Theodorus the Patritian, who drove him out of the Iſland, and made him fly into Africk: Yet he eſcaped with all his Treaſure, and living ſecurely in that Countrey, was by the Saracens in oppoſition to Conſtantine, owned for the Roman Emperour. They were glad of this opportunity, and having added what Fuell they could to the flame, fell upon the Eaſtern Provinces, which to waſte Madi their Prince, ſent Aaron his youngeſt Son (his eldeſt was Moſes) who managed his Matters with ſuch Induſtry and Conduct, that Irene to preſerve the Empire, beſides many Gifts ſhe ſent made it Tributary to this People; an Annual penſion being to be paid to their Prince. Having thus made what Peace ſhe could with the Saracens, the year following ſhe ſent Stauracius a Patritian, and Logotheta againſt the Sclavini, who had ſeized on Greece and Peloponneſus. He brought them all to obedience, and impoſing on them a Tribute, returned in Triumph with great Booty to Conſtantinople. Not long after, Madi Prince of the Saracens dies, and Moyſes his Son ſucceeds him, but after little more than a year is taken away alſo by Death, and gives place to his Brother Aaron; who being a Man much addicted to Arms, reigned three and twenty years, a moſt deadly Enemy to Chriſtians.

41. Conſtantine the Emperour growing now towards mans Eſtate, had his mind all this while fixed on Rotdindris the Daughter of Charles King of the Franks, and impatient he was to Conſummate the Nuptials. But though the Marriage was agreed agreed on, the Conſummation was deferred for ſeven years, and at length the matter was abſolutely broke off by Irene his Mother. The cauſe the Greek Hiſtorians aſcribe to the Ambition of Irene, who having a great deſire ſtill to continue her Power, feared the Acceſſion of the Friendſhip of Charles might make her Son too conſiderable for her to Govern. Others that have a kindneſs for the Woman, think ſhe took offence at Charles; becauſe he had invaded the Dukedom of Beneventum in Italy, which the Emperours had taken into their Protection, and that inraged at this Action, ſhe both broke the Marriage, and made War upon Charles, wherein ſhe had the worſt; Fortune favouring him in all his Enterprizes. There are others, who out of Reſpect to Charles and his Poſterity, thinking it more Honourable for him to refuſe than be rejected, write that he himſelf broke off the Match, and that thereupon Conſtantine to be revenged, ordered Theodorus a Patritian the Governour of Sicily, and other of his Captains to invade the Borders of Beneventum, which he got into his Power. But the great reaſon of the Breach ſeems to be fetcht from the Inclinations of Irene her ſelf, who had no mind to the Match long before the buſineſs of Beneventum happened, elſe ſhe had time and opportunity enough in ſo many years to have had it accompliſhed, and the great Enmity which upon this occaſion fell out betwixt Mother and Son, ſhew plainly, that he thought her to be principally Guilty, ſhe forces him to renounce the Contract made with Rotdrudris, though exceedingly in Love with her, and to eſpouſe an obſcure Maid, an Armenian by Birth, ſome ſay a Paphlagonian, by Name, Mary, who had nothing in the leaſt to commend her, not to ſay fit her, for the imperial Throne; but that ſhe was Daughter, or ſome ſay Neice to Philaretus, a Man that was very eminent for Acts of Charity.

A Match betwixt Conſtantine and the Daughter of Charles King of the Franks broken off, and why.

Καταλιποῦσα διὰ φόβον ϗ φιλαρχίαν, ἵνα μὴ δύναμιν ὁ ὑἱὸς αὐτῆς περιβάληται τὴν τῶν Φράγγων διὰ τὴν ἀγχιστείαν. Zonaras.

Irene forces her Son to Marry an obſcure Maid.

42. Now, as it ever happens in ſuch Caſes, there are not wanting thoſe, who endeavour on both ſides to widen the Breach, and blow up a little heat of Indignation into a flame of Malice. Her flatterers tell her, the Empire cannot ſubſiſt without her, that it is both indecent and unſafe for her, who had now aquired the Art of Government by long Practice and Experience, to quit and reſign it to a young raw Youth, whoſe Age would brook no other Maximes than what were founded upon Eaſe and Pleaſure. His Attendants impatient of delay, till they could have to doe with Offices and Management of Affairs, put him in mind that he is now about twenty years of Age, which ripeneſs though he pleaded not his Quality, was ſufficient to diſcharge him of the Bonds of Pupillage; and they provoke him to take by force that Inheritance which will not voluntarily be reſigned. Their great Spleen was againſt Stauratius a Patritian, and Logotheta, who Governed all under Irene at his Pleaſure; it was reſolved therefore, that he in the firſt place, ſhould be ſeized and baniſhed the Court, and when he was removed they feared not, but they could have Quarter good enough at the Empreſſes hand. But Stauratius ſounded the depth of their Deſign e'er it was ripe for Execution, and revealing it to Irene, Order was preſently taken with the Conſpiratours; of whom moſt were beaten and ſhaven, and then ſent into Exile. Her Son ſhe chaſtized with her own Hands and Tongue, and conſtraining him to keep within, cauſed the Senate and Souldiers to take an Oath of Fidelity to her ſelf, and not to permit her Son to Reign as long as ſhe lived. This though with great unwillingneſs was ſwallowed by all, but the Armenian Legions, who profeſſed they would adhere to Conſtantine, as they were bound by Duty and Allegiance.

The Souldiers Mutiny, and will have Conſtantine Reign.

43. The report of the Reſolution of theſe Armenian Legions, coming to other Souldiers, who were Quartered at a diſtance had ſuch Effect upon them, notwithſtanding the Oath they had lately taken, that conſulting what to doe they cloſed with them, as having more Equity on their ſide; and coming to a Rendezvous, they all required that Conſtantine might Reign over them. Irene now feared the violence of the multitude, and therefore diſmiſſed her Son out of his honourable Impriſonment, who being received with lucky Acclamations ſet himſelf to recall his Friends out of Baniſhment, to put them into places of Truſt and Profit; and to revenge both his and their Quarrel upon ſuch as had been either Authours, or Inſtruments in their late afflictions. Stauratius and others, being beaten and ſhaven were ſent into Baniſhment. His Mother with great Reſpect he led out of the Palace, and brought her to her own Houſe, which ſhe her ſelf had built in Eleutherium, and where ſhe had laid up a vaſt Treaſure. While theſe diſturbances happen at Court, and ſhake the whole Empire, an horrible Earthquake as it was ſuitable that Nature her ſelf ſhould expreſs the Horrour and Effects of Man's Ambition, made all things quake and totter at Conſtantinople, where the Citizens durſt not ſtay in their Houſes; but pitcht Tents in the Fields, and there continued till the violence was abated.

He depoſeth his Mother.

abated. The Court was alſo diſturbed by a Fire, which burnt to the Ground a very fair Banquetting-Room called Thomaites, with all the Rooms under it, wherein lay the Commentaries upon the whole Scripture, written by St. John Chryſoſtome. The Emperour animated by his Liberty, and the unexpected Injoyment of his Power, will now make War againſt the Bulgari and comes off with the Victory, as writes Cedrenus, though Zonaras ſaith it was a drawn Battel, and with no great harm either done or received, each one retired to his own Place. Not ſatisfied with the Reputation it ſeems that he got by this Expedition, he undertakes another as far as Tarſus againſt the Arabians; wherein one ſays, he took many Priſoners, and another affirms, he returned without any memorable thing performed.

44. But all this while he was not ſo Circumſpect over his Mother and her Party, but that they were very cloſe at work; ſo hard a thing it is for thoſe, who have once taſted of Sovereignty and Dominion, to reliſh any thing of a lower Guſto. Knowing there was no Force now to be uſed, they betake themſelves to Intreats, and ſeek by little and little to ſcrew up Irene into her former place. By Arguments drawn from filial Duty and good Nature, they perſwade him to admit her again into the Court, and to the Title of Empreſs, which the Armenian Souldiers, more ſenſible it ſeems of what would follow than any others, vehemently oppoſed, and deſired, that one Alexius Moſoles might be ſent them, which Conſtantine conſtrued, as he had ſome reaſon, as if they would rather promote him to the Empire, than bear the Domination of a Woman, and therefore he cauſed Alexius to be beaten and ſhaven, and committed him to his Cuſtody. Having ſtrengthened himſelf, as he thought, by the Conjunction of his Mother, he betakes himſelf again to Arms, and will needs fall upon the Bulgari, being by ſome falſe Prophets incouraged with a Promiſe of certain Victory. This ſo far puffed him up, that he neglected his buſineſs, as thinking it a thing needleſs to be ſolicitous for that which of it's own accord would fall into his hands; and therefore in this ſecurity as he lay, the Bulgari took their advantages, and gave him a very notable defeat. Beſides a great number of private Souldiers, many conſiderable Officers, and the chief Men of the Empire loſt their Lives, with Pancratius the Aſtronomer, who by his lying Prophecies had given the occaſion of the overthrow. Conſtantine having nothing left to clog him, for both Army and Baggage, and all was loſt, fled with all ſpeed; but brought Infamy enough with him to Conſtantinople.

Receives her again to Court.

He is defeated by the Bulgari.

45. This defeat opened the Mouths of his Adverſaries and Emulatours, who were not wanting to deſcant upon each particular, and more than call his Prudence and Conduct into Queſtion. He himſelf was Conſcious of his Errour; and Conſequently Jealous, that no better an Interpretation was made of it than it deſerved, which Humour thoſe that were near him, indulged with little ſtories put into his Head, and great Dangers ſuggeſted to him, which filled him with ſuch Conceits as were not to be removed without ſome extravagant Diverſion. It was told him, that the Souldiers now lying in Town, had a deſign to promote Nicephorus his Uncle to his place, which report ſo diſordered him, that he cauſed not onely his Eyes to be put out; but thoſe of Chriſtopher alſo his other Uncle, and cuts out the Tongues of another Chriſtopher, Nicetas, Anthimus and Eudocimus; his Mother, and Stauratius, finding him in this Humour, ſtrike in, and perſwade him to put out the Eyes alſo of Alexius, whom the Armenian Legions had demanded to be ſent them at ſuch a time, as they proteſted againſt her Reſtitution; telling him, that in Caſe he were ſpared, the Souldiers would infallibly make him Emperour. But when the Armenian Souldiers received the News, they preſently fell into a Mutiny, and committed to Cuſtody, Camilianus their Captain. The Emperour diſpatches away againſt them Conſtantianus Artaſeras, and Chryſochires with a ſtrong party, but they had the miſ-fortune to come by the worſt, and being taken Priſoners had their Eyes put out. Conſtantine therefore marches againſt them himſelf, and with better Succeſs. He utterly defeats them in Battel, and getting them all into his Power, the Officers he puts to Death, deprives the reſt of their Eſtates, and a thouſand of the ordinary ſort he cauſeth to be led in Chains to Conſtantinople, where they had theſe words, An Armenian Traitour, ſtamped with Ink upon their Faces, and then were diſperſed in Sicily and other Iſlands.

He is Jealous of his kindred.

46. This ſucceeded to the good liking of Irene, who all this while ſeeming to ſatisfie her ſelf with the Title without the Power; yet caſt in her Head, how ſhe might again be Miſtreſs of both. Her great Adverſaries the Armenian Legions were now made an end of, yet to attempt any thing againſt the Perſon of her Son, was not altogether ſafe, beſides unnatural; but ſhe rejoyced in his misfortunes, and comforted her ſelf in his want of Reputation, which that he might loſe ſtill more and more, ſhe was reſolved nothing ſhould be wanting on her part, and ſhe hoped to puſh him on to ſuch actions, as ſhould render him odious, and ſo make a kind of neceſſity of returning the Government into her own Hands. Knowing that he had no fancy for his Wife Mary, to which he had been preferred by her worthy care and foreſight, ſhe perſwaded him to ſhave her, and put her into a Monaſtery, which done, ſhe finds out for him another honourable Match Theodota one of the Maids of her Chamber, which Damoſel is crowned with the Imperial Diadem, and the Wedding kept with great pomp for four days together in the Palace of St. Mamas. This unequal Marriage made much for her Deſign, and ſhe improved the advantage to the utmoſt, for great contentions falling out amongſt Churchmen concerning the Lawfulneſs, or unlawfulneſs of the Match, ſhe ſtill ſided with ſuch as ſpake againſt her Son, and promoted their intereſt all ways poſſible, though ſecretly and as much in the dark as ſhe could. But ſome other things happened, which ſeemed to thwart all her purpoſes by recovering the Reputation of her Son. For, renewing his Wars with the Arabians he had good ſucceſs, as alſo againſt Cardamus or Cardames the Prince of the Bulgari, who ſending to him to demand Tribute, and threatning if he had it not, to come to fetch it as far as the Golden Gate of Conſtantinople, he ſent him ſome Horſe-Dung for Tribute, and withall this word, that ſeeing he was an old Man, he would not have him take the pains, nor undergo the labour of ſo great a Journey, but he himſelf would come and wait upon him. And gathering together a conſiderable Army he went, but the Barbarian, when the Armies came in ſight of each other, in a kind of a pannick fear fled away.

He is ſucceſsfull againſt Barbarians.

47. In the ſeventh year of his Reign, (when he Reigned alone,) he waited on his Mother to the Baths of Pruſa, and in the following month or October, news was brought him that he had a Son born, whom afterward he named Leo, Overjoyed at the news, he left his Mother and departed ſpeedily to Conſtantinople, giving a fair opportunity to her, to Caball with the Officers of the Army, and what by gifts and vaſt promiſes ſhe ſo improved it, that they promiſed to depoſe her Son that ſhe might Reign alone, and that they would watch for a convenient opportunity to effect it. While ſhe and they gaped after this deſired time, the Emperour reſolves to undertake another expedition againſt the Arabians, and with twenty thouſand men accompanied with Stauracius, and other Creatures of his Mother in the month of March he begins his Journey. Stauracius and thoſe with him perceiving both him and the Souldiers, to be full of hopes and courage were very thoughtfull leſt he ſhould return Victorious, and their Plot ſhould not take, they therefore procure the Scouts to report that the Saracens were fled, and that it was no purpoſe to proceed. Conſtantine fruſtrated as he thought of a glorious Victory, in much diſcontent returns to the City, and on the firſt of May Leo his young Son Dies, which overwhelmes him with exceſſive grief. In the middle of July thoſe of the Conſpiracy attempted to ſeize on him, which he having diſcovered endeavoured to make his eſcape, but his Mother ſo quickned them by her Letters, threatning that if they did not ſpeedily put a concluſion to the buſineſs, ſhe would reveal the whole matter, that fearing both her and the People, which flocked ſo to him that they were all afraid, and ſhe thought once of ſending ſome Biſhops to perſwade him to retire to a private Life, they laid hands on him and conveyed him to Chelandium. On the Saturday morning they brought him to Conſtantinople, and there ſhut him up in the Houſe called Porphyra where he was Born, and about three a Clock in the Afternoon, moſt wickedly and cruelly though by his Mothers orders, digged his Eyes out of his Head, even in ſuch a manner that Death preſently followed, after he had Reigned ſeven years by himſelf, and ten together with his unnatural Mother. Upon this blinding and Murther of the Emperour, the Sun was darkned for ſeventeen days, ſo exceedingly, that the Ships at Sea loſt their courſe, and all men affirmed that becauſe Conſtantine had loſt his ſight, the Sun was alſo hoodwincked, and for this very reaſon withdrew his beams.

He blinded and killed by order of his unnatural Mother.

48. But Irene little concerned it ſeems for ſuch a Prodigy being now rid of her Son, thought ſhe could not yet be very ſecure becauſe of her Husband's Brothers, who had taken Sanctuary in the Great Church at the perſwaſion of ſome of their Wellwillers. She ſent them therefore down to Athens, where having entertained ſome Councils tending to the depoſing of the Empreſs, and advancement of their own Fortune, they were killed as it's ſaid by the Inhabitants, and ſo the Race of Copronymus was totally extinguiſhed, ſhe, to ſhew what manner of Perſon now ſhe is, is drawn into the City by four Horſes in a gilt Chariot which is ſtaid by the hands of Patritians, and ſhe caſts money amongſt the People, as was uſual at a ſolemn Coronation. But what joy ſoever was at Conſtantinople upon this occaſion, there was ſadneſs enough in the Eaſtern Provinces, which the Saracens now invaded under Conduct of Habdimelech, who refuſed to grant any Peace at the deſire of Irene, and as confident to overpower a Woman, marched up through all the Countries as far as Conſtantinople it ſelf, the Suburbs of which they Plundered, and having ranged the Countrey without Controll, at length departed home. They were no ſooner gone, but another danger hung over the Head of Irene, and ſo much greater as a ſecret Traitour is more dangerous than a known and open Enemy. And who ſhould this be but Stauracius himſelf, who in all his Councils for feeding the Ambition of this Woman, had an Eye it ſeems to his own advancement. What Service ſoever he had formerly done her, he now went about to render it all fruitleſs, conſpiring to take the Diadem from her Head to ſet it upon his own, but he was timely diſcovered. She having a regard (it's probable) to his former kindneſſes, (though ſuch an act as this uſually obliterates the greateſt impreſſions of that kind,) onely forbids all men to keep him Company, after which oppreſſed with ſorrow, either for his Fault or for his Puniſhment, he falls into a bleeding from the Lungs, and ſo ends his days, his Ambition and Sorrow altogether.

The Saracens rove as far as Conſtantinople.

Stauracius purpoſes to Uſurp, and Dies.

49. Irene perceiving that thoſe ſhe moſt truſted, had more reſpect to their own advancement, than the ſecurity of her Eſtate, and therefore that ſhe ſtood in a ticklish condition, thought it beſt for her to oblige the People. In her fourth year, ſhe remitted the Tribute wont to be paid by thoſe of Conſtantinople, and promoted the Commerce of Abydus and Hierum by all means poſſible. This had the wiſhed effect, for it procured her the hearts of the Multitude. But it could not procure her the fidelity of her Servants, who all this while had wrought their own ends by her, and made her Service onely an advantage for their future preferment. One Ætius an Eunuch ruled all in the Palace, and being by his Commands over the Eaſtern Provinces exceedingly inriched, deſpiſed all the ancient Nobility, carrying himſelf very ſawcily toward them, and thought of no leſs than promoting to the Empire his Brother Leo, for whom he had with much labour, procured the Government of Thrace and Macedonia. The Nobility ſmelt out his deſign, and reſolving to oppoſe it whatever ſhould happen, conſulted how to make Emperour one Nicephorus the General Logotheta. Getting their Company together, they went to the great Palace, and there telling the Guards, that it was the pleaſure of Irene her ſelf that Nicephorus ſhould be Emperour on purpoſe to obviate the deſigns of Ætius, eaſily got admittance, and ſending their Emiſſaries about the City before Midnight, prepared the People for what they meant to act the day following. When it was day, they clapped up Irene cloſe Priſoner in the Palace, and then went and Crowned their new Emperour in the Great Church, having neither Acclamations nor good wiſhes, but Curſes and reproachfull Language from the People. Thus was Irene dealt with after a Reign of five years, though not in ſo ſevere a manner as ſhe treated her Son, for ſhe was but ſhut up in a Monaſtery of her own Building. But a circumſtance there was which made the affliction much more grievous. She was juſt now courted by Charles King of the Franks, who had lately aſſumed the Title of Roman Emperour, and deſired by him in Marriage, that the Eaſt and Weſt might in their two Perſons be again happily united. She her ſelf was not averſe; but Ætius the Eunuch hindred the concluſion of the treaty, by rubs continually laid in the way, driving that Trade we lately mentioned for his Brother; and then in the mean time happens the Conſpiracy of the Nobility, for Nicephorus and his Promotion. The Ambaſſadours of Charles were ſtill in Town, and were Eye witneſſes of this ſudden Revolution.

Irene indeavours to get the love of the People.

The Nobility perceiving a deſign of Ætius,

The depoſe Irene and make Emperour Nicephorus the General Logotheta.

AN INSTITUTION
OF General Hiſtory:
OR
The Hiſtory of the World.

BOOK II.

Of the Kingdom of the Franks in Gall, (formerly one of the Roman Provinces) Contemporary with the Conſtantinopolitan Roman Empire.

CHAP. V.

The Original of the Franks, their Seats, Kings and Exploits, before their coming into Gall.

SECT. I.

Sect. I.

1. GReat things which proceed from ſmall and contemptible Principles when they have once arrived at their Grandeur are apt to deſpiſe their Originalls, and to gain greater Reputation from ſuperſtitious Minds, ſeek after ſuch Heralds as can draw them ſpecious, though falſe, Pedegrees. Such as of old time amongſt the Heathens arrived at more than ordinary Power, Knowledge or Dexterity, in any reſpect, muſt needs be derived from the Gods themſelves; ſuch Nations as have had a more modern beginning, or the Original of whom is unknown, by reaſon of later Diſcoveries, have been more than ordinarily ambitious to derive their deſcent from the ſo much famed Trojans. The flattering Heralds are the Poets who have thus blazoned the Coats of Romans, Veneti, Britains, and others. And in later times the Franks have by their flatteries been advanced to the ſame degree of Honour.

The Original of the Franks, and whence ſo called.

2. By theſe Impoſtours they are derived, both as to Original and Name, from one Francion, a ſuppoſed Son of Hector, to doe them Honour. But John Tilius rejects both the Project and the Reaſon thereof, affirming, that ſuch as fetch their Original out of Germany, do really, and in truth, contribute more to their Reputation

Comment. & Diſquiſ. de Rebus Gallicis, lib. 1. ad initium.

Sect. 1. tion than thoſe who make them deſcendants of the Trojans. That Countrey having in many reſpects been more renowned, and deſerving more praiſe for oppoſing ſo long a time the warlike Romans, and for giving the Mate to that capacious and dreadfull Eagle, than that famed City, for being overcome by ſuch weak Oppoſers. At this day Learning is more prevalent than to ſuffer ſuch Dreams to paſs without contradiction, and therefore all knowing Men now joyn with Tilius, in the renunciation of that Title. Yet is there great difference in opinions touching the reaſon of the Name, and the Original of theſe Franks. Some (beſides what we have ſaid of that fabulous Francion) derive the Name from Francus their firſt King, who reigned many Years before the Birth of Chriſt. Others, and thoſe not a few, will have them named Franks in the Attick Tongue, by Valentinian the Emperour, from their Courage and Ferocity; ſome modern Writers held, that the Name was framed upon occaſion, at what time ſuch amongſt them, as proteſted themſelves their Leaders and Abetters, in recovering their Liberty, named themſelves Franks, by which word the Germans in their Language, underſtand ſuch as are free, and void of ſervitude. Hotoman, in his Franco Gallia, takes pains by inſtances to make this good; and Matharell, in his Anſwer to that Book, (which he terms no better than a ſcandalous Libel) doth aſſent to it; and long before them Aventine was of the ſame Opinion, deducing the Name from the ſame, as Frankheyt and Freydome in the Teutonick Language, which Sirname is yet given to the Francones, being vulgarly called De Freye Francken, or in Engliſh the free Franks.

Hunibaldus.

Ado. Viennenſis, Archiep. Gregor. Turonen. Abbas Urſpurgenſis, Sigibertus, Godofredus, Uterbienſ.

3. But as the Story of Francion, the Son of Hector, hath no other foundation than that of Lyes and Fables, ſo that of Valentinian hath as weak an Argument to ſupport it; for, to ſay nothing of the Etymology of the word, this People had not onely the Name of Franks, but as ſuch were very famous, even in Roman Writers, before the time of Valentinian. Againſt the Opinion of Hotoman, and his Fellows, Joannes Iſacius Pontanus, a late moſt learned Critick, oppoſeth, that Frank ſignifieth free, no more than anciently Cretian ſignified a Lyar, Sybarite denoteth a voluptuous Perſon, Cimber a Thief, to which we may add Lydian, by which word was ſometimes ſignified a Man very effeminate. For the Franks being thoſe who principally above the reſt of their Countreymen, contended for Liberty againſt the Roman Encroachments, thence came their Name to be uſed in this ſignification, eſpecially amongſt the Galls; and indeed what Aventine cites in behalf of his own opinion, doth really make againſt it, Frank ſignifying free, in caſe that the word Freye was added to it, in which ſenſe they ſay at this day the Vry Freiſen, or the free Friſians, whereas if any one ſhould term them Francke Freiſen, or Frank Friſians, it would quickly be ſeen, that the word Frank, in that idiome, hath not the ſame force and ſignification of that of free, and conſequently apprehend a great difference betwixt them. Neither doth Procopius, as he is made to ſpeak by Hotoman, ſay that the Franks were firſt called Germans, and then called Franks, after they had paſſed beyond the Limits of their own Countrey. For he plainly writes that he would explain firſt how they got this Name, and then how afterwards they invaded Gall. And his miſtake of Tacitus is as great, in thinking that he makes the Franks part of the Carnifates, for they lived behind the Rhine, in the Continent of Germany, but theſe on this ſide this River, within the Limit of the Roman Empire, or rather, as Pliny hath it, inhabited within the River Rhine it ſelf.

Origin. Francorum, lib. 3. c. 1. p. 179.

Lib. 4.

4. Some will have this People called Franks, as frey on cy, or free from Tribute, ſignified by the word cy, or Franſi, that is Fry Anſi, which later word, in the Gothick Idiome, denotes thoſe who excell other Men in Fortune and Wealth, in reſpect whereof Hanſi and Anſi are the Appellations of the greater ſort of Nobility onely. But cy ought to be writ Cyus, and is not of Teutonick but Latine Original, being derived from Cenſus. And in writing the word Franſi, violence is offered to the word, the latter ſyllable whereof ought to be ſpelled ci, and not ſi. That Opinion of Goropius Becanus, that they were called Franks, as Verranken, or Vryranken, from the Palm-trees, which largely extended themſelves; and that of Lazius, from the Fraca of the Hebrews ſeem too light and ſporting to be ſeriouſly confuted. There have not been wanting who derive the word from Freyancke, which they interpret free Servants in the Teutonick. But no opinion is ſo ridiculous as that of Turpin, a Monk, little more elegant in his Writing than his Name, who, in the Life of Charles the Great, delivers it for truth, that he who firſt contributed money to the building of the Church of St. Denis, had the name of Francke, as if the name had been formerly unknown, and came firſt into uſe in the days of that Emperour. Amongſt all theſe Opinions Pontanus interpoſeth his, which he thinketh moſt congruous to the nature of the thing, as well as the ancient ſignification of the Adrianus Junius Hornanus, cap. 9. Bat. p. 73.

Etymolog. German. Althameii Tacito ſubjectis.

the word. His opinion is that they were called Franks, from a certain Weapon they uſed, which hath the name of Franceſca in ſeveral Authours. From Gregory Turonenſis it appears, that this Weapon was wont to be worn as well by Kings as common and ordinary Souldiers. This being more truly writ and pronounced Franca or Franga, might by writers not acquainted with the Language, and by other Foreigners be termed Franceſca, and by Tacitus corrupted into Framea, which in this Authour appears to have been a ſort of Weapon peculiar to the Germans, and more than that, an Enſign of Reſpect and honour. None might bear Arms till approved by the City wherein they Dwelt. Then in the aſſembly, either the Prince, the Father, or ſome other relations of the party adorned the young man with a Target, and this Framea, which was the ſame with them, as the Gown amongſt the Romans, and the firſt ſtep to Honour. Now if it be natural that the ſame way things are conſtituted, in the ſame they be diſſolved, as taking off Enſigns of Degree and Order, hath ever been uſed for Degradation, as well as putting them on for Creation, or (as the word explains it ſelf) Inveſtiture, then by comparing this manner of Promotion or Creation of Souldiers mentioned by Tacitus, viz. by adorning them with this Framea, with what Gregory Turonenſis mentions of King Clodonæus his Exauctorizing or caſheiring a certain Souldier, by cauſing him to caſt away his Franceſca, we may Judge them the ſame kind of Weapon, and to have been in great uſe and repute, and that for a long time amongſt the Saxons. It was a ſort of Spear or Javelin, whereof the Iron was ſhort and narrow, but ſo ſharp and convenient, that they could either fight therewith Cominus at hand-ſtrokes, or Eminus after the manner of miſſive Weapons, far off and at a diſtance.

Lib. de moribus German.

5. It is certain that ſeveral other Authours, (as Procopius and Agathias as well as others,) make mention though not by the ſame name, of ſuch a ſort of Weapon amongſt the Franks, and this is to be ſaid in behalf of Pontanus his opinion, that theſe Franks might as well receive a name from a certain Spear or Javelin, as the Saxons their Countreymen from a Skeene or Scimiter, which they called Saxe in their Language, for that the Saxons were thence ſo called is more probable, being the judgment of moſt Learned men, than what he inſtanceth in the Quirites of Rome, and the Gæſatæ amongſt the Galls, whereof the former he would have ſo named from Quiri a Spear, and the latter from Geſis another ſort of Weapon, theſe Etymologies which we have formerly in their due places given of each, ſeeming altogether as proper both as to name and matter. The formation of the word Franceſca, he rightly judgeth as eaſie and natural as thoſe of Daciſcus from Dacus, and Syriſcus from Syrus. The Weapon he thinketh might have the name from Frey and Ainke, Frey being Free, and Ancken, as Kikanus tells us, in the old Netherland Dutch, to run in or faſten in, ſignifying the commodiouſneſs of Fighting, either Cominus or Eminus with this Inſtrument. But why may it not be objected out of Iſidore, that the Franks were not ſo named from this Franceſca, but this Franceſca from the Franks? Doth not Franceſca ſeem rather Relative to, and Derivative from Francus, than Francus a more ſimple word be derived from Franceſca? The word ſeems to father it ſelf, were it not as eaſie to ſay a Frank blade, or Franceſca Framea, (if we amongſt others may lawfully ſpend our Verdict, the adjective Franceſca having a relation to ſome other word,) as we ſay in Engliſh, a Bilboa Blade, or a Sheffield or London Blade, or for ſhortneſs, this is a Bilboa, &c. The Inſtrument receiving it's name from the Place and People, not the People from the Weapon. Neither doth Pontanus his reply at all weaken the objection, viz. That the Saxons themſelves called the Weapon by the ſame name. Why not for diſtinction ſake? Would an Inhabitant or Artiſt in any of thoſe places formerly mentioned, diſdain to call the Swords or Knives there made by their proper names? No diſgrace is it for a People to own by the mark of its own name, any thing which is the product of its own Induſtry and Ingenuity. But on the contrary we may ſhew Pontanus, that Nations have been ſhie, though not to give, yet to take a name from ſome ſuch accidental thing, ſome inconſiderable Adjunct or other which their Neighbours diſcovering in them and diſtinguiſhing them moſt by, (as that which appeared to them moſt remarkable,) did thence at firſt denominate them. We can eaſily inſtance in thoſe which call not themſelves by that name whereby their Neighbours know them, which yet the Franks never diſowned.

6. To conclude this conteſt about Names, the matter is very much in the dark, and not to be clearly diſcovered by any light we have from Antiquity. Yet what Pontanus brings in confirmation of his own opinion, rather makes us eſteem and approve than reject, and condemn that of Hotoman and his followers. The inſtance he maketh in the Cretians and Sibarites concludeth nothing, for as things in their caſe have been denominated from perſons, (as Drunkenneſs and Lying,) yet it is certain that elſewhere perſons have been alſo denominated from things, as is clear in the caſe of Names and Sirnames, where Sonſhip or Relation is not expreſſed to all who are skilled in ancient Etymologies. If the name of Proteſtant from one ſingle act of Proteſtation hath been given ſo many Profeſſours of Religion, though of ſeveral Nations, and not altogether of the ſame Judgment, becauſe the nature and remarkableneſs of time and affairs was ſuch, as made it ſtick where once it faſtened, and a convenience of diſtinction abſolutely confirmed it; Can we doubt but upon ſuch an occaſion as fighting for Liberty, oppoſing and invading Enemies, a profeſſion of publick concernment and proteſtation againſt the ſecurity and lazineſs of others, might well leave a note upon the agents, and a mark and name upon ſuch as headed an aſſociation for the preſervation of Laws, Rights and Liberty? Eſpecially amongſt a numerous people, ſuch as theſe Northern Nations were, and that rather than a ſort of Spear or other Weapon. His objection that Francke without Free, doth not at this day ſignifie Free, is too weak to conclude that it never did ſo, although in Engliſh it ſelf, that ſenſe and ſignification in ſome caſes ſtill remains. Although Procopius his meaning may be that they were called Franks before they paſſed out of their own Countrey, it concludeth not but there by their profeſſion and indeavours to oppoſe the Incroachments of the Romans, a ſufficient occaſion might be had to raiſe this Name. And whether they were part of the Carinſates or not, it's not very material to the main Queſtion. Let us therefore paſs on from the Name to the thing, and ſee if we can more clearly make out the perſons and places of theſe Franks.

7. Although as we ſaid before, the palate of this age be too quick and ſenſible to reliſh, and approve the inſulſe and obſolete Trojan Title. Yet it will not be amiſs to give the Reader a taſte of it, both for that to recite will be to confute it, and he may judge what guſt they had, who in former times have liked and approved it. The Original of the Nation of the Franks, ſaith Abbas Vrſpurgenſis, is to be fetched from the ancient Stock of the Trojans. For at ſuch time as after the Deſtruction of Troy, Æneas came into Italy, ſome of the ſaid Trojan Exiles in like manner arrived at the Mariſhes of Mæotis, which chuſing for their Seats, they inlarged their Bounds as far as Pannonia. They Built the City Sicambria, and there inhabiting very many years, grew into a great Nation and were firſt of all called Sicambri, for driving away the Alani from the Fenns of Mæotis, Valentinian gave them the name of Franks with remiſſion of Tribute for ten years. Theſe ten years ended, he ſent a certain Captain to them to raiſe Tribute, but they being of a fierce Nature, diſdained to be any longer ſubject to Tribute and ſlew the Meſſengers. Then Reigned amongſt them two who bore the ancient names of Priamus and Antenor. The Emperour being acquainted with their Faction, and too much incenſed, commanded all the Roman Forces, with many Exteriour Nations to fight againſt them. In the Battel, after many had faln on both ſides, the Franks at length overpowered in numbers were put to flight, and there was ſlain Priamus their King; departing from Sicambria they came into the Countrey of Germany, to a Nation the moſt inveterate againſt the Romans, and inhabited ſometimes in Thuringia with Marcomicus the Son of Priamus, and Sunno the Son of Antenor. The ſame Story is related by Aimonius, Ado Archbiſhop of Vienna, Gaguinus and Æneas Sylvius, onely Sylvius mentions Francion for their Leader to the Fenns of Mæotis, and whereas he and Vrſpurgenſis ſay they came thence into Thuringia and Franconia; Ado brings them into the uttermoſt parts of the Rhine.

Their Original from the Trojans how.

8. A ſtory moſt a-kin of all others, to the Britiſh Romance of our Geoffrey of Monmouth. If Æneas and Antenor ſecured themſelves, and got ſafe from the Deſtruction of Troy. What Poet, not to ſay what Hiſtorian mentioneth any other? Who ever made mention of any ſuch Son of Hector, or any other beſides Aſtyanax or Scamander and Laomedon? What Geographer ever found out ſuch a City as Sicambria in the Fenns of Mæotis, or Hiſtorian met with their paſſage from Troy into that Countrey? The ſtory of Valentinian his treating of them, and their removal into the inner parts of Germany, is as true as that he firſt gave them the name of Franks, and ſuch a fardle of lies as none converſant in the Hiſtories of thoſe times can bear. Not one Authour or teſtimony can they produce for ſuch an affirmation, but violate all order of times, making them ſo named firſt by Valentinian, and to have firſt paſſed into Germany in his time, whereas we can ſhew their name was known above one hundred and ſixty years before, and they inhabited toward the lower parts of the Rhine, below Colein in the days of Galienus the Emperour. In the time of this Valentinian, who began his Reign about the year of our Lord four hundred and twenty. The Alani whom the Franks are ſaid to have Expelled, lived not near the Marſhes of Mæotis, but in the inner parts of Germany. In the Chronicon of Proſper publiſhed by Pithæus, we meet indeed with one Priamus, but this is no other than Priamis mentioned by Ammianus Marcellinus as we ſhall ſee hereafter. And whatſoever ſome produce concerning the Ruines of a City Sicambria near Buda, can alledge no greater Antiquity than the days of Tiberius Cæſar, during whoſe Reign Sabinus Poppæus making War againſt the Thracians, was aſſiſted by the Cohorts Sicambrica as they ſeem to have read it, whereas Tacitus from a miſunderſtanding and wreſting, of whom this fable is thought to be raiſed, calls it Cohors Sugambra which can make nothing for their purpoſe.

Annal. lib. 4.

9. The opinion of Johannes Goropius Becanus is half as extravagant, who denying them to be the Poſterity of the Trojans, or to have travelled from that Countrey, yet maketh them Originally of the Fenns of Mæotis, and thinks them the ſame that Herodotus mentions by the name of Free Schytæ. This his opinion he frames upon no argument, but a very weak conjecture of their free and large Extention, and propagation of themſelves after the manner of Vines, upon which idle conceit he derives their name from Vercaucken or Vryancken. As to the time and way of their March and Travel from the Marſhes of Mæotis, he neither produceth any thing out of Antiquity, nor pretendeth any knowledge thereof, confeſſing his ignorance, and therefore as an idle fancy, his conceit is to be exploded. John Bodin a very Learned Frenchman, but one who careth as little to make falſe Flouriſhes, and uſe adulterate Colours, to ſet off the luſtre of his own, as to caſt Dirt upon other Nations, denieth the Franks to have been the off-ſpring of the Trojans. And yet by ſtrange ambages and wreſted methods in concluſion derives them from that Original. That he may elude the teſtimony of Tacitus, who affirms the Germans to have been Indigenæ, and leaſt of all others mixed by the Inrodes of other Nations, he makes a retreat and fetcheth all ſorts of people from the Caldæans, in the Countrey of whom or near unto it, he ſuppoſeth the Ark of Noah to have reſted. Betaking himſelf to Moſes and the Rabbins, he layeth it down for granted, that the moſt fertile Countries were firſt inhabited, whence after mankind increaſed, Colonies were afterwards ſent into more waſte and barren places. Hence he gathereth that Aſia and Greece were firſt peopled e'er the Northern places were repleniſhed with Inhabitants; and thence concludeth, that the Galls received their Original from the Greeks and Trojans, and thoſe ſame Galls overpowred in proceſs of time with multitudes, and ſtraitned by the narrowneſs of their Countrey, ſent Colonies into Germany beyond the Rhine, from which Colonies being Inhabitants of Franconia Orientalis and Neighbouring unto Gall, he will have his Franks to have iſſued, and afterwards Conquered their ancient Countrey. And he takes that Franconia Orientalis beyond the Rhine for part (at leaſt,) of thoſe moſt fertile places of Germany whereof Cæſar ſpeaks, occupied by Colonies of the Galls about the Hercinian Wood.

Their Seats where.

Method. Hiſto.

De bello Gallico, lib. 6.

10. Cæſar indeed hath ſuch a paſſage, concerning the Galls ſending Colonies into Germany, but ſo far from aſſerting that this was done into void places, that he expreſly ſaith that they had Wars with the Inhabitants, and that the Volcæ Tectoſages ſeized upon thoſe moſt fertile places, which indeed leaſt of all could want poſſeſſours. It's a pretty ſhift in a controverſie, to flie to the firſt Planters and Inhabitants of the World, in whom all Nations muſt needs be United. But why doth Bodin bring his Franks from the Trojans, having firſt denied that they proceeded from them? Will any one if he doth it, imagine that Germany and Gall were not Planted and Inhabited before the time of the Trojans? Were not the Sandy and hot places of Africk and Arabia inhabited by Cain's Poſterity, as ſoon as the more fruitfull Countries of Aſia and Europe? If we granted as we readily ſhall, that the Galls ſent Colonies into Germany, certainly he ſhall not conſtrain us to admit, that therefore the Germans were the Poſterity of the Galls, more than the Italians, Grecians, and Aſiaticks into the Countries of whom we reade that they ſent out alſo many Colonies. But what truſt is there to be given to Bodin, or what ſhall we think of his Cauſe, which muſt ſtand in need of not onely true but falſe and feigned Stories to maintain it? He cannot be content with a few Exemples which Cæſar and Tacitus ſupply him with, but muſt draw in Polybius to his Party, and make his Noble Authour ſpeak that which he never ſaid nor meant. Citing a paſſage out of the third Book of his Hiſtories, that the Boii, Eganes, Senones, and Avanes paſſed over out of Gall into Germany, whereas it is moſt certain from the ſame Authour, that their removal was not into Germany but Italy, and as for both Germany and the Rhine, they were utterly unknown to Polybius. His fancy that Ger- many was peopled from Gall, is not framed upon any Authority. It's probable they might both be inhabited by the ſame People, being both known by the name of Celtæ of old, and if Strabo be credited, the Germans being ſo called by the Romans, becauſe they ſeemed the Germaine or true Brethren of the Galls. Certainly it is agreed on by moſt, that their Languages were Originally the ſame as in due place may be diſcovered.

Fuit tempus cum Germanos Galli virtute ſuperarent ultro bella inferrent ac propter hominum multitudinem agrique inopiam trans Rhenum copias mitterent, itaque eaquæ fertiliſſima ſunt Germaniæ loca circum Hirciniam ſylvam quam Eratoſtheni & quibuſdam Græcis notam eſſe video quam illi Ercineam appellant Volcæ Tectoſages occuparunt, atque ibi conſederunt inter Apeninum & Padum primo Avanes poſt Boii inde Eganes poſt Remoſenones juxta Adriaticum mare extremi Gallorum omnium incoluerunt, lib. 2.

11. But the Gallick Language was not the ſame with the Greek, if we may believe Varro, the moſt learned both of Greeks and Romans who affirm, that the Maſſilienſes or Inhabitants of Marſeilles in Provence ſpeak three Languages, Greek, Latin, and the Gallick conſiſting of, or bordering on, ſo many Nations. For firſt Colonies of the Phocenſes were thither ſent out of Greece, then afterwards was a Colony from Rome there placed, and the Galls if not mixed with them, yet were their next Neighbours, which vicinity and a conſequent entercourſe muſt needs teach them the Gallick Tongue. But Bodin in deriving the Franks from the Galls, and bringing them out of Franconia where he will have the Tectoſages to have taken up their Seats, is out both in his Geography and Chronology, for they firſt Inhabited about the lower parts of the Rhine, lower than the Colonie of the Ubii, where Cæſar and Ptolemy both place the Sicambri, then afterwards after many attempts Wars and alterations, having brought under all betwixt the Rhine and the Meuſe with thoſe about Strasbourg, the Vangiones and Nemetos, they invaded Thuringia and Franconia, called afterwards Oriental or Eaſtern in relation to the Weſtern, which at this day is called France, whither as well as to other places they extended their Victorious Arms. Seeing therefore that before the very name of the Eaſtern Franconia was heard of, the name and people of the Franks inhabiting their moſt ancient Seats were very well known to the Romans, it ill becomes one who pretends to write a method and direction to others ſo far to forget himſelf, and to confound times in ſuch a manner, either through ignorance, or more probable wilfulneſs. As for his Tectoſages, it cannot be at all probable that they ſhould doe ſuch Exploits in the World, whom Cæſar witneſſeth in his time to have been content with the poſſeſſions they had already gotten; whereas the Sicambri, Suevi, and others were formidable to all, both Romans and their Neighbours. Beatus Rhenanus his Opinion is rather to be admitted, who thinks they were ſeated upon the River Nicer, where as yet remains an old Caſtle called Teck, retaining the firſt Syllable of the Name, that People which ſome rationally Conjecture was the Remnants of thoſe Galls; who pierced into Greece and Bithynia, called by Stephanus Toliſtobogi, who are ſometimes confounded with the Tectoſages. In Concluſion, for what Bodin brings us out of Ammianus and Cæſar, we may repay him with Intereſt out of the ſame Authours, who tell us, that the Galls were partly Indigenæ, and partly came out of Germany from beyond the Rhine; either driven by War, or forced from their Seats by the Incroachments of a troubleſome Sea.

Vid. Pontani Origin. Franc. lib. 2. c. 6.

Florus, l. 2. c. 11. Plin. l. 5. c. 32.

Cæſ. Bell. Gall. lib. 2. Ammia. lib. 15.

Braſidæ memorant Gallos fuiſſe populi partem Indigenam ſed alios quoque ab inſulis confluxiſſe & tractibus trans Rhenanis, &c.

12. As this Frenchman out of his inclination to his own Countrey, makes Authours and Books ſpeak that they never intended, ſo moſt German Writers out of the ſame Propenſion, will needs have Franconia the moſt ancient Seat of the Franks; and ſome of them for that purpoſe, make nothing of wreſting a place of Strabo, where Βελγικῶν lying betwixt Norici and Vindelici, they will needs conſtrain to ſignifie Franks. But for Βελγικῶν, in that place they ought to reade Βρέννων, as more agreeable to certain places in Horace and Pliny, and it's evident from Florus, that both the Norici and Brenni were People living about the Alpes, and ſo nothing a-kin to the Franks. Neither can Melancthon and Pencer, poſſibly gather from thoſe words of Strabo, that the Brenni inhabited betwixt the Norici and Vindelici, his words being theſe; The Vindelici and Norici poſſeſs the exteriour Mountainous places for the moſt part, with the Brenni and Genanni, who now belong to the Illyrici: So that their ſight did much deceive them, who not being content to reade Brenci in the Room of Brenni and Franci inſtead of it, make alſo ſo ſtrange a Tranſpoſition of places. Againſt theſe Opinions as well as others, which being of leſs moment it would be both tedious and needleſs to relate, it might ſuffice to oppoſe that of Procopius, which affects the Countrey by the Franks firſt inhabited, to have lain almoſt at the Mouth of the Rhine; where were many Mariſh Grounds. And that generally the Panegyriſts in their Orations, tell of the Piracies exerciſed by the Franks, ſo that they muſt needs, not onely have lived near to the Mouth of the Rhine, but upon the Northern Ocean alſo, and as the Panegyrick

Geogr. l. 4.

Noricis animos dabant Alpes atque nives, quo bellum non poſſet aſcendere: Sed omnes illius cardinis populos, Brennos, Sonones atque Vindelicos per privignum ſuum Claudium Druſum perpacavit. lib. 4. cap. 12.

Belli Gothici, lib. 1.

Quid loquar Franciæ nationes non jam ab his quæ olim Romani invaſerant ſed à propriis ex origin. ſedibus & ultimis barbariæ litoribus avulſas & in deſertis Galliæ Regionibus collocatæ partem Romani imperii cultu, &c.

to Conſtantine the Great phraſeth it, the farthermoſt Barbarian ſhores. To be ſure Eutropius ſpeaking concerning Carauſius, tells us, that at Bologne in Gall, he undertook to ſcowre the Seas on the Coaſts of Belgium and Armorica, which the Franks and Saxons by their naval Expeditions had infeſted. Agathias however, out in other things teſtifies that they lived about the Rhine. An old Chronicle belonging to Holland, written in Rhyme almoſt four hundred years agoe, ſpeaking of them before they Conquered Gall called them Rhine Franken. But St. Hierome, who lived before either Agathias or Procopius, and e'er that the Franks had paſſed the Rhine, and in good earneſt attacked Gall, deſcribes their Seat moſt accurately in theſe Words: Betwixt the Saxons and Alemans, a Nation not ſo great, as ſtrong, by Hiſtorians called Germany, but at this day Francia.

Initio Hiſt. apud Pontan. origin. Franc. c. ult p. 28.

Inter Senones & Alemanos gens non tam lata quam valida apud Hiſtoricos Germania nunc Francia vocatur in vita Hilarionis.

13. For underſtanding this place of St. Hierome, and clearing the Ambiguity of the word Germany; it's ſeaſonable to remember, that whatſoever lyes betwixt the lower part of the Rhine and the River Elbe, and betwixt the Ocean and the German Catti, Tacitus the Hiſtorian calleth ſimply by the Name of Germany or Germaines, without any diſtinction of Superiour or Inferiour. He tells us, ſpeaking of the Death of Varus, and the ſlaughter of the Legions that the Germaines revolted, which word can be taken for no other, than that Tract of ground now mentioned. In another place, he brings in Tiberius ſpeaking of his Brother Druſus, and ſaying, that in no place except apud Germanias was the Title of a General, and a Laurel to be obtained. Neither can he be otherwiſe underſtood, where he deſcribes the River Rhine flowing in one Chanel, till it come to the Borders of the Batavi; to which he adds, that, Then it is divided into two Streams, and retains both its Name, and the violence of its Courſe, as it paſſeth by Germany flowing towards the Gallick ſhoar, in a broader and a gentler Stream. In this Tract of Land called Germany, by a peculiar Name did the Franks inhabit, betwixt the Saxons and Alemans. For on the North and North Eaſt were the Saxons, the Suevi and Alemans poſſeſſed whatſoever lyes about the River Meyne, and the Southern part of the Rhine, almoſt as far as the Danow; whereupon the Franks muſt have been ſeated at the Weſtern part of Germany, and of the Rhine. The Saxons therefore lay at their Backs, and the Suevi with the Alemans, cloſed their Eaſtern and Southern ſides. Oroſius tells us, that the Saxons being ſeated on the ſhoars of the Ocean, and unpaſſable Mariſhes, and making a dangerous Eruption into the Roman Borders, were in the Territories of the Franks overthrown by Valentinian. St. Hierome in the Chronicon of Euſebius at the Year of our Lord 389. notes that the Saxons were beaten at Deuſon the Region of the Franks, which paſſage Ammianus who ſerved under Valentinian at that time, placeth to the third Conſulſhip of that Emperour, and his Brother Valens, Pontanus rationally conceiveth this Deuſon the ſame, which ſucceeding Hiſtorians called Duitſium, at this day Duyts ſtanding over againſt Coloine; where long agoe a ſtone was found in a Monaſtery, with an inſcription importing that that Fortreſs was placed in the Land of the Franks by the Emperour Conſtantine, wherein Souldiers were to lye in Garriſon for the defence of Gall.

Annal. l. 1.

Lib. 2.

Apud principium Agri Batavi in duos amnes Rhenus dividitur ſervátque nomen & violentiam curſus qua Germaniam prævehitur ad Gallicam ripam latior & placidior adfluens.

14. Johannes Jacobus Chifletius, a learned Phyſician of Bruſſels will have this place to be now called Duisburck, ſituate on the other ſide of the Rhine, about Colonia Trajana (a Village of Cleve at this day called Kellen) but Micæus in his Chronicon of Belgium, interprets Deuſo as Pontanus doth in Latine Tintinum, and Duyts in the Language of the place. Whether it was this or that: The Provincial Chart which Beatus Rhenanus ſaith he ſaw at Auſburg in the hands of Conradus Pentinger, and drawn in the Reign of the later Emperours, reconcileth the difference. This Chart or Table publiſhed by Ortelius at Antwerpe, through the Care and Induſtry of Marſus Velſerus; hath from the Mouths of the Rhine as far as Coloine all along (the ſaid River deſigned ſo plainly, as well may be imagined) from the part of the great or Weſtern Germany, this word Francia Characterized by Capital Letters, and towards the Mouths of the Rhine and the Northern Ocean, theſe Chamani qui & Franci, and Chauci Vapluarii Chrepſtini, Gregory Turonenſis makes the Franks oppoſite to Nineſum (or as Micæus hath it Noneſium) a Town now called Nuys, and ſeated upon the Rhine, as alſo to Coloine, or the Colony of Agrippina. Aimoinius alſo expreſly writeth, that Clodio the ſecond King of the Franks from Pharamond, held his Court at Dyſpargum, the ſame Town which Chifletius takes for Deuſo, called at this day Duisburck, and ſeated betwixt Weſel and Dyſſeldorp. For all the Nations whatſoever, inhabiting over againſt the Sun-ſetting, betwixt the Rivers Rhine and Elbe, though amongſt themſelves, they had their particular and diſtinguiſhing Names; yet generally, and taken all together, were at this time called by that of Franks.

Vindiciæ Hiſpanicæ, cap. 9.

Lib. 2.

Sect. I.

The Franks go under the Name of Sicambri, Chauci and Chamani.

Their Seats.

Lib. 7.

15. It's certain, that theſe Franks amongſt ancient Authours ſometime go under the Name of Sicambri, other whiles of Chauci, and Chamani : As for the Sicambri, both Suetonius and Tacitus tell us, that Auguſtus Cæſar tranſlated them into Gall, yet Strabo witneſſeth that in his time, they were not quite and altogether removed out of Germany, ſaying expreſly, that a little portion of them remained, and that they and the Cimbri, were moſt known of all the Nations inhabiting betwixt Elbe and the Rhine. Their Seat was probably, where at this day are the Territories of Arnheim, and Velaniæ (eſpecially where it joyns upon the River Iſala, now Iſel) reaching farther towards Coloine, and ſtretching out wide as far as the Rivers Luppia (now Lippe) and Rura whereof that waſhing the Walls of Weſel falls into the Rhine, and this mixeth it's ſtream with the ſame River at Duiſburg. But Strabo not onely placeth theſe Sicambri upwards upon the Rhine ; but maketh them ſtretch alſo as far as the Ocean, which ſeemeth manifeſtly to contradict the Geography of Tacitus, who placeth the Friſii upon the Maritime Coaſt, from Rhine or Iſel, as far as the Chauci. Yet muſt we ſtick to the Letter of Strabo, and with Pontanus eaſily ſuppoſe that in the time of that Geographer, and of Cæſar the Name of Friſii was unknown, and the ſame People known by the other of Sicambri, which was then ſo Famous as to ſtrike Terrour into the Romans themſelves. The words of Strabo do not a little confirm this Opinion, who makes mention of Melo a Captain of Sicambri, whoſe Name is no other than Friſian, as appears by ſeveral others, as Bonnones, Poppones, Fanthones and Millones, and as Ubbo Enimius a learned Hiſtorian hath evinced in his own Name. Neither doth Tacitus, ſeem at the leaſt to weaken this Conjecture, from whom it is evident the Name of Friſii became famous in the Reign of Tiberius, upon the miſcarriage of Apronius.

The Chauci where.

Conſule Pontanum ut ſuprà, lib. 2. c. 5.

16. The Chauci had their Habitation from Amaſis (or Ems all along the ſhore as far as Elbe) Ptolemy divideth them into greater and leſſer, whereof theſe inhabited the ſhore betwixt Amaſis and Viſurgis (now Weſer) and they that Tract lying beyond this River as far as the Elbe, ſo that Tacitus who maketh them to extend within the Catti, admires they ſhould poſſeſs and fill ſo much Ground. The Chamani ſome call by the Name of Camani, by ſome thought the ſame with the Campenſes or Campani, at this time differing onely in one Letter ; now to come to our purpoſe. Poets do not onely call the Franks by the Name of Sicambri, but their Countrey, or Francia, alſo by that of Sicambria, as is notorious in Claudian and others. Auſonius includes them, in the other of Chamani : But all things conſidered, it's Judged that the Sicambri were the true and Germine Mother People (as one may ſay) of the Franks. Firſt, if we conſider the ſituation of both, as well the one as the other, having inhabited both the Banks of the River Rhine to the Weſt, and the ſhores of the Ocean whence they had ſuch opportunity of Piracy, that the Franks not onely therewith infeſted Spain, but vexed and plundered London the Metropolis of Britain, by their Incurſions from their Ships, as the Panegyriſt in many words expreſſeth it to Maximian, their Predeceſſours having in the time of Probus roved about the Coaſts of Greece, Aſia and Africk, whence they were driven back by the Garriſon Souldiers of Carthage. Secondly, if we conſider the Authority of the Ancients, not onely thoſe of Claudian, and others formerly mentioned. Trithemius, the Abbat, makes mention of the ſaying of Remegius the Biſhop, ingraven in a Marble and extant at Rhemes, who ſpeaking to Clodonæus King of the Franks being about to be baptized, uſed theſe words, Mitis deponas colla Sicamber, or O Sicamber, gently put down your Neck ; which paſſage Gregory Turonenſis confirmeth, mentioning the very ſame words, but adding thereto, Adora quod incendiſti & incende quod adoraſti : Adore what thou didſt formerly burn, and burn what thou didſt formerly adore. And Venantius Fortunatus an Authour, rather more ancient, who flouriſhed about the 570 year of our Lord, calleth Choribert King of the Franks, by the Appellation alſo of Sicamber. Neither do the ſeveral diſpoſitions of each Nation compared together leſs perſuade, concerning the ſame Original. Strabo noteth the Deceitfulneſs of the Sicambri, and Vopiſcus taxeth Franks with unfaithfulneſs. The Sicambri were ſo dreadfull to the Romans, that Auguſtus, having compoſed all other differences throughout the World, yet delayed to ſhut the Temple of Janus, becauſe they committed ſome Hoſtility againſt the Galls, and their Neighbours upon the Rhine. No leſs terrible, in following Ages, were the Franks not onely to the Neighbouring Saxons and Alemans, but the Romans themſelves, which Egonhardus Chancellour to Charles the Great teſtifieth to Poſterity ; writing alſo a Proverb, that, One ſhould chuſe a Frank for a Friend, but not for a Neighbour : We might add much concerning their Apparel, their manner.

Τον φράγκον φίλον ἔχῃς γείτον οὐκ ἔχῃς.

ner of Living, the Adornment of their Bodies, eſpecially the wearing of their Hair. But theſe things in another place will be more convenient.

A diviſion of the Franks into Anſuarii Franci.

17. But having been ſo large in theſe former Diſcoveries, we cannot well paſs the matter over, without taking notice of a more late Diviſion of our Franks into ſeveral Tribes or Diviſions, Anſuarii and Salii, as we have them marked out by Ammianus Marcellinus. Pontanus thinks them the ſame with the Anſinarii, whereof Tacitus maketh mention, who having been beaten out of their Habitations by the Chauci, got Poſſeſſion of thoſe Territories, out of which the Friſii had been driven by Command of Nero. The Hiſtorian calleth them a more powerfull Nation, than that of Friſii. And Pontanus judgeth them to have been a People without any certain place or Poſſeſſion, ready to joyn themſelves to any other as they could find it Advantageous. That by Virtue of this Principle at ſuch time as the remainders of the Sicambri, and the other German Nations lying toward the Northern Ocean, changed their former and ancient Names for the more honourable Name of Franks, theſe Anſuarii being given to Arms, willingly aſſociated themſelves with the ſaid Franks, jointly to aſſert their ancient Liberty againſt any whomſoever, and hereupon, though received as Partakers in the common chance of War and Fortune, yet did they ſo far ſtill receive their old and honourable Name, that they would be called Anſinarii Franci; whether one might not gather from this paſſage of Pontanus, that his Judgment at the writing thereof was for the Name of Franks to be derived from their profeſſion of freedom, rather than a ſort of Weapon, as in another place he expreſſeth himſelf, we leave it to the Reader to judge. But theſe Anſuarii were inrolled amongſt the Roman Auxiliaries, being in the Notitia of the Empire read Arupſinarii, and reckoned among the Palatine Guards.

18. What the Original of theſe Anſuarii was, ſeeing Antiquity is therein ſilent, and whence they had their Name, we can onely conjecture. The Etymology of the word ſeemeth to point at ſomething extraordinary, which, if it be written Hanſuarii, with an aſpiration, a thing neglected and omitted both by Greeks and Romans, then it betokeneth ſome thing noble and excellent, Hanſi in the Teutonick and Gothick Idiome, ſignifieth thoſe who in Fortune and Riches excelled other Mortals, as being rather of an Heroick Nature, and tranſcending the ordinary bounds of humane capacity. Jornandes ſaith expreſly, that the Goths having overthrown the Romans, and ſlain Fraſcus their Captain, named their Noblemen, as thoſe who had conquered Fortune it ſelf, not mere Men, but Demy Gods, that is to ſay, Hanſes. Neither is this ſignification of the word wholly at this day aboliſhed, ſignifying alſo ſuch Gentle or Noble Men as are elevated above the common and ordinary ſort. Anſhelm, Ansbrecht, Anſwald and Ansfrid, ſeem to challenge no other Original, as neither the Teutonick Hanſe, or the Hanſe Towns of Germany aſſociated and united, as it were, with the League and Oath of the Anſinarii. This Etymology much more ſuiteth thoſe Towns than either that of Anzee, as it were ſituate upon the Sea, ſeeing that moſt of them are at a conſiderable diſtance from the Ocean, or the other of Goropius Becanus, who will have them derived from Anſie, ſignifying Society, from the German word Anſie to look back. For it appears by ſufficient Teſtimony, that the Anſinarii were, both as to their Nation, and by reaſon of their Arms, Men of Reputation, but though in one Society ſcattered here and there, without any certain Seat or Habitation, and ſo are theſe Towns ſeparated far from one another, four of them onely are Metropolitical, Lubeck, Dantzick, Brunſwick and Colen, yet ſeventy two they are reckoned in number, many other famous Towns having been of old time joyned with them in the communication of Rights and Privileges.

And Salii Franci.

19. The Salii were the other ſort of Franks, who having invaded Taxandria, (now Brabant, the place where we reſide at the writing hereof,) lying betwixt the Rivers Meuſe and Sceld, were driven back by Julian out of theſe Roman Territories into their own place, as Ammianus relateth. Some, as Beatus Rhenanus, derive them from a River Sala, which falls into the Meyne. Others, as Paulus Æmilius, fetch them from Sala, which empties it ſelf into Elbe. But Pontanus rationally concludeth, that from neither of theſe Sala's could the Franks be ſo denominated, becauſe the one runs through Thuringia, and the other through Franconia, (afterward ſo called) whereof a great part of the former, and all, or moſt, of the latter, were at that time held and poſſeſſed by the Alemans, Ammianus hinting as much, where he writes, that the Bucinobantes, a Nation of the Alemans, inhabited over againſt Moguntiacum, or Mentz, near to the Alemans the Burgundiones inhabited in theſe ancient times, it being out of the Road of all true Antiquity to ſuppoſe the

Lib. 16.

Lib. 19.

Franks then held any part of theſe Countries, their Seat being Weſtward, and lower down upon the Rhine, which appears partly from the ſame Ammianus, who adds, that whilſt Julian was buſie againſt the Alemans, the Franks taking that opportunity from their own Seats, over againſt Colein, paſſed the Rhine, and fell upon Juliacum (now Juliers) and the Rhemi or Rheims in Champagne. It is not worth the while to relate how Sidonius Apollinaris derives the word from the Latine Salio, as if their Leaping and dancing had procured this appellation. But much more extravagant is that of Goropius Becanus, who, according to his Cuſtome of ſtrange alluſions, will have them named Salii, from Sala, the Ornaments of Horſes, or from Sadell, as it is in Dutch, or Sadle in Engliſh, as if they firſt had invented and fitted it to Horſes.

20. That is moſt rational which Pontanus brings of the Salii being ſo denominated from the River Sala, at this day called Iſala, or Iſel, near, or upon, which they inhabite. Hence is alſo to be deduced the name of Sallandia, or the Countrey lying beyond this River Iſel, it ſignifying no more but the Land or Territory of Sala. Zorimas the Hiſtorian ſpeaking of Julian, by occaſion, maketh mention of the Salii, who being part of the Franks, and driven by the Saxons from their Seats, paſſed over into the Iſland of the Batavi, bordering upon them. And Claudian the Poet makes them to have inhabited upon the Rhine, and there where it divides it ſelf into two branches, over againſt which place that River of Sala, or Iſel, floweth; ſo that the Countrey of theſe Salii not onely comprehended what as yet bears the Name of Solland, but took up alſo part of that we now call Weſtphalia. Theſe Salii alſo, as well as the Arupſinarii, were enrolled amongſt the Palatine Auxiliaries. But from all the diſquiſitions laid together, we may take a ſhort view of the ancient Seat of our Franks, and conclude with Pontanus, the old Francia, comprized not onely all the ſpace beyond and over againſt Colonia Ubionum, (or Couleines) betwixt the Rhine and the ancient Sala, (the old Seat of the Sicambri Rhenenſis) at this day taking in part of Weſtphalia, and the Dukedom of Cleve, but alſo the whole Tranſiſulania, and what ground ſoever, as far almoſt as the utmoſt Chanci, Teucteri, Tubantes and Bructeri, both the greater and leſſer Phrygians poſſeſſed, which at this time are called Zatphenians, Drenterians, Tuentenians, the Weſtern and Eaſtern Frieſelanders, a large, ample Territory, and inacceſſable of old time, by reaſon of Fenns and Woods about the River Viſurgis, now commonly called the Weſer. Neither was there any other Franks, or France, known to Trebellius Pollio, Vopiſcus, Ammianus Marcellinus, Eutropius, Auſonius and Claudian, Poets, the moſt ancient Authour of Pentingers Table, or other Hiſtorians, Geographers, or Panegyriſts, to the Age of Valentinian the third.

Lib. 3.

21. Having diſcovered their Original and ancient Seat, we ſhall now take notice of ſuch Affairs as the meanneſs of their Condition by degrees preſents unto us. And by the way, though we ſeek for truth and reality, yet we cannot but take a little notice of the Romantick ſtories which are dependents of their Trojan Pedegree. Hunibaldus is the blazoner of theſe falſe pretended Titles, who though by conſent of all judicious and underſtanding Men he be accounted no other than what he is, fabulous even to Barbariſm, yet ſome have not been wanting to receive, publiſh and cry up his Lyes, and amongſt the reſt, Trithemius, the Spanhemian Abbat, who as his great admirer, epitomized eighteen Books of his Hiſtories, and fears not to call him the Solid Hiſtoriographer of the Franks. But the Fountain of Trojan Vanities is of ſuch a depth, that it hath afforded matter for all ſorts of Cheaters, thence to draw and obtrude upon the World, out of which abyſs many, both French and German Writers, following the Dictates of their Maſter Hunibaldus, derive a Series of French and Sicambrian Kings, ancienter not onely than the Age of Chriſt, but that of Alexander the Great. Of theſe Kings they make two Ranks, ſome being Boſhpharians, and of the Race of the Trojans, who, being accounted ſtrangers, were reckoned amongſt the Sicambri by the Germans. He that leads the dance is Marcomirus, in whoſe Reign the Trojan Scythiæ (afterward Franks) deſcended through the Countrey of the Saxons into Germany, and near the mouths of the Rhine, (where now the Weſtfreiſlanders, thoſe of Gueledrland and Holland do inhabite) four hundred and twelve years before the Birth of Chriſt, died in the twenty eighth of his Reign, and twenty one after their deſcent into Germany. After him, in good rank and order, follows his eldeſt Son Marcomirus, in the Year of the World 3500, who deſerves ſpecial notice to be taken of him by us, becauſe he married, you muſt know, Cambra, the Daughter of Belinus, one of our Geffrey of Monmouth's Kings of Britain, from which Woman the People was called Sicambri.

Funccius, Gaguinus, Lazius, &c.

A Catalogue of French and Sicambrian Kings by Hunibaldus.

22. After him thoſe Sicambrian Kings took their places. Priamus, one of Trojan Race, Helenus, Diocles, a moſt doughty Champion againſt Goths and Galls, Helenus the ſecond, who being good for nothing, was forced to give his Diadem, and reſign his Chair to his Brother Baſanus, a very brave Man, who built the Caſtle Baſambucum, in the Countrey of Juliers. Him followed Clodomirus Nicanor, Marcomirus the Second, Clodius, Antenor the Second, another Clodomirus, Merodacus, Caſſander, and Antharius, who brings up the rere of this firſt Rank or Order. His Son Francus begins the Second, from whom our Sicambri were named Franks, who making a perpetual League with the Germans, Saxons and Doringi, the Romans, were ſo affrighted therewith, that they ſent an Army againſt the Saxons, the Leader of which, Lollius, was ſlain by Clodio, the Son of Francus, as Lazius, Funccius, and others, tell the ſtory. Clodio, or Clogio, as well he deſerved, ſucceeded his Father, in whoſe tenth year, they tell, our Saviour Chriſt was born, and who ſtoutly demeaned himſelf againſt Tiberius the Emperour. He was ſucceeded by Heumerus his Son, whom followed Marcomirus, Clodomirus, Antenor, Ratherus, who, after many Wars againſt the Galls, built Roterdam, (rather Ratherodam) and ſo we are to him beholden for Eraſmus, that three-tongued Coryphæus, as Lazius calls him. Next comes Richimerus, who fought ſtoutly againſt the Galls and Romans; after him Odemarus, who took truce with the Enemy, Marcomirus, by whom Francfurt was built, or rather, now named, being formerly called Helenopolis, A. D. 149. After him are reckoned Clodomirus, Pharabertus, Sunno, Hildericus, in whoſe time it became a Proverb, Das iſt ein gut all Franchiſck werck, becauſe then our Franks applied their minds to building. Then did Bartherus take the Sceptre, in whoſe tenth Year, when the Romans under Galienus had given themſelves up to Idleneſs and Luxury, the Franks undertook an Expedition into Italy, deſtroying all with Fire and Sword as far as Ravenna. And afterward aſſiſted by the Saxons and Bavarians, they invaded Gall, whence marching by Tungeren, and ſo through the Bellonaci, or Beannieiſin, beyond the Seine, they paſſed with flying Colours into Spain.

23. The next King in order was Clodio, during whoſe Reign the Franks, for the ſpace of ſeven years, poſſeſſed a great part of Gall, about the Year of our Lord 298. Him followed Waltherus Dagobert, and another Clodio, who fighting valiantly againſt the Romans, was ſlain on this ſide the Meuſe, A. D. 319. He was ſucceeded by his Brother Clodomirus, in whoſe time the Thoringi offered the Franks a large part of their Countrey, lying betwixt them and the Suevi on condition of being protected againſt Invaſions and Injuries of theſe potent Neighbours. The Franks cloſing with this offer, about thirty thouſand armed Men, with their Families, departed into this new Countrey, under conduct of Genebaldus, the King's Brother, with that condition, that this Colony ſhould ever remain in obedience under command of the Franks. And ſo began the Dukedom of the Oriental Franks, who were governed four hundred and fourteen years by twenty Dukes, deſcended of the ſame Stock ſucceſſively. But after Clodomir followed Richimir his Son, in whoſe time a fight was fought betwixt the Franks and the Romans, under conduct of Tiberianus, A. D. 338. Next Richimir came Theodomir, who in the Tenth Year of his Reign was, together with his Mother, taken by the Romans. At this time the Kings of the Franks dwelt in the borders of the Timgri, beyond the River Meuſe, in a Caſtle anciently called Duiiſpergi, from the Borders of the Franks the Galls inhabited as far as the River Ligoris, or Loire, beyond which reigned the Goths. After him came Clodio, in whoſe time Julian had War with the Alemans, and the Franks poſſeſſed Gall, as far as the River Seine, and Valentinian fought with the Saxons in their Borders, on this ſide Odera, not far from the Sea.

24. The next in order was Marcomirus, during whoſe Reign Jubalchus, with fifteen thouſand Franks, was cut off in Aremorica, or Little Britain, by Maximus the Tyrant. And Marcomir himſelf was ſlain, A. D. 393. by the Romans, who invaded the Franks under Conduct of Valentinian. After him (who left no Son behind him) was his Brother Dagobert created Interrex, in whoſe time Valentinian named them Franks, rather for their Fierceneſs than their Liberty. The ſecond Interrex was Genebald, after whom Pharamond, the Son of Marcomirus, Duke of the Oriental Franks, was preferred to the Kingdom, A. D. 419. His Son Clodio reigned twenty Years, and having invaded Gall, died in the Year 446. His Son Meronius having governed with much honour, died A. D. 458. though Jornandes and Sigonius place his Death at the Year 455. Him ſucceeded Hildericus, who warred with the Alemans, who then inhabited betwixt Italy and the Suevi, and died in the Year 484. or, as Sigonius hath it, 481. Laſtly, after him reigned Clodonæus thirty Years, who overthrew the Alemans, and being baptized by Romigius, died in the Year of our Lord 514. Hitherto Trithemius extendeth the Hiſtory of thoſe Kings which Hunibaldus had digeſted into eighteen Books, from whom alſo he affirms, that thoſe Franks in the City of Troy ſpake the Language of that Countrey, in Scythia the Scythian Language, in Germany the German Tongue, and in Gallia that of Gall, in like manner as Æneas at Troy ſpake the Trojan Dialect, and in Italy the Italian Language.

25. Though Trithemius, with his Companions, Lazius, Beroaldus, Roſiniocus, and others, give credit to thoſe tales, induced, as they imagine, by the Antiquity of Hunibaldus, the broacher of them, who as they believe him, himſelf flouriſhed in the days of Clodonæus, five hundred Years onely after Chriſt, yet can they bring no Evidence, onely his ſingle Teſtimony, which in a Man's own behalf is not to be regarded. On the contrary, it is objected againſt him, that beſides the ſtaleneſs of the Trojan Project, which at the firſt ſight the wiſeſt Men are apt to reject, there are very probable, not to ſay pregnant, Arguments againſt his Antiquity. It is firſt alledged, that his ſtyle was barbarous, and ſavours not at all of that Elegancy which yet, in that Age, the Latine Tongue retains, as appears in Boetius, Sidonius Apollinaris, and others, of whom he is a pretended Contemporary. His talking of Roterdam, that noble Town of Holland, diſcovers the cheat, which being ſo named from the River Rota, or Rotera, (as Amſterdam from Amſter, on which it is ſeated) not yet four hundred years ago, as Hadrianus Junius, and others, have obſerved, he yet mentions Ratherus, the pretended founder, his twenty third King in order, whom he buries there in the eighty ninth year of Chriſt. Who can be ſo ſtupid as to believe him, that if this City had been built at that time, by ſo great and eminent a King as he makes him, Tacitus, Dio, Suetonius, Pliny, and the reſt of the Roman Hiſtoriographers, who are very curious in their Remarks upon theſe Batavian Countries, would not both have mentioned the Building of the Town, within the Roman Pale, and committed to poſterity the Records of ſo great Exploits, as Hunibaldus will have this King to have performed againſt the Romans? It is alſo a wonder not eaſily to be removed, that Gregory Turonenſis, who lived ſix hundred years after Chriſt, and conſequently was junior to this Hunibaldus, who makes ſuch diſquiſition, and took ſuch pains in ſearching out any thing that might conduce to the diſcovery of the Affairs of the Franks, the Names and Succeſſion of their Kings, ſhould not in the leaſt mention Hunibaldus, nor take notice of a Catalogue of Princes, ſo elaborate and formally digeſted.

Vid. Pontan. Orig. Franc. lib. 3. cap. 3.

Compared with other Authours.

26. But if we examine a little his particular Stories, we ſhall find them altogether diſſonant to the courſe of Hiſtory and Geography, and diſcover them to be Chimæra's of an idle and impotent Brain. Firſt, he brings Marcomirus the King, out of Scythia, whereas his Name is merely German, and moſt of thoſe of the ſame Claſſis no other than plain Greeks. He makes him paſs through the Territories of the Saxons to the Mouths of the Rhine, as if the Scythæ and Saxons had been Neighbours, and as if there had been ſuch a Name as that of Saxons above four hundred years before the Nativity of Chriſt. Yet there hangeth a tale by this ſtory. Ado Viennenſis writes, that in the days of Valentinian and Valens, the Franks paſſing from Sicambria Mæotidis, came to the utmoſt parts of the Rhine, and there, with their Captains, Marcomirus and Sunno, took up their Habitation for ſome Years. Which paſſage this Impoſtour hath corrupted to his own Deſign, placing that ſeveral Ages before Chriſt, which indeed in no Age ever happened. It is very fond Geography for him to place the Sicambri near the Mouths of the Rhine, where now the Hollanders, thoſe of Guelderland and Weſtfreiſland inhabite. Who would not imagine that he was contemporary and acquainted with our Geoffrey of Monmouth, and that they too made up the match betwixt Antenor and Cambra the Daughter of Belinus, King of Britain, from which the Sicambri were forſooth ſo named? They two, and Beroſus, (whom Annius of Viterbo raiſed from the dead) were certainly Companions, and rare Heralds, in deriving the Pedegrees of People, Cities and Perſons, from unknown and unheard of Records. But if they were named Franks firſt from Francus, the firſt King of the ſecond Claſſis, what then becomes of Francion, the Son of Hector, from whom they muſt have been denominated in the Trojan times? but as well from the one as the other; for though this Francus is ſuppoſed to have reigned above thirty ſeven years before Chriſt's Nativity, yet at that, and for ſome time after, the Name of Franks was utterly unknown, and that of the Sicambri very much flouriſhed, till the latter end of the Reign of Auguſtus, who, under the Conduct of Tiberius, tranſlated a part of them that had yielded, from beyond the Rhine into Gall.

27. His ſtory of Lollius is ridiculous above meaſure, both as to matter of Hiſtory and Geography. Firſt, it is not probable that the Name of Saxons was up at that time, if it were, how could Lollius come at them, who yet in the days of Ptolemy, the Mathematician, lived beyond the River Elbe, without invading and infeſting other Nations of Germany. But Lollius neither invaded Saxony, neither obtained any Victory, nor was ſlain in any Rancounter in theſe parts, or elſewhere. For as Dion Caſſius expreſly writes, the Battel was fought on this ſide the Rhine, (Germania Ciſrhenana) theſe Nations of Germany, Sicambri, Uſipetæ and Teucteri, having paſſed over that River, and circumvented not the Perſon, but Forces of Lollius, upon whoſe preparations for a freſh encounter, they retired into their old places, and Lollius, as is evident from Velleius Paterculus, was afterwards appointed by Auguſtus, Governour to Caius Cæſar, his Grandſon, who then warred againſt the Parthian, in which Expedition he died. That which follows concerning Clodio, Son of this Francus, agrees as well as the other with the ancient and authentick Roman Writers, from whom it is alſo as evident, that he could not fight with Tiberius in the fourth Year of his Reign, who as then had nothing to doe with the German War, it being managed by his Brother Druſus, as yet living. His ſtory of Hilderick his thirty Kings muſt needs provoke Laughter, in whoſe Reign he ſaith the Franks firſt began to build and apply their minds to Architecture, whereas he had formerly mentioned the building of Roterdam, by Roterus his twenty third King, and of Francfurt by Marcomirus his twenty ſixth in order: Concerning Bartherus their King, under whom they ſhould have invaded Italy, there is not one ſyllable to be found in any Authour. Neither of Genebaldus his leading a Colony into Thuringia, and there ſettling a Dukedom in the three hundred and twentieth Year of our Lord, that Countrey being at that time poſſeſſed by the Alemans and Suevi, neither the Name of Thoringi being as yet known. The Caſtle Duytsburck, where he writes the King of the Franks to have lived, was not in Thuringia, but below Coloine, ſituate in Germany the Great, and upon the Rhine, not on the Meuſe, as this learned Geographer ſeems to place it. Still as good ſtuff he writes on the Saxons being overthrown by Valentinian on this ſide Odera, which runs its courſe beyond Elbe. His Memory, contrary to the Art of Lying, is very bad, in telling the Tale concerning Valentinian his naming the Franks from their ferocity, having formerly derived the appellation from his doughty King Francus. His Dagobert's Perſon is a fiction, as well as his Office of Interrex. Indeed in Thuringia are many footſteps of ſuch a Name, as Dagoberſtera near Ertford, and Dagoberthuſa near Marpurge in Haſſia, and another Village of the ſame Name near to Coloine, but theſe received their name from other Dagoberts, whereof one lived in the Year 632, and the other 716. when the Name of Oriental France came to be in uſe, and the Franks poſſeſſed all Thuringia or Franconia, whereas at this time of this ſuppoſed Dagobert, or A. D. 394. there was no ſuch thing as Orientalis Francia, or Franconia. But this Impoſtour, perhaps a Native of this Countrey long after, as well as others in later times, to doe it honour, hath not been ſparing to obtrude falſe and coined ſtories upon the World, and brings this Dagobert out of that place to inſert him amongſt the Kings of the Franks, that from him paſſing to Genebald, he might from Genebald bring the Title and Honour upon Pharamond, as derived from his Dukes of Oriental France.

Lib. 54.

Hiſt. l. 2.

Genebaldus the firſt King of the Franks.

Aſcaricus and Radagiſus.

Malarichus.

Lege Pontan. ubi ſuprà, lib. 3. cap. 6.

28. Having already been more tedious than the nature of our deſign may ſeem to require, induced by the Greatneſs and Glory of the French Nation, in diſcovering the cheats of Hunibaldus, and his Companions, we ſhall addreſs our ſelves to the ancient Monuments of authentick Writers, and thence ſee what may be had concerning the true Series and ſucceſſions of their Kings. To let paſs thoſe of the Sicambri, whilſt that Name onely obtained, and come to the time of Galienus the Emperour, in whoſe Reign the Name of Franks became firſt to be known, the firſt we meet with in any good Authour, that have the Title of Kings, after that time, are Genebaldus and Eſcateck, during the Government of Diocletian, A. D. 288. being both named in a Panegyrick of Mamertinus to that Prince, and Maximian his Collegue. After them are to be found Aſcaricus and Radagiſus, the ſame Maximian governing the Empire, together with Conſtantius, A. D. 292. who breaking the Peace made with Conſtantius, were too cruelly puniſhed by Conſtantine the Great, his Son, as Eutropius writes, being caſt to wild Beaſts, which Fact yet Emnonius, the flattering Panegyriſt, extolleth. In the days of Conſtantius, the Son of Conſtantine, A. D. 342. we meet with Malarichus whom Pontanus judgeth a King, though called onely by Marcellinus the Rectour of his Countreymen in the Emperour's Palace, for Conſtantius thought it better Policy to oblige them by good turns, and by promoting them to

Honours

Melobandus.

Honours to keep them in quiet, and uſe them againſt the Alemans and other German Nations, than to imitate the ſevere example of his Father. After him Melobandus flouriſhed with the Title of Tribune in the Court of Conſtantius, who in the Reign of Valentinian, Valens and Gratian was King of the Franks, at that time the good Friends and Allies of the Empire, and as Ammianus, an Eye-witneſs, tells us, was Comes Domeſticorum, and a very valiant Man, by whoſe conduct the Romans had a great Victory over the Alemans, whereof a great number was ſlain, together with Priarius their King, and Gratian improving the Victory, paſſed over the Rhine, and there atchieved ſo much Renown, as the Awe thereof continued in Peace the Weſtern parts of the Empire. Neither was Melobandus leſs valiant and victorious at home, Ammianus giving him the name of Bellicoſus, and for farther confirmation, relating how Macrianus, King of the Alemans, invading Francia, was circumvented and ſlain by his Arts and Policies.

Richomerus.

29. The next that follows is Richomerus, or elſe Theodomerus his Son. Richomerus was Comes Domeſticorum to Gratian, and did many eminent Services for the Romans, but it ſhould ſeem from Gregory of Tours, the Hiſtorian, that Theodomerus revolted, and practiſing ſomething againſt them, was put to death, with Aſcila his Mother. Richomerus was Conſul the laſt Year of Gratian, A. D. 384. ſo that the death of his Son muſt have happened afterwards, in the Reign of Theodoſius or Arcadius, about the Year 400. Theſe two were ſucceeded by Marcomirus and Sunno, two Brothers, who are mentioned in the Affairs of Valentinian the younger, preſently after the Death of Gratian. Gregory adds Genebaldus, a third to them, concerning whom, foraſmuch as the Hiſtory of Salpitius Alexander, whom he cites, is loſt, nothing can be certainly affirmed. But as for the other two, their valiant Exploits are upon Record, eſpecially thoſe of Marcomirus, who at ſuch time as Maximus was beſieged in Aquileia by Theodoſius, invaded the Lower Germany, and making great havock with Fire and Sword, ſtruck great terrour into thoſe of Coloine. Afterwards he was baniſhed into Hetruria, and his Brother Sunno appearing in his behalf, was made away by the People. From this Marcomirus (counting from that time when he is firſt mentioned in Hiſtory, during the Reign of Theodoſius) unto Pharamond, are reckoned about thirty years, which might give occaſion to ſeveral Chronologers, as Sigebert Gemblirenſis, Ado Viennenſis, and others, to think Pharamond the very ſame of Marcomirus, although there be no certain teſtimony of ſuch a thing to be diſcovered in Antiquity; for neither Gregory Turonenſis, nor the Chronicon of Proſper, (which Scaliger calleth Conſulare, and hath added to the later Chronicon of Euſebius) make mention of Pharamond. But of Clodio, whom they make the ſecond King of the Franks, after Pharamond, both Gregory, Sigebert, Ado and Sidonius Apollinaris his Contemporary makes ample mention, though ſometimes for the verſes ſake called Cloro, now Clodius, otherwhile, as by Caſſiodorus, Hlodonicus, and Clogio, but by Aimoinius, as he is now commonly read expreſly Clodio. After him are reckoned Meroneus, Hildericus and Clodonæus (or Hlodonicus, as Remigius calls him) the firſt Chriſtian King of the Franks.

In Conſularibus legimus Theodomerum Regem Francorum filium Richomeri quendam & Aſcilam Matrem ejus gladio interfectos.

Marcomirus and Sunno.

Pharamond.

Clodio.

Meroneus.
Hilderich.

SECT.

SECT. II.

The Atchievements of the Ancient Franks, from the Reign of Genebaldus, to the Death of Childerick.

The ſpace of one hundred ninety ſix Years.

Sect. 2.

The Franks aſſiſt Poſthumius againſt Gallienus the Emperour.

Paſſing the Rhine, are beaten by Aurelian.

1. FROM the time of Gallienus and Valerian, wherein the Franks were firſt known to the World, to the Reign of Clodio; from which, or elſe from Pharamond, the Modern French Hiſtorians begin their Annals, paſſed about one hundred and ſeventy Years, in which ſpace of time very Eminent Actions, and great Atchievements were performed by them, on both ſides the Rhine againſt the Romans. Thoſe effects of theirs tending to the Deſtruction of the Weſtern Empire, and at length effecting it in a great meaſure, are already deſcribed and illuſtrated in their proper place, and therefore we ſhall but here give the Reader a ſhort view of them, for the recalling of them to mind, by preſenting him with a ſhort Recapitulation: The firſt thing therefore we hear of them, is, that they aſſiſted Poſthumius againſt the Emperour Gallienus, and after that, as well the Traitour as the Prince was ſlain, fell in upon the Fortifications, and demoliſhed thoſe which had been raiſed by the ſame Poſthumius ſeven years before; being by Trebellius the Hiſtorian, ſometimes called Franks, ſometimes Germans. Under Valerian they paſſed the Rhine, and undertook an expedition of no leſs Conſequence, but were after much Miſchief done to the Romans, ſet upon by Aurelian at unawares, who ſlew of them ſeven hundred, and ſold three hundred for Bond-ſlaves. Some of them ſerved yet under this Aurelian, when he was ſent Vicar to Ulpius Crinitus in the Eaſt, but when their Countreymen grown bold upon the abſence of the Romans from the Borders, roved through Gall as far as Spain; he being now declared Emperour, clearing all Gall of them, drove them back into their own Countrey, and reſtored the Limits of the Empire (viz. the Rhine and thoſe parts about it) to their Ancient quiet and Security.

2. But this quiet and ſecurity, continued not long, nor Gall free from their Incurſions, which in the Reign of Tacitus and Florianus they renewed, and preſently were with much violence proſecuted by Probus; who was reſolved to clear both the upper and lower parts of the Rhine, of ſuch ill Neighbours, which made him joyn with Proculus and Bonoſus, who took then upon them the Purple at Coloine: Yet did they betray Proculus to him, who had fled to them, and pleaded Kindred with them, as Vopiſcus writes. Probus having taken many of them Priſoners upon Promiſe, as it ſeemeth, of quiet and dutyfull demeanour, gave them a Territory to inhabit about Propontis; but they making as little Conſcience of their Faith to the Romans, as thoſe did of their Fidelity to their Princes, and acted by that itch of Glory and Wealth, which in theſe late Ages had ſo irritated thoſe Northern Nations, ſeized on a great Company of Veſſels, wherewith they roved about the Coaſts of Aſia and Greece, invaded Sicily, and took Syracuſe it ſelf, ſo Famous for it's naval Victories; then Coaſting about, and doing much damage to the Coaſts of Africk, they were at length repulſed, by the Garriſon Souldiers of Carthage, and paſſing through the Straits of Gades, came back by the Coaſts of Portugal and Spain into the Chanel, and ſo into their own ancient Countrey, which lay part upon the Rhine, and part upon the Britiſh and Northern Ocean. But upon report, of the Death of Probus, both they and the Saxons thought they had an opportunity put into their hands, which they improved to good purpoſe by Inrodes, made into the Roman pale; for Carauſius, whom Diocletian had ſent againſt them, bore himſelf rather as one that would part ſtakes with them, watching his opportunity how he might ſeize upon Britain, and aſſume the Title. The Franks therefore making uſe of this Diſtraction, infeſted the Roman Empire both by Sea and Land, and

Zozim. lib. [illegible]

They ſeize of part of Batavia.

Sect. 2.

But being beaten are tranſplanted.

Cum per ſe regnum receperit Genebaldus, Eſateck verò munus acceperit, Mamertinus ad Maximianum.

ſeize upon the more Maritime parts of Batavia, where they fix themſelves: This and other Difficulties, cauſed Diocletian to make Maximian his Collegue, who coming to Batavia ſets upon them, though in almoſt unacceſſiable places; and after much ſtrugling of both ſides for the Victory, forceth them to ſubmit. Their Kings Genebaldus, and Eſateck as he is (corruptly ſure) called by the Panegyriſt, received upon their Submiſſion; the one his Kingdom, and the other ſome great Gift. Yet notwithſtanding, Maximian removed a great number of Families into the deſert places of Gall, that they might with their own Labour and Service, replant and repair what they themſelves had waſted, that their Countrey might be drained of, and the Roman Territory ſupplied with Inhabitants. Or, it being all moſt impoſſible for want of Corn upon the Borders to defend them againſt thoſe Rovers, who ſtill by their continual Wars and Exerciſes, learnt more Experience and Diſcipline, that the Grounds might be Tilled by thoſe had waſted them, and by taking their Youth into the Roman Legions, in proceſs of time they might oppoſe Franks againſt Franks.

A ſecond Invaſion of Batavia.

3. Politick Reſolutions, eſpecially if founded upon Martial Actions, meet with many Rubs, and feel moſt commonly the force of the Change, and Viciſſitudeo f humane Affairs. What was thought to have done the Work, and completed the buſineſs about the Franks, did but increaſe and ſtir them up to a new Attempt, as ſoon as time and opportunity would favour them. When the Rhine now by extremity of Froſt, and a very hard Winter was Frozen over, a great number of them under Conduct of their Kings Aſcaricus, and Radagiſus, the ſecond time invaded Batavia: By this time Maximian had given up the Charge of Gall, and the Weſtern parts of the Empire to Conſtantius Chlorus, who making ready for an expedition into Britain againſt Alectus, who had killed Carauſius, and inveſted himſelf with the Purple, and Authority, had the Work done to his hand by Aſclepiodatus, the Prefect of the pretorian Guards; by whom Alectus was ſlain near London, and a great multitude of Franks, having eſcaped into the City, when after they had loaded themſelves with plunder, they thought to eſcape, were put to the Sword; having made up the greateſt part of Carauſius his Forces, and maintained the Quarrel ſo long in defence of him and Alectus his Succeſſour: Preſently after this, Conſtantius making the ſame advantage of a Thaw, as they had done of the Froſt, conveyed his Army over the Rivers, and ſo ſtraitly beſieged them, that they were conſtrained to beg Peace, and a great number of them were again tranſported into Gall, to learn Civility, and cultivate their Barbarous diſpoſitions. But Conſtantius being Dead, the two Kings deſpiſing the Youth, and Rawneſs of his Son Conſtantine, and breaking the League made with his Father, invaded the Roman Territories, having paſſed over their Forces near the diviſion of the Stream, into the Rhine and the Wale. Conſtantine conceiving his Honour nearly touched, ſent his Army againſt them, which taking them at unawares made great ſlaughters, and among other Priſoners took Aſcaricus, and Radagiſus the two Kings; whom with as many of ripe Age as were taken, he ſubjected to various Torments, and finally caſt them to Wild beaſts in the Theatre, for which brave Fact he is extolled, by the flattering Panegyriſts, who yet doe them ſome kind of Honour in comparing them to the two Snakes, which Hercules in his Infancy (as Conſtantine in his infant Government) is ſaid to have ſtrangled. This being done, Conſtantine invaded their Territories, as far as the Dructeri, where he made great Havock of the Countrey, and glutted Wild beaſts with the multitude of thoſe Franks, who were ſo ſtout by Confeſſion of their Enemies, as not to ſtart at the Terrour of the Puniſhment; but willingly would look Death in the Face, and that in the Countenance of fierce and cruel Lions.

A. D. 292.

Aſcaricus and Radagiſus French Kings ſlain.

4. Conſtantine having thus ſucceeded, that he might for the time to come, have a free and ready paſſage into their Countrey, or rather to ſhew how little he ſtood in fear of them, and to awe them with the Majeſty of the Empire; built a Bridge over the Rhine, where it ran by their Countrey. Yet did not theſe things ſo affright or awe them, but that ſtill they took hold of all fit opportunities to invade the Roman pale, which cauſed this Emperour afterwards, being himſelf otherwiſe diverted, to ſend his Son Criſpus to defend the Limits againſt their Inrodes. After the Death of the Father, they aſſiſted Conſtantine the Son in the Invaſion he made into the Territories of his Brother Conſtans, who after Conſtantine was Murthered at Aquileia waged War with them, and at length compelled them to retreat into their own Countries. After the whole Empire had faln to the ſhare of Conſtantius, by the Death of his two Brothers, he ſo far conſidered their Natures, that thinking them not capable of being beaten into better Manners, he reſolved

Sect. 2.

A. D. 342.

Malarickus kindly treated by the Emperour.

to try them with Kindneſs. Therefore did he give them what by Force they had ſo long attempted; removing them into the adjacent parts of Gall and Germany, and preferred the chiefeſt of them to Commands, and honourable Employments about his own Perſon, as Malarickus the King, Mellobandes, Laviogaiſus and Silvanus, who Governing the lower Germany with great Wiſedom and Courage, was falſly accuſed to Conſtantius, as if he affected the Sovereignty, and plainly Forced, when the Emperour could by no means be brought to have a good Opinion of him, and he was made to believe, that the Franks his Countrey-men would not harbour him, to take upon him the Purple, which done, he was betrayed, and ſlain by his own Men, who by great Words and fair Promiſes, were corrupted by Conſtantine. Beſides the knowledge of Arms, and the Conduct and Valour of a Commander, joyned with an honeſt mind, and the Merits of Bonitius his Father (which Commendations, Ammianus Marcellinus an Eye-witneſs gives him) Aurelius Victor, witneſſeth in his behalf, that he was of a moſt Courteous and affable Diſpoſition, and though of barbarous Extract, ſufficiently adorned with the Learning and Breeding of a Roman.

They again infeſt the Roman Pale, but are beaten by Julian.

5. Either his Conduct, his Intereſt, or both ſufficiently appear in this, that as his Countreymen kept themſelves ſtill, during his Government, preſently after his Death, as if the obſtacle was now removed, they bare down all before them, and paſſing over the Rhine, over-ran a great part of Gall, having taken forty Cities ſituate upon the River, and therein an unſpeakable number of Slaves, beſides infinite Booty. For this and other Cauſes, Conſtantius took Julian his Couſin German into the Partner-ſhip of the Empire, who e'er he came to the Charge of Gall and the Borders, received the News of the taking of Coloine by the Franks, wherewith he was ſo ſtruck, that he was often heard to mutter to himſelf, that he had gotten nothing more by his late promotion than to periſh in greater Employment. He took Auguſtodunum (now Autun) which the Franks had ſeized on, and thence adventured upon Antiſiodorum (at this day Auxerre) whence marching to the Tricaſſini, he was ſet upon by numerous Enemies, but had the better, taking or putting them to flight, how reſolute ſoever. Piercing farther into the Countries, and ſending far before him the Reputation of a Conquerour, he almoſt as ſoon took as ſaw the City of Coloine, having it rendred up by Compoſition after a Peace made with the Enemy. During this Peace, he made uſe of the Franks againſt the Alemans and others; but it was not long e'er they broke it, and when he was employed elſewhere, ſeized on a Caſtle ſeated on the Bank of the Meuſe, which retaining yet it's Name in part (Keſell) he beſieged, and fearing that they within might take the advantage of a dark Night to eſcape over the Ice, he cauſed Boats to be continually rowed by the Souldiers up and down to keep a Chanel, and thereby compelled them for want of Neceſſaries to yield. Taking up then his winter Quarters at Paris, he returned and unexpectedly fell upon that ſort of Franks called Salii in the Spring; who not long before, had taken the Boldneſs to plant themſelves in this Countrey of Taxandria, now Brabant in the Roman Soil. Who ſent a Meſſenger to deſire of him, that they might live peaceably in their new obtained Poſſeſſions; but he cauſed them to yield themſelves to his diſpoſal. Having handled the Chamani, who followed the Example of the Salii in the ſame manner, he repaired the Caſtles, which being formerly built upon the Meuſe the Franks had razed.

The Salii forced to yield.

Lib. 3.

6. But how theſe Salii came to take up their Quarters in Taxandria, or here about Breda, we muſt not fail to take notice out of Zozimus. The Saxons for ſome reaſon or other unknown to us, bore them mortal Hatred (their onely Crime it's probable, was the Convenience and Fertility of the Soil) and therefore making a ſtrict Alliance with the Quadi, a People bordering on the Sarmatæ, reſolved utterly to deſtroy them; and ſo they had done, but that they were awed by the Fame and Glory of the common Name of Franks. They forced them to quit their Habitations, ſome paſſing over into Taxandria or Brabant and others, ſeizing on the Iſland of Batavia afterwards: The Quadi either ſet on by the other, or moved by the deſire of Gain built them Veſſels, and paſſing down the Rhine by the old Francia entered Batavia, whither the Salii had been driven back by the Saxons, reſolving utterly to diſpoſſeſs them of the Iſland, which they had as it were made their own by primer Occupation. Julian received the News of this their Boldneſs with much Stomach, and Commands the Quadi to deſiſt from their Enterprize, which they durſt not but obey, and wherewith the Salii perceiving themſelves delivered of an imminent danger in way of Gratitude gave up themſelves, and all they had into the Powerand Protection of Cæſar. The Quadi, though they had loſt their prime Gain, yet were reſolved not to ſit quite out, Robbing and rifling on the

Sect. 2.

the Sea-Coaſts privily, and by ſtealth as they could whereby they rather much diſquieted, than endamaged the Roman Subjects. Julian yet affected that by cunning, which he could not doe by plain Force, and brought them to ſuch ſtraits, that they were forced to ſubmit, which being done, he liſted many both of them and the Salii in the Legions, of whom the Companies continued till the time of Zozimus. But as for our Franks, though the Salii had reaſon to be quiet, who were either permitted to continue in Batavia, or were removed over the Water to other Convenient Seats: Yet the Anſinarii would not contain themſelves, but made Incurſions afreſh into the Neighbouring parts of Gall, at ſuch time as Conſtantius ſuſpecting that Julian aſpired after the Empire ſent Letters to Check and Admoniſh him to keep himſelf within the modeſt bounds of Cæſar. Being ſaluted Auguſtus by his Army leſt he ſhould be blamed for Idleneſs, having returned a Meſſage to Conſtantius, he marched into the Borders of Germania Secunda, and paſſing ſpeedily over the Rhine fell unexpectedly upon the Anſinarii, who expected nothing leſs than ſuch an attack, truſting to the difficulty of the paſſages, through which never yet any Prince had Pierced. He eaſily overcame them, killed and took many, and gave thoſe that remained ſuch Conditions as him beſt pleaſed, having got this advantage by this Expedition, as he imagined, that by the Terrour thereof, the Neighbouring Barbarians would be kept in good Order, and the Borders remain in a ſetled Condition.

The Quadi ſubmit.

Ammian. lib. 20.

And Anſinarii overcome.

7. As long as he lived it ſo came to paſs, theſe Nations beyond the Rhine thought it ſufficient, that none moleſted them within their own Territories. But he being Dead, Zozimus tells us, they were preſently up again, reſolving to make War upon the Romans. Ammianus makes it a Common, and united deſign of them and the Saxons together, which that he might be able to withſtand and prevent for the time to come; the Emperour Valentinian, not onely diſpoſed his Forces of Horſe and Foot into convenient places and Garriſons, but ſtrongly fortified the Borders of Gall, all along the Rhine from the Rhetii, as far as the Ocean, with Caſtles, ſtrong Forts and Towers. The Franks hereupon deſiſted, but the Saxons proceeding in their deſign, were firſt overthrown by Severus the Roman Captain, and after they had ſubmitted, and had Peace given them, were perfidiouſly cut off by an Ambuſh laid for that purpoſe, in the place called Deuſo, in the Countrey of the Franks, (as is Conjectured) Deutzium a place ſituate over againſt Coloin. At this time Mellobandus or Mellobandes, was King of the Franks, the Comes Domeſticorum as is formerly ſaid, in the days of Valentinian and Gratian; againſt whom Macrianus King of the Alemans, having made a Peace with the Emperours, advanced with an Army, waſting all the Countries with Fire and Sword, but was received, and by the Strategems of Mellobandes overthrown and killed. Now were the Franks, the Allies and Aſſociates of the Romans, many of them flouriſhing in ſuch Grace with the Emperour; that Mellobandes aroſe to the very Dignity of Conſul, which Honour he obtained, not onely through the Favour of Gratian, who was indeed very well inclined towards his Nation; but alſo for his ſingular deſert and good Service performed in the Wars, in reſpect to which he was made General, by Valentinian againſt the Quadi, and Sarmatæ. Mellobandes afterwards under Gratian overthrew a great Force of Alemans at Argentaria, a Town ſituate upon the River Hebellus above Strasburg, in which Battel Priarius (by ſome corruptly called Priamus) was ſlain, and with him thirty thouſand of his Men, as Ammianus writes; who alſo in the War of Thrace, which Valens unfortunately managed, gives to Richomeres, the Frank, the greateſt praiſe of preſerving the Roman Army. Valens miſcarrying in this Expedition, the Northern Nations ſtill continue their Inrodes, which cauſed Gratian, who being himſelf but twenty years of Age, had his Brother for his Collegue, but thirteen years old, to ſalute Theodoſius with the Title of Emperour. He being ſick at Theſſalonica, and the Barbarians out of Thrace, invading Macedonia and Pannonia; Gratian was conſtrained to ſend Banto and Arbogaſtes, two Franks, againſt them, who overthrew the Goths in Macedonia, and forced them to return back into Thrace.

Lib. 4.

Lib. 26.

Mellobandus the French King beats the Alemans.

8. The year after the Death of Gratian, we have Richomeres Conſul together with Clearchus, and in the next that follows Banto joyned with Arcadius Auguſtus. But three years after, we have other News of the Franks; who at ſuch time as Theodoſius beſieged Maximus the Tyrant in Aquileia, under the Conduct of Genebaldus, Marcomirus and Sunno, paſs the Rhine, and invade the upper Germany, waſting all things as they march along; and having got much Booty, leave behind them many of their Company to drive the ſame Trade, and return back into their own Countrey. Of thoſe that were left behind many periſhed, and ſuch was the Succeſs ceſs againſt them, that the Roman Captains conſulted, whether they ſhould not improve it by an Invaſion of Francia it ſelf. Nauxius would by no means yield to ſo dangerous an attempt, and returned to Mentz; but Quintinus his Collegue (for to them two had Maximus committed the Care of his young Son, with the defence of Gall) animated by the importunate deſires of the under Officers would needs proceed, and paſſing the Rhine about the Caſtle Nineſium (at this day Nugs) found the Villages void of all Inhabitants, which he Commanded inſtantly to be ſet on Fire. But paſſing farther on, they were cunningly by the Enemy drawn into Bogs, Woods, and unpaſſable places, where by the envenomed Darts of the Franks they were out-right killed, or died of lingring Deaths, ſwallowed up by the Quicks, or diſadvantagiouſly fighting, were moſt of them cut off and ſlain, very few eſcaping through the darkneſs of Night and covert of Woods. This overthrow and Diſaſter is by ſome eſteemed not much inferiour to that of Varus in the time of Auguſtus, conſidering that Quintinus would not againſt ſo Valiant a Nation, whereof his Collegue ſtood ſo much in fear, lead leſs than three Legions. And whether Arbogaſtes who being appointed General by Theodoſius, againſt Victor the Son of Maximus, and had diſcomfited and ſlain him after the fight, thought that by reaſon of ſo great a Diſaſter received from his Countreymen, he himſelf and thoſe about the Court were in danger, out of hatred to the two Kings Sunno and Marcomirus, or really being bent according to his Oaths Military and of Allegiance, to advance the affairs of Rome though in the deſtruction of thoſe of his own bloud, he adviſed the Emperour to require ſatisfaction for what injury had been done, and to give up theſe perſons who had been the Incendiaries, the procurers, and fomenters of the War.

A. D. 384.

They invade the upper Germany.

Gregor. Turnenſis ex Alexand. Sulpitio, lib. 2.

9. The Emperours were ſo prudent, as to conſider what Tacitus the Hiſtorian long before had aſſerted, that the onely way to Conquer the Germans was to ſet them at odds amongſt themſelves, and therefore gave him Commiſſion, to exerciſe his Enmity or private grudges in ſuch a method as his own Judgment ſhould beſt dictate to him. He marching to Coloin in the ſharpeſt time of Winter, reſolved to invade them at that ſeaſon, when the Trees being deſtitute of Leaves ſhould afford as little ſhelter and covert as could be, and paſſing the Rhine fell upon the Quarters of the Bructeri and Æſia, a Village inhabited by the Chimani none appearing to make any reſiſtence except a few of the Anſinarii and Catti, who under Conduct of Marcomirus onely ſhewed themſelves upon the Mountains, and as well at this time as upon other occaſions he ſo beſtirred himſelf, that for two years the Franks dared not to make any attempt of moment upon Gall, or any other place of the Empire, till ſolicited and induced by the ſame perſon, that now ſo zealouſly withſtood their invaſions. Arbogaſtes elevated much with his ſucceſs, and that favour and countenance he had received from Gratian, was by this time heightned to ſuch confidence and reſolution as to brook no Superiour. Being by Gratian preferred to the place next to Banto his Countreyman, after his Death he arrogated to himſelf the chiefeſt command, without any commiſſion or conſent of Valentinian the young Emperour, having all the Souldiers at his Devotion, whom he ſo much obliged by a ſeeming contempt of money, (though he had great wealth, and through his good Conduct and Proſperity in all attempts,) that he would plainly countermand ſuch Orders as were given by the Emperour how juſt and convenient ſoever. The young Prince patiently enduring what he was not able to remedy, at length when he underſtood that the Barbarians inhabiting about the Danow were about to invade Italy, reſolved to march in perſon, and uſe his utmoſt indeavour for the relief of that Countrey. He acquaints therewith Arbogaſtes, who according to his cuſtome of contradicting whatſoever he propounded, diſlikes the deſign, which ſo inraged the Emperour, that he drew his Sword and had therewith made at him, but being hindered by an Attendant, fell upon him with Reproaches and reviling Language; Boyling ſtill with Indignation againſt him, on a time he gave him into his hands a Paper, whereby he abrogated his power, and revoked his Commiſſion, which after Arbogaſtes had peruſed, being moved to a great degree of Paſſion, he plainly told him, That as he did not give him, ſo neither ſhould he take from him his Authority.

Caret Gentibus tranſrhenanis ſi non amor Romanorum at certè odium ſui quando urgentibus imperii fatis nihil præſtare fortunæ magis poſſit quam noſtrum diſcordia, lib. de moribus Germanorum.

Marcomirus and the French beaten by Arbogaſtes a Frank but General to the Emperour.

10. By theſe and other means an implacable hatred and capital Enmity was begot betwixt them, which the poor Prince wanting Power could not improve to any real diſadvantage towards his adverſary. Arbogaſtes let him feel the firſt effects of his Strength in ſhutting him up in the Palace, and deveſting him of the Honours due to his imperial Dignity, to ſuch a meaſure, that he little differed from a private man, and what attendants and reſpect he had being worſe than none, becauſe performed by Franks and ſuch as obſerved more the nods of Arbogaſtes, than the Commands of Valentinian; Hereupon the Emperour by Letters implored the Aſſiſtence of Theodoſius his Collegue. But the Barbarians hovering over Italy, St. Ambroſe the Biſhop of Milan was deſired to go to Valentinian, and invite him to the defence of thoſe Provinces, which he underſtanding rejoyced, hoping the Biſhop by his Authority might interpoſe and get him better Quarter from Arbogaſtes. Upon a report flying of the Emperour's coming, Ambroſe according to the pleaſure of thoſe who were concerned, put off his Journey, which Valentinian underſtanding, deſired him by Letters that he would not defer to come to him. He having received the Meſſage made what haſte he could, but having paſſed the Alpes underſtood of his Death, which Arbogaſtes procured by corrupting the Eunuchs that waited on him in his Chamber, as we have formerly related, there being but little diſtance, as One more glorious in his ſufferings hath obſerved, betwixt the Priſons and Graves of Princes. Arbogaſtes having done the Fact, though already in his mind he had ſwallowed the Imperial Authority, yet would not himſelf take the Enſigns, but therewith inveſted one Eugenius his dependent and Servant, (as Claudian the Poet calls him,) who had been firſt commended to him by Richomeres his Countreyman. Treaſon when once come to ſuch height as to admit no pardon, muſt be Rigorouſly proſecuted. He perſwades his new mock Prince the ſtronger to confirm him in his lame Title, to take to him the Alliance and Aſſiſtence of the Nations beyond the Rhine, and to make ſtrict League with the Franks and Alemans. Having raiſed a conſiderable Force, they ſeize upon the Straits leading to Italy, intending to obſtruct the paſſage of Theodoſius, who yet removed the obſtruction, and by the mercy of God obtained the Victory againſt the Pagan upſtart, (who bore the banner of Hercules,) although the Franks and other Barbarous Nations omitted nothing of their Duty. Arbogaſtes after the diſaſter and Death of Eugenius having fled into the Mountains; when he perceived all ways were laid, and all means uſed for his apprehenſion, fell upon his own Sword, leſt it ſhould be ſaid that Arbogaſtes was killed by any but Arbogaſtes himſelf. A great man, a complete General by confeſſion of his Enemies, in whom thoſe abilities which in others are but ſcattered and diſtributed, did truly concentre and unite. And by ſuch true and proper humane means, he ſtill arrived at his end, viz. Proſperity and Succeſs, preſerving Theodoſius in his Imperial Dignity, depoſing and deſtroying Victor the Son of Maximus, and now had from a Scribe or a man of very low Condition, advanced and eſtabliſhed Eugenius in the Throne, had not God Almighty himſelf interpoſed, and in a miraculous manner (as Chriſtian Writers acknowledge,) daſhed in pieces this Pagan's Project.

11. Theodoſius the Emperour Died not long after, leaving two young Sons which he committed to the Cuſtody of Rufinus and Stilico, with the care of the Eaſtern and Weſtern Empires. Stilico in the Weſt made a League with the Franks, who when the Vandals invaded Gall, did what they could to oppoſe them, but being inferiour in number and ſtrength, were forced to retire into their own Quarters. Stilico being Dead, they thought themſelves it ſeems looſed from the Tye and Obligation of the League, and leſt the Vandals ſhould get all, paſs over the Rhine, break into Gall, and beſides other Cities, take, Plunder and burn that of Triers the Metropolis of that Tract. The Vandals as deſirous to keep what they had, as they were greedy to obtain it, make preſently Head againſt them, but were totally defeated, twenty thouſand of them Slain, loſt Godegiſilus their King, and had every man been cut off, but that a party of Alans ſeaſonably interpoſed. The Vandals, Alans and Suevi having enough of this Rencounter, leſt they ſhould any more have to doe with the Franks, made Gunderick the Son of Godegiſilus King, and march to the Pyrenæan Mountains, which having paſſed, they enter Spain the firſt day of October, A. D. 409, where they reduce much of the Countrey under their Obedience. Upon rumour of this notable Victory, the Britains fearing ſome attempt upon themſelves, ſtand upon their own Guard, and ſo do ſeveral Cities of Armorica, (now little Britain) ſhaking off the Roman Yoke, and modelling themſelves into a new ſort of Government. Yet did the Franks retreat back into their own Countrey, leaving the Burgundians alone with a party of Alans, to domineer over the Inhabitants of Gall.

They beat the Vandals killing their King.

12. The Franks for two or three years contained themſelves quiet within their own Bounds, onely they ſent a party to the aſſiſtence of Gerontius the Britain, who had ſlain Conſtantine the Uſurper, which was cut off and deſtroyed by Conſtantius General for Honorius the Emperour, who having ſent Ulphilas his Lieutenant againſt them, he cunningly let them paſs by till he could fall in upon their Rere, at ſuch time as he knew Conſtantius had reached their Front. Honorius by the Conduct of this Conſtantius had by this time deſtroyed the Uſurpers, removed the Goths out of Italy into Gallia Narbonenſis, and the Vandals were thence driven away, ſo that he celebrated Games for this Freedom of Italy as one overjoyed, onely the Burgundians were an Eye-ſore, who having paſſed into Gall with the Vandals, ſtill continued forſaking their Companions when they underſtood their expedition into Spain. Conſtantius therefore reſolved to fall upon them, which they being aware of, and knowing themſelves unable to bear the Shock deſired Peace, and to be received into friendſhip and confederacy with the Romans. He fearing leſt by ſome ill accident and uncertainty of War, he ſhould blur the glory of his former Atchievements, was not averſe to their Propoſals, and according to their requeſt giving them Peace, entered into a League of Friendſhip and Society. This coming once to the knowledge of the Franks, they diſdained exceedingly, that the Burgundians a People not much conſiderable either for Reputation or Strength, ſhould there obtain quiet and peaceable Poſſeſſion, where they themſelves hitherto, notwithſtanding ſo many attempts and expeditions, could not fix at all, ſpeedily therefore raiſing a great Army, they paſs the Rhine and take and burn Triers, under Conduct of Marcomirus, if we might believe Sigonius, who forgets that Marcomirus and Sunno had been either baniſhed or put to Death by Stilico, as Claudian the Poet hinteth not obſcurely. Againſt them was ſent Caſtinus the Comes Domeſticorum, (foraſmuch as Conſtantius returned to Rome to take Poſſeſſion of the Conſulſhip,) who haſting into Gall, overthrew them in ſeveral Ingagements, and forced them notwithſtanding all their courage and reſolution, once more to retreat and croſs the Rhine.

Marcomirus and Sunno put to Death.

Pharamond King of the Franks.

13. About this time it muſt be that the Franks had Pharamond for their King, in the room of Marcomirus his Father. It's very ſtrange that Gregory Turonenſis a grave and diligent Authour, ſhould not once mention this Prince. But Aimonius both names him and placeth his Reign at this time, and ſo doth Proſper Tiro in his Chronicon publiſhed by Scaliger and Pithæus, who lived about this time, and therefore good credit is to be given to him. This Chronicon in the Edition of Scaliger at the 25 year of Honorius hath theſe words, Pharamundus regnat in Francia, or, Pharamond Reigns in France, after which follows the year 26, and at it this Note, Solis facta defectio hoc Anno, The Sun was this year Eclipſed. If therefore it be certain that Pharamond Reigned the year preceding the Eclipſe, he Reigned in the year of our Lord 417. For there was not any memorable Eclipſe in any of theſe years, except that which happened on the 19th. of July, A. D. 418. Which was total throughout Africk and Ægypt, being mentioned by the Chronicon of Alexandria with this addition, that it fell out on the 14th. of the Calends of Auguſt, on the day of preparation to the Paſover, the eighth hour of the day. Idatius alſo aſſigneth the ſame fourteenth day of the Calends of Auguſt, but the heedleſs Printer or Writer reckons the fifth Teria or Thurſday, whereas Friday was the day, the Noon thereof the time, almoſt two hours later in Italy than it fell out in Ægypt. Pharamond therefore began his Reign in the year 417, not the 420 as Scaliger imagined, who thought that this Eclipſe happened in the year 421 following Bunting in his Calculations. For in this year, no Eclipſe of the Sun could be ſeen through Europe or Africk, by reaſon of the Southern Latitude of the Moon, which ſtill increaſed through the acceſſion of the Parallaxe.

14. From the Death of Marcomirus and Sunno, or rather from the time wherein Authours ſpeak nothing of them, the year 395 to the beginning of Pharamond, intervene 21 years, during which ſpace it's conceived by ſome that the Franks continued quiet, and contained themſelves within their own bounds, as alſo it is probable that they ſo did during the time he Reigned over them, elſe it's a wonder he ſhould not be mentioned by Gregory, and ſo little ſpoke of by the reſt of the Hiſtorians. There be ſome who conceive him ſo buſie at home, that he could not attend Foreign matters, ſo taken up with making Laws, that he could not have any leiſure for Warlike Employments, ſo addicted to the Society of his Wiſegaſt, Leſegaſt, Widegaſt and Solegaſt, by the aſſiſtence of which Sages he compiled his Salick Law, that his Ears were deaf to all other Councellours. But Chifletius Phyſician to the Arch-Duke at Bruſſels, though in another Book written ten years before, he thinks the Salick Law to have been made by this Prince beyond the Rhine, yet in his Anaſtaſis Childerici he judgeth it agreeable to truth, that he ſeized on that part of Gall called Belgica Secunda, which contained ten ſorts of People, as the Remi (inhabiting about Rheims in Champaigne,) Sueſſiones (thoſe about Soiſſons,) Catalanni (thoſe about Cataloni in Champaigne,) Silvanecles, Bellonaci (about Beanveiſm,) Ambiani (the Metropolis of whom was Samarobrina now Amiens,) Veromandin (Veromandois at this day,) Atrebates (Arteſiens,) Nervii at this day thoſe of Hannault, whoſe

He ſeizes on Belgica Secunda.

Vide Miræi chron. Belg. pag. 518.

Metropolis according to Ptolemy was Banacum now (Banay,) and the Morini inhabiting in part the Weſtern Coaſt of Flanders, and ſo called becauſe they Lived amongſt the Fenns then in the Teutonick called Moeren, whence our Engliſh Moores are derived. This Belgica Secunda (the Metropolis whereof was Darocottorum Remorum, (or Rheims in Champagne,) he will have him to have ſeized, being already waſted and weakned by the incurſions of the Vandals, and held it to his Death, his Argument being taken out of an old Manuſcript Genealogy, preſerved in the Palace at Bruxells, which ſaith he was Buried according to the Rites and Cuſtome of the Barbarians at Rheims without the City, towards Landunum in a little Hill which in Latin may be called Pyramis, it being the manner of old, as Servius noteth, for great men to be Buried either under great Hills, or in the Hills themſelves, whence it came to paſs that Pyramids or great Pillars were wont to be raiſed upon Graves. Whereſoever he was Buried, Sigobert writes that he Reigned eleven years, ſo that his Death muſt then according to the former account fall into the 428 year of our Lord. His name is by ſome thought to have been truly written Waramund, ſignifying the truth of the Month, War being truth, and Mund Month in the Teutonick. But Scaliger denieth that W could degenerate into F, and bids us enquire of Peter the Lombard what Fara, of which Faramond is compounded, doth properly ſignifie. For the Language of Franks, Goths, Lombards, Vandals and Burgundians, with thoſe of other Northern Nations was the ſame, being all Teutonick in their Original.

Dies.

A la manere barbariſque.

In lib. 11. Æneid.

Emendat. tempo, lib. 6.

15. From the ſaid Peter therefore we underſtand that Fara ſignifieth a live Generation or Off-ſpring, as alſo from the Laws of Lombardy and the common Speech of the Danes at this day, who to expreſs the Inhabitants or Generations of ſeveral Countries, to the name of the place add that of Fara, as Selandfar, Hollandfar, and Irelandfar, ſo that Faramond muſt denote the Month, Source, Original or defence of Nations, Generations or Off-ſprings. That many names of Men do end in Mund, is moſt notorious to any one meanly skilled in the Teutonick Language, eſpecially the Saxon Dialect, to which that of the Franks if we may conſider their Neighbourhood, muſt have had a great affinity. And here we muſt take notice that not onely this of Pharamond, but of all the other Kings heretofore mentioned are purely Tuetonick, and thereby abundantly evince the Original both of Names and Perſons, to have been no other than truly German. But to leave off this Diſcourſe and Etymology of Names, to Pharamond ſucceeded his Son Clodio, in the fifth year of the Reign of Theodoſius the younger. By this time Ætius the Roman General had fallen out with the Goths, who had formerly been removed out of Italy into Gall, and having beaten them in ſeveral Rencounters, forced them to beg Peace, by which ſtirs the Franks thinking they had a fit opportunity preſented, made a new irruption into the Roman Territories; Gregory of Tours writeth that Clodio their King lying incamped at Dyſpargus in the Borders of the Tungri beyond the Rhine, ſending out his Spies as far as Cameracum, (now Cambray upon the Schelde,) after he had underſtood that all was ſafe and paſſable, invaded Belgica Secunda, and ſetting upon the City Cambra, overpowred the Romans there lying in Garriſon, took the City and ſubdued all as far as the Rivolet Somna. But as to this Expedition, and the place from whence it is taken, there is much difference amongſt ſome modern Writers, ſome, according to what is alledged from Gregory, will have Pharamond to have kept himſelf quiet beyond the Rhine, and theſe places in poſſeſſion of the Franks at this time, on this ſide that River to have been ſeized and injoyed in the Reign and by means of his Son Clodio. Others will account Pharamond a Prince of ſuch Conduct and Valour, that the Romans durſt not attempt any thing againſt him, but that he both obtained and kept what of their Territories he had got into his hands, and theſe ſtirs that happened in the time of his Son, were occaſioned by his Youth, and want of experience, whereof the Romans took the advantage.

Lib. 2. c. 9. de geſtis Longobardorum qui Guiſulphus non prius ſe regimen ejuſdem civitatis & populi ſuſcepturum dixit in ſe & quas ipſe eligere voluiſſet Longobardorum Faras id eſt generationes vel lineas tribueret.

Leg. Longobard. lib. 3. tit. 14.

Clodio ſucceeds.

Pontan. orig. Franc. lib. 4. c. 12.

Vide Chifletii Anaſtaſ. Childerici, pag. 6.

16. That Clodio held his Royal Seat at Dyſpargus or Dysbargus, is affirmed by Himonius, and by neither party can be denied. But one contends this Caſtle was beyond the Rhine, and another affirms it was Seated at no leſſer diſtance from that River, than betwixt the Cities at this day called Bruxells and Lorrain. Pontanus alledgeth the teſtimony of Gregory Turonenſis, who ſaith it was Seated in the borders of Tungri, and Chifletius telleth us of a Manuſcript of Cambray, or Hiſtory of the Acts of the French Kings which hath to the ſame purpoſe, Habitavit Clodio Rex in Disburgo Caſtello in finibus Tungrorum; or King, Clodio lived in Diſpargus a Caſtle in the borders of the Tungri. Now the Tungri lived partly beyond, and partly on this ſide the Rhine, in that Territory to which that very place or Caſtle is very near at this day called Dinsburg, betwixt Weſel and Dyſſeldorp; and that the moſt ancient

Lib. 1. c. 4.

Lib. 2. c. 9.

Copies of Gregory Turonenſis read Tungrorum, and not Thoringorum, (which being ſo corrupted, is ſwallowed by Sigebert, and thoſe that follow him,) Pontanus appealeth to the Teſtimony and Edition of Morelius. Notwithſtanding all this acted, both out of Gregory and his own alledged Manuſcript, yet Chiffletius recants what he had formerly written in behalf of Tungrorum, becauſe he was deceived in thinking this Disburg the ſame with Deiſtheim, where Henſchenius wrote there were two Caſtles, whereof one called Disburg, which the Inhabitants themſelves ſtifly denied, affirming the place to be ſimply called Burg. But at laſt he thinks he hath found out the matter, by diſcovering two Towns, or Caſtles, bearing the Name of Duiſburg amongſt the Franks, one beyond the Rhine over againſt Coloine, at this day called Duysburgh, (in old time Caſtrum Deuſonis) the ſame which Philip the Emperour pawned to Henry the firſt, Duke of Loraine and Brabant, in the Year 1204. Another Duysborcke, a large and noble Town near Tura, almoſt in the midway betwixt Bruſſell and Loraine, which his Friend Wendelin thinketh might poſſibly be within the Dioceſe of the Tungri, ſeeing that St. Hubert, a few days before his Death, A. D. 727. dedicated a Church at Tura, and Loraine, with the Territories about it, was certainly of the Tungrian Dioceſe, as far as the River Dilia, ſo that this Duisborck was in the Borders of the Tungri, if not within the Dioceſe it ſelf; Gramaius alſo in his Antiquities of Brabant, makes honourable mention of this Duyſburg, noting in the Margent, that it was wont to ſeal with a Caſtle, bearing two Banners or Enſigns.

17. Chiffletius adds, that at the writing of his Book (A. D. 1655.) there were thoſe alive who could remember the ruines of the old Caſtle of Dursburg, in the place where now ſtands the Village of John de Mulder, in the Suburb called Tſeren, that the Paſtour of the place reported from the teſtimony of ancient Monuments, that two hundred years before Tura this Duisburg was a Caſtle of the Dukes of Brabant, wherein the Princes and Nobility were wont to conſult about State Affairs. He produceth a cutt of the Seal mentioned by Gramaius, wherewith the Scabines time out of mind have been wont to ſign their publick Inſtruments, and with his Friend Wendelin, he affirmeth, that the Dyſpargus mentioned by Gregory, much more agreeth with this place, than that beyond the Rhine, and that this was the very Caſtle which Clodio made the Seat of the Kingdom, all this Tract being made famous by the ſeveral Caſtles and Dwelling-houſes which the Princes of Brabant (deſcending from thoſe French Kings) choſe and appointed to themſelves at Bruxells, Loxain, Fara and Duisburg. But nothing doth Chiffletius by his favour produce, which neceſſarily concludeth this his Duisburg to have been the place. It is ordinary for Colonies to name the places of which they are the new Poſſeſſours, after thoſe Cities and Towns from whence they came, and whence they are deſcended, ſo that this Caſtle near Loraine might be both built and named long after this ſtory of Clodio. The Dioceſſes of places have been wont to exceed their Civil Limits, neither can Wendelin make out, that the religious Borders are here meant by Gregory. It ſeemeth that Clodio firſt ſeized on and made this Caſtle the ſeat of the French Kingdom, and he might doe it in either place, becauſe the one was beyond the Rhine, and the other within the Limits of his Expedition. But why doth not Chiffletius anſwer to the Teſtimony of Gregory Turonenſis, that Duisburg was beyond the Rhine, in reference to him who then lived and wrote in the middle of Gall it ſelf? And what will he ſay to the aſſertion of Ado Viennenſis, who writes, that Clodio marching from the Caſtle Dyſporus, (as he calls it corruptly) paſſed over the Rhine, and worſting the Romans, ſeized on Sylva Carbonaria, as far as Camacacum, and there he took up his Quarters. If this Sylva Carbonaria was part of the Sylva Arduenna, or that called now Boiſd Ardenne, lying about the Meuſe, and the Countrey of Leige, Clodio muſt have made a fine progreſs, firſt Northwards, from this Duisburg, lying betwixt Bruxells and Loraine, and then backwards again as far as the River Schelde, and the City Cambray. Certainly had he formerly taken up his Seat in that part of Brabant, he would firſt have ſo cleared the Coaſts as not to leave an Enemy at his back, neither could he be ſo little skilled in the Countrey, as to think the neareſt way to the Schelde, was to go quite contrary, except intending to leap over it, he took that courſe which thoſe obſerve who leap Ditches, by going backwards to fetch the longer run, and ſo to be carried over with the greater violence.

18. But if Clodio placed the Seat of his Kingdom at this Duisborck near Bruſſels, he can ſcarcely be ſaid there to fix it, ſo ſmall a time did he enjoy his new obtained Conqueſt. For although Gregory, Aimonius, and the reſt, take no notice of it, yet it appears from the Verſes of Sidonius Apollinaris, that Ætius the Roman hearing of this Pugnaſtis pariter, Francus qua Clojo patentes Atrebatum terras pervaſerat, hic coeuntes this irruption the Franks had made into the Atrebates (or Arteſiens) in conjunction with Majorianus, marched with great ſecrecy againſt them, and overthrew the Army of Clodio, which they fell upon unawares as they were celebrating a Marriage in all Security. The Verſes of Sidonius make mention of a Village called Helena, where this (Scythian as he terms her, or) French Virgin was married, as judgeth Pontanus, who thinks it the ſame with that at this day called Hedin le vieux, ſituate in Artois, upon the River Cancus, or Cancius. But Chiffletius blaming all other Expoſitours and Commentatours upon this place of the Poet, for their Ignorance in Geography affirms it; that very ſame which Baldericus calls Lenenenſis Caſtrum, a Town now known by the name of Lens. He will have the whole Expedition and Affair thus managed. Clodio having entered the Sylva Carbonaria (but that he did it from Duisborcke not a word) paſſed on in the military high way leading through Angia, Athus and Lutoſa, as far as Tornacum, (or Tournay) where others of theſe artificial and publick ways met, as from Virovacum (now Verinck) Torenenna, (Teroane) Nemetacum, or as Hortius calls it Neinetocenna (Arras) Cameracum (Cambray) and Ponſſcaldis, or the Bridge of Scaldis, at this day Eſcanpont, all which Ways, High-Streets, or Cauſways, meeting together, Sidonius expreſſeth by his Coeuntes claudebant anguſta vias. Now Ætius and Majorianus having in their paſſage taken the Village Helena, expected the coming of Clodio, and at length joined Battel with him in a very difficult place, betwixt Tournay and the Bridge. On the Bridge leading over the Schelde, which was but narrow, ſtood Ætius, and under, or below it, Majorianus; whence, ſaith he, the Wedding which was kept on an hill, nigh the Bank of a River, was diſturbed, and (to the unſpeakable grief no doubt of the Bride) ended in Bloud and Slaughter. That this was a great defeat of the Franks, ſufficiently appeareth from Sidonius, but whether as a puniſhment of their ſecurity and careleſneſs, they ſuffered expulſion quite out of Gall, and were driven back beyond the Rivers Meuſe and the Rhine, cannot by any thing he ſaith be determined; ſome think the contrary, conſidering that the Poet writing a Panegyrick to Majorianus, would not have omitted a thing ſo notable, making for his purpoſe. However * Proſper in his Chronicon expreſly writeth, that part of Gall near the Rhine, which the Franks had poſſeſſed, was recovered by the Arms of Count Ætius. And Caſſiodorus, who lived at this time, addeth, that † in the Conſulſhip of Felix and Taurus, Ætius having ſlain a great number of Franks, recovered that Tract beyond the Rhine, on which they had ſeized. As for Clodio, notwithſtanding this ill ſucceſs, yet Gregory writes, that he was a profitable and moſt noble Prince, Ado Viennenſis will have him to have reigned twenty five years, but Proſper ſets his death at the 448th Year of our Lord, which contracts his Reign within the number of one and twenty years. As for his being buried at Cambray, the modern French Hiſtorians, who tell the ſtory, have too great a tale to make good that that City was then in the Power of the Franks, if not, that his Subjects had the courage thither to tranſlate his Body.

Claudebant anguſta vias, arcúq; ſubactum
Vicum Helenam, fluménq; ſimul ſub tramite longo
Arctus, ſuppoſitis trabibus tranſmiſerat Agger
Illic ſe poſito, pugnabat ponte ſub ipſo
Majorianus Eques. Fors ripæ colle propinquo
Barbaricus reſonabat Hymen Scythicisq; choreis
Nudebat flavo ſimilis nova nupta marito,
Hos ergo ut perhibent ſtravit, crepitabat ad ictus
Claſſis——

Clodio and his French beaten by Ætius.

Dies.

* Chron. Conſ. ad An. Dom. 419. pars Galliarum propinquior Rheno quam Franci poſſidendam acceperant Ætii Comitis armis recepta.

† Felice & Tauro Conſſ. Ætius multis Francis captis quam occupaverant propinquam Rheno partem recepit.

19. After Clodio reigned Meroneus, not his Son, but his Kinſman, one of his Lineage, in the twenty fifth Year of Valentinian. The ancient Manuſcript Genealogy of the French Kings, formerly mentioned, and to be ſeen in the King's Library at Bruſſels, tells us, that being not the Son of Clodio, but his Kinſman, he cauſed himſelf to be made King, excluding the Sons of his Predeceſſour. The Manuſcript of Cambray, called Geſta Regum Francorum, gives him the name of Meronechus, who being of the ſtock of Clodio, ſucceeded him. Pontanus makes a great Argument to confirm what he formerly had aſſerted, that Clodio loſt not all he had got on this ſide the Rhine, becauſe this Meroneus, preſently after his death, as ſeveral Writers teſtifie, enjoyed what bordered on the River, without any trouble or conteſt, placed ſome of his Franks upon the River Axona (now Ayſne or Diſne) in the Borders of the Rhenni, and was called upon by Valentinian and Ætius for ſuccour againſt Attila, the common Enemy, to all thoſe that poſſeſſed any thing in Gall. He grants therefore that Ætius and Majorianus might expell Clodio out of Secunda Belgica, but not out of Germania ſecunda, or the Inferiour Germany, the Metropolis whereof was Coloine, and which contained two ſorts of People, eſpecially, viz. the Ubii and the Tungri, to which all, or moſt of the reſt may be referred. For under the Name of Tungri are thoſe contained whom Cæſar calleth by the common Name of Germans, as the Eburones, (the Inhabitants of Luych or Leigh) Condruſii, (thoſe about Condreux or Condrox) Pæmani, Segni and Særeſi, which five Nations, together with the Adnatici and Bateſii, were in later Ages compriſed under the Name of Tungri. But the Franks being ſummoned by Ætius, fought moſt valiantly in that famous Catalaunian Battel, wherein a great number, if not the greateſt part of them, Meroneus ſucceeds.

Proſper Greg. lib. 2. c. 9. Meroneus qui non erat Clodii filius, ſed ipſi ſanguine conjunctus, fecit ſe creari Regem, Clodii filios duos, qui ætate minores erant, excludendo.

Vid. Sigon. Chronicon. Bug. & alios.

Sect. 2.

them loſt their Lives, and the remainders returned home with Meroneus their King. By Rocico the Monk he is called Meronicus, who writes, that he was choſen King, inthroned in the City of the Ambiani or Amiens, and that from him, in reſpect of his Prudence and good Government, thoſe called formerly Franks were after him named Meroningi, being held in ſuch Veneration, that he was eſteemed no leſs than a common Father. Upon this account he is, in a Manuſcript Book containing the Life of Charles the Great, in a Table of the Images of the French Kings thereunto prefixed, made the Head, or Original of the firſt Generation, being wholly ſeparated from Clodio. He reigned ſeven Years. The place of his burial is not known.

Geſt. Franc. l. 1.

In Biblioth. Regia Bruxell. ſervat.

Dies.

20. Theſe were the Atchievements of the ancient Franks for one hundred and ſeventy years, and ſuch were the beginnings and rudiments of the French Power and Dominion in Gall, which if as well the modern as more ancient Hiſtorians of that Nation had duly conſidered, they had not ſo much doted on the vain Trojan Title, nor attributed ſo much to the fabulous Narration of thier Hunibaldus. By what we have already ſaid, may be ſufficiently diſcovered, which was the moſt ancient Seat of the Franks, how by degrees they arrived at their Conqueſt, when, and upon what account, they paſſed the Rhine, and that they had many Kings before the time of Pharamond and Meroneus, though utterly unknown to Gregory Biſhop of Tours, their moſt diligent Hiſtorian. Now we have brought them into Gall, we muſt ſee how they there behaved themſelves, and what Progreſs they made till ſuch time as they became Maſters of that renowned Province. But for a clearer Method and way of proceeding (the greateſt help to Learning, and beſt part of Logick) let us firſt tell the Reader how this Countrey ſtood, and who were thoſe that inhabited it at the time of their Invaſion. At that time therefore Gall was poſſeſſed by three ſorts of Nations, or People, viz. Romans, Burgundians and Goths. The Romans held all from the River Rhine, as far as Ligeris, or Loire, in Gallia Celtica, except certain Cities of Aremorica (now Britain) which revolted, and put themſelves under a new form of Government. The Goths beyond Ligeris poſſeſſed all Aquitain. The Burgundians whatſoever lies about Rhodanus, towards the upper part of the Rhine, a few Cities excepted, which retained their fidelity to the Romans. The hither part of Spain was held partly by the Goths, partly by the Romans, and the farther and more remote, by the Vandals, and their Aſſociates.

The Poſſeſſours of Gall.

Childerick ſucceeds.

21. To Meroneus then ſucceeded Hildericke, or Childerick his Son, who was born at Samarobina, the City of the Ambiani (at this day called Amiens) about the Year of our Lord 436. Being fifteen years old he was taken Priſoner by the Hunnes, together with his Mother, but was reſcued and delivered by Wiomadus a Frank. Having ſucceeded his Father in the Year 455. with whom he was continually brought up and learnt the Diſcipline of the Camp, he reſolved to recover what he had loſt, and burnt with deſire of inlarging the Power and Dominions of the Franks, having a good opportunity put into his Hands by the death of Ætius and Valentinian. It may be gathered from the verſes of Sidonius Apollinaris, that after their death he added to the conqueſt of Secunda Germania, and Belgica Prima, (which laſt contained four Cities, or People, viz. the Treveri, Mediomatrici, Leuci and Veroduni, the Metropolis being Auguſta Treverorum (now Triers) made by Clodio and his Father, the Triumphs of Germania Prima and Secunda Belgica, whereof the former contained the Vangiones (under whom were of old reckoned thoſe of Wormes and Mentz, but Moguntiacum, or Mentz, being afterward built by the Romans upon the place where the Meyne falls into the Rhine, it came to be head of Germania Prima and ſo at this day continues) the Nemetes and Tribocci. Neither yet herewith content, he invaded and ſubdued almoſt all as far as the River Loire, with which Enterprize Anitus, the Roman Emperour, then awakened, committed the care of what remained on the other ſide of that River to Ægidius a Patritian, and the Magiſter Militum. Anitus being laid aſide, Majorianus took the Enſigns of the Empire, who having done great things againſt the Vandals, and others in Africk, entred Gall, to clear that Countrey of all Intruders. He reſolved firſt to begin with the Alans, as thoſe that were more inconſiderable than either the Franks or Burgundians. But whilſt this game was playing, Childerick, King of the Franks, plaid ſuch prancks with the Wives and Daughters of his Subjects, that he ſpeedily turned Banckrupt, both of Kingdom and Reputation, having rendred himſelf very odious to his Nobility for his great Exactions, but eſpecially for his many and notorious Adulteries, he was either forced out of his Kingdom, or foreſeeing a ſtorm, prudently retired out of the danger. Gregory of Tours writes, that perceiving his Life to be way-laid, he departed into the Fredeg. cap. 11.

Francus Germanum primum, Belgámq; ſecundi Sternebat, Rhenúmq; ferox Alemanne bibebas, &c.

Goes into exile.

Sect. 2.

the Countrey of the Thoringi, as the preſent Copies have it, but Pontanus thinks that Tungri is to be read, both becauſe the ſame corruption is notorious elſewhere in this Authour, and it was much more eaſie for him to fly to them, and convenient to continue amongſt them, who were near at hand both on this and the other ſide of the Rhine, than to make a long Journey into the territories of the Thoringi, betwixt whom and the Franks, were the Alemans, and ſeveral other Nations, not at all inclined to ſhew any Hoſpitality, or afford any Kindneſs to a Frank.

Greg. l. 2. c. 12.

Papirius, Maſſonus, Annal. lib. 1. p. 13.

22. Indeed it appears from the Story, that he intended not in his retirement to be far out of the way. For he left behind him Wiomadus (or Windomalus) his truſty and faithfull friend, to lie as it were Leiger for him, to obſerve and watch all fit occaſions, to mollifie the Spirits of the People, to aſſiſt time in wearing out all Prejudice and Regret from exulcerated Minds, and then to give him a ſign when there ſhould want onely his Preſence to perfect the good inclinations of his Subjects.

Ægidius got the Kingdom.

He cut in two a piece of Gold, whereof the one part he left with him, and took the other himſelf, commanding him to truſt to no other Token, but ſending that piece carefully to him upon occaſion, thereby to prevent the fraud and cunning of the adverſe Faction. He being thus withdrawn, the Franks reject all of their own Bloud, and commit themſelves into the hands of Ægidius, a Roman Captain, to whom Anitus, when Emperour, had given a Command amongſt the Sueſſiones upon the River Loire, and he governed them as King, for the ſpace of eight years, being a Perſon excellently accompliſhed with all Endowments of Body and Mind, which received greater Luſtre from his Profeſſion of the Chriſtian Religion. All this while Wiomadus was not idle, but being for the repute of his Prudence and Induſtry received amongſt the number of Ægidius his Friends, improved the advantage thence afforded all manner of ways, to the Service of his old Maſter, and when many of his Enemies were removed out of the way by Death, others brought over to his Party, and the greater part either moderated by time, or touched at length with the ſenſe of ſome Impropriety in the thing, that they ſhould be governed by a mere Stranger, he thought things ripe enough, and ſent him the piece of Money, as had been agreed betwixt them.

A. D. 469.

Returns.

Sigebert tells us expreſly, that his Subjects returned to their Duty, and deſired his Return, wherein he was not ſlack, and being joyfully received by the major part, with little trouble he drove away Ægidius his Competitour.

Cap. 11.

23. But Fredegarius, in his Epitomized Hiſtory of the Franks, tells a ſtory of Childerick his betaking himſelf to Conſtantinople, to Mauricius the Emperour, and of his return thence by Sea into France, a very pritty piece of Anacroniſm, the Emperour Mauricius living no leſs than an whole Age after Childerick. Wilthomius his Chronicon, written in the Year 810. mendeth the matter by reading it Martianus, who though he lived not ſo long before this Exile of Childerick, as Mauricius did after, yet died in the Year 457. whereas the flight of Childerick happened about the Year 461. and his reſtitution eight years after. But were it for no other Reaſon, than that Gregory of Tours, who was more ancient than the reſt, and lived in the next Age to Childerick, makes no mention of it at all, the Story were juſtly to be ſuſpected.

Lib. 1. cap. 7.

It makes nothing for his Sea Voyage, what Aimonius expreſly writeth, that the King being in the middle of his way, ſent to give Winomadus notice of his coming, with orders ſpeedily to meet him, which he as readily performed, with the French Nobility, and found him at the Caſtle of Barrum, the Inhabitants whereof he had commanded to receive him with all Reſpect and Honour. They ſo fully complied with his Commands, that they went out to meet him, and conducted him into their Town, with which Office of Duty and Kindneſs Childerick was ſo much pleaſed, as in Teſtimony of his Acceptance of ſo ominous a beginning, he remitted to them the Tribute they had been formerly accuſtomed to pay.

Lib. 2. c. 15.

Lib. 1. c. 5.

This Barrum Franchett would have Barrum Ducis, or Head of the Dukedom of Barre. Belleforeſt takes it for Barr upon the Siene. But thoſe two are far later than this Barr now in queſtion; neither was the Dominion of the Franks at this time ſo large in Extent, being bounded with the River Somona, otherwiſe called Phrudus, now the Somme; Olivar Vredius in his deſcription of the ancient Flanders, will have it ſome Fort in Brabant, or elſe Batavia. Chiffletius concludes it was a Town belonging to Brabant, at this day called Per, it being a Cuſtome of the Romans to change their Teutonick P, into their B, as might be made appear by many Examples. This Per, he tells us, was an ancient Caſtle, where now is to be ſeen an Houſe of Nunns, and he is the more ſtrengthened in his Opinion, conſidering that upon ſuppoſal of Childerick his flying into Thoringia, this place would lye convenient for his Journey. From Amiens, the Reſidence of Childerick to Erfurd, or the Royal Caſtle of Thoringia, (the Ruines whereof are yet remaining) are reckoned one hundred and thirty Brabant Leagues, in the middle whereof is Coloine ſeated on the Rhine, where he ſuppoſeth Childerick to have ſtaid, and thence ſent to Wiomadus, who preſently met him at Per, or Ber, fifty Leagues diſtant from Amiens, and from Coloine fifteen. But this is altogether uncertain.

24. What way ſoever he came, he was followed by Baſina, the Wife of King Baſinus, by whom he had been entertained, a Woman that had broke her Conjugal Faith formerly with him, and finding, as ſhe did not ſhame to tell him, his great abilities that way to ſatisfie her Appetite, came for that very purpoſe, that ſhe might ſtill cohabite with him. To this Relation Fredegarius and Aimonius add a Story of the ſhapes of ſeveral Beaſts, as Lions, Unicorns, Leopards, Bears, Wolves, Dogs, and leſſer ſorts of Animals, ſeen by Childerick on his Wedding night, with the Interpretation made by Baſina, upon which account Trithemius calls her a Witch, although the Flemmings at this day call a wiſe and provident Woman by the name of Baſinne, and diminutively Baſinneke. But after his Reſtitution Childerick, to make amends for his former Looſneſs and Injuries offered to his Subjects, purſued the Wars with all alacrity and vigour. Baronius, out of the Acts of St. Genoneſue, relates how the City of Paris being long beſieged by the Franks, the People oppreſſed with Famine were miraculouſly relieved by that Virgin; yet they took the City, and therein Childerick placed his Royal Seat. Sigebert writes, that the Franks invaded Gall, not ſo much to plunder and ſpoil, as now to make it their perpetual Habitation, took Colonia Agrippina, or Coloine, having put to flight Ægidius the Roman Captain, and ſlain a great number of the Romans. Rocico the Monk adds, that Childerick at this time fell upon the ſame City, which after too much ſlaughter made, he ſubdued, being then governed by Ægidius the Roman, who, not able to reſiſt ſuch a Force, betook himſelf to flight, and ſo eſcaped the rage and fury of the King. Both theſe Hiſtorians farther tell us, that the Franks proceeding, beſieged and took Triers, ſituate upon the Moſſelle, at which time Ægidius, the Tyrant of the Romans, as the Monk calls him, died, and Siagrius his Son, in the City Sueſſio, was advanced to his Father's Throne.

Gregor. Tur. & Rocico, lib. 1.

Ad An. 456.

A. D. 475.

Beats Ægidius the Roman General.

A. D. 476.

25. The Year following Childerick, with his Army, marched as far as Aurelia, or Orleance, which having with too much cruelty waſted all the Countrey about it, at length he took it, and purſuing his Victory all along the Loire, as far as the Mouth of the River Meduana, on which ſtands the City Andeganus, or Anjou, the year following he took it in alſo, and burnt it, putting to the Sword Paulus, a Count and Governour of the Town. Rocico tells us, that there he deſigned to have met with Adonagrius, General of the Saxons, who had taken and hazarded the City, but he fled away by boat, and left Paulus to keep the City, who therefore thus periſhed in his Stead. Yet from Sigebert it appears, that Childerick this ſame year made a League with this ſaid Captain of the Saxons, whom he calls Andorackrius, both of them together ſubdued the Alemans. Gregory adds, that Odoacrius made a League with Childerick, and that they ſubdued the Alemans, who had invaded part of Italy, which Alemanni ſome think no other than the Alani, being Gallo Germans, who in the time of Tacitus inhabited betwixt the Rhine and Danow, afterward paſſing over the River, infeſted Gallia Belgica with their frequent Inrodes. Rocico the Monk tells us for a concluſion, that Childerick, deſirous to return to his own Houſe, or the City of the Ambiani, was taken with a Fever, and left his Kingdom to Clodoneus his Son. But he omits his laſt Expedition, mentioned both by Gregory and Sigebert. Having reigned twenty four Years, as Aimonius computeth, he died in his Return, at Ternacum, or Tourney, and was buried there on the left hand of the military way, leading to the Town, at one hundred and fifty foot diſtance from the ſaid way, towards the North, and ſix hundred from the neareſt Eaſtern Bank of the River Scheld, being interred according to the Roman Cuſtome, which required, that betwixt the Sepulchre and the Highway ſhould be left a ſpot of Ground ſacred to the Dii Manes, juſt ſo many foot large, as that betwixt this and the military way. But for the proof of the place of his Sepulture, we have an Argument ſo notable and rare, that it cannot be paſſed over without ſome ſignificant and ſpecial Remarks.

Sigebert. A. D. 477. Gregor. Rocico, Papirius, Maſſonus, lib. 1. p. 14.

Enlarges his Dominions,

478.

And dies.

26. The City of Tourney is divided into two by the River Schelde, which alſo parts the Dioceſe of Cambrey from that of the Atrobates and Tourney. On the ſide of Cambrey Dioceſe are three eminent Pariſhes, of St. John, St. Nicholas, and of St. Brixius, ſtanding betwixt them both, moſt large and conſiderable, whereof the Parſon Pattus perceiving the Houſe of the Treaſurer, and the Alms-houſe of the Pariſh, which ſtood near the Church-Yard, and his own Houſe, to be very ruinous, after he had taken advice with the Æditici, or Churchwardens, reſolved to pull pull it down, and build up another ſtronger and upon more deep Foundations. In the Year 1653. the twenty ſeventh day of May, at three of the Clock in the Afternoon, when they had digged to the depth of ſeven Foot, or more, lighting of a kind of a ſtony Rock, there was found a Button of Gold, and preſently after a bundle as it were of rotten Leather, wherein were contained more than one hundred Golden Coins, by one Hadrian Quinquinus, a Labourer both deaf and dumb, who by his inarticulate Voice and Geſtures, called as well as he could the Neighbours together. Pattus with two of the Wardens came to the place, with intention to ſeize on the Treaſure for the uſe of the Church, and furthering the building. There they found moreover about two hundred Silver Roman Coins ſo eaten with Ruſt, that they could not be read, and therefore were afterward loſt, no reckoning being made of them. Many pieces of Iron almoſt all conſumed with Age, and the moiſture of the Ground. Two skulls, whereof one of a larger ſize, together with the bones of an humane Skeleton. Then within a matter of five Foot farther, many other things of Art and value; as a Sword, that at the firſt handling it fell into pieces, with the Hilt and Scabbard, Eſtines, or a Caſe of writing Inſtruments, the Head of an Oke, with about three hundred Bees (many more it's Conjectured, being carried away amongſt the Rubbiſh) a Bodkin, Buttons, Claſps, Nails, Plates, and Boſſes all of Gold, and ſet with an infinite number of Rubies, beſides the Skull of an Horſe. And that without which, neither the Age nor Perſon, whom they concerned could ever have been known, the Golden Ring of Childerick, King of the Franks, and therein his Image and Name ingraven.

An account of the place and manner of his Sepulture.

Anaſtaſis Childerici per Chiffletium Antwerpiæ, 1655.

27. The Golden Coyns were of Valentinian, Marcian, Leo, Zeno, Baſiliſcus and Marcus. But the neweſt was that of Zeno, in the ſeventh Year of whom, or there about, died Childerick the firſt, ſo that his muſt be the Grave and Relicks, the Subject of this ſtory. Beſides theſe, were found an Axe, or Hatchet of War, by Chiffletius called the King's Franceſca, which lay behind him, together with his Framea, or a kind of Dart; a piece of an Horſe-ſhoe of Iron, another Gold Ring, a Cryſtal-Ball as big as thoſe of the Tennis-Court, an Oxehead of Gold (being the King's Idol) and the top of his Swords-hilt, wherein is to be ſeen a double Calves-head, a Golden Caſe for the Hilt, a piece of an Agate-Cup, with ſeveral other things, of very great Curioſity. The Treaſure was preſented to Arch-Duke Leopoldus Guilielmus then Governour of the Low-Countries, for the King of Spain; who giving to the poor of the place more than the value thereof, with reward to the poor Man, who firſt diſcovered it, commanded Chiffletius to make what Obſervations he could upon the particulars, and commit his Remarks upon ſo eminent and noble a Subject to Poſterity. This he hath done in his Anaſtaſis Childerici, or Reſurrection of Childerick; a Book furniſhed with much Good, and various, ſometimes impertinent Learning, out of which, it will not be amiſs for us to make ſome Obſervations, which may tend to the Illuſtration of the Subject in hand; the knowledge of theſe moſt dark and confuſed times, and the farther not impertinent Information of the Reader, to whom perhaps it may be ſome Recreation after theſe knotty Diſquiſitions.

28. That it was a Cuſtome of old time, to bury Treaſure and much Riches with Kings, and great Perſons; the Hiſtories of David, of Cyrus, and many other Princes do abundantly teſtifie, although Ulpian telleth us, that Ornaments ought not to be buried with Bodies; the Deſignment of ſuch things by Will being of no Force, and Null by the Civil Law. That as well Chriſtians as Heathens, have been wont to bury their Dead in very rich Clothes, the Conſent of all Antiquity, notwithſtanding the Law, doth ſufficiently evince. Kings and Souldiers were buried in Purple, as Childerick in a Robe of Gold, wrought upon purple Silk, as did appear by what remains were found in his Grave; which time and moiſture had not altogether cauſed to change their Colour. Upon his Signet or Gold Ring, is his Image ingraved, having very long Hair, and large, lying upon both his Shoulders, holding in his Right hand a Dart. The Inſcription Childirici Regis, not in Gothick but Roman Letters; a certain Note, whoſe Ring it was, and to what times it belonged, even thoſe wherein the Roman Elegancies, good Arts and Sculpture amongſt the reſt were not as yet aboliſhed, although remitting much from its ancient Perfection; G. in the word Regis being changed into S. The writing of Childiricke was of old uſed, as well as Childerick, as of Sigibertus, for Sigebertus. I having ſo much affinity with E, that as Varro acknowledgeth, the Ancients were wont to make uſe of them indifferently. Neither ought the Ring to be ſuſpected, becauſe the Inſcription is in Roman Characters: For the French Kings of the firſt Race were skilled in the Latin Tongue; as it appears in Theodomeres one of the number, the Son of Richimeres, and Aſila, expreſſed in a Golden Coyn, publiſhed by by Paulus Petavius with this Inſcription, Teudome Rex of the very ſame Character, as this of Childerick. Clodonæus the firſt, Clotarius the firſt were both of them Learned in the Roman Language, and of the latter Petavius publiſhed alſo a Golden Coyn, on which was twice inſcribed Chlotarius Rex. The like inſtance might be made in ſeveral others.

Lib. 14. f. de Religioſis & ſumptibus funeribus & ſervo alieno 113. f. Fin. de legatis. 1.

29. Indeed granting that to be true, which both Gregory Turonenſis and Aimonius write, concerning Chilperick, the firſt, his adding four new Letters to thoſe formerly uſed, and Ch amongſt the reſt, the King with its Inſcription might juſtly be ſuſpected, Childerick being Great Grandfather to him, by whom thoſe four ſhould be invented, and therefore his Name written Hilderick, the Ch not being as yet in uſe. But who can be ſo ridiculouſly credulous, to believe that Chilperick brought theſe Letters firſt into the World, which are manifeſtly taken from the Greek Alphabet, and were then in uſe amongſt the Romans? from whom perhaps, Chilperick might ſo far take them as to Communicate them, to the Orthography of the Vulgar French, for as well that, as other barbarous Northern Nations, might be very deficient in Characters and Writing. But to ſay, or imagine that thoſe amongſt them who underſtood Latin, could not uſe Ch before his time is more than Extravagant. Therefore, in a Golden Coyn of Chlotarius the Father of Chilperick, is twice ingraven Chlotarius Rex. None that are Learned in the Greek and Latine Tongues, but muſt needs take notice of the great difference in their Writing, and pronouncing the Roman Names of Men and Places; for each Language hath its particular Genius and Idiome, not onely of Phraſe, but Pronunciation alſo, to expreſs which, Letters are or ought to be adopted as near as poſſible. The Name of Childerick is German. Huldas, Aventine tells us, is Love; Hulderick, Love of a Kingdom, or Rich in Love; or, as Hadrianus Junius interprets it, Rich in Suffrage, Hulden being the ſame, as to Grace with ones Suffrage; the Letter C being Euphoniæ gratiâ added to H. But whom the Ancient Saxons named Hylderick, the Celtæ called Childerick, and thence might the Romans take it, as more agreeable to their Pronunciation. Therefore, not onely Gregory Turonenſis writes Childerick and Chilperick, for Hilderick and Hilperick, as Chuni for Huni; but Claudian alſo, Auſonius, Sidonius and Proſper.

Lib. 5. c. 44.
Lib. 3. c. H.
In Nomenclatura.
Hiſt. Bat. cap. 23.
Et Hilperick.

30. As for the long Hair, which Chilperick wore, as his Image cut in his Seal repreſents him; the Reader muſt know it was the Cuſtome of the Noblemen, amongſt the Franks or Sicambri to uſe that Faſhion, which was utterly unlawfull for the Vulgar ſort. The Romans when they took any of them, cut off their long yellow Hair, and ſent them to the Women for new Faſhions, which muſt needs be a great affliction to them, conſidering that by the Salick Law, no leſs a mulct than two hundred and fifty Denarii were inflicted, on any one that ſhould Poll any Boy without the Knowledge and Conſent of his Parents. But their Beards were as ſhort as their hair was long, being cloſe ſhaved off, as Sidonius the Poet deſcribeth them. The Spear which he holds in his Right hand, was not onely for War, but betokened Dominion and Empire; it appearing from Gregory, Aimoinus and others, that the Kings uſed the delivery of it, as a ſign of Inveſtiture (being indeed the ſame with the ancient Sceptre) to which ſucceeded amongſt the German Emperours, a Sword for Kingdoms, and a Banner for Provinces. As to the faſhion of the Signet it ſelf, Kings before the uſe of Arms on Shields, according to the preſent Cuſtome, were wont to ſign and Seal with ſeveral Impreſſes and Repreſentations. The ancient Perſian Kings uſed the Image of the preſent King, ſay ſome, others of Cyrus, and others ſay of the Horſe of Darius, which got him the Kingdom by Neighing. Alexander the Great, as writes Curtius, ſealed ſuch Letters as were ſent into Europe, with an old King, ſuch as were for Aſia, with that of Darius. Scylla cauſed to be Ingraven in his Ring the Image of Jugurtha, whom he had Conquered. Auguſtus Cæſar at firſt Sealed with a Sphynx, and when he perceived that gave occaſion of Diſcourſe, with the Image of Alexander, and at laſt with his own (cut by Dioſcorides) which laſt Faſhion was followed by his Succeſſours. Yet Galba broke the Cuſtome, Sealing with his Paternal device of a Dog looking from the Deck of a Ship. And Commodus tells Clodius Albinus, that he ſhould receive his Letters ſealed with the Seal of Amazonia; the ancient Kings of the Franks wore their own Images in their Rings, repreſenting onely the Head and part of the Breaſt, by the Romans called Effigies Thoracatus, and Προτομὰς Βασιλικὰς, by the Greeks. Such is this of King Childerick, and a later of Chilperick his great Grandſon, having after the Faſhion of thoſe of the Eaſtern Emperours, their Breaſt-plates adorned as it were with Gemms.

Claudian. in laud. Stiliconis Greg. Turon. lib. 2. c. 9. & lib. 3. c. 18.
Tit. 28. §. 2.
In carm. 5. Vultibus undique raſis Pro barba tenues perarantur pectine criſtæ.
Otho Friſingenſis, lib. 2. c. 5.
Thucid. Interpr.
Lib. 6. c. 11.
Plutarch.
Sueton.
Dio, lib. 51.
Capitolinus in Clodio.

31. But amongſt the other Rarities preſented to the Arch-Duke, was there an Image of the Head of an Oxe of pure Gold, whereof the Eyes, Noſtrils and Horns were decked with Rubies. The Brain-pan was hollow and open, having a cover, and the whole pervious and hollow, as far as the Throat for the receiving (it's probable) of Wine or other Liquors for Adoration. On the cover was a Button, either for to hang on it Magical Toys, for Garlands, Flowers, or the like Gifts, or Offerings. This hung on the Forehead of his Horſe, being faſtened to the Headſtall, from which Pattus the Prieſt looſed it, and was indeed the King's Idol, and Companion in his Warlike expeditions. For the Franks were at this time Pagans (or Fanaticks, as an ancient Authour calls them) uſing various ſorts of Images and Repreſentations; and amongſt others, it ſeems this of an Oxe, which whether they had it from the Ægyptian Cuſtome of worſhipping the Bull Apis, or each People received it from a more general abuſe of Religion, at the diſperſion of Nations as ſome conceive, is not fit in this place to be diſcuſſed. Chiffletius obſerves, that after Chriſtianity came amongſt them; they were yet much addicted to this ſort of Animal, being wont to be drawn by them in Chariots, which Cuſtome yet continues amongſt the Inhabitants of Taxandria or Brabant, where the moſt ancient Franks firſt ſeated themſelves. He conceives the Idol to be hung at the Forehead of the Horſe out of a Religious humour, which Tacitus long agoe obſerved to be in the Germans (Predeceſſours and Progenitours of the Franks) who attributed much unto the Neighings, or various noiſe made by Horſes, taking thence their preſages, and counting no Auſpicium, ſo certain and infallible. But as the Horſe his Face was adorned with this Idol of an Oxes Head, ſo his trappings with a number of Bees of the ſame Metal; there being betwixt the Natures of Bees and Oxen, ſo great affinity, that as Naturaliſts unanimouſly agree, Bees are generated out of the corrupted Carkaſſes of Oxen, and as both Bernardinus Gomeſius, and Kircher have obſerved in ſeveral Drones, which in their Entrails retain ſomething which manifeſtly bears the ſhape of the Idol of Childerick. All thoſe Bees were of one bigneſs, weighing each thirty ſix Grains of pure Gold, having none of a larger ſize, or Kings amongſt them, which Office Childerick deſired alone, and without any Repreſentation of a Competitour to enjoy, whilſt the little Bees expreſſed the duty of loving and obedient Subjects.

Geſta Reg. Francorum.

Lib. de moribus Germanorum.

Gomeſius & in illo Voſſius, lib. 4. Obeliſki Pamphili, cap. 1.

32. Hereby ſeaſonably, as Chiffletius judgeth, may be determined that Queſtion ſo much of late debated, and by none Satisfactorily determined, viz. What were the Arms of the ancient French Kings? Guaguinus tells us, that it was a conſtant Report continued to his time, that three Toads were born by them in their Armour, which Papirius Maſſonus alſo confeſſeth; but affirms the opinion to be grounded upon no Authority. Nicolaus Gillius reports, that Clodonæus the firſt bore in his Eſcutcheon three Creſcents, which at length he rejected and exchanged for Lilies, but he who lived the laſt Age is not at all to be heeded, relating a thing which happened one thouſand one hundred Years before, without ſome Teſtimony of Antiquity to back him. In like manner, Paulus Æmilius tells us a ſtory of Clodonæus, who being to be Baptized, inſtead of three red Diadems, which he bore in a White ſhield whilſt he was Pagan, took Lilies, which hath no more Foundation in Antiquity than the former. Neither were Lilies then born by the ancient French Kings. Firſt, becauſe as now they are the Arms of France, they are Golden, which Colour is not natural unto Lilies, envied by Venus her ſelf for their Whiteneſs. Again a Lily conſiſts of ſix Leaves, theſe of France but of three; and laſtly, none of theſe Kings uſed them, foraſmuch as Ducheſne, Hiſtoriographer to the French King, confeſſed in a Letter to Chiffletius, that he could not obſerve Lilies in any Seal of the French Kings before Philip Auguſtus. Upon this Account, thoſe both of the Line of Meroneus, and Charles the Great are excluded, to whom thoſe Lilies in their Tombs are falſly aſcribed, which gave Peireskius juſt occaſion, as well as other Circumſtances, to Quarrel with the Tombs of Clodonæus at St. Genoneſue, and Chilperick at St. Germans, and to eſteem ſo little of thoſe at St. Denis; that he thought all thoſe moſt ancient Monuments to have been built at the ſame time, and not long before the Reign of St. Lewis. Fauchet Conjectures, that the firſt Heralds that invented the Coat Armour of the Franks, intending to denote their Original from the Sicambri, who inhabited the Fenns of Freiſland, toward Holland, Zeland and Guelderland, gave their Kings the flower Panilea or Iris (being a little Lily of a yellow Colour, which groweth in Marſh Grounds, and flouriſhing in May or June) in a blew Field imitating water, which when it ſtands ſtill acquireth the Colour of the Skies. But not to ſpeak of Geography, which gives to the Franks, as we have ſeen, dry Ground as well as Marſhes; Chiffletius rejects this flower partly, becauſe there is of it no mention in Antiquity. Eſpecially, for what he diſcovered in the Grave of Childerick. Renatus Ceriſerius, would have them to have been the Head of a Spear, which afterwards came to be changed for its ſimilitude into Lilies: But he

In Clodonæo.

Lib. 3. Annal.

In Clodonæo.

Præfat. ad Tacitum Francicum.

brings no Authours on his ſide,and confounds the Spear or Framea, with the Franciſca of the Franks.

33. Having taken ſo much pains to tell what they were not, at length, he concludes what the Arms were. viz, No other but Bees, wherewith the trappings of Childerick his Horſe were all over garniſhed, as I remember I have ſeen at Paris, in the Church of Noſtre Dame the Horſe of St. Lewis, (who at the upper end of the Body of the Church, hath there his Statue on Horſe-back at the Right hand, as one goes toward the Quire,) juſt ſo beſtowed, and ſet out with Lilies. His main Argument is taken from Childerick's Horſe. The Bees he conceives did at length degenerate into Lilies, for more Reaſons than one. Firſt, becauſe the Lilies of France as they are painted, are not much unlike Bees, eſpecially ſuch as are found in the old Coins of the Epheſians, and Delphians, which have their Wings ſo long and ſtretching out, that together with the Tail, they make a Figure much reſembling the ſhape of the Modern French Lily. As many Lilies were born, and in uncertain numbers, by the French Kings deſcended from Hugh Capet, ſo many Bees were found in the Grave of Childerick. The Lilies of France are Golden, ſo theſe Bees of pure and ſhining Gold. The Lilies you muſt know, were accounted of Celeſtial Original by the Vulgar, and Bees are not derived from inferiour Pedegree, by thoſe Heralds the Poets. Theſe Flowers De lis, (as we Engliſh muſt call them, becauſe the French do) are blazoned in a blew Azure field, which is the Element or Camp of our Bees, who exerciſe themſelves continually in the Air. A Bee you know gathers Honey; to which Pliny gives grand Epithetes, and which is alſo of a yellow or Golden Colour. A Lily is a Royal flower, and ſo is a Bee a Royal (what ſhall I call it) Inſect. But that we may tell the Reader, how by degrees the Arms, or Devices of France came to be changed; he muſt know, that Bees were thus in repute with Childerick, and Clodonæus his Son, till ſuch time as he turned Chriſtian, which was, A. D. 496. Though the ſtory hath gone, that he then rejected the Toads, and exchanged them for Lilies. From this time Chiffletius gueſſeth, he and his Son Clotharius, uſed no other Image or Repreſentation, than that of the Croſs, for in a Golden Coin of this Clotharius, which Paulus Petavius (as Gaſſendus telleth us) received from Peireskius and publiſhed, which alſo Chiffletius in his Vindiciæ Hiſpanicæ hath exemplified; there is to be ſeen on one ſide his own Image, and on the other a Croſs. The Kings of the ſecond race uſed no other Symbolum in their Seals, nor Monuments. As for the third, Fauchet writes, that he could not make any certain Obſervation, of any Lilies uſed before Lewis the Groſs, in whoſe Reign, or a little before thoſe Enſigns called Arms began to be Hereditary. This Lewis began his Reign in the Year 1108. and the Cruſado, or expedition into the Holy Land (from which Families derive their Arms, or Enſigns of diſtinction) was undertaken in the Year 1096. At which time Chiffletius imagines, that unskilfull Heralds being to give Arms to the French King, painted the Bees ſo ill-favouredly, that they repreſented Toads, as well as that for which they were deſigned: Fauchet produceth indeed an old Coat Armour, wherein Lilies were ſo badly painted, that one might take them as well for Toads as Flowers. At length Philip Auguſtus, who travelled to Jeruſalem, A. D. 1190. Firſt took the Lilies into his Coat Armour, but many in number of ſo late ſtanding are the French Lilies, which were afterward reduced to the number of three in the Reign of Charles the Sixth, who departed this Life in the Year of our Lord, 1422.

Eſſe apibus partem divinæ mentis & hauſtus Ætherios dixere.

In Originibus.

34. To ſpeak briefly of the other remaining Rarities; the Style or Pin, wherewith he wrote was of Steel, ſuch as the Ancients uſed to write with in Tables, covered over with Wax. It was quite conſumed in its Golden caſe, to which Chifflet procured another to be fitted, and affirms it was not onely ſerviceable for writing, but for ſtabbing alſo, if need ſhould require; this Graphium or Stylus, having been too often employed in ſuch Service, as appears from the Roman ſtory. The Graphiarium, or Caſe, was all of pure Gold, not ſparkling with Gemms, as the other Royal Ornaments; but ingraven all over with little Croſſes, upon which Account, ſeeing the King himſelf was a Pagan, Chifflet conjectureth it was given him by St. Genoneſue, the Patroneſs of Paris, a Virgin much honoured by him, and for whoſe ſake as the Legend tells the ſtory, he remitted the Sentence of Death to ſeveral Offenders. From the keeping of the Graphium, he thinks the Grafiones or Graves, which Anſwer the greater ſorts of Counts to have been denominated. But the Pugillares, or Diptycha (when conſiſting but of two Leaves) or Tables on which he wrote, were conſumed by time and moiſture, onely the Gold caſe remaining, wherein they were ſet. Sometimes theſe Tables were of Box, ſometimes of Ivory, or other choicer Stuff. According to the Wealth and Quality of the owner.

35. It was the Cuſtome for the Arms of Princes and great men to be Burnt or Buried with them, as appears from Cyrus Eptiæſtion and others, and Tacitus witneſſeth particularly concerning the German Nation. Which gave occaſion ſince the days of Chriſtianity, to the ſetting up of Coats Armours upon Graves, and fixing them unto Herſes, and daubing or hanging the Walls of Churches with them, as is extravagantly practized in the Low Countries, the Provinces of Holland eſpecially. Accordingly with Childerick was Buried his Sword, the Steel whereof all fell apeices, but was diſcovered to be about two feet and an half in length, having onely one Edge, as intended to Cut and not to Stab. The Gold and ſparkling Gemms which adorned the Scabbard, and Hilt remained intire, weighing twelve ounces and two drachms. Beſides this Sword which had a Golden Hilt adorned with Gemms, ſo as to make it ſutable to the Scabbard, there was the head or Iron of a Battle Axe very much eaten with ruſt, three parts of a foot long, and half as broad, the figure whereof as of all the reſt of thoſe things, Chifflet cauſed to be cut in Copper and ſtamped in his Book. This Axe or Hatchet was by the Spaniards called Franciſca from the Franks their uſing of it, as Iſidore of Hiſpalis affirms, being called Franciſca or Francica in the ſame ſenſe, as in the Acts of a certain Council, Charles the Bald, Emperour, is ſaid to have come in a Golden Robe after the French faſhion, Habitu Franciſco, with the Legates of the Apoſtolick See. Moſt Authours in deſcribing the Franciſca make it a Bipennis or two-edged, and their Authority is of ſuch weight, ſome of them being capable of ſeeing them with their Eyes, that we can little doubt of their Teſtimony. Yet this of Childerick was a plain Axe, ſo that we muſt believe the Franks uſed two ſorts of this Weapon, though Bipennis be taken ſometimes for a ſimple, ſingle or plain Hatchet. Beſides this Franciſca, was found the head or Iron of a Spear or Javelin of a triangular form, ſuch as Vegetius deſcribes, and the ſame which Tacitus mentions under the name both of Framea and Haſta, deſcribing it accordingly to have been a ſhort kind of Spear, with a narrow and light Iron, but ſo ſharp and convenient, that they could fight either Cominus or Eminus with it as they ſaw occaſion. So that Pontanus was groſly miſtaken, imagining the Framea to be the ſame thing with the Franciſca.

Lib. 18, cap. 6.

Act. Concil. Pontegonenſis Aimonius, lib. 5. c. 33.

Bipennis per ſe plenum eſt & ſecurim ſignificat. Haſtas, vel illorum vocabulo frameas gerunt anguſto & levi ferro; ſed ita acri, & ad uſum habili ut eodem telo, prout ratio poſcit vel cominus vel eminus pugnent.

36. As it was a Cuſtome for great Perſons to have their Arms buried with them, ſo alſo their Horſes and Grooms, ſometimes their Wives with other Servants and Attendants, as is clear in the Story of the Indians, Scythians, Galls, Danes and Germans. With Childerick was Buried his Bucephalus, whom it pleaſeth Chifflet ſo to name, not becauſe he had the figure of an Oxe-head upon his Shoulder as he of Alexander, but bore on his forehead his Maſter's Idol. The bones of his Head and Jaws were remaining, with a Shoe of Iron almoſt conſumed, yet entire at the firſt view, which ſhewed his Feet to have been none of the biggeſt. And beſides the Golden Bees formerly mentioned, ſo many Golden plates and boſſes were found belonging to his Bridle and Trappings, as diſcover them to have been exceedingly Royal and Magnificent, which the Relatour thinks deſigned rather out of reſpect to the Idol than the Rider. But the Bones of the Horſe diſcovered abundantly, what Man's skull the other was found with that of the King, it being the Cuſtome to have the Groom as well as the Horſe, either Burnt or Buried with his Maſter. The Groom of Childerick was very young, as appeareth by his skull compared with the King's. Princes being wont to have ſuch ſmall attendants upon their Stables, (perhaps onely as Pages of the Stirrup for they could not doe the work.) In a certain Diptyck of Ivory belonging to the Cathedral of St. Lambert in Leige, wherein is deſcribed Saminanus or Sabinianus the Comes Domeſticorum Equitum, and Ordinary Conſul in the year 505, under Anaſtaſius, are alſo drawn to the Life two little Dwarfiſh Grooms leading out of the Stable the Emperour's Horſes, and below them other five of the ſame Stature, amongſt whom two having their hands bound behind them, and an Horſe-ſhoe or ſomething of that Nature hanging at their Noſes or Mouths. The whole Deſcription of them is to be ſeen in a Braſs Cutt in Chiffletius his Book.

Servius in Virgil. Æneid. Herod. lib. 4. Cæſar, bello Gall. lib. 6. Saxo-Gram. lib. 8. Tacitus de moribus German.

37. The Buckles, Claſps or Buttons belonging to the Ornaments of the Horſe expreſſed in Latine by the word Fibulæ, were of pure Gold and ſet thick with Rubies and other Gemms, an Honour peculiar to Sovereign Princes. M. Brutus of old complained that Tribunes were ſo luxurious then as to wear Golden Fibulæ. Aurelian the Emperour was the firſt that gave common Souldiers leave to wear them of Gold, whereas formerly they had onely uſed thoſe of Silver. Leo the Em-

Plin. lib. 33. cap. 3.

Vopiſcus.

Cod. lib. 11.

perour forbad the wearing of Pearl and Jacinths in Bridles, Saddles, or Girdles, but permitted ſingle Fibulæ of Gold to be worn by private perſons, with this caution, that what was Sacred as he terms it to his uſe and Ornament, they ſhould not dare to imitate. Joannes Rhodius complains that of the ancient Roman Fibulæ none could be found but thoſe of Braſs, and thoſe alſo very rare, onely Pancirollus tells us of a Golden one he ſaw, the figure whereof was ſent to Charles Emanuel Duke of Savoy. In the Eaſt the ſingle Golden ones were peculiar to Princes and very great men, as appears by the privilege granted to Simon the High Prieſt by Demetrius to be Clothed in Purple and to uſe a Golden Fibula, as Jonathan had received the ſame privilege from Alexander and Antiochus. The ancient Fibula of the Romans was without an Hook, reſembling a kind of a Bow to which a Bodkin made a String: But thoſe of Childerick though various in ſhape, yet for the moſt part imitate the Modern ones in the Hook, and the Ring into which it is inſerted. Had Pancirollus lived to ſee this Treaſure, he would have been ſenſible how much Light might thence have been obtained for clearing of the thing ſo much controverted. They were ſo many of them and ſo maſſie, that altogether they weighed 17 ounces of Gold. The form of them is very well repreſented in the Book of Chifflet, neither the ſpace of 1200 years, nor the moiſture of the place, having at all corrupted the ſubſtance of the Gold, nor changed the lively and ſparkling Colour of the Gemms. The Cryſtal ball found in the Grave, he thinks was uſed by the King in his Sickneſs, a virtue being aſcribed to thoſe Balls by Naturaliſts of refreſhing and cooling the hands of thoſe that lie ſick of acute Fevers. But we have made too long a Digreſſion.

SECT. III.

From the Death of Childerick, and the Promotion of Clodonæus the firſt Chriſtian King, to the Ruine of his Family, or of thoſe called the Meroningians.

The ſpace of two hundred ſixty four years.

Sect. 3.

Clodonæus ſucceeds.

1. TO Childerick ſucceeded Clodonæus his Son, begotten on Baſina, and the Heir of his Courage as well as his Kingdom, being by ſome called Hludouicus, and by others Hlodowicus, Ludovicus, and Ludduin, according to the diverſity of Nations and Dialects, in the eleventh year of the Emperour Zeno, the ninth of Odoacer King of Italy, the ſecond of Fœlix the Roman Biſhop, A. D. 484, Theodorich King of the Goths, and Venantius being Conſuls.

A. D. CCCCLXXXIV. Theodoricho & Venantio Coſſ.

2. Clodonæus not onely filled Gall with the fame of his Atchievements, but affrighted all Europe by the Noiſe of his ſucceſsfull Arms. Gall was at this time held by four ſeveral Nations, all which Lorded it over the poor Natives, viz. the Romans, Goths, Burgundians and Franks. He eſteeming it a thing below him, and unworthy of his Progenitours, to content himſelf with what their Valour had devolved upon him, reſolved to raiſe his Name as high as their Renown by new Conqueſts. The Romans he thought fit to begin withall, becauſe their Power now ſeemed utterly decayed, and upon the Invaſion of Italy and theſe Weſtern Provinces, the Præfecti Prætorio kept to themſelves ſuch Cities as they had formerly Commanded. Having drawn in Chararichus and Ragnacharius his Kinſmen, and petty Princes of the Franks, in the fifth year of his Reign he marched againſt Syagrius the Roman, who held the City of Sueſſio now called Soiſſons and provoked him to Battel, who not at all diſmayed with the terrour of ſo great a force as Clodonæus brought along with him, came forth and Ingaged, but had the fortune though he fought moſt valiantly to be overthrown, and fled for ſuccour to Tholouſe, to Alaricus King of the Goths, who overcome with the threats of Clodonæus, delivered him up into his Makes War with the Romans.

Gregorius Turonenſ. lib. 2. c. 27. Aimonius, l. 1. c. 12.

Sect. 3.

And drives them out of Gall.

488 or 489.

Hands, and he cauſed him preſently to be beheaded. Then did the Victorious King ſubdue Soiſſons with the other Towns adjacent, and inlarged his Territories as far as the River Loire, the Romans being utterly diſpoſſeſſed of and driven out of Gall, their Dominion over which Countrey now received its period, after it laſted from the time of Julius Cæſar, his firſt Invaſion about 546 years, in the year of our Lord 488 or 489, Probinus and Euſebius being Conſuls.

Greg. l. 2. c. c. 40, 42.

Conquers the Thuringi.

Falls in Love.

Aimonius, lib. 1. c. 13.

3. But amongſt the Allies and Aſſociates of Clodonæus, Chararicus is ſaid as ſolicitous about the event to have carried himſelf rather as Neuter in this War, though deſcended of the ſame Stock with the King. For at this time there were ſeveral Reguli of the Franks, who Reigned in Gallia Belgica called Auſtraſia, and Francia Orientalis, as that Countrey, now called France, was known by the name of Francia Occidentalis; of theſe Sigebert had his Seat at Coleine, Ragnacharius at Cambray, and Chararicus in ſome other place, which it ſeems they held as Appendages, being deſcended of the bloud Royal, and acknowledging Clodonæus for their Superiour. He having finiſhed the War with Syagrius and unwilling to lie idle, fell upon the Thuringi, and in the tenth year of his Reign forced them to receive his Commands. And in this ſame year he Married Clothildis or Crotildes, the Niece of Gundebaldus King of the Burgundians, of whom he fell inamoured upon this occaſion. He ſent on a time his Ambaſſadours to the Court of the Burgundian to eſtabliſh a Peace, who whilſt they made their abode there, took much notice of a Maid that dwelt in the Palace, whom they obſerved to be extraordinary both for beauty and for deportment. They inquire who ſhe is, and have anſwer it is the King's Niece, who takes care of her Education, her Parents being Dead. The Ambaſſadours returning, tell the King they have done all they had in Commiſſion, and fall into large Commendations concerning the Maid, affirming her a Perſon worthy of the greateſt Monarch living. He is hereupon ſmitten, falling in love with her he never ſaw, and withall hoping by a Marriage with her ſo to order his matters, as to make himſelf King of Burgundy; he ſends one Aurelianus to take more notice of her, and upon liking richly to preſent her, to Wooe her for him, and to know how ſhe could ſtand affected to the Match.

The terms of Marriage.

4. Aurelian being entred Burgundy, and drawing near to the Court, Commands his followers to hide themſelves in the adjoyning Woods. He Clothes himſelf with the Rags of a Beggar, and goes to make trial if he could ſpeak with Clothildis, who was gone to Church, it being then the Lord's Day. He amongſt other Beggars ſtands and expects her coming out, and when Service was done, out ſhe came to give her Alms to the Poor. She reaches money to Aurelianus, who lays hold on her Hand, and uncovering it makes as if he would kiſs it. Hereat ſhe is offended, and going into the Palace, ſends for the Beggar and expoſtulates with him for his ſaucineſs, who giving her no anſwer to this Demand, takes the opportunity to doe his Meſſage, telling her that his Maſter the King of the Franks hearing of her excellent Vertues, deſired her in Marriage, and he goes to ſhew her his Ring and the other Preſents, but turning about finds that his Bag wherein he conveyed them, and which he had laid behind the Dore was ſtoln from him. But inquiry being made, the Bag was found and reſtored to him as a Stranger, out of which he then takes the Preſents, which receiving ſhe made him this anſwer. It is not lawfull for a Woman that is a Chriſtian to Marry a Pagan, but if Almighty God be pleaſed ſo to order it, that I may be a means to bring him to an acknowledgment of his Creatour, I refuſe not but ſubmit to his pleaſure. Aurelian anſwered there was no doubt but the King would comply with her, and thereupon ſhe deſired him that all might be concealed from her Uncle. He returns and gives his King an account of his ſucceſs, who is more and more inamoured of her by all Reports he receives, and the more becauſe the Kingdom of Burgundy he had already ſwallowed in his hopes. He ſends, and by his Ambaſſadours asks her in Marriage of her Uncle, who without much adoe conſents and delivers her to be conveyed to his Preſence. Not long after Theodorich, King of the Goths in Italy, ſends and demands Andalfleda the Siſter, (Jornandes ſaith the Daughter) of Clodonæus, and obtains her for his Wife. And ſo theſe three potent Nations Invaders and Sharers of the Roman Empire, became allied and confederate amongſt themſelves.

Papirius Maſſonus, lib. 1. p. 17.

5. Clodonæus four or five years after his Marriage undertook a War againſt the Alemans, it being as contrary to his reſtleſs humour, as his ambition to lie idle. They foreſeeing the Storm whilſt yet beyond the Rhine, reſolved that ſeeing there muſt be a War, the Seat of it ſhould not be their own Countrey, and paſſing the River would give him ſome tolerable pretence to quarrel with them. Some ſay they came into Gall to ſeek out new Seats, and entring into Germania Secunda, encamped at Tulbiacus a Village belonging to the Agrippinenſes, or thoſe of Coleine, according to Tacitus. Miræus in his Chronicon Belgicum calls it a Town of the Vbii, at this day known by the name of Zullich, and Pontanus Writes it Zulpich, but whatever was the Name, a great and bloudy Battel was here fought by the Franks, for preſervation of their Conqueſts, their fame and reputation, by the Alemans for their Liberty and their Fortunes. After much contention and ſlaughter on both ſides, Clodonæus ſaw plainly that the Enemy got ground, whereupon with a ſorrowfull Heart and weeping Eyes caſt up to Heaven, ſaith Gregory, he devoutly implored the aſſiſtence of Jeſus Chriſt, whom as he ſaid Clotildis preached to be the Son of God, and who was reported to afford help and aſſiſtence to perſons in diſtreſs, and procure Victory for ſuch as believed in him, vowing faith in his Name, and therein to be Baptized, if by a Victory now obtained over his Enemies, he might but have experience of his Divine Power. This Prayer made, the Face and Poſture of the Battel was inſtantly changed, and the Alemans who had lately born themſelves as Victours were conſtrained to flie, and their King being ſlain, humbly to beg pardon and peace of Clodonæus.

Overthrows the Alemans.

6. Sigebert the Prince of Coleine received a wound in his Foot, of which he ever after continued Lame. Lipſius would have Adalogerio King of the Boii, amongſt other Princes to have been in this Battel, but Marcus Velſerus as well as others deny it, affirming that it doth not appear by the Teſtimony of any ancient Writer, that this Fight touched, or any way concerned that Nation. However, great was the Reputation that Clodonæus got by the Victory. Theodorich King of the Goths in Italy, by Letters yet to be ſeen amongſt Caſſiodorus his various Epiſtles, congratulated with him, and moved ſome ſay by the intreaties of the Alemans interceded for them, adviſing him to uſe his Fortune and Power moderately toward the Conquered, who yet as it ſeems from Ennodius had no ſuch good Quarter at his Hands, but that they rather choſe to accept of the offer of Theodorich, who kindly invited them into Italy. The Ambaſſadours of Theodorich brought with them a man ſkilfull on the Harp, as a preſent to Clodonæus, who having formerly deſired ſuch an Artiſt of him, he wrote to Boetius requiring him to find out the moſt expert in all Italy. But Clodonæus returning home after his Victory, recounted to Clotildis his Wife the ſtory of his Prayer, and what had followed upon it, which opportunity ſhe, who had often ſolicited him heretofore, now taking, ſo wrought with him, that he took upon him the Profeſſion of Chriſtianity, being Baptized by Remigius Biſhop of Rheims, as will be amply ſet forth in its proper place.

Rerum Boiiar. l. 2. ad A. 490.

Lib. 2. ep. 41.

In Panegyrico.

L. 2. ep. 40.

Turns Chriſtian.

7. At this time Reigned over the Burgundians Godegiſilus, in conjunction with Gundebaldus his Brother, but fearing that at length he ſhould be ſent after his Brother, Chilperich the Father of Clotildis, whom Gundebaldus had Murthered, he ſends privately to Clodonæus and offers him a yearly Tribute, on condition he would ſtand cloſe to him and aſſiſt againſt the Tyrant. Clodonæus promiſes him his utmoſt aſſiſtence, and levying a great Army marches ſtreight againſt Gundebaldus, who utterly ignorant of what had paſſed betwixt them, ſends to his Brother requiring his aſſiſtence for oppoſing the Injuſtice and Violence of their common Enemy. Godegiſilus returns him good words and fair promiſes, but joyning his Forces with Clodonæus at Divio, they fall upon Gundebaldus near the River Oſcara, and putting him to flight drive him to * Avenio, which done, Godegiſilus gives up part of the Countrey into Clodonæus his Hands, and departs to Vienna lying upon the Rhoſne. Clodonæus in the mean time purſues the flying Enemy, and beſieges him in Avenio, where being reduced to great Straits, he ſends Aredius his faithfull Friend to the Beſieger, and he ſo works upon him by arguments drawn from the uncertainty of Fortune, that he perſwades him to raiſe the Siege, which would be tedious and doubtfull, and content himſelf with a yearly Tribute, which Gundebaldus ſhould pay him, who thus recovered his former State and Condition, and Clodonæus returned into his own Kingdom. So Gregory the Biſhop of Tours tells the ſtory. Procopius writes that the Germans, meaning the Franks, of their own accord, fell upon the Burgundians, and procuring Theodorich to joyn with them, they parted the Conquered Countrey according to agreement. However it's ſaid for the preſent, that Gundebaldus recovering himſelf refuſed to pay Tribute to Clodonæus according to the late Accord, and leading an Army againſt his Brother Godegiſilus, beſieged him in Vienna.

Forces the Burgundians to pay him Tribute.

Divio Metropolis Ducatus Burgundiæ hodie Dijon, de qua hæc Merula inter plura. Divionis conditor habetur vulgo, mihi potius reſtaurator, pomeriique productor Aurelianus Imperator. Nomen ab Divis quîs plurimus ibi fuit Cultus impoſitum putatur. Hac urbe nihil in Burgundia pulchrius, &c. Caſtrum vocatur à Gregorio Turonenſi.

* Avenio urbs Saliorum hodie Avignon Metropolis Comitatus.

8. All this while Alaricus Reigned ſecurely over the Viſigoths or Weſtern Goths in Gallia Narbonenſis, having under his Dominion the whole Countrey lying betwixt the Rivers Rhoſne and Loire, as far as the Pyrenæan Mountains. Clodonæus was ſo incenſed againſt him for holding the Arian Hereſie as Aimonius believed, or rather

Sect. 3.

Picks a quarrel with the Viſigoths.

rather envied him ſo much for the large ſhare he had of Gall, that he reſolved to pick a quarrel with him, and for that purpoſe ſent his Ambaſſadours to him to give him a meeting at the Borders, and to ſettle ſome Rules about the receiving of Fugitives, terms ſo tickliſh as he knew would give offence. And Alaricus ſent back the Ambaſſadours both without their buſineſs done, and without any reſpect due to thoſe of their Character, which advantage Clodonæus readily took and denounced War againſt him, as well to vindicate and aſſert the Law of Nations, as the Catholick Faith. The Noiſe of this War was quickly blown over into Italy, and came to the Ears of Theodorich the Father-in-Law of Alaricus, who offered himſelf ſtreight as Mediatour betwixt them, writing his Letters to them both, to the Kings of the Heruli, Thuringi and the neighbouring Nations, (yet to be ſeen amongſt Caſſiodorus his Epiſtles) for an Accommodation. "Alaricus he adviſeth not to be "too confident upon the reputation of the Viſigoths, for the great things by them "formerly atchieved; he bids him conſider what an alteration Peace and Idleneſs "work in the minds of men, and not to commit that to the chance of fortune, "which with infinite labour and travel had been ſo long a time procuring, but ſtay "till he could ſend to the King of the Franks, and be content that the quarrel be "taken up by the Interpoſition and Arbitration of Friends. He tells Lodoin, (for ſo "is Clodonæus there called,) that he could not but wonder he ſhould be ſo eaſily "moved, and upon ſo ſlight an occaſion to make War upon his Son-in-Law, for it "would be the paſtime of the Enemies of both Nations. Bids him conſider they "are both Kings of moſt flouriſhing People, but in the flower of their Age, and "that therefore they ought not lightly and out of love to contention bring their "Kingdoms into extreme hazard; he alſo propounds to him the mediation of "Neighbour Princes, and commands him to lay by the Sword, which he could not in "Honour ſee drawn by either of them. In concluſion, by the privilege of a Father and a "Friend, he threatens that which ſoever of them ſhould neglect his Advice ſhould find "the whole power of his Goths, and all his Friends and Allies ingaged againſt him.

Theodorich King of Italy interpoſes.

9. Clodonæus thought it an extravagant and proud humour of the Oſtrogoth, to imagine that he ſate at the Helm of the World, and ſhould take upon him to be Moderatour of Nations, not content to have by his mediation obtained fairer terms for the Alemans, than otherwiſe had been granted them. "Contemning his threats "and ſlighting his Admonitions, he anſwers him in ſhort, that he ſtood affected "toward the King of the Oſtrogoths, juſt as it was fit he ſhould and no more, for "he perceived him reſolved to give harbour and relief to his Enemies, that he made "no War upon Alaricus, but Alaricus upon him, which being as good as "denounced againſt him, he demands why he may not defend himſelf, and deſires he "may not farther be provoked to act any thing which may be contrary to his own "Principles, and the dictates of good Nature. This anſwer quite alienated the "mind of Theodorich from him, who ſent ſpeedily to the Neighbouring Kings "before mentioned, inveighing grievouſly againſt him as a man that rejected every "thing, that had the ſtamp of Juſt and Right upon it, made his Sword the rule "and meaſure of his Actions, and was abſolutely deaf to all reaſonable propoſals. "He inſiſts upon it as the intereſt of all Nations, to put a ſtop to the growing "Power of the Franks, which would procure the Deſtruction of all other "Kingdoms, if after the Alemans, the Viſigoths ſhould be deſtroyed. He adviſeth that "a Council of Princes be formed, to which Clodonæus might be ſummoned to give "an account, and foraſmuch as the ſafety of each was included in the prudence of "all together, each one muſt ſend his Ambaſſadours to deter him from the "execution of what he had but as yet deſigned.

Clodonæus his anſwer to Theodorich.

10. Gundebaldus the Burgundian was not deaf to any Propoſal made againſt Clodonæus whom he hated, more for his greatneſs and Power than for his Religion, though he himſelf was a bitter and inveterate Arian. For it can ſcarcely be believed that he who had Murthered one of his Brothers already, and had now ſhut up the other in Vienna, intending to uſe him in the like ſort, could be much troubled with the dictates of Conſcience; neither doth Clodonæus in his anſwer to Theodorich, alledge any thing concerning Faith or Religion againſt Alaricus, though the Hiſtorians of thoſe times being Churchmen, look upon ſuch Contentions through Religious Glaſſes, (more ſuitable to the Organ than the Object,) being as little skilled as practiſed in ſecular Policy and State Myſteries. By this time Godegiſilus and his followers were ſorely ſtraitned in Vienna, where Proviſions were grown ſo ſcarce, that Vienna, hodie Vienne, urbs Allobrogum Delphiniorum circumjacenti tractui nomen dat le pays de viennois. A Venerio Africano exule biennio ædificatam & inde Biennam vocatam in vulgus tradunt. Salsè hoc ridet Merula. Alpinam vocat Auſonius 4. Parental. & Carm. 7. de urbibus. Notat ibi Vinetus ex Plinio & Ptolemæo Viennam Auſtriæ urbem, non ut hodie cognominem huic fuiſſe ſed Viana nomen habuiſſe.

Sect. 3.

Godegiſilus thought fit to put out of the Town the mean and the uſeleſs Multitude. This being done, it happened that the Man that had had the charge of the Aqueduct, was thruſt out among the reſt, which ſo inraged him, that preſently he went to Gundebaldus, and diſcovered to him how he might eaſily take the City. He led a Company of ſelect Men into the Aqueduct, who following his Directions, with Iron Bars removed the Stones that ſtopped the paſſage, and without much labour opened a way for the Souldiers, who entering the City, ſurpriſed the beſieged, ſet open the Gates to their fellows, and eaſily made themſelves Maſters of the place. Godegiſilus fled to a Church of the Arians, and there was ſlain, with a Biſhop of that Profeſſion. The Franks that ſerved him, all gathered together in a certain Towre, as reſolved to fight it out, rather than be knocked on the Head, but Gundebaldus commanded no harm ſhould be done them, and ſent them away to Alaricus to Tholouſe, as into baniſhment. Such Senatours, and other Burgundians, as were of his Brother's Party he ſlew; the Countrey which now is called Burgundy, ſaith Gregory of Tours, he ſettled under his own Authority and Dominion, and to the People he gave milder Laws, that they might not be capable of oppreſſing the Romans.

Lib. 2. c.

11. Gundebaldus elevated upon this ſucceſs, and proud upon his Alliance, denied now to pay the Tribute formerly promiſed to Clodonæus, who thence ſeeming to take a juſt occaſion of a Quarrel, was not wanting in the proſecution, which Gundebaldus found would be ſo vigorous, as he reſolved not to abide the tryal, but fled to the Oſtrogoths, and there died in Exile. Clodonæus being hereby freed from much Care and Trouble, reſolved for a time to omit the through Conqueſt of Burgundy, which Theodorich had for the moſt part ſeized, and bent all his Endeavours againſt Alaricus. Paſſing the Loire, he pierced through the Coaſts of Tours into Poictiers, a City ſeated on the River Clianus (by Sidonius and the Ancients called Clitis) ten miles from which, in the grounds called Campi Vocladenſes, (which Name they almoſt at this day retain) they engaged in Battel. Clodonæus having got ſight of Alaricus, and remembring the big words and threats that had paſſed betwixt them, was pricked with a deſire of Glory, as well as revenge, and bore up toward the place where he ſtood to ingage him in a ſingle Combat. This being perceived by two of Alaricus his Guard, that they might deliver their King from ſo imminent danger as now threatned him, they directed their Lances, and all the force of their Horſes, againſt Clodonæus; but by the goodneſs of his Corſlet, and the ſeaſonable Interpoſition of ſome of his ſtouteſt followers, he eſcaped, having, according to his purpoſe, ſlain his Enemy, after he had reigned two and twenty Years. A great number of the Ainervi, which had followed Apollinaris, periſhed in this Battel, which was fought in the ſeventeenth Year of the Reign of Anaſtaſius the Emperour, in the fifteenth of Theodorich, King of the Oſtrogoths in Italy, A. D. 507. Anaſtaſius Auguſtus the third time in the Eaſt, and Venantius Decius in the Weſt, being Conſuls.

He overthrows the Viſigoths, and kills their King Alaricus.

Eſt Vocladum Caſtrum in planis Pictavienſis territorii ſitum, ab urbe Pictavienſi decem milibus paſſuum diſtans, ut notat Hiſtoricus, & quidem adhuc nomen retinens, ſed Pictonica pronunciatione diſtortum, & Voglai dictum; ea planities porrecta in aliquot millia paſſuum patet, locus planè idoneus pugnæ.

A. D.
CCCCCVII.
Anaſtaſio Auguſto & Venantio Decio Conſſ.

12. But Procopius, an Authour more ancient than Gregory the Biſhop of Tours, tells the ſtory a little different from his Relation. He writes how the Germans, as he calls them, or Franks, having invaded the Countrey of the Goths, pitched their Camp about Carcaſſo, a City of Gallia Narbonenſis. That Alaricus having levied very conſiderable Forces, ſate down in a very ſafe and convenient place, expecting, it ſeems, the Auxiliaries of Theodorich, his Father-in-Law, out of Italy. But the Franks behaving themſelves as Souldiers are wont in an Enemies Countrey, and foraging far and near, the Goths began to be angry with their King, and charging him with Lazineſs and Cowardiſe, unanimouſly required that he would lead them out to battel, affirming they could eaſily beat the Germans without the conjunction and Aſſiſtence of Theodorich. Alarick thus neceſſitated to fight, led them out, but with ſo ill ſucceſs, that he himſelf loſt his Life, together with the greateſt number of his Men. Procopius adds, that the Franks, preſently after this Victory, beſieged Cacraſſio, wherein the great Riches formerly taken by Alaricus the Elder, at the taking of Rome, were reported to be kept, amongſt which was the rare and coſtly Furniture of Solomon, that had been carried from Jeruſalem to Rome, at the taking of that City. But hearing of this Siege, Theodorich marched thither with all haſte to raiſe it, which the Franks underſtanding, durſt not abide his coming, but packed up their baggage, and departed, after which they ſeized on that Tract of Gall, which lieth upon the Rhoſne, and toward the Ocean, whence Theodorich, not able to drive them, there permitted them to ſettle themſelves, and kept that part of the Countrey which he had recovered. This is the Relation in ſhort which Procopius gives us, much more probable than the ſtories which Caſſiodorus and Jordanus do do tell us, who deſigning to ſpeak well of the Goths, the one becauſe of his Relation to Theodorich, and the other out of reſpect to his own Countrey-Men, brag of great things atchieved by the Goths againſt thoſe Germans whom they will have quite defeated, and to have loſt more than thirty thouſand of their Men. That theſe are flouriſhes appears from this, that theſe Franks were not onely able to keep the Field, but lay Siege alſo the ſame year to Arles, the Metropolis of Provence, a thing more uſually practiſed by the Conquerours, than thoſe that are ſo ſhamefully beaten, as they would make them to have been.

Carcaſſo, Carcaſſum, Carcaſſio, veteribus nonnullis etiam citra geminationem literæ S dicta, hodie Carcaſſonne urbs Volcarum Atacinorum, eſt Epiſcopalis & gemina. Superiorem & inferiorem interfluit fluvius Atax, (vulgo Aude) unde Populi eum incolentes Atacini dicti.

Sect. 3.

Lays Siege to Arles.

Takes Bourdeaux, and defeats the Goths.

13. In the mean time the Viſigoths conſidering that Amalaricus the Legitimate Son of their deceaſed King, was exceeding young, ſent him into Spain, there to be reſerved for better times, and made choice of Giſelaricus, his baſe Brother, to reign in his ſtead, being by reaſon of his Age in a better condition to grapple with thoſe difficulties that now preſſed upon them. Theodorich was ſo kind, as to take upon him his Protection, and for that purpoſe, as was pretended, ſent his Commanders and great Forces out of Italy, whereby, in effect, he became King of the Countrey, as Procopius not obſcurely hints, which Giſelaricus well enough perceiving, boiled with Diſdain and Anger, and entered into a Conſpiracy againſt Theodorich, but being not able to effect any thing, and having few either Hands or Heads to employ, but what were at his devotion, upon diſcovery of his Deſign, was deprived of his Fortunes, and fled to Tranſimundus, King of the Vandals, into Italy, whence not able to procure any conſiderable aſſiſtence, at length he went into Spain, and after ſeveral fruitleſs attempts, was at laſt ſlain, and an end was put to all his troubles. But to return to Clodonæus and his Franks, after the raiſing of the Siege he ſends Theodoricus, his Son, to take in the Gothick Cities, while he makes himſelf Maſter of ſeveral lying on the Sea Coaſts, and amongſt the reſt, of Tholouſe, the Metropolis of the Kingdom, and wherein was kept the Royal Treaſure. Having taken Bardigala, or Bourdeaux, he therein wintered, and in the Confines of this City defeated a number of Goths, who having ſurvived the former Battel, had united themſelves in a conſiderable Body, ſo great ſlaughter being made of them, that the place retained the Name of the Arian Camp, from this very occaſion.

Cadurci Quercięns Peuple de Querci in Gallia Celtica.
Ruteni item Roüergnois in Gallia Celtica.

After other places ſubdued he returns to Tours.

14. But the Conquerour was not content with the Conqueſt of thoſe Cities, nor with the Acceſſion of the Cadurci, Rutheni and Arverni, who yielded up themſelves into his hands; neither yet did ſeveral parcels of Acquitain ſatisfie him, on which he had ſeized, having his mind fixed on Provence, which he ſorely ſtomached, that Theodorich, partly by Force, and partly by conſent of the Inhabitants, ſhould have got into his Power. Impatient of a Competitour in the whole Countrey, he reſolves to drive him out of Gall, and for that purpoſe lays a Siege to Arles, the chief City of Provence, ſituate upon the River Rhoſne, over which then lay a wooden Bridge. Here was fought a ſore and bloudy Battel, the great ſhock of which was ſuſtained by Tolus, the Captain of the Goths, who after much ſlaughter removed the Franks from this Poſt, as Athalarick, the Succeſſour of Theodorich, relates in a Letter to the Roman Senate. But the Franks though hindered from paſſing the Bridge, got over at another place, and ſtoutly beſieged the City; yet being neither able to ſtorm the place, nor ſtarve out the Inhabitants, they revenged themſelves upon the naked Countrey adjacent, by Plunder and Devaſtation, of which, when they would make no end, Theodorich ſent an Army of Gepidæ to reſtrain their Excurſions. This obliged them to retreat, which they did, laden with very great booty, and Clodonæus flouriſhing with Military Glory, returned, and took up his Quarters at Tours.

Apud Caſſiod.

Is made Conſul by Anaſtaſius the Emperour.

Cæſarodunum hodie Tours Metropolis Gentis totius Turonum, ad confluentiam Ligeris & Cari (le Cher) ſita. Regio propter amœnitatem incomparabilem hortus Franciæ audit. Ortelio omnino totius orbis amœniſſima vocari merita, vulgo la Touraine cujus Incolæ Tourangeois vocantur.

Lib. 2. c. 38.
Tanquam Conſul & Auguſtus vocitatus eſt.

15. As there he lay, Ambaſſadours arrived out of Greece from Anaſtaſius the Emperour, who ſent him the Enſigns and Ornaments of the Conſulſhip. For that Prince being then in Meſopotamia, and hearing of the great things performed by him, thought it convenient, by ſuch a kind of Empty reſpect, to gain his Favour, and the rather, becauſe Theodorich, the Gothick King, and the Emperour were at this time at odds about Pannonia, on which the Goths had ſeized, and the difference betwixt them was riſen to an open War, Romanus, the Comes Domeſticorum, and others, being about this time ſent to waſte the maritime Coaſts of Italy. Clodonæus having received the Preſents with the Reſcript of his Election, ſent for Theodorich his Son, intending to make a very formal ſolemnity, and in the great Church of St. Martin, inveſted himſelf with the Tunica trabeata, and the Chlamys, and with a Diadem on his Head, rode through the City, caſting, as he went along, Gold and Silver to the People, being from that day forward, as Gregory of Tours phraſeth it, termed Tanquam Conſul and Auguſtus. From theſe words Tanquam Conſul, as alſo from the want of his Name in the Faſti, it appears that by the Conſulſhip now conferred on him was not meant the ordinary Dignity and Magiſtracy which gave the characteriſtical Note to the Year, but the Conſulatus Codicillaris, or that by Reſcript or Patent, being honorary, and firſt brought up by Julius Cæſar. But about this remarkable paſſage in Hiſtory, various are the Opinions and Judgments of Writers, as their Intereſts and Relations do ſeverally biaſs and incline them.

Sect. 3.

16. Baronius will not believe that he accepted of the Honour, becauſe his Name is not found in the Faſti, for he concludes, that the Emperour would never offer him the Honorary or Titular Conſulſhip, being a thing much below him, and unuſual to be conferred upon thoſe of his Dignity. But the Cardinal meaſures the Actions of the King by his own Inclinations, and juſt like the ancient Hiſtorians that were Churchmen, looks at them ſtill through a Glaſs of Religion, imagining that a Sword was made of the ſame Materials as a Biſhop's Croſier Staff, or a Cardinal's Cap as a Souldier's Helmet. The reaſon that moves him to believe that Clodonæus would not accept of the Offer is this, that the Emperour was an Arian, and he would not have to doe with an Heretick, full as probable as the conceits of thoſe People who believed at Rome, that when our Henry the Eighth, and Queen Elizabeth were by them excommunicated, they would not onely be cut off from the Body of the Church, but from Humane Society, and wither away and periſh for want of Commerce with other Princes and Nations. What he farther alledges concerning the meanneſs of the Honorary Conſulſhip, is founded but upon his own Surmiſes; for though it was lower than the Magiſtracy it ſelf, and the Annual Dignity, yet was it wont to be conferred on very deſerving and eminent Perſons, and the thing was ſo new, and unuſual to the Franks, that this might be ſome motive to accept it; beſides, we might inſtance in marks of Honour of a more inferiour Nature, and not go far from home, which have been accepted in later times, both by Kings and Emperours.

17. But he was now accounted Tanquam Auguſtus, and the Purple Tunick and the Chlamys were Enſigns and Ornaments of Royal Dignity, as well as the Diadem. Fauchet therefore the Preſident interprets them as ſent in token that he ſhould remain inveſted with that Right and Superiority which the Emperours formerly obtained in Gall, noting farther, that as the Biſhops of theſe times did dutifully demean themſelves, to the Majeſty of the Emperours, ſo new Kings were not wont to wear Crowns, till ſent as Gifts from ſome greater Perſons. Yet cannot he deny, but the giving of a largeſs to the People, was a thing uſual and ſolemn to them that obtained the Conſulſhip, and he was not thenceforward called abſolutely Auguſtus, but Tanquam Conſul and Auguſtus, to note that his Dignity was but borrowed. But farther, Fauchet, and ſome other Modern Writers, will needs that he received the Patritiate alſo, or Honour of Patritian (not unuſual to be given to Kings) from Anaſtaſius; and Papirius Maſſonus amongſt the reſt, is pretty poſitive, farther obſerving, that this Honour was far different from the other of the Conſulſhip, the Dignity of Patritian being perpetual, or for Life, whereas that of the Conſul was but annual. But Baronius tells him, that for all this, the Honour of the Patritiate was inferiour to that of Conſul; and that it was more common; and beſides, he erroneouſly affirms, that all ancient Authours make mention of the one, but are wholly ſilent as to the other. Laſt of all, Chiffletius, no friend to the Grandeur of the French Monarchy, ſticks to that of Conſul, as not willing to allow the King of the Franks too much Honour. But what he confeſſeth beſtowed and received from Anaſtaſius, he uſeth as part of Promiſes, for uſhering in a grand Concluſion, which he much labours, nay ſweats to make out. This is that the French Kings, by Permiſſion and Authority of the Emperours, enjoyed their Kingdom, and ſo held it, though got by force and violence, that as Vaſſals they ſubmitted and ſubjected it unto them, and obſerved and obeyed their Rules and Commands. In ſumm, he would from this and other Inſtances prove, that both the Kings and Kingdom of France are obnoxious and ſubject unto the Empire.

Lib. 2. c. 22.

And likewiſe the Honour of Patritian.

Hiſt. lib. 1. *p.*24.

Ad An. Chriſti 508. num. 2.

Epitaphium ejus à Remigio ut fertur compoſitum, hunc habet verſiculum,
Patritius magno ſublimis fulſit honore.

Vindic. Hiſpanic. c. 13.

18. However, this Ceremony being over, Clodonæus departed from Tours to Paris, where, as Gregory words it, he placed the Chair of his Kingdom. There being ſettled, he buſied himſelf with Domeſtick Affairs, and with ſomething ſhortly after which happened amongſt his own Countreymen, the occaſion rather being taken by the King, than given by Sigebert, Canaricus, Rachnacharius, and others of their petty Princes. Sigebert, who having his Seat at Colein, injoyed no ſmall Dominions on both ſides of the Rhine, thought he was not ſufficiently reſpected and rewarded for the great Services he had done Clodonæus, and thereat grew diſcontented, when in the mean time Clodonæus promiſed his Son Chlodorick, that he ſhould certainly ſucceed in the Inheritance after his Father's Death, and find him

He ſeizes on the Eſtate and Countrey of Sigebert.

him both his loving and his conſtant Friend. Clodorick whatever the King ſpake or meant, made ſuch an Interpretation as ſuited his Ambition, concluding that he adviſed him to haſten his Father's end; therefore following him over the Rhine, he ſlew him in the Wood Barconia, the ſame as ſome think with that Forreſt, which at this day is called Veſterwald. The feat done, he gives Clodonæus notice that his Father is dead, and deſires him, to ſend ſome he could truſt to receive his Treaſure. He gladly ſends thoſe that would bring it away, with what farther Inſtructions it's uncertain; but one of them as Clodorick opened a Cheſt, wherein he ſaid his Father was wont to lay his Gold, bade him thruſt down his hand and ſearch it to the bottom, and as he ſo did, and inclined his Body, he up with his Bipennis or Franciſca, and ſtruck out his Brains. Clodonæus having received the News haſtens to the place, and there profeſſing to the People, that he was wholly Innocent as to any deſign againſt Father or Son, eaſily perſuades them to receive his Protection, and lays the Countrey to his own Dominions.

Gregor. Turonenſ. lib. 2. c. 40.

Chararick.

19. Chararick had as we formerly hinted ſtood Neuter in the Battel, which Clodonæus fought with Siagrius the Roman Captain, and envying his good Succeſs, carried himſelf with little Reſpect toward him; all which the King bore in an exulcerated mind, and by a Wile getting both him and his Son into his hands, compelled them to be ſhaven and take Orders; the Father to be made Prieſt, and the Son to be ordained Deacon. On a time when the Father bewailed his Condition, the young Youth laid his hand upon his Chin, and ſhewing the ſmall Rudiments he had of a ſhaven Beard, affirmed, that thoſe leaves would in ſo flouriſhing a Tree grow again, and prayed, that he who had been the cauſe of cutting them, might as ſpeedily periſh; which Speech coming to the Ears of the King, he thought it fit to make ſure work of it, and commanded them both to be put to Death. He thus made an end of them; but there was one yet behind, the greateſt Object of his Jealouſie and Indignation, which was Rachnacharius the Prince of Cambray, and the Atrebates; a Man of a luxorious Life, and exceedingly puffed up with a Conceit of his noble Extract, which ſo far tranſported him, as to affirm, that the Kingdom of the Franks of right appertained to himſelf, being indeed the Great, Great Grandſon of King Clodio. By doating on Faro his Minion, and his Laſcivious Carriage, he ſo provoked his Subjects, that they conſpired againſt him, and ſent to Clodonæus, offering to betray him into his hands. He who onely watched for a convenient opportunity, moſt gladly cloſed with their Propoſals, and to the Conſpiratours ſent good ſtore of Gold as they thought; but it was onely Braſs money cunningly Guilded. Clodonæus raiſes an Army, and marches to them; a Battel is pitcht on both ſides, but Rachnacharius hath his hands bound behind him, and is ſo preſented to the King, with his Brother Richarius in the ſame poſture, both whom he upbraids, that being of the Royal ſtock, they ſhould ſuffer themſelves to be bound, and therewith kills them in the place. They being diſpatched, he procures another Brother they had, Rignomerus by Name (otherwiſe called Ricunirus and Ricimirus) to be ſlain, and ſo poſſeſſeth himſelf of all their Dominions, and their Treaſure. Many other Princes out of Jealouſie he put to Death, and ſo many of his Kindred, that one day as his Nobles ſtood before him, he bemoaned his Condition, that he was an Alien amongſt ſtrangers; having never a Kinſman to ſtand by him in Caſe of neceſſity, which yet ſome thought he ſpake craftily, to ſee if any one would preſent himſelf as of the Royal Race. But the Traitours who complained, how that their Gold was turned to Braſs, he refuſed otherwiſe to requite than with a ſevere reproof, as deſerving Death it ſelf, for their Ingratitude and Treachery to their Prince.

And Rachnacharius and others killing them, adds their Countrey to his own.

Clodonæus dies.

20. While Clodonæus thus endeavoured to ſecure to his own Poſterity, what he and his Anceſtours with ſo great labour had obtained, about two years after, Death ſummoned him to other Manſions in the thirtieth year of his Reign, and in the five and fortieth of his Age. In ſeveral Authours he hath ſeveral * Names, of which we muſt advertize the Reader, leſt he be confounded and miſtaken in his peruſal of the Hiſtories of theſe obſcure times. In his Epiſtle to the Biſhops after the Gothick War, he calls himſelf Clotonechus. Theodorich King of Italy, directs his Letters to him by the Name of Ludvin: In his Epitaph recited by Aimoinus, he is called Clodoneus; in the Teſtament of Rhemigius the Biſhop, who baptized him Hludowicus; by Sigebert the Hiſtorian Ludowicus; by Contractus and Albericus, Clodonæus; in an ancient Table at Bruſſels, where he is pictured Claudius, and Clovis with the u vowel, commonly by the Modern French. In the ſaid Table, as his Father is pictured with his back turned, and with a ſtrange and foreign Cap on his head, to ſignifie his flight and Exile; ſo he is to be ſeen, with his Eyes lifted up towards wards Heaven, and his Hands cloſed as praying and imploring divine Aſſiſtence, in Memory, as it ſeems, of the Battel fought with the Alemans. He was certainly a conſiderable Man, and for his great Atchievements againſt the Romans, Alemans, Goths and others; and for inlarging to ſo great a Proportion, the bounds of the French Empire deſervedly obtained from Poſterity, the Sirname both of the Warriour, and of the Great: As for his Piety, how it could conſiſt with ſuch particulars as we have mentioned, let Baronius and other Church-men, who are moſt concerned look to that. He was buried at Paris, in the Church of the Holy Apoſtles St. Peter and St. Paul, founded by himſelf, which is now changed into that of the Abby of St. Genonefue, where his Effigies was to be ſeen in the days of Papirius Maſſonus. His Death happened, five years after he had ſlain Alaricus in the twenty fourth Year of Anaſtaſius the Emperour, the twenty ſecond of Theodorich King of Italy, A. D. 514. M. Aurelius Caſſiodorus, whom we have ſo often mentioned without a Collegue, being Conſul. So ſome collect, but Scaliger perhaps with better reaſon caſts it back to the 509. Year of our Lord.

---

* Quem hodie Ludovicum Latinè vocant Cæſar Lavicum dixit. Erit itaque Luyt & Wiis genuina & vera vocis notatio, ut nihil aliud ſignificaverit quam Populi Refugium. Luyt enim hodie Teutonicis eſt Populus, Wiick Refugium. Ludwin aut Hlodwin eodem ferè recidit, nam Lod, & Luydt idem quod antè dictum, Populum notabit. Win autem Pulchrum quid & venuſtum, delicias etiam & amorem ſignificat, ut Hlowin hoc pacto intellectus fuerit populi Amor, delitiæ & venuſtas.

The diviſion of his Kingdom amongſt his four Sons.

21. He left four Sons behind him, Theodorich, Clodomir, Childebert and Clotharius, who divided his Kingdom equally amongſt them. Theodorich reigned at Metz, Clodomir at Orleance, Clotharius at Soiſſons, and Childebert enjoyed his Father's ſeat at Paris. E'er they were well ſetled, the Danes under Conduct of Chochilaichus their King, invaded the Maritime Coaſts of Gall, and light upon a certain Village belonging to Theodorich, which plundering and waſting at their Pleaſure, with their Booty and Captives they indeavoured to put to Sea again; their King refuſing to go aboard, till he ſaw them all ſhipped and put off. But Theodorich, having timely notice of this Piracy, ſent his Son Theodobert with a conſiderable Power into thoſe parts; who being a young Man of excellent Endowments, ſo ordered his matters, that he ſurprized their King e'er he could get to Sea, and then with a Fleet he had ready at hand, ſet upon the Daniſh Navy and defeating them, recovered all the Booty they had got. At this time, three Brothers reigned over the Thoringi; Badericus, Herminefredus and Bertharius. Herminefredus firſt ſlew his Brother Bertharius, who left a Daughter called Radegund, beſides ſeveral Sons. Not herewith content at the Inſtigation of Almaberga his Wife, who uſed ſeveral Tricks to increaſe his Jealouſie and Ambition; he called in Theodorich to his Aſſiſtence againſt his other Brother, promiſing to divide his Territories equally with him: Joyning therefore their Forces, they fell upon Badericus, and eaſily overpowering him, deſtroyed both him and the greateſt part of his Army. This done, Theodorich departed home not doubting, but the Conditions of the League would be performed. But Herminefredus thought nothing leſs; for being once rid of him, he fortified the whole Countrey, and refuſed to ſurrender the ſhare due to Theodorich; who hereupon boiled with Anger againſt him, but for the preſent found no ſufficient opportunity to revenge himſelf.

Divodurum hodie Metz ut Gregorio Turonenſi & aliis Metæ urbs Medio matricum olim Regia & Metropolis Auſtraſiæ, Romani haud ita pridem imperii ſed à Rege Franciæ, Anno 1552. cum aliis occupata: Sita eſt ad confluentiam Selliæ in Moſellam. Genebum alio nomine Aurelii & Aureliani hodie Orleans urbs ad Ligerim Carnutum vadicaſſium. Auguſta Sueſſonum ville de Soiſſons urbs Galliæ Belgicæ. Lutetia Metropolis Pariſiorum & totius Galliæ hodie Paris. Vide Gregor. Turonenſ. lib. 3 c. 4.

22. But it was not long, e'er his thoughts were diverted upon another Subject, by the advice and procurement of his Mother. The Murther of her Parents, ſtill ran in her mind, ſhe had often in vain deſired their Deaths might be revenged; but now ſhe thought Providence had decreed it, giving her ſo many Sons, of whom, though one or two might periſh in the Attempt; yet ſhe concluded the thing would be accompliſhed amongſt them. To perſuade them, ſhe uſed powerfull Rhetorick, ſuch as ſuited the Paſſions both of a Daughter and a Mother, to which ſhe added, as ſhe thought as powerfull Reaſons, drawn from the ſame principles of Ambition, and Cruelty which ſhe affirmed, would produce the ſame Effects towards the Grand-Children, and ſo much worſe by how much the Baits and Allurements of ſo great Territories as they now poſſeſſed, were greater than thoſe of their Anceſtours, overcome (it's probable) rather with hopes of bettering their Condition, than of preventing the miſchief by her objected, they levied Forces and with their joynt Powers reſolved upon an Invaſion of Burgundy. Before this time Gundebald was Dead, and Sigiſmond his Son had ſucceeded him, whoſe firſt Wife was the Daughter of Theodorich King of Italy, and by her he had a Son called Sygirius; but after her Death married another, it ſeems ſome waiting Woman, which as the Cuſtome of Step-mothers is, very much hated, and maligned the Youth. He was ſufficiently ſenſible of it, and ſo imprudent, that on a Feſtival day he upbraided her for wearing his Mothers clothes, which drove her into ſuch a Rage, that ſhe never ceaſed to inflame his Father againſt him, telling him of ſtrange Deſigns he had to uſurp and joyn the Dominions of his Anceſtours, to the Italian Kingdom of Gundebaldus 4°. Calend April. Ann [illegible]. Lugduni Abieno Conſule, leges ab ſe editas tulit, quæ extant, earum & Gregorius meminit.

of Theodorich his Grandfather. Sigiſmund at length overcome with her Importunities, cauſed the poor young Man as he ſlept to be ſtrangled; and preſently after, though too late repenting, went and ſpent his time in a Monaſtery, bitterly lamenting his cruel Jealouſie and Paricide, which was ſhortly after revenged upon him, as our Authours obſerve.

Burgundy invaded.

King Clodomir ſlain.

Gregor. Turon. lib. 3. c. 6. Aimoinus de Geſtis Francorum, lib. 2. c. 4.

23. For the Sons of Chrotildis in obedience to her Commands, invade Burgundy with a great Army. He made as great Preparations for reſiſtence, as time would give him leave, and Courageouſly oppoſed himſelf againſt the Invaders, but in Battel had the worſt. His Brother Godomir eſcaped, but he himſelf was taken together with his Wife and Children by King Clodomir, and committed to cloſe Priſon at Aurelia, or Orleans, where while he remains, Godomir gathers together his diſperſed Forces, raiſes new ones, wherewith joyning a freſh Army, he renews the War. Hereupon Clodomir being obliged to buckle himſelf to Action, would not be perſuaded to ſpare Sigiſmund, becauſe he ſhould leave an Enemy at his back, but, though ſome Church-men foretold that in Caſe he ſlew him, he ſhould miſcarry in his Attempt, and receive the very ſame meaſure, put him to Death together with his Wife and Children. Then the following Spring did he invade Burgundy, and as ſoon as Godomir appeared in the Field, he put his Army to flight, but giving the Chace, the heat of his Bloud, and deſire of Glory ſo tranſported him, that he came up with the middle Ranks of the Burgundians before he was aware, and being known by them was incompaſſed, and when he refuſed to yield to quarter, was immediately ſlain. His Head was ſet upon a Spear, by ſo ſad a Spectacle to terrifie and diſ-hearten his followers; but they were thereby ſtirred up to greater Animoſity, and moved to revenge his Death, which they did to purpoſe, purſuing them ſo far that they utterly defeated them, and then returned home with the News of Clodomir's death. Clotharius his Brother married Gundeaca his Wife, and with her his Kingdom. Chrotildis his Mother, as ſoon as Grief would give her leave, ſent for his three Sons, Theodonald, Gunthar and Clodonald, and with all Care imaginable brought them up.

They make War upon the Thuringi.

Thuringia Regio eſt Germaniæ cis Albim flumen priſcum hodie nomen retinens.

And ſubdue them.

24. All this while, Theodorich his mind was fixed upon Herminfredus Prince of the Thoringi, whoſe ſhuffling and refuſal to allow him his ſhare in the Booty, they had unjuſtly got, ſo overpowered his thoughts, that theſe Wars were ſcarcely able to give him any diverſion. He perſuaded his Brother Chlotharius to joyn with him, promiſing him a ſhare of the Prey, and by a ſet Speech to the principal of the Franks, wherein he painted out the cruel uſage of the Thuringians toward their Anceſtours, he prevailed with them to undertake the expedition, and that with much alacrity. Accompanied with Chlotharius his Brother, and Theodobert his Son, he invaded their Countrey; where as he was to paſs, they had digged Pits and covered them over with Earth, and the device took at the firſt, a ſmall number of Men and Horſes falling into thoſe Snares; but the thing being once diſcovered, the Franks were ſo cautious in their March, that none of theſe Wiles would farther ſucceed, and coming once to ingage their Enemies, they overthrew them with ſo great ſlaughter, that the River Oneſtrudis, is ſaid to have been ſo filled with dead Bodies, that they paſſed over upon them, as on a firm Bridge. Herminefredus with much adoe eſcaped, and ſecured himſelf in a Fort, whither after his retreat, Theodorich ſent to him, and with great Promiſes and Obteſtations perſuaded him to come to him to Tulbiacum, where as they once walked together upon the Wall, he fell down and died of the bruiſe. Gregory profeſſes he knew not how he fell, although many affirmed, that Theodorich was the cauſe of his Death, Aimoinus writes expreſly, that he took his opportunity, as they walked and diſcourſed together, and threw him down Headlong; and this no whit Contradicts the probability of the Fact, that he being Dead, he procured all his Children to be ſtrangled. This done, all the Countrey he ſubdued under the Dominion of the Franks, who as Aimoinus obſerves, had formerly inhabited the Territories of Thuringia.

Difference amongſt the Kings themſelves.

25. That Theodorich his Conſcience was not ſo tender, but it could ſufficiently digeſt ſuch a Murther as this, farther appears, from what he attempted againſt his Brother Chlotharius, while they yet remained in Thuringia. Having a deſign to make him away, he ſent for him to conſult about ſome pretended buſineſs, and behind the Hangings, in a Room where they were to ſit, placed ſome armed Men, who being in good time diſcovered by Chlotharius, he refuſed to conſult without his followers at his back; ſo that Theodorich, ſeeing his deſign was brought to light, fell off, excuſing himſelf, in which Art he was very expert, and preſented him with a Silver Diſh, which afterward repenting he had been ſo bountifull, he ſent his own Son Theodobert to beg of him. Chlotharius returned the Diſh, and retires home, having married Radegund the Daughter of Bertharius, late Prince of the Thoringi. But ſtill the Invaſion of this Countrey, gave occaſion to farther miſchief. A report was ſpread amongſt the Arverni, that Theodorich was ſlain; whereupon Archadius one of the Senatours, ſent to Paris to Childebert, and invited him to come and take poſſeſſion of his Brother's Kingdom. He came with all ſpeed, and by the means of Archadius got into the City; but upon the Rumour that his Brother was alive, and returned out of Thoringia, he ſecured the place, and retired with intention to make a Journey into Spain, in behalf of their Siſter Chrothildis. This Lady had been at the importunate ſuite of Amalricus King of the Goths in that Countrey, by her Brothers given him in Marriage; but was not treated in any Faſhion becoming her Birth, or Quality, on the contrary handled like a Slave, affronted upon all occaſions, and Contumeliouſly uſed, upon the Account of her Religion eſpecially. For her Husband moved with his Arian Zeal, as well as the violence of his own Diſpoſitions, cauſed Excrements and filth to be caſt in her way, as ſhe went to the Orthodox Church, and beat her ſo cruelly, that the Bloud trickling out of her Body, he therewith dyed an Handkerchief; and as Gregory reports, ſent it to her Brother. Aimoinus tells us, that tired with thoſe Indignities and cruel Uſages; ſhe wrote Letters to her Brothers, which came to the hands of Childebert, as he lay in the City of the Arverni, which he had by Force wreſted from the Dominion of Theodorich.

Arverni les Auvergnats le Peuple d' Auvergne, gens inter Celticas olim potentiſſima.

Childebert invades Spain.

26. Childebert exceedingly provoked by theſe Letters, and being a Man expert in whatever concerned War, with all ſpeed marched into Spain, hoping to ſurprize Amalricus. But he found him not unprovided, either by Sea or Land, and by Land it was agreed, that the Controverſie ſhould be decided. There wanted no Courage on either ſide, but the Franks had the advantage in their Horſe, which being too ſtrong for the Goths, bore down all before them, and after great Execution utterly routed them. Amalricus flying for his Life, made toward a Church of the Orthodox Chriſtians, but before he could enter was overtaken, and ſlain by a Trooper of the Franks. Childebert hearing he was Dead purſued his Victory, with the Terrour whereof the Citizens of Toletum being ſtruck, he eaſily took the place, in which finding his Siſter, and exceeding great Treaſure, with them he returned into France; where e'er they arrived, Chrothildis died in the way, and being brought to Paris, was there buried by her Brother. But while Childebert invades the Dominions of another, he looſes what he had lately made his own at home. For Theodorich diſdaining to looſe his Towns, on which the other upon the Rumour of his death, had ſo confidently ſeized, thought not himſelf obliged to the manners of ſtaying for his return, but with all ſpeed attempted the recovery of his own Inheritance. Entring the Countrey to puniſh the Inhabitants for their eaſineſs, in ſubmitting to an Uſurper, he waſtes all with Fire and Sword. Archadius who had betrayed the City, fled to the Bituriges, but Placidina his Mother, and Alchima his Siſter were taken and confined to Cadurcum. There was one Munderick, who affirming himſelf the Kings Kinſman, Challenged the Sovereignty as his due, and prevailed with many of the ordinary ſort, to own him for their lawfull Prince. Refuſing to repair to Theodorich, as knowing ſufficiently for what purpoſe he was ſent for, he ſecured himſelf in a Caſtle called Victoriacum; he and all his followers reſolving to die rather, than to put themſelves into the hands of their Treacherous Enemies. Yet when all other attempts failed, by reaſon of the ſtrength of the place, and valour of the Defendants, Theodorich procured Aregiſilus to Trepan him, who took an Oath (his hands touching the Sacred Altar) that he ſhould receive no harm. When he brought him forth, upon a Watch-word given, the Souldiers were to fall upon him, which Mundericus perceiving upbraided Aregiſilus, with his perfidious dealing, and vowing that he ſhould not reap any benefit by his Treachery, preſently ran him thorough with his Lance. Then the Souldiers coming on, he ſo laid about him, that he killed many upon the place, and ſold his Life at ſo dear a rate as could be imagined. Being thus made away, his whole Eſtate was ſeized by Theodorich.

Biturices vulgo Berry.

Cadurci, Peuple de Querci quorum Metropolis fuit Dueona.

27. Theodorich being thus employed, Childebert returns, and whether induced by their own Inclinations or the mediation of Friends the two Brothers make a Peace, giving Hoſtages on both ſides, who within a while were all ſold for Slaves, the League being of no long continuance. But while they were friends Chlotharius and Childebert reſolved to make another expedition into Burgundy, and if poſſible to perfect the Conqueſt of that Countrey. They invited Theodorich to joyn with them, but he having Married the Daughter of Sigiſmund plainly refuſed, neither would would he permit any of the Arverni to ſerve in the War. Yet did they manage their matters with that dexterity, that they took Auguſtodunum, and driving Godomir quite away, made themſelves Maſters of all Burgundy. Thus Gregory tells the ſtory as done in the Life time of Theodorich, but Caſſiodorus who lived at this very time, and had more reaſon to underſtand how matters went than he, relates other paſſages antecedaneous, which he omits, and ſpeaks of the Death of Theodorich before the Conqueſt of that Countrey. From his Letters to the Senate and People of Rome, it appears that Athalarick, who by this time had ſucceeded his Grandfather Theodorich in Italy, ſent a great Army againſt the Franks, that Theodorich Brother of Clodomir and King of the Franks Died, during the ſtay of the Goths in Burgundy, and the Franks declining a Battel, the Burgundian betaking himſelf to the Patronage of the Goths, * recovered by intreaty what he had formerly loſt in Fight. However not long after, Godomir or Gundemar as ſome call him, for all his Gothick Alliance, was by Childebert, Clotharius, and Theodebert their Brother's Son beaten quite out of his Kingdom, ſpoiled of all Power and Dominion, and driven into Exile.

A War againſt the Burgundians.

The French King Theodorich Dies.

Auguſtodunum Bibracte Cæſari, aliis Auguſta, Julia Æduorum, & Flavia, & Florentia, & Pollia, hodie Autun. Metropolis Æduorum ad ima collis Ceniſii & ad Arotium fluvium in Gallia Celtica. Var. lib. 11. Sed quamvis ſuperba Natio declinaverit Conflictum, vitare tamen proprii Regis nequivit interitum: Nam Theodoricus ille diu potenti nomine gloriatus in triumphum principum noſtrorum languoris potius pugna ſuperatus occubuit.

* Recuperavit enim prece quod amiſit in acie.

28. So that here the Kingdom of the Burgundians receiveth its period, who being a People of Germany and living beyond the Rhine, had firſt under Honorius the Emperour Ground allowed them to inhabit in thoſe parts of Gall lying neareſt to that River. After the Overthrow received from Ætius under Valentinian the third. Sapandia was given to ſuch as remained of them, which they parted with the Natives and there planting themſelves, quickly began to ſpread through the Neighbouring Territories, and by degrees made themſelves Maſters of that part of Gall called Lugdunenſis prima, Maxima Sequanorum, Viennenſis, the Alpes Graiæ and Penninæ with the Province lying on this ſide Druentia now called Durance. Theſe Kings of theirs are mentioned in our Books: Gundicanus who aſſiſted Jovinus the Tyrant in aſſuming the Purple, and being overthrown by Ætius the Roman General obtained Peace. Gunderick and Chilperick his Sons aſſiſted Theodorich the ſecond King of the Goths, againſt Reciarius King of the Suevi in Gallæcia. Chilperick had his Seat at Genona (now Geneva) upon the lake Lemanus. The Sons of Gunderick, viz. Gundebald (or Gundebad) Godegiſil, Chilperick and Godomar divided the Kingdom amongſt them. Gundebald by degrees having made them all away, Reigned alone as we have lately ſeen, and by Chilperick his Brother had two Nieces: Chrona made a Nun, and Chrotildis whoſe Children fully revenged upon his the Death of their Grandfather. For Sigiſmund his Son was taken and Slain by Clodomir, who alſo defeated his Brother Godomar though he was Slain in the purſuit, and could not perfect the Conqueſt. But this was done for him by Childebert and Clotharius about the ſixth year of Juſtinian the Emperour, and the ſeventh of Athalarick King of Italy, A. D. 532. Thus much we thought to add in a ſummary way concerning the ancient Kingdom of Burgundy, both that the Reader's memory might be helped as to the Succeſſion of the Kings, and that by the Territories which this day go under that Name, he might not be miſtaken concerning the true extent of the Countrey.

The Seats, And Kings of the Burgundians.

29. To return to our Franks, Childebert and Chlotharius the two Brothers having got poſſeſſion of the fair Territories of the Burgundians were not therewith ſatisfied, but this Morſel rather whetted their Appetites, and fitted them for ſwallowing a greater bit, viz. The Patrimony of their own Nephews. The three Sons of Clodomir were all this while Educated under the tender Eye of their Grandmother at Paris, which Childebert grudged to ſee, and fearing that by her means they might become more Potent than he thought would well conſiſt with his own Intereſt; he ſent to Chlotharius his Brother who having Married their Mother, and with her having got Poſſeſſion of their Inheritance, he doubted not would be moſt ready to liſten to his Advice, to meet him ſpeedily at Paris there to conſult, whether they had better ſhave the Boyes, and cauſe them to enter into Orders, or rid them of their Lives, and themſelves of all occaſion of fear and jealouſie at the ſame inſtant. Chlotharius needed no Wings to make him flie to Paris, where when arrived, there needed as little Conſultation, but calling for that Archadius, who by his Treachery had ingratiated himſelf with Childebert; they ſent him to their Mother with a pair of Sciſſers and a naked Sword, bidding her make choice of one of the two, to cut out and determine the Fortune of her Grandchildren. She falls into a great Rage, and in her fury lets fall this Expreſſion, that ſhe had rather ſee them Dead than ſhaven, if ſo the caſe ſtood that they muſt not Reign. Archadius takes her at her word, and returning ſpeedily to thoſe that ſent him, tells them that the Queen complied fully with their deſires. They hereupon haſte thither where the Children

Lie,

Two of Codomir's Sons murthered by their Uncles.

Lie, and Chlotarius taking the Eldeſt Boy throws him on the Ground, then runs his Sword into his Body under the Arme, and ſo diſpatches him. He that was next to him in Age affrighted with his cries and lamentations, caſts himſelf at the Feet of his Uncle Childebert, and calling him Father, uſeth all the Rhetorick which in ſo great an Agony his Childlike Abilities could afford to ſave his Life. Childebert was moved with the Anguiſh he ſaw him in, and with tears in his Eyes beſought his Brother to ſpare him, offering him anything he would ask in return for ſo great a kindneſs. But barbarous and furious Chlotarius in great heat upbraids him with his Inconſtancy, that having given Original to this Enterpriſe, he now deſerted the cauſe, and vowed that if he would not put the Boy from him, he ſhould die in his ſtead, which made his Courage fail him, and he deſerting the Child, Chlotarius ſeized on him, and Murthered him in the ſame manner he had done his Brother.

The third turns Monk.

30. So periſhed two of the Sons of Cleodomir, whereof the Eldeſt was but ten years old, and his younger Brother exceeded not ſeven, which feat accompliſhed, their good Uncles ſent after their Attendants to wait on them in the other World, as had been anciently the cuſtome of Princes. But part of their Pray they miſſed; for, while they were buſie with thoſe two, the third, Clodoaldus by name, poſſibly being in ſome other Apartment was conveyed away by his Servants, and rejecting all hopes of an earthly Kingdom ſhaved himſelf, entred into Orders, and being afterward made Prieſt, lived and died with great Reputation for Sanctity, at Novigentum a Town diſtant but four miles from Paris, which from him received a new Name, and at this day is called St. Clou, after the manner of the Abbrevations of the Modern French, at preſent the Retirement of the Duke of Orleance and the Princeſs Henrietta of England his Lady. In all this affair we hear nothing of Theodorich, which makes us more confident he was Dead before this, whatever ſome of our Hiſtorians write to the contrary. Theodobert his Son ſucceeded him in his Kingdom of Metz or Auſtraſia, having Married Wiſegarda the Daughter of Waco King of the Lombards, over whoſe Head he afterward brought another Wife upon this occaſion. The Goths having after the Death of Clodonæus recovered much in Gall that he had taken from them, Theodorich ſent this his Son Theodobert, and Chlotharius alſo Guntharius his eldeſt Son to recover thoſe Territories out of their Hands. Gunthar went as far as the Ruteni, and then, for what cauſe nobody knows, returned. Theodobert proceeded as far as the Bituri ces or Bearne, where he took the Caſtle Deas, and coming before another Town called Capraria, one Deuteria preſented her ſelf to him to mitigate his diſpleaſure againſt the Inhabitants, and ſhe ſo demeaned her ſelf, that he fell in love and afterward Married her, though he had another Wife, and ſhe an Husband yet living in another place.

Ruteni Roüi ergnois Populus Galliæ Celticæ quorum Metropolis Segodunum hodie Rodes.

Theodobert Son of Theodorich like to be ruined by his Uncles.

31. Yet do our Hiſtorians ſpeak much in Commendation of Theodobert. His Father having Murthered Syginald his Kinſman, ſent and Commanded him to deal in the ſame manner with Gynald his Son, but he ſhewing him his Father's Letters, he ſent him out of the way, and when he came to be King reſtored him his Patrimony. His Father Dying after he had Reigned above two and twenty years, Childebert and Chlotharius his Uncles did all that lay in them to deprive him of his Life and Inheritance, and might have done much if he had not had timely notice of his Father's ſickneſs, and got to the place before he expired. Being ſtoutly defended and ſecured in his Throne by thoſe of his Subjects, living about Leodium or Leige, his Uncle Childebert who was the better of the two, and perceived he could not prevail againſt him, invited him to his Court, made much of him, and preſented him very richly at parting, putting him in hopes that he ſhould ſucceed him being Childleſs. Now he was King, he carried himſelf as a Prince both Great and Good, Governing with Juſtice, reſpecting the Clergy, indowing Churches, relieving the Poor, and beſides many other good deeds, remitting all the Tribute that was due to his Exchequer from the Churches of Arvernum. However Deutheria whom after his coming to be King he had Married, having a Daughter now Marriageable by her other Husband, was ſo jealous of him, that ſhe cauſed her to be put into a Chariot that was drawn by untamed Heifers, and Drowned at Virodunum in the River Moſa. This coming to the knowledge of Theodobert to gratifie his Diſpleaſure, as well as the earneſt deſires of the People, he put away Deutheria though he had by her a young Son called Theoduald, and took to him Wiſegarda whom he had Married ſeven years before. She Dying not long after, he Married another, but would not have to doe with Deutheria any more.

Virodunum hoc in loco non eſt Virodunum Æduorum Virdun ſur Saonne, ſed Virodunum Mediomatricum, ſeu Virdun en Lorreine aſſidens fluvio Moſæ hodie Meuſe.

Sect. 3.

More differences among the French Kings.

32. Childebert and Theodobert his Nephew were now very gratious. Notwithſtanding the Clemency that's aſcribed to the one, and Goodneſs to the other; yet conſidering the temper and cuſtome of their Family, a wonder it were if this friendſhip and alliance did not tend to the Deſtruction of ſome of their neareſt Relations, to the ſhedding of ſome of their own bloud. They now lay their Heads together, and conſult how to out Chlotharius of his Kingdom, raiſe Forces with ſuch ſpeed, and march againſt him with ſuch expedition, that being ſurpriſed, he was not in caſe to take the Field, but rather concealed himſelf in a Village about Orleance, where yet they diſcovered him, and were about to finiſh their Work, when miraculouſly they were prevented. Chrotildis hearing that of her two Sons that remained, the one was about to ſheath his Sword in the Bowels of the other, and calling to mind how ſince the time ſhe had firſt ſet them on work of killing their Relations, her Children had neither ſpared Uncles nor Nephews, nor any others whatſoever, but like Savage Beaſts, the more bloud they taſted, the more they thirſted after it, ſhe exceedingly afflicted her ſelf, and going to the Tomb of St. Martin, poured out her tears and Prayers to Almighty God, deprecated his diſpleaſure, and implored his help in this time of extremity, to take up the quarrel betwixt her two Sons e'er it ſhould proceed to farther miſchief. And according to her requeſt, to prevent what ſhe moſt feared, on a ſudden ſuch Storms and Tempeſts of Hail and Thunder aroſe, that overthrew all their Tents, broke the order of their Armies, and beat to the Ground the two Aggreſſours, who proſtrate on their Faces, asked pardon for what they had done, and ſent to Chlotarius to deſire all paſt might be forgotten, and a firm League of Amity and Alliance might be Concluded. He at whoſe Quarters not the leaſt diſturbance of Weather had happened, readily granted their requeſt, and ſo through the Prayers of their Devout Mother as our Authours obſerve, all matters were compoſed.

An expedition into Spain.

33. Childebert being now at leiſure, began to think of his expedition he had made into Spain, and how he had taken the City Toledo. He thought he had not done enough to revenge the injuries offered to his Siſter, but eſpecially deſired to become Maſter of that Countrey, of which at that time he had but had a proſpect. He eaſily perſwaded his Brother Chlotharius who bore a mind as reſtleſs and ambitious as himſelf to joyn with him, and together they march as far as Cæſarauguſta, (now Saragoſſa;) which refuſing to open to them they cloſely beſiege. Such was the condition of the Town, that the Defendants perceived they had nothing to truſt to but their Prayers, and made their ſolemn Proceſſions about the Walls, which the Franks ſeeing at a diſtance, imagined they were about ſome magical Charms and Incantations, and apprehending a Countreyman, demanded of him what might be the meaning of ſuch a ſhew. He anſwered, that they Prayed to Almighty God for the preſervation of their City, which the Kings underſtanding, deſired ſome Reliques of St. Vincent the Martyr, formerly a Prieſt of the place might be ſent them, and raiſing their Siege departed into other Quarters of Spain, which having ſubdued and waſted they returned home with very great Booty. So lame is the account we have concerning this expedition from Gregory of Tours, and ſuch as follow him, and as herein they are deficient, ſo they totally omit another affair, the knowledge whereof is more neceſſary to the underſtanding of the State of this Nation. At this time Beliſarius as we have in its place ſhewn at large, was about to make War againſt the Goths in Italy, who being ſore preſſed with the difficulties that impended, Theodatus their King ſent and made an Alliance with the Franks on theſe terms, that to them ſhould be reſigned all that part of Gall which the Goths had hitherto poſſeſſed with twenty thouſand Aurei, on condition that with the Goths they would joyntly manage the War againſt Beliſarius.

Provence delivered to them by the Goths.

34. But e'er this accord could be perfected Theodatus Dies, and Vitigis ſucceeds him, who perceiving plainly that he could not call that Army which lay in Provence, under the Command of Martius, to his aſſiſtence, but the Countrey muſt be expoſed to the Inrodes of the Franks, cauſed it to be delivered up into their hands, with ſo much money as Theodatus had promiſed to procure their friendſhip, (for they were ever moſt averſe to the Goths,) and their aſſiſtence againſt the Emperour Juſtinian. Childebert, Chlotharius and Theodobert having received the money and Territories, and divided them amongſt them, imbraced the Amity of the Goths, and promiſed them ſuccours, but profeſſed they could not ſend them any of their own Nation, becauſe they had entred lately into friendſhip with the Greeks, and promiſed aſſiſtence to Juſtinian in this War. But thus became the Franks Maſters of Provence, and that with conſent of Juſtinian the Emperour, who confirmed at their deſire what the Goths had granted, as Zonaras obſerves out of Procopius. Now did they they poſſeſs the famous Colonies of the Phocians at Maſſilia, at Aquæ Sextiæ, and of the Romans at Arelatum, and as Procopius teſtifies, began to ſtamp Gold Coins, not with the Image of the Emperour, as the cuſtome was, but with the Effigies of their own Kings; whereas to the Perſian King himſelf it was not lawfull, nor to any other Barbarian to Coin Gold money, though that of Silver was permitted them. Afterwards the War growing hot in Italy, Theodobert that he might ſeem mindfull of his word, ſent ten thouſand Foot to the aſſiſtence of the Goths, but theſe were not Franks but Burgundians, who were Commanded to ſay, that they came without any Orders received from him, for fear of diſobliging the Emperour. When the War was grown out in length, and both Goths and Romans were waſted and ſpent, our Franks conceived it eaſie to get a good ſhare of Italy, and repined to ſit idle at home and be lookers on, while others diſputed a province ſo near adjoyning. Forgetting then their late Oaths and accords both with Romans and Goths, (for this Nation of all others is moſt faithleſs, ſaith Procopius,) with an Army of fifty thouſand men under Conduct of Theodobert, they invaded Italy. They invade Italy.

Tom. 3. Annal.

35. Amongſt them there were ſome few Lanciers to guard their King. The reſt were Footmen without either Bows or Lances, wearing a Sword, a Shield, and a Battle-Axe, the Iron whereof was broad and ſharp on both ſides, and the Handle very ſhort, and this upon a ſignal at the firſt Charge, they were wont to caſt from them to break the Enemies Shields and kill their men. How they deceived both Goths and Romans we have ſhewed in a more proper place, as alſo how paſſing the Poe, they ſacrificed ſuch Women and Children as they found, and caſt them into the River, as the firſt ſpoils of War, retaining yet (as Procopius affirms,) though Chriſtians much of their old ſuperſtition, and uſing Sacrifices and other impious Rites in making their predictions. We need here put the Reader in mind how they were ſtraitned for Proviſions, and how Theodobert being ſeriouſly admoniſhed by Beliſarius to conſider what he was about, reſolved it was beſt for him to quit Italy, and ſo returned home, for which relations we are beholding to Procopius; Gregory of Tours ſaying little to the purpoſe of theſe matters, and telling an idle ſtory of the Daughter of Theodorich King of Italy, begotten on the Siſter of Clodonæus, as that ſhe Married a Slave, and for that being proſecuted with War by her Mother, ſhe poiſoned the old Woman in the Chalice, for which being depoſed by the Goths, they choſe Theodatus King of Tuſcia for their Prince, who put her to Death for her unnatural cruelty towards her Mother. This you muſt know the Kings of the Franks took moſt heinouſly, and ſent to Theodatus vowing to be revenged on him for the Death of their Kinſwoman, except he would compound the matter. He ſent them fifty thouſand Aurei to be friends, which Childebert and his Nephew Theodobert parted betwixt them, Childebert ever bearing evil will to Chlotharius, who was yet even with them, having got into his hands all the Treaſure of their Brother Cleodomir. Notwithſtanding the receit of this money, yet Theodobert invaded Italy, and being ſtraitned for Proviſions, returned home with very great Spoil.

hlot h.

36. To let paſs this fable of Gregory, and apply our ſelves to the Narrations of Procopius, who was an eye-witneſs of moſt of theſe Tranſactions, we are told farther by him that the affairs of the Goths being well-nigh ſunk, and Beliſarius lying before Ravenna, Theodobert thought to make an advantage of their Neceſſities, and ſent to Vitigis their King, offering that if he would divide Italy with the Franks, he would bring ſuch an Army into it, as ſhould eaſily drive thence Beliſarius with his Greeks. The noiſe of this Embaſſy coming to Beliſarius his Ears, he ſends his Meſſengers to Vitigis, who convinced him and his Goths that it was their intereſt rather to make an accord with the Emperour, than thoſe perfidious Franks, and a reſolution they took accordingly, ſending away the Ambaſſadours with a flat denial. Yet for all their good thoughts of the Emperour's Alliance, was Vitigis within a little time deſpoiled of all Dignity, and carried Priſoner to Conſtantinople, and Totilas was choſen King in his ſtead. He having taken and defaced Rome, ſent to Theodobert for his Daughter in Marriage, and received anſwer that he could not be eſteemed King of Italy, nor ever would be, having taken Rome but not able to keep it, having demoliſhed part, and quitted the reſt to his Enemies. This cauſed him to caſt away all thoughts of demoliſhing any more of that City. He ſupplied it with Proviſions, commanded to be re-edified what was beaten down at his firſt taking of it, ſent for the Senatours and others home that were confined in Campania, and held the Solemnity of the Circenſian Games. Of ſuch Reputation and Authority at this time was Theodobert.

Thrace waſted and a quarrel with the Emperour.

Agathias, lib. 1. ad init.

37. As he was of great Reputation, he was ſufficiently ſenſible thereof, and as of his own Diſpoſition he was bold and active; he now began to entertain greater Conceits and Imaginations in his Head than formerly. While Narſes was buſied in Italy, and the Emperour's Forces employed againſt the Goths, he thought of no leſs than invading Thrace, which having Conquered and waſted he deſigned to lay Siege to Conſtantinople it ſelf. He levied great Forces, and that nothing might be wanting to ſo great a deſign, he ſent to the Gepidæ, Lombards and other bordering Nations to make them ſenſible of the danger they were in, and to ſhew how intolerable a thing it was, that Juſtinian in his Imperial Edicts ſhould call himſelf Francicus, Alemanicus, as alſo Gepidicus and Longobardicus, beſides other Titles, as if he had indeed Conquered all thoſe Nations. And indeed to ſpeak the truth, as well in behalf of Theodobert as others, that Juſtinian took the ſeveral Titles of Alemanicus, Gothicus, Francicus, Vandalicus and Africanus, is evident out of his Edicts. But as for ſome of them he might juſtly doe it. The Goths he ſubdued having taken Vitigis the King, and made great ſlaughter of that Nation by his two Generals Beliſarius and Narſes; the Vandals alſo he had in a manner quite deſtroyed in Africk, which might confer alſo upon him the Sirname of Africanus. But to the Title of Francicus, if we may ſo ſay, he had no Title at all, having no where given them any except we call that an overthrow, when Narſes defeated the Alemans, their Clients or Dependants, which was after the Death of Theodobert. Of this affront (for no leſs he accounted it,) he was highly ſenſible, and though, as Agathias judgeth, in all probability he had periſhed in the attempt, yet left he no Stone unturned to puniſh Juſtinian for his Arrogance, and had certainly undertaken the expedition, had not Death put an end to him and his deſigns altogether. But concerning the manner of his Death, there are ſeveral relations. Gregory writes as if he died of a Conſumption, or ſome other lingring Diſeaſe, and that his Phyſicians made many applications to no purpoſe. Agathias tells us this ſtory, that Hunting on a time in the Woods, a fierce Bull ran with all his force againſt a Tree, which puſhing down, one of the Boughs thereof light upon Theodobert, and ſo wounded him in his Head that he died the very ſame day of the hurt. In the fourteenth year of his Reign as Gregory reckons, or rather his fourteenth being completed, thirty ſeven years after the Death of his Grandfather Chlodonæus, the twentieth of Juſtinian the Emperour, and the fifth of Totilas King of Italy, A. D. 546.

Theodobert dies.

Lib. 3. ad calcem.

Theodobald his Son ſucceeds.

38. To Theodobert ſucceeded Theodobald his Son, a Child, and under the Government of his Schoolmaſter. After the Death of Totilas in Italy ſucceeded Teias, who being utterly overthrown, the Goths that remained were forced to ſubmit to the Yoke, but preſently growing weary of it they ſent to Theodobald, deſiring him to conſider their Condition, and how the Tyrant of the world proſpering in this his courſe of deſtroying Nations, their turn could not be far off, but the old Enmities and Wars would be renewed, ſuch as the Marii, Camilli and the Cæſars had made againſt the ancient Germans, who had alſo poſſeſſed themſelves of all beyond the Rhine, ſo that juſt perſons their ſucceſſours would ſeem to demand nothing but what was their own. Theodobald being utterly unexpert in all things that concerned War, and hating buſineſs and labour, was averſe to their Propoſals, alledging rightly that it was neither Policy nor Piety by ſuch a raſh and needleſs adventure, to caſt themſelves into manifeſt Danger. But Leutharis and Butilinus notwithſtanding the inclinations of their King, entred into a League and promiſed the Ambaſſadours aid. Theſe were Brothers, Alemans by Nation, but of ſo great authority amongſt the Franks, that they Governed their Compatriots, being firſt owned and preferred by Theodobert. Now if we give credit to Aſinius Quadratus, (ſaith Agathias) an Italian born, but one that wrote moſt accurately the affairs of Germany, theſe Alemans are a ſtrange and mixt People, which their name ſufficiently teſtifies. Theodorich King of the Goths having now made himſelf Maſter of Italy, had ſubdued them and made them Tributaries. As ſoon as he was Dead, and the War broke out betwixt Juſtinian and the Goths, the Goths flattering the Franks, and by all means endeavouring to gain their favour, both loſt ſeveral other places, and were forc't to quit the Nation of the Alemans; for being to fight not ſo much for their Dominion as their being it ſelf, they conceived themſelves bound to relinquiſh all their diſtant and ſupernumerary Subjects, and ſquare and limit their affections by the Rules of Neceſſity. The Alemans being thus quitted by the Goths, Theodobert thought it as much his intereſt to gain them, and ſo bringing them under, left the Dominion over them and his other Subjects to his Son Theodobald. They began now, eſpecially the wiſer ſort, to be civilized, and in their civil Government conformed themſelves much to that of the Franks. As to Religion they differed, beſtowing on Ubi ſuprà.

The Alemans ſubmit themſelves to the French.

on Trees, Rivers, Hills and Groves Divine Honours, by cutting off the Heads of Horſes and other Creatures, and Sacrificing them to theſe dumb deities.

39. Leutharis then, and Butilinus, as we have formerly ſhewn, with confidence enough invaded Italy, and had ſuch ſucceſs as was anſwerable to their raſhneſs and Indiſcretion. Before this, Juſtinian, while Totilas yet lived, had ſent his Ambaſſadour to Theodebald to deſire he would joyn with him againſt the Goths, the ancient Enemies of his Nation, but received this anſwer, that with the Goths an alliance was already made, and that if any thing he retained in Italy, it was by conſent of Totilas and the free ſurrender of that People; for the Reader muſt call to mind what we have already hinted, that Theodebert had moreover made tributary to him the Cottian Alpes with thoſe toward the Sea, and Liguria and the maritime Coaſts of Venetia, without any Right or Title, as the Emperour alledged. With this anſwer he diſmiſſed the Ambaſſadour, Leonatius, a man born of a conſular Houſe, and ſent Leudardus unto Cæſar under the ſame Character; and not long after the defeat of Leutharis and Butilinus, died without iſſue in the ſeventh year of his Reign. Some tell us that by his Teſtament he left his Great Uncle Chlotharius his Heir. But Agathias, having told his Reader that he died miſerably of a Diſeaſe which from his very Birth had hung upon him, adds that whereas the Law of his Countrey called Childebert and Chlotharius his two Uncles to the Succeſſion, a moſt grievous contention aroſe about it, which had like to have deſtroyed the whole Family. Childebert was both grown old and very Diſeaſed, ſo that he appeared a mere Sceleton, and he had no Male Iſſue, onely Daughters. Chlotharius was not very old and had four Sons, all full of Spirit and Vigour. He objected therefore that the Eſtate of Theodebald was not to go to his Brother, whoſe Kingdom in a ſhort time would fall to him and his Sons. Neither did his hopes deceive him, for within a while the old man of his own accord gave up his Inheritance to him, fearing its credible the power of the man, and deſirous not to have any quarrels with him. And not long after he himſelf Died, and ſo the Monarchy of the Franks was devolved upon Chlotharius. Gregory writes that Childebert died of a lingring Diſeaſe at Paris, where he was buried in the Church of St. Vincent, which he himſelf had built. And that Chlotharius ſeized on his Kingdom and Treaſures, driving his two Daughters into Exile, whereof the name of one was Crothberga, and the other Crothſinda, as appears from Aimoinus. Childebert died in the forty ninth year of his Reign, the one and thirtieth of Juſtinian, A. D. 557.

Theodebald dies.

Fauſtus in vita Mauri apud Papirium Maſſonum, lib. 1.

Agathias, lib. 2.

Childebert dies.

40. Thus remained Chlotharius Monarch of the Franks, and Lord of all Gall, which had not happened to any of that Nation before him, and ſhews us that the beſt things of this world are ſometimes granted to the worſt of Mortals. Yet was he not contented, but behaved himſelf in that manner, as if all was his due without acknowledgment of the power and intereſt of his Benefactour. Chramnus one of his Sons was ordained as a ſcourge againſt him, whom being a young man very ſtout and crafty, he had made Governour of Aquitaine. He bore himſelf higher than the quality of a Governour, or indeed that of a King would permit, acting all things like a Tyrant, and taking no other meaſures than from his own mere Luſt and Pleaſure. His Father being informed what courſes he took, ſent for him that he might give him better Counſel, but he inſtead of coming to his preſence, goes to his Uncle Childebert at Paris, whom he incenſes ſo far againſt his Father, that they enter into a League to deprive him both of Life and Kingdom. Chramnus hereupon goes back to Aquitaine, and in his paſſage endeavours to bring all places to ſubmit to his Commands, his Father being now employed in a War with the Saxons, which hindred him from marching againſt him in Perſon, but he ſent Cherebert and Guntran two others of his Sons to chaſtiſe their rebellious and unnatural Brother. They ſent to him to reſtore what without any Right or Title he had ſeized, and to gain time he promiſed he would doe it, as ſome write, or as others, anſwered that he could not doe it, yet profeſſed himſelf his Father's Subject and Vaſſal, and deſired to keep what he had with his good leave and bleſſing. They no way ſatisfied with this anſwer prepared to fight, and then ſuch an hideous tempeſt of Thunder and Lightning happened, as diverted them from their Intentions. Chramnus then betakes himſelf to craft. He cauſes a Rumour to be ſpread that his Father was ſlain in the War againſt the Saxons, to which his two Brothers giving credit haſted away into Burgundy. He followed them, and taking in his way Cabillonum proceeded as far as the Caſtle of Divio. In the mean time his Uncle Childebert believing alſo that his Brother was Dead, lead an Army to Reims and waſted the Countrey with Fire and Sword, which done, he Died of a Fever, ſaith Aimoinus, and was Buried at Paris by German the Biſhop in the Church of St. Vincent, of which he himſelf had been the Founder.

To whom ſucceeded Chlotharius Monarch of the Franks, and Lord of all Gall.

Who makes war upon the Saxons.

Cabillonum (hodie Chalon ſur Saone) oppidum Æduorum Cabillonenſium ut Divio Æduorum Divionenſium in Gallia Celtica.

Reims olim Durocottorum urbs Galliæ Belgicæ.

Sect. 3.

41. Chramnus thus deprived of his Uncle's Aſſiſtence, betook himſelf to Conabus King of the Britains in Aremorica, where he preſently renewed the War. His Father having made an end with the Saxons, concluded he was now by any means to be ſuppreſſed, and for that purpoſe marched himſelf in the Head of an Army into Britain, making his Prayers to Almighty God, that he would be Judge betwixt them, and as formerly to David over Abſalom, ſo he would pleaſe to give to him the Victory over his unnatural Son. This Prayer he made, but not with that Fatherly tenderneſs which he did, whom he took for his Example. For it pleaſing God to give him the Victory, inſtead of rejoycing for the ſafety and Preſervation of his Son, as we may believe David would have done, by the great ſorrow he underwent for his Death, he cauſed him with his Wife and Daughters, (his Labour for whoſe Preſervation cauſed him to neglect taking ſhip, and ſo to be ſurprized) to be ſhut up in a poor Cottage, and therein to be burnt to Death. But if we can believe Gregory, he ſhewed abundance of good Nature in his Wars with the Saxons lately mentioned. They themſelves gave the occaſion, rebelling and denying the payment of their accuſtomed Tributes. But when he was come near their Countrey, they ſent their Meſſengers to him and offered to pay the Arrears, and what he pleaſed more, ſo he would but withdraw his Army and leave them to their wonted repoſe and quiet. He thought it reaſonable, and adviſed that they ſhould not proceed farther againſt them, leſt they ſinned againſt God; but his Men alledged they were Lyars, and there was no truſt to be given to what they ſaid. Then did the Saxons offer the half of their Goods to purchaſe Peace, which the King willingly would have accepted, and uſed the ſame Argument as formerly to his Souldiers: But they would not therein Acquieſce. Then did the poor People offer their Clothes, their Cattel, and all other moveables they had, with half their Lands, ſo they might have their Wives and Children free, and Peace to live with them. The King then was very earneſt with his Men foretelling their Ruine, if they would not reſt ſatisfied with ſuch unreaſonable Propoſals, and flatly refuſed to accompany them in the War. Hereupon they fell into a great Mutiny, and running with violence to his Tent tore it in pieces, and loaded him with reproachfull Words; affirming they would kill him, if he refuſed to go along with them. He was forced to go, but Battel being joyned after an innumerable Company ſlain on both ſides, the Franks recovered a mighty overthrow. Chlotharius in great trouble then asked Peace, profeſſing that he was drawn into the Action by Conſtraint. Which having obtained he returned home.

Invades Britain.

And ſurprizing his rebel Son burns him.

42. So is the ſtory told by Gregory and Aimoinus, both favourers of the Franks, to the advantage of Chlotharius, which little ſuits with the conſtant Deportment of his whole Life. Twice he committed Paricide: Firſt killing his Nephews, and afterward his own Son, with his innocent Wife and Daughters. Beſides Whoredom and Polygamy; of Inceſt he was guilty, in marrying two Siſters, the one while the other lived, and he frequented her Bed. Redegund was his firſt Wife, who was deſcended of the Royal Bloud of Thuringia, as we ſaid before, after her the Wife of his Brother Clodomir, and the Wife of his Nephew Theodobert. Beſides theſe he married Ingundis, by whom he had five Sons. Gunthar, Childerick, Charibert, Gunchramn, Sygilbert, and Chlotſinda a Daughter. Then when this his Wife recommended her Siſter Aregundis to him, to provide her a wealthy Husband; he himſelf fell in Love with her, and took her to Wife, and by her he had Chilperick; beſides Chramnus, by another Woman called Chunſena. Having this load upon his Conſcience, no wonder, if he was a little ſenſible thereof, eſpecially when he knew he could not live much longer. He came, as Gregory tells us, to Tours, where at the Sepulchre of St. Martin he earneſtly prayed, that his ſins might be forgiven. Then went he and hunted in the Foreſt Cotia, where being ſeized with a Fever he returned to the Village called Compendium, where as he lay deſperately ſick, he uttered theſe words: Woe is me, what think you? What kind of heavenly King is he, who kills ſo great Kings in this manner? which expreſſion Papirius Maſſonus ſo interprets, that being a deſpiſer of God, and impious all his Life, he could not die otherwiſe, but with his laſt Breath accuſed him as grudging Life to mortal Men. Yet he died not till the one and fiftieth Year of his Reign: Or rather, that compleated, and was buried by his four Sons at Soiſſons, in the Church dedicated to St. Medard of his own founding, in the thirty fourth Year of Juſtinian, the nineteenth after, the Conſulſhip of Baſilius, A. D. 560.

His Character.

And Death.

Compendium (hodiè Compeigne) oppidum vero Manduorum (le Peuple de Vermandois) ad Confluentiam fluviorum Axonæ (Aine) & Oeſiæ (Oiſe) in Gallia Belgica.

43. For four Sons he left to ſucceed him and no more, Gunthar, Chramn and Childerick being dead before him. Cherebert Reigned at Paris, Chilperick at Soiſſons, Guntramn at Orleance, and Sigebert at Metz, over the Mediomatrices. But this diviſion ſion was not made before ſome Quarrelling betwixt the two Brothers, for Chilperick was before-hand with them, and ſeizing his Father's Treaſures, which lay at Paris, therewith hired Souldiers, and began to uſurp upon them all. But they timely gathered together, and forced him to quit his pretenſions, and come to an equal diviſion of the Kingdom by Lot, which fell out as we have obſerved. Cherebert, (or Charibert) married Ingoberga a very devout Woman; who having two Maids called, Marconeſa and Meroſidis, he fell ſo deſperately in Love with them, that he rejected their Lady. For this German, the Biſhop of the place, ſeverely rebuked him, and as ſome ſay, excommunicated him, but he remained incorrigible, and therefore by the juſt Judgment of God both of them were ſpeedily taken away, with a Son he had by one of them; and himſelf not long after dyed at a Caſtle called Blavia in Aquitaine, and was buried in the Church of St. Romain. Gregory mentions another Wife he had, Theodogildis by Name, the Daughter of an Herdsman, as the other two were deſcended from a Cottage, who after his Death ſent to his Brother Gunthcramn, offering her ſelf to him in Marriage with all her Treaſures. He ſeemed to comply with her offer, and receiving the Treaſures thruſt her into a Monaſtery at Arles, were tired quickly with the Auſterities of that ſort of Life, ſhe ſent privily to the Gothick King of Spain, making the ſame offer, ſhe had done to Gunthcramn; but the Abbeſs ſurprized her as ſhe was going out of the Monaſtery, and cauſing her to be ſoundly beaten committed her to cloſe Cuſtody, where in great Trouble, ſhe ſpent all her Weariſome days. This is the Account we have from Gregory and Aimoinus, concerning Cherebert King of Paris, which ſhews him Guilty of one of his Father's vices, although otherwiſe, as appears from other Writers, he excelled in Virtue, both him and all his Predeceſſours. Amongſt many other things worthy of Memory, he is celebrated for his kindneſs towards Vultrogotha the Wife, and his two Couſin Germans, the Daughters of Childebert, whom he very much eſteemed, though not onely outed of their Inheritance, but baniſhed by his Father. He is farther ſaid to have hated War and Contention, and to have been a great lover of Peace, Juſtice and good Letters. For he was the firſt of thoſe Kings that underſtood Latin, his Father, Grandfather all before him, having onely ſpoken the Sicambrian Dialect, as appears from Venantius Fortunatus. Being dead, his three Brothers ſeized on his Kingdom and divided it amongſt them.

The Kingdom divided among his four Sons.

Aimoinus Pariſiis Gregorius verò Theſauros aſſervatos ſcribit in villa Brannaco.

Aimoinus. l. 3. c. 2.

Reginol. 1. Chronic. & Ino Camotenſ. in fine partis 5'. Decreti.

Cheribert dyes.

Blavia (hodie Blais) oppidum Santonum ad Sarumnæ maritimum Æſtuarium Gallia in Celtica.

His Character.

His three Brothers ſucceed him.

Lib. 6.

44. And as they made themſelves the Heirs of his Kingdom, ſo of his vitious Courſe of Life, for all were Inheritours of their Father's intemperance; two of thoſe that ſurvived eſpecially. Gunthcramn (or Guntrann) had four Sons by divers Concubines; the Names of which, we are of Aimoinus his mind, that it is not worth the while to mention, being ſuch like as they were, and all dying with their Iſſue before him. Yet this vice excepted, he is otherwiſe reported to have been a very good Man, a Prince both very juſt and upright, and of him this very ſtrange ſtory is related. Being on a time hunting in the Woods, and his followers diſperſed here and there, as the manner is, with one of his moſt truſty Servants, he ſate down under a Tree, and leaning his Head in his Companion's Boſom fell aſleep. As thus he ſlept, a certain Animal crept out of his Mouth, and made toward the Bank of a Rivolet adjoyning, as if it would go over, which his Servant perceiving, he drew his Sword and laid it a croſs the Brook as a Bridge for it to paſs, which accepting it went over upon it, and entering at the Foot of a certain Mountain after ſome hours ſtay, returned by the ſame Bridge into the Mouth of the King. Hereupon he preſently awaked, and told to his Companion a ſtrange Dream he had had; as that he beheld a vaſt River, over which lay an Iron Bridge, which having paſſed, he entred into a certain Cave at the bottom of a Mountain, wherein he beheld ineſtimable Treaſures, the hidden Gaza of the ancient Fathers. Then the other tells him, what he had ſeen come out his Mouth, and it's agreed that the Mountain be ſearched, wherein juſt as he ſaid a Cave was found, and therein an unſpeakable quantity of Gold and Silver, out of which the King at firſt intended to ſend a very rich Veſſel to Jeruſalem to our Saviour's Sepulchre; but conſidering the difficulty of the Journey, and how the Saracens infeſted thoſe Coaſts, he changed his mind, and beſtowed the Preſent on the Church of Cabilo, which he had cauſed to be built over the Sepulchre of St. Marcellus, and as long as the Tomb of the Martyr continued in Gall, nothing for Workmanſhip could be found that was comparable to it. This Dream of Guntram hath been much written and ſpoken of in later times. Marius tells us, that it's at this day to be ſeen (he wrote but in the Year, 1635.) ingraven on a Marble in a very ancient Nunnery, in a Town called called Palme ten miles diſtant from Beſançon, an imperial City ſituate in the middle of the County of Burgundy. Some that think it not altogether impoſſible, for the rational Soul to be ſeparated from a Man's body, and yet the Body live, a certain kind of Life flowing from that Temperature into which a ſpiritual ſubſtance can have no Energy or natural influence, do much concern themſelves about the Creature that went in and out at the King's mouth.

Guntram fleſhly given.

Chron. Belg. ad A. D. 594. Decimo miliari à Veſontione.

Sigebert Marries Bruna the King of Spains Daughter.

Chilperick Marries her Siſter.

Galſonta al. Walſonta & Galſuintha.

But ſtrangles her in Bed.

45. But, to our buſineſs. Sigebert knowing, that as to the matter of Women all his Brothers were much blamed, reſolved not to ſplit his Reputation upon the ſame Rock, and therefore ſent into Spain to Athanagild (or Athanahild) King of the Goths, to ask his Daughter Bruna, or Brunia, in Marriage. Having received her with a very rich Portion; for that ſhe was an Arian, he cauſed her to be Chriſtned, ſaith Gregory, or baptized ſaith Aimoinus, and the later adds, that cauſing her to be inſtructed in the Catholick faith, he changed her Name from Bruna to Brunechild; whereas the other calls her Brunehild at firſt, making no mention of any change of Name. The noiſe of this Match being ſpread abroad, and, as in ſuch Caſes is uſual, the fame of the Ladies worth being very great, Chilperick the other Brother who was already provided of a great number of Women, ſent into Spain to procure her elder Siſter, promiſing that if he could be ſo happy as to enjoy her, he would diſmiſs all his other Wives. 'Atavaſild believing him, ſent his Daughter to him, Galſonta by Name, with a great deal of Treaſure, and his Ambaſſadours at the delivery of her demanded of Chilperick an Oath, that he would never put her from the Dignity of Queen. He readily gave it, but being of a very fickle and inconſtant Humour, Fredegundis one of his former Wives, again wound her ſelf into his Favour, and prevailed to be once more reſtored to his Bed. Having got ſo great an opportunity of working her ends, ſhe ceaſed not to improve it, and knowing ſhe had got faſt hold of him, carried her ſelf as Queen, and put all affronts imaginable upon Galſonta. She poor Lady hereupon makes her Complaints, and for a time is put off with good Words; but at length, the difference increaſing, at the Inſtigation oft he Strumper, he, who had ſhe been taken by an Enemy, was in Honour ingaged to have redeemed her with his Sword, nay if the Caſe had ſo required, with his very Life, as Aimoinus obſerves, was not aſhamed, when ſhe thought nothing leſs, in their common Bed to cauſe her to be ſtrangled; a Villany unknown to a Tyrant, a Frank, and much more to a King, in ſuch a manner to violate the Dignity of Marriage. His Brothers were inraged at the Fact, and thinking themſelves highly obliged to puniſh it, agreed together to deprive him of his Kingdom. And that the thing took not, Chilperick was not ſo much beholding to his own Policy, as the ſlightneſs of the Council, and Advice upon which the Deſign it ſelf was founded.

The Hunnes overthrown in Battel.

Albis, Ptolemæo ἄλβις, Germaniæ Celeberrimus fluvius. Germanis Elbe, Bohemis verò, apud quos Originem ſumit, Labe. Elue & Elbe Germanis undecim ſignificat, atque tot Amnes in Albin influunt unde nomen ſortitus eſt ut aliqui atumant.

46. But, to leave the wiving of thoſe Kings, and come to ſomething more fit for them to Practiſe, and us to Write, not long after the Death of Chlotharius their Father; the Hunnes reſolved to invade Gall out of Pannonia, with intention there to Plant themſelves, as Attila long before them had attempted. Sigebert having notice of their Motions and delighting in War, for which Nature had very well qualified him, determined to paſs the Rhine, and if they ſtill proceeded to give them Battel in the fartheſt parts of Thuringia, which was then ſubject unto his own Juriſdiction. At the River Albis they met and fought, where Sigebert remained Victour over a moſt fierce Nation, having ſlain many thouſands of them in the place; and returning home, expected thanks from his Brothers, as the common Protectour of all their Dominions. But on the contrary he found, what in the leaſt he never could have expected. Chilperick in his abſence had faln upon his Towns, and amongſt others, had made himſelf Maſter of Reims, ſo that his Sword which was not yet fully dry, he muſt again bathe in the Bloud of his Countreymen and Relations. Sueſſio or Soiſſons, the ordinary reſidence of his Brother he takes by Force, and therein Theodebert his Son whom he ſent to ſafe Cuſtody, then ingaging in Battel with him himſelf, he routs his Army, puts him to flight, and immediately recovers what was his own before his expedition. Having done thus much, he was ſo good Natur'd, as to make a Peace with him, and not onely reſtored him his Son, whom he ſent away with great Gifts, but the City of Soiſſons alſo; and then being at his eaſe, he ſent Goga the Major Domus, or his principal Miniſter into Spain to fetch Brunchildis, which he did to his ſorrow, as the event proved. For after ſhe came to have once an Intereſt with the King her Husband, ſhe alienated his mind from him by degrees, and at laſt perſuaded him to put him to Death; from which Act proceeded ſuch Effuſion of Noble, yea alſo of Royal Bloud amongſt the Franks, and ſuch ſlaughters were made, that in Sibylla her Prophecy they now accounted to be fulfilled, which foretold, that Bruma ſhould come from the parts of Spain, before whoſe Face the Nations, or rather, the Kings of the Nations, ſhould periſh; but ſhe her ſelf ſhould be kicked to death by Horſes.

Venantius Fortunatus, l. 7.

The Saxons twice beaten by Sigebert.

47. In the mean time the Saxons being Neighbours to Thuringia, did much miſchief to that Province, ſo that Sigebert was obliged to ſend one Lupus, an induſtrious Man, and a very good Souldier, to reduce them to reaſon, which not being able to doe without blows, he fell upon them, and on the Bank of the River Bordaha, cut in pieces many thouſands of them, beſides multitudes that were drowned in the River. Yet notwithſtanding this People would not contain it ſelf within its own bounds, but playing again the ill Neighbour, Sigebert himſelf, with a compleat Army, marched againſt them, and ſending away his Horſe, fought on foot at the Head of his Men, which ſo animated them, that they got another notable Victory. At this Battel was preſent one Conda, now very Aged, but formerly an excellent Souldier, who loſt two Sons in the Fight, young Men of very great valour. Theodorich, the Son of Clodonæus, in conſideration of his worth, firſt made him a Colonel; then Theodobert having more experience of Conduct, gave him the place of Great Maſter of his Houſhold, and after his Death he was, in a manner, Tutour to Theodobald, during his Minority. Afterward he ſerved Chlotharius in the ſame capacity, he had one Theodobert, who did nothing of moment without him, and at laſt, having outlived ſo many Kings, he was ſo dear to Sigebert, that he, and he alone, ſate with him at his Table, than which, amongſt the Franks, a greater Honour could not be conferred on a Subject. On the Death of his Sons Venantius Fortunatus wrote an Elegant Poem, from which we have this Account of the Battel, and the Fortune of this excellent Captain, which otherwiſe had been buried in eternal oblivion. Gregory and Aimoinus writing of the Wars againſt the Saxons, ſpake nothing of this Conda, but great things of Mummolus, who obtained ſeveral notable Victories over them, and the Lombards, which the Reader may find in the Hiſtory of this People, who at ſeveral times and under conduct of ſeveral Captains invaded Gall.

Civil Wars among the Brethren Kings of France.

Burdigala, hodie Bourdeaux, oppidum Biturigum Vibiſcorum, de qua conſule Sincerum in appendice ad Itinerarium Galliæ. Bituriges Celtici, ductis duabus ſuæ gentis Coloniis in Aquitaniam, altera Boiorum, Vibiſcorum altera, huc attribuerunt, agrum Burdigalenſem, illi Tarbellicum. Ut innuit Monetus in Geographia Galliæ.

48. Not long after the finiſhing of theſe Wars with the Saxons and Lombards, the Brothers fell at odds amongſt themſelves, the quarrel beginning betwixt Sigebert and Chilperick, whoſe Son Clodonæus ſeized upon Burdigala, but was thence expelled by one Sigulfus, who concerned himſelf in behalf of Sigebert. In the mean time a difference alſo aroſe betwixt Sigebert and Guntram, who aſſembled all his Biſhops together at Paris, to determine the Controverſie, but the Civil War being to grow into greater flames they refuſed to ſtand to their determination, ſo great were their ſins, as Gregory obſerveth. Chilperick after this fruitleſs Mediation was ſo far incenſed, as to ſend Theodobert his eldeſt Son, who had, when a Priſoner, given his Oath never more to fight againſt his Uncle, to invade the Countries of the Turoni, Pictavi, and all the other places beyond Ligeris, which having formerly been part of the Inheritance of Cheribert, had faln to Sigebert. At Pictavi or Poictiers he gave Battel to Gundobald, who endeavoured to put a ſtop to his Cariere, and gave him a notable overthrow, with which ſucceſs animated, he waſted with Fire and Sword the greateſt part of the Countrey about Tours, and if they had not yielded themſelves in time, had utterly deſtroyed them. Thence he removed to the Lemonices, and Cadurci, the Territories of whom he invaded, waſted, deſtroyed, burnt their Churches, cauſed their Service to ceaſe, killed their Clerks, demoliſhed the Monaſteries of Men, deluded the Women, overturned all things, ſo that in the Opinion of Gregory, the groans of theſe Churches were greater than they had been in the very days of Diocletian. Sigebert, as he had ſome reaſon, being moved with theſe violent Courſes of his perfidious Nephew, ſent and raiſed Forces beyond the Rhine, out of Thuringia, and the neighbouring Nations, which making up a great Army, he led them againſt Chilperick, who fearing that his Brother Guntram, had deſerted him, becauſe overcome by the Threats of Sigebert he had let his Forces paſs the readieſt way through his Countrey, deſired Peace, which being granted, he capitulated that the places his Son had waſted, might not be called to account, having done nothing but what they were conſtrained to doe by Acts of ſuch a violent and terrifying Nature.

49. By Virtue of the Accord, he was to give up all that Theodobert had lately Conquered, which done, the Army of Sigebert was to diſband and march away. But being ſtrangers, and having no other motive to the Service, but the deſire of pay and Booty, they reſolved, ſeeing their time was to be ſo ſhort, to make the beſt uſe of it they could; and therefore rifled all the Towns about Paris, and ſo returned, being nothing pleaſed with Sigebert for his ſo ſhort Entertainment, who overpowered ſome with good Words, and others with harſh Deeds, cauſing ſeveral Mutineers to be ſtoned. Now all differences were compoſed betwixt the Brothers, and nothing was expected but a perpetual Amity, and a good Correſpondence not to be infringed. But ſee the natural Diſpoſition of theſe Franks: Chilperick the Year after raiſes Forces, and again makes Excurſions into the Dominions of Sigebert, making waſte of all things he light upon as formerly, which obliged his Brother to recall the Army, he had lately remitted into Germany. He himſelf marches toward Paris, and ſends Orders to his Subjects living about Tours and other places, to make head againſt Theodobert, who having no mind to the Employment; he ſent Godegiſilus and Guntram, two of his Officers againſt him. Upon their appearance in the Field moſt of his Men deſerted him, yet would he with a few , in Compariſon, give them Battel, and being ſlain was carried by Arnulfus to the City of Engoliſme and there buried. Chilperick upon the approach of Sigebert, when he heard that his Brother Guntram had made his Peace with him fled, to Tournay with his Wife and Children, and therein fortified himſelf. Sigebert took in all Towns on this ſide Paris, and came as far as Rothomagus or Rouen, whence returning to Paris again, thither came to him his Wife Brunchildis with her Children.

Tornacum, hodie Tournai, oppidum Belgarum ad Scaldim fluvium.

Rotomagus Roüen hodie Metropolis Venetio Caſiorum in Gallia Celtica.

King Sigebert ſtabbed.

50. Now did theſe Franks, who had formerly been ſubject to Childebert the Elder, ſend to him, offering to renounce the Title of Chilperick, and to put themſelves under his Government. Incouraged by this Addreſs, he ſent a Party to beſiege his Brother in Tournay, reſolving himſelf to follow with a greater force. At a certain Village called Victoriacum, his Army came to a Rendezvous, and here ſetting him upon a Target, (according to the cuſtome of theſe Northern Nations, for ſo Vitigis was by the Goths inaugurated) they ſaluted him firſt King of Paris. Thus far all things tended to his wiſh; but the Fortune of the greateſt Monarchs is very inſtable. Two young men corrupted with gold by Fredegundis, the Wife or Strumpet of Chilperick, while he prides himſelf in his new Title, and receives the congratulations of his Officers, even in the midſt of the Army, with poiſoned Knives, in thoſe days called Scramaſaxi, ſet upon him on each ſide, and wounded him ſo, that he died ſpeedily in the place, in the fortieth Year of his Age, and the fourteenth of his Reign. Chilperick having received the News, came out of Tournay, and buried him at a Village, called Lambrus, near Doway, whence he was afterward removed to Soiſſons, to the Church of St. Medard, which being founded by Chlotharius, his Father, had been finiſhed and beautified by himſelf. Chilperick thus, by the wickedneſs of other Men, being ſaved from imminent Ruine, from Tournay went ſtreight to Paris, where finding Brunichild, and her two young Daughters, he baniſhed the Mother to Rouen, and the Daughters to * Meldi, a Town lying upon, or rather a People living near, the River Matrona; as for Childebert, the Son of Sigebert, Gundebald, his moſt faithfull Friend, had beforehand with all ſecrecy imaginable conveyed him unto Metz. † Chilperick by Andonera, his firſt Wife, had three Sons, Theodobert, Meroneus and Clodonæus. Meroneus he ſent againſt the People living about Tours, being the Subjects of his Brother Guntram; but coming to that City under pretence of going to viſit his own Mother, who lived baniſhed amongſt the Cenomani, he went to Rouen, and there he married Brunichildis.

Is ſucceeded by Childebert his Son.

* Meldos Papirius Maſſonius ait eſſe oppidum ad Matronam fluvium; at verò Meldi ſive Meldæ ſunt Populi, quorum alii ſunt Belgo-Celtici, ad dextram ſcilicet ripam Matronæ, alii propriè Celtici Sequanam inter & Matronam fluvios; Les Briois Celtiques, le Peuple de Brie Celtique, aut our de Meaux, & deſſa & deſſus la Riviere Mame. Alii ſunt Meldi Maritimi atque Belgici, uti Strabo diſertè ait, & Cæſar ipſe indicat cum ſcribit, ſuo juſſu fabricatas Naves in Meldis, ad ſubvehendos exercitus in Britanniam.

† Chilperick ut Venantius tradit, l. 9. potentem & validum adjutorem ſonat. Abjecto litera C, quod in aliis nominibus, Scaligero monente, fieri debet, eſt Hilp-rich, Hilpe Anglis etiamnum Helpe auxilium, Rich dives aut potens.

Hilperice potens ſi interpres Barbarus extet,
Adjutor fortis hoc quoque nomen habes.

51. Chilperick was inraged upon hearing thereof, fearing the Craft and Wit of the Woman, who he knew would never be reconciled to him, nor his Wife Fredegundis, but would work his Son to her own Will, and thruſt him on to dangerous attempts againſt his Family. He goes down therefore with ſome Forces to Rouen. They take Sanctuary in a Church of St. Martin, whence they refuſe to depart, till he had given his Oath, not onely for the immunity of their Perſons, but of their Marriage alſo. The Accord is made, and being come out of the Church, he feaſts them for two days together, but then takes away his Son, not at all regarding ding his Oath. As he returns, News is brought, that thoſe about Campania and Reims, had riſen up in Arms, and taken from him the City of Soiſſons, which raiſed in him ſuch Indignation, that ſpeedily increaſing his Forces by new Levies, he goes againſt them, overthrows them in Battel, and retaking Soiſſons, puts many of the Nobility to death. Then ſends he his Son Clodonæus againſt the People inhabiting about Tours, joining with him, as his Couſellour and Aſſiſtent, one Deſiderius. Againſt them Mummolus, the Patritian of King Guntram, made head, and giving them battel, got the better, killing, Aimoinus ſaith, no leſs than fifty thouſand of their Men, with the loſs of twenty thouſand of his own followers, though Gregory mentions but twenty four thouſand on the one ſide, and five thouſand on the other. This put Chilperick much out of humour, and Fredegundis, his Wife, obſerving it, thought it a fit time to turn his Rage and Diſpleaſure upon Meroneus his Son, whom ſhe accuſed of Treachery, and abetting the Intereſt of Brunichildis. At her inſtigation he is ſhaven, and being thruſt into a Monaſtery in an Iſland called Aniſola, near to the Cenomani, there it is commanded that he be ordained Prieſt. But by the perſuaſion of one Guntram, a Count, he makes his eſcape thence, and reaſſuming the Habit of a Lay-perſon, comes to Tours, and takes Sanctuary in the Church of St. Martin, where Gregory the Biſhop, our Hiſtorian, refuſed to give him the Communion, till he threatned to cauſe a Maſſacre of the People thereabout to be made. He continued here for ſome time, to the great regret of his Father, and Fridegundis his Step-Mother, who uſed all means poſſible to intrap him. Being by her Wiles drawn out of this Church, with intention to be ſlain, though he eſcaped the danger, at length, after he had had recourſe to Brunichildis, but was rejected, he was circumvented by the People called Tarabannenſes, who pretending they would revolt to him from his Father, he uſed all ſpeed imaginable to put himſelf into their Hands. But having him once in their Power, they ſent his Father notice, who uſed all expedition to come at him, which he dreading, and expecting to be cruelly handled, he prevailed with one Gailenus, his follower, to kill him, which he did with a Knife, run into his ſide. The King coming after he expired, cauſed Gailenus to be tortured to death, with ſeveral others of his attendants. The Report went, that this Train was laid for this unfortunate young Man by Guntram Boſo, who was very dear to Fredegundis, becauſe he had ſlain Theodobert, another Son of Chilperick, and by Ægidius a Biſhop, who had been a long time very familiar with her.

Sect. 3.

Aninſula Monaſterium eſt Cenomannorum cui Carileſo hodie Nemen non procul à Ripa Ledi fluminis (le Loir) & Vindocino (Vandome) urbe Ptolemæo cognita.

Qui Tarabannenſes Gregorio ſunt Tarnanenſes Aimoino. Eſt autem Tarnanna ſeu Tarnenna oppidum Morinorum, hodie Teroane.

52. Childebert all this while reigned in the room of Sigebert his Father, a Child of ſcarcely five years old when the Succeſſion was devolved upon him. By the procurement of Gundebald his faithfull Friend, the Eſtates reſolved to ſtick cloſe to him, rejecting all Propoſals which could be made by Chilperick his Uncle, who ſeeing that he had eſcaped his Hands, and that his Subjects were not to be moved from their Fidelity, made a Virtue of Neceſſity, pretended great kindneſs, and at his demand releaſed Brunichildis his Mother, and ſent her to him. Guntram, his other Uncle, ſeemed more ſerious and ſincere in his pretenſions, who having loſt all his Children, after that grief would give him leave to conſider the ſtate of his Affairs, caſt his Eye upon this his young Kinſman, as him whom both Nature and Providence deſigned for his Heir, and therefore he ſent to him, offering him all kindneſs, and deſiring that he would do him the favour to ſee him. Thoſe about the youth weighing all circumſtances, were of opinion, that conſidering he had no Children of his own, he could have no Plot upon him, and ſo they came to an Interview, at a Bridge called Petreus, where there wanted no expreſſions, nor other ſigns, of Joy and Affection. After long Embraces, Guntram told him, that ſeeing that his Sins had pulled down the Judgment of being Childleſs upon him, and that thoſe who proceeded from the Loins of others were to inherit his Territories, and his Treaſures, he thought none ſo fit as himſelf, his Nephew, whom he now adopted for his Son, deſiring that ſuch affection might grow betwixt them, as became ſo near a Relation, that one Buckler might protect them, and one and the ſame Lance defend them againſt their Enemies. In caſe it ſhould ſo happen, that he ſhould have Children, he promiſed he would look upon him as his Son, and have the ſame kindneſs ever for him as he had at preſent, expecting the like from him, which his Nobility promiſed in his behalf. After this they dined lovingly together, and making each other rich Preſents, parted aſunder, having agreed upon a joint Embaſſy to Chilperick, to require that he would reſtore ſuch parcels of their Childebert courted by his Uncles.

Dominions as he had got into his Hands, or otherwiſe to expect and prepare for War. Chilperick ſlighted the Meſſage, ſpending his time in making Cirques both at Soiſſons and Paris, for entertaining with Shews the People of thoſe parts.

Stirs in Britain.

53. About this time happened ſome ſtirs in Britain, upon this occaſion. Maclianus and Bodiccius, both Counts of that Countrey, had by Oath covenanted betwixt themſelves, that whoſoever was the longer liver, ſhould patronize and defend the Sons of the other, no otherwiſe than his own Children. It happens that Bodiccus dies firſt, and leaves behind him a Son, named Theodorick, whom Maclianus treats ſo contrary to his Oath, that he outs him of his Inheritance, and lays it to his own Demains. Theodorick thus abuſed, wanders a long time up and down in a deſolate condition; but at laſt the Britains took pity on him, and fell with ſuch violence upon the Uſurper, that they kill him, together with Jacob his Son, and ſettle Theodorick in what was left him by his Father, Warochus, another Son of Maclianus, ſtoutly making good his own Inheritance. In the mean time Chilperick buſies himſelf with Prætextatus the Biſhop of Rouen, whom accuſing of having conſpired with his Son Meroneus againſt him, he brings him to his Tryal before a Synod of Biſhops. Prætextatus denied all that was objected. The Biſhops either flattered the King, or at leaſt held their peace, onely Gregory of Tours, the Hiſtorian, as he himſelf tells us, ſtood to the truth, and for ſo doing came into trouble, but he told the King his own freely. Chilperick ſeeing he could not prevail, but that the Biſhop juſtified himſelf ſufficiently, ſet ſome upon him, who perſuaded him that an end might ſpeedily be put to his troubles, and he might not in vain conteſt with the King, to confeſs himſelf guilty, which he did, caſting himſelf at his feet, acknowledging that he endeavoured to depoſe him, and ſettle his Son (whoſe Godfather he was) in his Throne. Chilperick moſt unworthily takes advantage at this confeſſion, and falling at the Feet of the Biſhops, demands Juſtice againſt him, and afterward ſends them a Book of Canons, wherein this was contained, That a Biſhop being taken in Murther, Adultery, or Perjury, ſhould be depoſed. He required that either his Coat or Rochet might be torn in pieces, or that the hundred and eighth Pſalm, containing the Curſes of Iſcariot, might be read over his Head, or that they would proceed to excommunication. The Biſhop of Tours withſtood all theſe demands, urging the Canons, againſt which the King had promiſed that he would act nothing. But Prætextatus was taken from them, and committed to Priſon, whence endeavouring to make his Eſcape, he was grievouſly beaten, and ſent into an Iſland of the Sea, near adjacent to the City Conſtantina. This happened a little before the death of Meroneus.

Heavy Taxes impoſed on the Subjects of France.

Lemonices ſive Lemonici, hodie Limoſins, Populus Galliæ Celticæ.

54. Not long after Samſon, the youngeſt Son of Chilperick, died of the Dyſentery, joyned with a Fever. He was born then when Chilperick was beſieged in Tourney by his Brother, and Fredegundis being in great apprehenſion of death, neglected the Infant, aſſoon as it was born, and in a deſperate humour would have ſuffered it to periſh, but he reviled her for her neglect, and commanded it to be baptized, after which it ſcarcely lived four years. Fredegundis alſo her ſelf was at this time very ſick, but recovered, to the ruine almoſt of her Huſband's Family, through her implacable Malice againſt his Sons. He, though his Charge and Care by the death of his Children might have been leſſened, yet grew more covetous than ever, at the inſtigation of his Wife, laying ſuch heavy Taxes upon his People, that many of them made the beſt of what they had, and departed out of his Dominions. The Lemonices made an Inſurrection, had ſlain (Aimoinus ſaith they did ſlay) Mark the Collectour, but that he was reſcued by the Biſhop; and burnt all the Books and Papers they could come by, that concerned the Tax. To ſuppreſs this Rebellion, the King ſent certain of his Officers, with competent Forces, who puniſhed the Rioters with great ſeverity, and Churchmen, amongſt others, whom the Courtiers, as Gregory tells us, falſly accuſed; which done, more heavy Impoſitions were laid upon the Countrey. Not long after, viz. in the fifth year of Childebert, which was the nineteenth of Chilperick and Guntram, ſeveral Prodigies appeared, and were followed by a violent Diſeaſe, which raged all over Gall, being that which Phyſicians call Cholera Morbus. The Parties were taken with a Dyſentery and Vomiting, which were accompanied with a great pain in their Reins, and in their Heads or Necks. That they vomited was yellow or green, and many thought they were poiſoned, it's certain that ſuch Herbs as are accounted to reſiſt Poiſon,

Then followed a Peſtilence.

did relieve moſt that made uſe of them. Beginning in Auguſt, it firſt deſtroyed a multitude of Children, and then invaded thoſe of riper years. Chilperick himſelf was brought very low with it, and when he recovered, his youngeſt Son, as yet not baptized, fell ſick, whom when they ſaw in danger, they cauſed to be chriſtned. When he grew ſomething better, his Brother Chlodobert was ſeized with the Diſeaſe, whom his Mother Fredegundis perceiving in danger of death, began to conſider, and entertain more ſerious thoughts than formerly.

Which deſtroyed vaſt numbers.

55. In this good fit, which was not like long to continue, ſhe became a Preacher of Mercy to the King her Husband, ſhe deſired him to conſider in what danger they were to be bereaved of their Children, and affirmed that the Cries and Tears of Orphans and Widows pulled down theſe Judgments upon their Heads; therefore ſhe beſought him that he would no more burthen his People, but commit to the Fire the Books of the late Tax, which he did with his own hands. Not long after this their youngeſt Son died, whom from the Village Brennacus they conveyed to Paris, and cauſed to be buried in the Church of St. Denis, Chlodobert, their other Son, being very weak, they carried in a Litter to the Church of St. Medard in Soiſſons, and laying him at the Sepulchre of the Saint, made Vows for his Recovery; but he died at midnight of a Conſumption, and was buried in the Church of St. Criſpin and Criſpinian, Martyrs, the whole City being in deep mourning, as for their neareſt Relations. Of this Diſeaſe alſo died Auſtrigildis, the Wife of King Guntram, ſo wicked at her death, that unwilling to die alone, ſhe procured two of her Phyſicians to be ſent after her, through her falſe Accuſations. Chilperick, by the loſs of his Children, was grown very charitable, giving much to the poor, and liberally endowing many Churches. Yet the bewitching words of his Wife Fredegundis made him forget natural Affection it ſelf; for whereas he had but one Son remaining, Chlodonæus by Name, ſhe cauſed him to be ſent to Brennacus, a place, as ſhe thought, infected, for there her own Children had yielded to Nature. Here, as he lay, he let ſlip ſome fooliſh words concerning his future greatneſs, (for he thought he had reaſon to expect to be King) and the puniſhment he would inflict upon his Enemies. The report hereof being brought to her Ears, ſhe was filled with Rage and Jealouſie, and accuſed him of very wicked Deſigns unto his Father, who was ſo uxorious and unnatural, as to give him up into her Hands. Within a while ſhe cauſed him to be ſtabbed with a Knife, and gave out, that he had killed himſelf, which his miſerable Father eaſily believed, and rejoiced in his deſtruction. His Mother was put to a cruel Death, his Siſter condemned to a Monaſtery, and all their Eſtates were ſeized to the uſe of the Queen, who cauſed a young Woman, with whom Chlodonæus was ſaid to be in Love, to be burned alive, and others that favoured his Cauſe, with various torments to be deſtroyed.

The Britains invade Gall.

56. During theſe Domeſtick Miſeries, which if he could have underſtood it, happened to Chilperick, the Britains, under conduct of Warochus, their Count, invaded his Dominions with Fire and Sword, againſt whom ſome oppoſition was made, but onely with this Effect, that exaſperated them the more, and made them commit great outrages in their Incurſions. He attempted alſo ſomething againſt his Nephew Childebert, though to no purpoſe, whoſe Officers had both honeſty and ability faithfully and ſucceſsfully to ſerve him. Betwixt his Brother Guntram and him, there was no good Intelligence, and it happening that Miriothe, King of Gallicia, who there reigned over the Suevi, ſending his Ambaſſadours to Guntram, he intercepted at Poictiers, and cauſed them to be conveyed to Paris, where he clapt them in Priſon, and diſmiſſed them not till after a whole years durance. With Lewigildus the King of Spain, he ſeems now to have been at Peace, notwithſtanding the juſt offence given to the Nation of the Goths in the matter of Galſuintha; for that King ſent his Ambaſſadour to him, Egilanus by name, with whom, being at preſent a violent Arian, though afterward in his miſery he recanted, Gregory our Hiſtorian had a diſputation, which verbatim he has publiſhed in his Book. Not long after the Ambaſſadours, which Chilperick had ſent to Tiberius the Emperour, returned, after three years ſpent in their Employment, and after ſo much labour and toil, were ſhipwreckt in the Haven. For not daring to put into the Port of Marſeilles, by reaſon of the Diſſentions riſen amongſt the French Kings, they made for that of Agathe, a Town belonging to the Goths, and before they could land, their Ship was by a Tempeſt driven, and ſtriking upon ground was broken to pieces. The Ambaſſadours, and moſt of their followers, yet eſcaped upon Boards ſafe to land, and moſt of their baggage was ſaved, though, as uſually happens in wrecks, that the adjoining Inhabitants, inſtead of relieving thoſe in diſtreſs, rob them of what the fury of the Waves hath ſpared, the Townſmen pilfred all they could. Gregory the Biſhop tells us, he then waited upon the King at Novigentum, where he ſhewed him a Jewel he had, made up of Gold and pretious Stones, weighing fifty pounds, for the adorning and ennobling the Nation of the Franks, as he ſaid, adding, that if he lived, he would doe more in that kind. He ſhewed him alſo certain Aurei, ſent him by the Emperour; whereof each weighed a pound, being ſtamped with the Emperour's Image, encircled with this Inſcription, Tiberii Conſtantini Perpetui Auguſti: and having on the reverſe a Chariot with four Horſes, and a Driver, with theſe words, Gloria Romanorum. Beſides many other things the Ambaſſadours had brought him.

Civil Wars again amongſt the Kings.

57. Mention being here made of the Diſſentions of the Kings, we are told by our Authour, that while the King lay ſtill in this Village of Novigentum, or Saint Clou, Ambaſſadours came to him from his Nephew Childebert, making offers of Peace and a ſtrict Alliance, by virtue of which they were to out Guntram of his Kingdom, and part it betwixt them. Chilperick was very glad of the overture, being very deſirous to beget an ill Underſtanding betwixt his Brother and Nephew, and ſoothing them with good Words and large Promiſes, of making Childebert his Heir, (foraſmuch as he had not now any Sons left him,) diſmiſſed them with very great rewards. The cauſe of the Quarrel betwixt Childebert and Guntram, it ſeems, was this: Guntram, after his Brother's death, had given part of Marſeilles to his Son Childebert, but now thought fit to deprive him of it, which the young man much ſtomaching, firſt ſtrengthened himſelf by this New Alliance, and then ſent to him, requiring he might be put into Poſſeſſion of what was his own, elſe he lets him know the keeping of this inconſiderable thing ſhould coſt him the looſing of far greater matters. Guntram however refuſes to put him in Poſſeſſion, and aware of ſome force to be attempted, ſecures all the Avenues of his Kingdom. Chilperick takes his opportunity at theſe their Diſſentions, and ſends Deſiderius with an Army into the Territories of Guntram, who takes Petrogoricum*, † Aginnum, and all other Towns in thoſe Quarters of Aquitaine.

Several Prodigies.

58. The following Year, which was the ſeventh of Childebert, and the one and twentieth of his two Uncles, in the Month of January, there was great Thunder and Lightning, Flowers appeared upon Trees, and a Comet appeared, encircled, as it were, with Darkneſs, having a terrible Tail. On Eaſter-day, at Soiſſons, the Heavens ſeemed to burn. Not far from Paris it rained Bloud, and ſo ſtained the Clothes of many, that it could not be got out. Theſe Prodigies were followed by a grievous Contagion, which ſwept away multitudes of People, dying ſuddenly, aſſoon as the Bubo appeared on their Groins. This ſame Year, wherein alſo Tiberius the Emperour died, had Chilperick another Son born, after ſo many he had loſt, which ſo affected him, that he commanded the Priſons to be ſet open, and forgave many Debts owing to his Exchequer. His Son he would have baptized at Paris, whither he went on Eaſter-Eve, and becauſe by the common Agreement of the Kings, a Curſe was laid upon him that ſhould come into that City without the Knowledge and Conſent of the reſt, to avoid the Curſe he was ſo cunning, as to have ſeveral Reliques of Saints to be carried before him at his Entry. All this while the difference about Marſeilles continued betwixt Guntram and his Nephew, who now again ſent his Ambaſſadours to Chilperick, with offers of entring into a more ſtrict Alliance; and deſires to join with him in an Invaſion of Guntram's Dominions, to force him to reaſon with dint of Sword. The Agreement being confirmed on both ſides by Oath, Chilperick being of himſelf ſufficiently inclined to the War, preſently raiſed an Army, and marched to Paris, where having done much harm to the Inhabitants, he entred his Brother's Territories, and waſted all where he came with Fire and Sword. Some of his Officers he ſent to take an Oath of Fidelity from the Biturices, who refuſing to break their Faith, gave Battel to Deſiderius his Captain, and ſo great ſlaughter was made, that of both Armies periſhed more than ſeven thouſand. But it ſeems the Biturices had the worſt, for Chilperick his Men proceeded toward their Metropolis, and made ſuch havock and deſtruction of all things, as, if we can believe an Hiſtorian, and a Biſhop, the like was never heard of in former times, not ſo much as an Houſe, nor a Vine, nor any other Tree, being left ſtanding, and as great Indignities being offered to all hallowed places, by which theſe Forces did paſs.

---

* Petrocorii ſunt ſatìs auguſtus Populus Les Perigordiens, quorum Metropolis Veſſuna, Ellæ amni impoſita Perigneus.

† Aginnum, hodie Agen, Metropolis Volcarum Nitiobrigum, ad dextram Garumnæ Ripam, ſupra ipſius & Oldi fluminis confluentem.

After the Civil war a great Murrain on Cattel.

59. This did Chilperick by himſelf without the conjunction of his Nephew's Arms, which might more imbolden his Brother Guntram to make head againſt him, and that he did with ſuch ſucceſs, that falling upon his men in an Evening, he cut off the greateſt part of his Army, and compelled him the day following to ſend, and deſire a Peace, which was granted, the matter being put into the Hands of certain Commiſſioners appointed on each ſide. Then did Chilperick recall all his men he had ſent into ſeveral Quarters, who yet in their paſſage did very great miſchief to the Countrey People. This deſolation by War was followed by a great Murrain and Death of Cattel, which raged in ſuch a meaſure, that it became a ſtrange ſight to ſee a Cow, or any other ſuch like Creature. In the mean time, Childebert got his men together, and made up a conſiderable Army, which fell ſuddenly into a Mutiny, crying out that the Biſhop of Rheims, and ſome others of the prime Miniſters were Traitours, ſelling his Countries, and Cities unto his Enemies, and Tumults aroſe to that height, that they came to the King's Tent, demanding them to be delivered up into their hands, and they with much adoe eſcaped, the Biſhop amongſt the reſt flying as faſt as his Horſe could carry him, and leaving one Shoe behind him for haſte. What this Mutiny of the Army procured we know not, but Childebert in the Ninth year of his Reign, had his ſhare of Marſeilles delivered up to him by his Uncle Guntram. What content ſoever he received hereby, his Uncle Childebert about the ſame time had his former ſorrows renewed, his young Son now ſcarce a year old being taken away by a Dyſentery. This cauſed him to give cool Entertainment to the Ambaſſadours of Lenvichild the Spaniſh King, who being ſent to ask his Daughter in Marriage, for the Son of that King, though he had already conſented to the Propoſals, yet upon notice of his Son's Death, he recalled back the Ambaſſadours, who were now on their way homewards and would needs change the Bride, pitching, inſtead of his Daughter begotten on his beloved Fredegund, on another which he had by Audonera, lock't up in the Nunnery of Poictiers. But the young Lady was averſe, Radegund the Abbeſs exceedingly concerning her ſelf, and affirming, that it was a thing altogether improper, for a Maid that had dedicated her ſelf to Chriſt, again to return to theſe Earthly pleaſures.

60. But there wanted not ſome flatterers who made the Queen believe that her young Son was bewitched to Death, and that by the eſpecial procurement of Mummolus a great Officer, whom ſhe had of a long time mortally hated. Many of the Women of Paris, which either ſhe or her Attendants pretended reaſon to ſuſpect, ſhe ſubjected to various Torments, burning ſome, and breaking others upon the Wheel; then went ſhe with the King to Compendium, where ſhe took her opportunity to lay the load upon Mummolus, who was inſtantly ſent for, loaded with Chains and grievouſly tortured. Yet did not he confeſs any thing which had relation to the Death of the Child, though he could not deny but that ſeveral Ointments and Potions he had received from thoſe Women, to procure favour and reſpect from the King and Queen. After an increaſe of Torments, when the Hangmen themſelves were weary of their Office, and an end was to be put to their pains, and his ſufferings by the impending Sword, by the wonderfull bounty and kindneſs of the Queen he was reprieved, though carried in a Cart to Bourdeaux, and utterly deſpoiled of his whole Eſtate, the loſs of which he not long ſurvived. Fredegund to put an end to her ſorrow by deſtroying what was an occaſion of it, burnt all the Clothes and Furniture that belonged to the Child, four Waggons full as was reported, neither would ſhe ſpare ſuch Gold and Silver as had belonged to him, but made it paſs the fornace to alter and deface its former faſhion.

Mummolus tortured through the malice of Queen Fredegund.

61. As ſoon as grief would give him leave, Chilperick conſidering that his Brother and Nephew were reconciled, and meaſuring the deſires of others by his own Inclinations, preſumed that they would fall upon him to wreſt out of his hands thoſe Towns which upon their difference he had invaded. He therefore ſent to the ſeveral Governours to bid them ſtand upon their Guard, he himſelf went to the City of Cambray where he reſolved to ſecure both his Perſon and all his Treaſure; while he here mues up himſelf, he has another Son born to him, whom he commanded to be cloſe kept in the Town called Victoriacum, leſt appearing abroad any miſchief ſhould befall him. Childebert at this time was in Italy, having been formerly hired by Mauricius the Emperour for fifty thouſand Solidi, to make War upon the Lombards in that Countrey. Gregory tells us that they being apprehenſive of his great Power ſubmitted themſelves to his Commands, gave him great gifts and promiſed fidelity, which done, he returned home having thus deluded the Emperour, who demanding the money to be repayed, he confiding in his own ſtrength, returned him no anſwer at all as to that matter. This Summer many Prodigies appeared, and all the Corn and Wine was deſtroyed by ill weather, a great Murrain alſo raging amongſt Cattel. But the Eyes of the People were ſomething diverted from theſe ſad ſpectacles, by a ſplendid Embaſſy ſent from the Goths to Chilperick about the Marriage of his Daughter. Nothing was wanting to ſet out the Bride in ſuch an Equipage, as might demonſtrate the Wealth and Magnificence of her Family. An incredible quantity of Gold and Silver he gave her, and her Mother out with ſuch abundance that ſhe her ſelf had hoarded up, that the King himſelf imagined ſhe had utterly exhauſted his publick Treaſure. But ſhe went away with the curſes of the people, of which ſome whole Families were thruſt into Waggons and compelled to accompany her, and as ſhe paſſed out of the Gate of Paris, the Axletree of her Chariot brake, which was interpreted as an ill Omen. Fifty Horſemen of her Train ſlipped away, and went to Children with their Golden Bridles and Chains, and every day almoſt ſome of her Company left her. The Army that attended her for fear of any attempt from the other two Kings, being about four thouſand men, rifled and pillaged the Countrey, and committed all ſorts of Outrages in their paſſage.

The Lombards ſubmit themſelves.

62. While the Bride was thus on her way toward her Nuptial Enjoyments, Fredegund her Mother enjoyed her beloved Lauderick the Major Domus of the Palace, with whom ſhe was ordinarily unclean, carrying it ſo cunningly, that nothing was leſs expected by her Husband, who ſtill in an extravagant meaſure doted on her. But on a time when he was gone out to Hunt, ſhe thinking he was ſure, retired into the inner Room of her Apartment to waſh her ſelf, when the King, either changing his mind as to Hunting or upon ſome other account, ſpeedily returned and followed her into her Chamber, where as ſhe lay upon her face, he in jeſt gently ſtruck her with his Rod. She imagining it had been Lauderick called him by that Name, and asked him why he did ſo, or uſed ſome more wanton kind of expreſſion, which Chilperick having heard, fell into a violent fit of Jealouſie, and thence into ſo great a Rage that the Houſe could not hold him, but out he would go into the Woods to cool himſelf and vent his paſſion. She underſtood very well by his words and geſtures in what Eſtate ſhe was, and adding boldneſs to her Crime, called for Lauderick, told him her miſtake and bid him think of his Grave and not of her Bed any more. He fell into a great unquietneſs curſing the day they had begun their unlawfull Pleaſures, and cried out that he knew not what way to turn him or to eſcape the danger. She in ſhort takes him up and tells him what ſhe would have him to doe to ſave both their Lives, and this was no leſs than to procure ſome to kill the King, as he came home in the dusk of the Evening from Hunting. He approving her advice, which their common danger in his opinion made neceſſary, ſent ſome he could truſt upon the Errand, who as the King lighted from his Horſe diſpatched him in the dark without diſcovery, and when it was done, gave out that the Fact was committed by ſome that had been ſet on by his Nephew Childebert, who, they ſaid, were fled amain into the Woods, taking the advantage of the Night and thickets.

Chilperick Murthered by contrivance of his Wife Fredegund and her Stalion.

Aimoinus, lib. 3. c. 56.

Ita quidem ille rem refert. Chronographi autem Gallici alii aliter. Audi vnum pro omnibus.

Du Haillan dans ſon Hiſtoire de France. Il approcha ſecrettement d' elle, & d'une bagnette qu'il tenoit en la main, luy donna un Coup ſur le derriere de la teſte. Elle qui penſoit quece fut ſon adultere Laudry, luy dit. Il me ſemble mon Laudry qu' un bon Chevalier doit tonſiours frapper par deuant, & non par deriere D'autres diſent qu' elle dit Laudry, pourquóy trappez vous pur derriere, frapper par deuant, ſi vous en avez envie, carie croy que le Roy ſoit parly. Quoy qu'il en ſoit, l' euxe ni l'autre reſponce ne vault gueres, & ne pouuoit eſtre gueres plaiſante a un Mary.

63. Theſe No-bodies were by ſome body purſued with as great ſucceſs as the Reader can imagine, Lauderick and Fredegund laughing in their Sleeves, and rejoycing that through the ſecret management of the affair, they had not onely eſcaped Death, but ſhould Reign together with her, (it's probable alſo his) Son Chlotharius; for ſo was the young Child called. Madalulphus the Biſhop of Sylvaneata, who attended three days but could not be admitted to his preſence, (he carried himſelf ſo haughtily) hearing he was killed, came to the place and cauſing the body to be waſhed, and better Clothed, carried it by water from Cala where the Murther was committed to Paris, and there Buried it in the Church of St. Vincent, now St. Germain Dezprez, where as yet is to be ſeen his Tomb with his Image, cut upon an hollow ſtone, in the Walk that lies before the high Altar toward the North. His left hand is ſtretched out toward his Beard and Throat, as if, as ſome imagine, he

Who is buried at Paris.

Locum iſtum quem Gregorius appellat Villam Calenſem, Du Haillan nobis, innuit eſſe Chelles pres Paris.

he would ſignifie that in that part he had been Murthered. But Philip Lautery, Maſter of the French King's Mint, had his very Seal wherein he was cut in this very poſture, which makes it more probable that it was familiar to him, it having been the ordinary courſe when long Beards were in faſhion, for all ſorts of men as they walked or muſed, to handle them and put them into ſhape. Round about his Sepulchral-ſtone are theſe words ingraved, Rex Chilpericus hoc tegitur Lapide, or King Chilperick lies under this Stone. In the Table of the French Kings to be ſeen ſtill in the Library at Bruſſels, he is Pictur'd in an ordinary travelling Coat, ſuch as Capitolinus writes that the Emperour Verus uſed, or an Hunting Garment, ſuch as Virgil ſaith Dido was wrapped in when ſhe went out to that ſport, (by him called Chlamys, but by Juvenal Cucullus, and Martial Bardocucullus,) and that in ſuch an ordinary Habit he was ſlain appears by what is written concerning the Biſhop, that he cauſed his body after it was waſhed to be adorned with more Royal Veſtments. He was the firſt of thoſe French Kings that applied their minds to Poetry, and without the help of an Interpreter could diſcourſe in ſeveral Languages, if Venantius Fortunatus doth not flatter him.

His Character.

64. Gregory, the Biſhop, and from him Aimoinus writes, that he thought himſelf wiſer than all men living, and in imitation of Sedulius compoſed two Books of Verſes, which were very lame in their feet, or Scazontes, as Aimoinus calls them, ſhort ſyllables being put for long, and long ones for ſhort, through his exceeding great Ignorance in things of this Nature. Yet from the Epitaph he made for St. German, ſome plead that he wanted not a Poetical genius, and they grieve that theſe two Books of Verſes are not extant to anſwer for themſelves. It's certain that the Orthography of the Franks lame before for want of certain Letters, he made upright by addition of ſuch as anſwered to † ω, χ, θ, φ, or Omega, ch. th. ph. in the Greek Language, ſending his Edicts abroad, whereby he commanded that Children ſhould be taught them, and ſuch Books as wanted them, to be razed and tranſcribed. But whatever he was as to his Intellectuals, his Morals were naught, as Gregory inſtanceth, and we already have ſeen in ſeveral particulars. The Biſhop calls him the || Nero and Herod of his time, and thus he makes good the names he gives him. As Nero of old, ſo he rejoyced in the burning and devaſtation of Cities and Provinces. He animadverted upon perſons on purpoſe to confiſcate their Eſtates. He made his Belly his God, hated the Poor, deſpiſed and reviled the Clergy, upbraiding the Biſhops with their Riches * and Honours, and affirming that all reſpect was from Kings transferred upon their perſons. Out of ſuch a kind of principle, he nulled ſuch † Teſtaments as were made in favour of the Church, as alſo many Orders made by his Father, believing that his own Rules would be infringed after his Death. As for Luſt and Luxury, that in thought cannot be imagined which he indeed did not practiſe. Never was he wanting in deviſing new Arts and Myſteries to oppreſs the people, and if any were found blame-worthy, it was nothing with him to bid their Eyes to be pulled out of their Heads, this being one of his eſpecial directions given to his Judges againſt ſuch as diſobeyed his Orders. In concluſion, he never cordially loved any man, nor ever did any love him. He died in the 23 year of his Reign, the ſecond of the Emperour Mauricius, the tenth of Pelagius the ſecond Biſhop of Rome, the year of our Lord 587, according to the common account, although if according to the computation of Joſeph Scaliger, we fix his beginning at the 560 of our Lord, and he Reigned but twenty three years, his Death muſt have faln at fartheſt but into the beginning of the year 584. But conſidering that Gregory Turonenſis makes mention of the Emperour || Mauricius, before the Death of Chilperick, and that he had Reigned ſome time, (ſome years it's poſſible,) whereas the beginning of Mauricius is placed but at the 586 year of our Lord, had Chilperick Died in the 584, at that time there muſt have been no ſuch Emperour; and therefore this account cannot be true, or the ſeries of the years of the Emperours muſt be alſo unravelled, as upon farther conſideration we ſhall find they muſt; Tiberius the Emperour Dying, and Mauricius ſucceeding him, rather in the 582 year of our Lord.

Σκάζω Claudico Scazontes verſus, id eſt, Claudicantes, qui numeris ſuis non perficiuntur. Papirius Maſſon.

† Gregor, lib. 5. c. 44, apud quem errore Librariorum in Editione Pariſiana, 1610, falsò ſcribuntur, θ, ᛦ, Z, π, Rectè Aimoinus ut hic, lib. 3. c. 40.

|| His itaque cum hac præda pergentibus, Chilpericus, Nero noſtri temporis & Herodes, ad villam Calenſem quæ diſtat ab urbe Pariſiana quaſi centum Stadiis, accedit.

* Nulli penitus niſi ſoli Epiſcopi regnant, periit honor noſter, & tranſlatus eſt ad Epiſcopos civitatum, Greg. lib. 6. c. ult.

† Obſcurè hic ſcribit Gregorius, Teſtamenta quæ in Eccleſiis conſcripta erant, plerunque diſrupit. Sed ſeipſum interpretatur, lib. 7. c. 7. ubi ait de Guntram no. Teſtamenta defunctorum qui Eccleſias hæredes inſtituerant & ab Chilperico compreſſa fuerant, reſtauravit.

|| Ab Imperatore autem Mauricio ante hos annos quinquaginta millia ſolidorum acceperat ſcil. Childebertus, ut Longobardos de Italia extruderet.

65. Chilperick being Dead, the Murtherers notwithſtanding their former hopes by ſome freſh accidents, found themſelves obliged to make their Addreſſes to Guntram tram

Fredegund applies her ſelf to King Guntram.

Who enters the Dominions of his Brother Chilperick.

tram, who they knew, upon the rumour of the Murther if once it ſhould come out, would be ſpeedily upon them. To colour therefore the matter, as well as to make a vertue of Neceſſity, Fredegund having taken up her abode in the Church of Paris, ſends him Letters moſt full of fawning and flattery, calling him her Lord, and deſiring him to come and take Poſſeſſion of the Kingdom of his Brother, whoſe Son an Infant ſhe was ready to put into his Armes, and fully accommodate her ſelf to his will and pleaſure. Guntram it's ſaid, as he ever ſhewed more good Nature than any of his Brothers, wept bitterly at the report of his Brother's Death, and as ſoon as grief would give him leave got together ſome Forces, and therewith marched to Paris. Childebert his Nephew having notice of what had paſſed, was perſwaded alſo to go thither and ſee what Markets he could make out of the late Calamity, but the Citizens of Paris would not admit him into the Town, whereupon he was forced to ſend his Ambaſſadours on his Errand, which was to flatter Guntram with the Title of moſt pious Father, and to deſire that the League made betwixt his Father and him might be now moſt ſtrictly obſerved. Guntram received them as they had deſerved, charging them with perfidious Dealings, who had never ſuffered his Nephew to ſtand to any Agreement, but lately cauſed him to break all Leagues and Alliances by a late Compact made with Chilperick, for driving him out of his Kingdom, and ſharing his Cities betwixt them, and therewith he ſhewed them the very Articles themſelves ſigned with their own hands, and therefore demanded of them how they could be ſo impudent, as to deſire that now he ſhould friendly entertain his Nephew, whom they by their tricks and deviſes had rendred ſo much his Enemy. They intreated him then that if he would not be pleas'd to grant his Nephew what he had once promiſed him, yet he would let him enjoy theſe Towns that had faln to his ſhare by the Death of Charibert. To this he replied and ſhewed them the Writings, whereby it was agreed that which ſoever of the Brothers without the conſent of the reſt ſhould go to Paris, ſhould looſe his ſhare, and that Polioctus the Martyr, with Hilary and Martin the Confeſſours, ſhould be Judge and Avenger betwixt them. Yet did Sigebert his Brother enter that place, and periſhing by the Judgment of God, loſt his ſhare, and ſo alſo did Chilperick, ſo that both of them having forfeited their parts, the whole Kingdom of Charibert together with his Treaſures was by Law devolved upon him, and that he was reſolved to have it as his right, not having any one to enjoy any parcel of it, except by his own bounty and free gift. With this anſwer, he bade them begon, like diſſembling and perfidious Perſons as they were, and make a relation thereof to his Nephew their Maſter.

Chlotharius ſucceeds Chilperick as King.

66. Theſe Ambaſſadours being returned, others were ſent within a while to demand Fredegund the Queen might be given up into his Hands, which had procured the Death, as they ſaid, of his Aunt, and had Murthered his Father, his Uncle, and his Couſin Germans; but Guntram thinking ſhe might be ſerviceable for ſetling the Affairs of her Son gave anſwer onely, that he would conſider of it, and made much of her, promiſing he would protect her againſt all her Enemies. Now did the Nobility aſſemble themſelves to their King of four months old, whom they called Chlotharius, and ordered that all the Towns which had been ſubject to Chilperick, ſhould ſwear fealty to Guntram and Chlotharius his Nephew. Guntram as a means to keep all in quiet as well as to ſatisfie Juſtice, cauſed Reſtitution to be made of what had been unjuſtly taken away from any in his Brother's time, gave much to Churches, and confirmed ſuch gifts as having been made to them by Teſtaments, had been aſſigned by Chilperick to other Uſes; he carried himſelf to all with much affability, and was very bountifull to the Poor. Yet knowing ſufficiently the humour of his Nation, would not he truſt himſelf amongſt them without a ſtrong Guard where e'er he came. On a certain Lord's day when he was at Church, and the Deacon had injoyned to the People ſilence that the Service might begin, he took the opportunity to ſpeak to them, "adjuring them to be true to him, and not " Murther him as they had lately done his Brothers; that he might live though it
" were but three years longer to foſter his young Nephews, which were now be" come his Adoptive Sons, leſt it ſhould come to paſs (which God forbid,) that he
" and they being made away, all the People ſhould alſo Periſh with them, there " being none left of their lineage to protect them. This he having ſaid, the " whole multitude poured out their Prayers to Almighty God for his Preſer" vation.

67. While matters thus went about Paris, the Daughter of Chilperick, Riguntis by Name, having proceeded in her Journey toward Spain as far as Toloſe, and being now upon the Borders of the Gothick Territories there made a ſtop to reſt her ſelf and followers, and put her Train into ſome better order and Decorum, being wearied and diſordered by the Travel, and Accidents of ſo long a Journey. Here while they made an hault, News comes of Chilperick his Death, which when Deſiderius a great Officer of the Countrey underſtood, he got together a Company of ſtout Fellows, and entring Toloſe ſeized upon all the Treaſure the Lady was carrying along with her, and committed her to cloſe Cuſtody till his return. He then goes and enters into Council with Mummolus, with whom he had entred into a ſtrict League and Confederacy two years before, who then lay at Avinion with one Gundebald, who bore himſelf for one of the Bloud Royal. And ſo it ſeems he was, being a Baſtard Son of King Clotarius, who not owning him; his Mother having Educated him after the Royal Faſhion, with his Hair grown in length, preſented him to Childebert as his Nephew, and his fleſh and bloud. He having no Sons of his own, receives him and keeps him with him, which being made known to Clotarius, he ſent and demanded him of his Brother, and being brought to his Preſence, cauſed his long Hair to be cut off; affirming, that he never begot him. After the Death of Clotarius King Charibert received him, afterward Sigebert got him into his hands, and ſent him to Coloine to Priſon, as Aimoinus and the French Chroniclers will have it. However, thence he made his Eſcape and went to Narſes, who then Commanded in Italy, for the Emperour; his Hair being grown again, like thoſe of the Frank Bloud Royal. In Italy he married, begot Children, and afterwards went to Conſtantinople, when long after he was invited by ſome (by Guntram Boſo 'tis ſaid) to come back into Gall, and Landing at Marſeilles was entertained by Theodore the Biſhop, who furniſhed him with Horſes to convey him to Mummolus, who then alſo lay in Avinion. Hereupon Guntram a Dux (as Gregory calls both him, Deſiderius, and Mummolus) the ſame with Boſo, as appears from Aimoinus a great Officer of thoſe parts, to conceal it ſeems what he had done, apprehends the Biſhop, and commits him for having admitted a ſtranger into the Countrey, and made way for betraying the Kingdom of the Franks into he Emperour's hands, and though he produced a Letter written by ſome Noblemen of the Subjects of Childebert, to teſtifie he had done nothing but what he was Commanded to doe, yet came he to great trouble, as alſo did Guntram the Officer himſelf, whom King Guntram had ſuſpected to have ſent for Gundobald.

Mummolus and others enter into a Conſpiracy.

Gregorius, lib. 7. c. 24.

68. For Guntram the Officer, ſharing with another Officer of King Guntram, the Treaſure of Gundobald (who had retired for his Security into a certain Iſland of the Sea adjoyning) after he had carried much Gold and Silver to the Metropolis of the Arverni, where it ſeems his Command lay; went to ſpeak with Childebert, and in his return was intercepted by King Guntram, who threatned him with Death, for inviting Gundobald into Gall. He laid the fault upon Mummolus, and as a Teſtimony of his Innocency, delivered his Son as an Hoſtage into the King's hand, till he took Mummolus and brought him before him. Hereupon he diſmiſſed him, and he gathering a numerous Army went and beſieged him in his City, but to no purpoſe, for after ſome vain Attempts, Childebert ſent Gundulfus one of his Captains, and raiſed the Siege; Mummolus he brought to Arvernum, whence after ſome time he returned to Avinion, and there joyning with Deſiderius, as was ſaid, they conveyed Gundobald to a place called Briva Curretia, and there according to the Cuſtome, lifting him aloft upon a Target proclaimed him King. But carrying him a third time about the Army, he and the Target fell together, ſo that he could ſcarcely be raiſed by the Standers-by. Now was it October, when Bunches of Grapes appeared upon Vines, and Flowers upon other Fruit-Trees. Several ſtrange Lights alſo appeared in the Heavens, the Earth quaked, and ſeveral other ſtrange things fell out, which in the opinion of Men, were foreruners and ſigns of the Ruine of Gundobald.

Set up Gundobald for King.

69. In the mean time, King Guntram ſent his Captains to take in ſuch Cities as having formerly belonged to Charibert, his Brother Sigebert had reduced to his own obedience. Thoſe of Tours and Poictiers were inclined toward Childebert, Sigebert his Son; but the Biturici fell into their Territories, and forced them to ſubmit themſelves, at leaſt for a time, to the Government of Guntram. Childebert his Affairs thus going to wreck, he ſent his Ambaſſadours once more to his Uncle to require, that his Towns might be reſtored, and Fredegund given up into his hands, to receive her Condign puniſhment. But he ſent thoſe that he had formerly employed, who being very unacceptable to Guntram; very ſharp words paſſed betwixt them, and from Words it came to Deeds, the King cauſing Dung and other kinds of filth to be caſt out upon their Heads at their departure. Fredegund perceiving how much ſhe was favoured by the King, was more imboldned to follow on that Courſe of Cruelty and Bloud, to which her wicked Nature did incline her. Such as came from her Daughter now at Toulouſe, though but to bring her the News of her misfortune, ſhe handled with all Indignities imaginable. Prætextatus, the Biſhop of Rouen, ſhe ſtill perſecuted, who appealing to Guntram, it was found that he never had been by any Synod depoſed, which ſhe objected, and ſo he was remitted to his See. The King being now very ſenſible of her unquiet and turbulent Humour, cauſed her to retire to a Village called Rotboiale near to Rouen, whither ſhe was Conducted by her Husband's Nobility, who uſed her with all Reſpect, and promiſed her to uſe all diligence and fidelity in the Education of her Son. But this Confinement ſhe took in great diſdain, and perceiving her ſelf out of requeſt and Power, began to think of Brunechild, whom being in good Eſteem in the Court of her Son Childebert, ſhe much envied and hated, and to that degree her more than Womaniſh Emulation roſe, that ſhe perſuaded a certain Clerk to go to her Houſe, and getting into her Family by degrees to inſinuate himſelf into her Preſence, and when he had got a convenient opportunity, to kill her. He cunningly enough obſerved her rules, but by ſome means or other the Plot was diſcovered, and the fellow was ſent back Ignominiouſly to her, whom for his Labour ſhe rewarded, by cutting off his Hands and his Feet. Whether the report of theſe Acts of Cruelty, made Guntram ſuſpect ſhe had an hand in her Husband's death or no, we know not, but preſently after, he began to make Inquiſition after it. But ſhe ſo craftily ordered her Affairs, as to caſt the whole load upon Eberulfus the Chamberlain, with whom ſhe was faln out, becauſe after the Death of Chilperick he refuſed to live with her. This Eberulf was a very bad Man indeed, as appears from the Character given him by Gregory, who had too much occaſion to underſtand him, and whether Guilty or no, took Sanctuary in the Church of St. Martin, his Eſtate being diſpoſed of by the King. Here he had not long continued, when Guntram ſent one Claudius with great Promiſes to Tours, perſuading him, either to take him alive or kill him; yet ſo, as not to violate the Privileges of the place. This Claudius being covetous, goeth to Fredegund and gets Money of her for doing the feat, then with many Oaths doth he promiſe Friendſhip to the man, and grows ſo Familiar with him, that getting a convenient opportunity he kills him within the Sanctuary. A great Tumult hereupon ariſing, the Servants of Eberulf, coming in to reſcue their Maſter, ſeeing him already diſpatched kill Claudius, who thus received the reward of his Perjury, and thoſe that belonged to the Church and the Abby, mixing themſelves with the multitude, much more Bloud was ſpilt in the place.

Comites ſuos habet Greg.

Sect. 3.

The Inhabitants of Poictiers ſubdued.

70. This Year being the tenth of King Childebert, thoſe of Poictiers revolted again from Guntram, againſt whom he ſent a ſtrong Army, and conſtrained them after much hurt done to the Countrey, to return to obedience. This done, the Army had Orders to march againſt Gundobald, who improved his time in riſling ſeveral Cities; ſome whereof willingly received him, and others ſhut their Gates upon him, as did Toulouſe, though to no purpoſe, not able to withſtand the Power he brought along with him. He perceiving he was like to have a great Task of it, a ſtrong Army being already on its march againſt him, ſent two Meſſengers, or Amballadours as he would call them to Guntram with conſecrated Rods in their hands, as was the Cuſtome of the Franks, that none might touch them; but having done their Meſſage, they might return in ſafety with the Anſwer. But they were ſo indiſcreet as before they came to the King's Preſence, to blab out the Errand on which they were ſent, which coming to his Ears they were met in the way, and being bound with Chains, were then brought before him. They concealed nothing of their Meſſage, but told him that Gundobald who lately arrived out of the Eaſt, and affirmed himſelf the Son of Chlotharius, had ſent them to demand his ſhare of his Father's Kingdom, which if by fair means it could not be granted; they were to let him know, that with a numerous Army he would ſpeedily be with him, for all the Men of Courage which inhabited beyond the River Doronenia, had joyned themſelves with him, and this he ſaid, that when once they came into the Field, then God Almighty would determine the Controverſie, whether indeed he was the Son of Chlotharius. Guntram fell into a great Rage, and Commanded them to be tortured. In their pains, they confeſſed that his Niece the Daughter of Chilperick had given up the Treaſures, at Toulouſe; that Gundobald was earneſtly deſired as King, by all the Nobility of King Childebert; for Guntram Boſo, who ſome years agoe had made a Journey to Conſtantinople, had invited him to come into Gall.

Guntram adopts Childebert his Heir and Succeſſour.

71. King Guntram was very much ſtartled to hear what they ſaid, concerning the Noblemen of Childebert, and thought fit to ſend for him, that he might hear the Confeſſion of the Meſſengers. In his Preſence they conſtantly affirmed the ſame thing, and ſome of thoſe that were Guilty abſented themſelves, not daring to be preſent at the meeting. Guntram ſeeing how his Nephew was betray'd, in a great Paſſion of Pity and Commiſeration, delivered a Spear into his hands, telling him thereby, he delivered over to him his whole Kingdom; and bidding him go, and what Cities ſoever belonged to him to uſe them, no otherwiſe than his own, for as much as he onely remained of his Lineage, being his Brother's Son; and therefore deſigning him his Succeſſour, utterly diſclaiming all elſe whatſoever. Then taking the Youth apart, he diſcourſed with him in private, Conjuring him, that he ſhould not reveal what he propounded to him. He told him, whom he ſhould make of his Council, whom he ſhould truſt, of whom to beware, whom to employ, and whom to remove from places of truſt and Employment. Eſpecially, he gave warning to beware of Egidius the Biſhop, who ſaid, had ever been an Enemy to him, and had forſworn himſelf very often to his Father. Then Dining together, he turned to the followers of his Nephew, and bade them look upon him now no more as a Child, but Reſpect and Reverence him as their King. Having ſpent three days together, they parted with all Expreſſions and Tokens of love and kindneſs. Guntram gave Order, that whatever Towns had been ever his Father's ſhould be given up into his hands, and bade him beware of Brunechild his Mother, whom he ought not to truſt, though his neareſt Relation, in matters which concerned Gundobald.

Gundobald's Baggage taken.

72. Gundobald hearing of the great Army that was coming againſt him, and being now forſaken by Deſiderius, came with Mummolus, Bladaſtes and others to Connenæ, a City ſeated beyond the River Garumna upon a very high Rock; the Inhabitants whereof he informed, how great a force would preſently be with them, and therefore as a Friend he adviſed them, that whatever Proviſions, or other things they had in the Countrey, they ſhould not fail to fetch them in. This when the Inhabitants had done, after a little time he told them, the Enemy was come, and perſuaded them to iſſue out againſt him, which they innocently did, and then ſhuts the Gates upon them, and keeps them out. The Army which we ſaid had incamped it ſelf upon the River Dordonia, hearing that Gundobald lay on the farther Bank of the Garonne, were reſtleſs to be at him, upon a Rumour, that there he lay with all the Treaſure which had belonged to Rigundis, the Daughter of Chilperick. Leaving the more inconſiderable ſort, with the Baggage behind them, the reſt ventured to paſs the River, and though many of them were drowned, yet a ſufficient number got ſafe over to the other Bank, where they found a multitude of Camels and Mules loaden with Gold and Silver, which having ſhared and incamped themſelves before Connenæ, and not ſatisfied with their former Booty, plundred and waſted all the Countrey adjoyning. Then began they to jeer and revile Gundobald, calling him Bellimeres, for ſo King Guntram affirmed he was rightly called, and that his Father was a poor Artificer, naming him both a Miller and a dreſſer of Wooll. He from the Walls laboured to take them off from their violent Proſecution, telling them, he was the true Son of Chlotharius; and how by Guntram Boſo he had been invited from Conſtantinople, upon Pretence that the Royal Family was much diminiſhed, Guntram his Brother (as he called him) onely ſurviving now of all his Father's Children; beſides Childebert the Son of his Brother Sigebert was but young, and Chilperick his other Brother had lately left an Infant behind him. He inſiſted much upon the Hardneſs of his Caſe, and ſaid he was willing to appear before his Brother Guntram, and ſtand to his Judgment and Award.

73. This nothing moved the Souldiers, who perceiving the Town was not to be ſtormed, thought beſt to ſend to Mummolus, and try whether they could work him off, and perſuade him to oblige King Guntram, by deſerting and delivering up into his hands this Counterfeit, as they termed him. Lendegiſilus then who Commanded the Army (being by Office the Over-ſeer of the King's Horſes, whom they commonly call Comeſtabilis ſaith Aimoinus) procuring Speech with him upbraided him for quitting his Allegiance to his King, and ſerving an Uſurper; asked him what it was he could expect, whether to periſh miſerably, the Town being once taken; and adviſed him by all means to return to his Maſter, who was very mercifull, and whom he might oblige by removing theſe Difficulties and Intanglements, into which he had been the great means of bringing him. Mummolus promiſing he would conſider of the matter, goes back into the City and reſolves with Sagittarius a Biſhop, and Waddo (for Bladaſtes fearing what might happen, had ſet Fire to an Houſe belonging to the Church, and while they were buſie in quenching it eſcaped) to yield both the Town and Gundobald into the King's hands. Lendegiſilus promiſing them Pardon and Indemnity. Mummolus then tells Gundobald, he had tried the minds of the Beſiegers, and found them not at all averſe to him; but they admired he would not have recourſe to his Brother Guntram, whom he knew would be Friendly to him, and he uſes many Arguments to put himſelf into the King's hands. The poor Man ſaw well enough his drift, and fell into a Paſſion, upbraiding him and his Companions, for inviting him into Europe, taking his Treaſures from him, when he arrived, and now betraying him into the hands of his Enemies. Perceiving it was no contending he went out with them, and being delivered up after a Prayer, wherein he deſired Almighty God to be the Avenger of his Cauſe, he was by one Bollo Count of the Bituriges, tumbled down the Rock into the Valley, and by Boſo brained with a ſtone.

And he himſelf betrayed by thoſe of the Conſpiracy is Murthered.

74. The Rabble inſulted over the dead Body, ſtabbing it with their Lances, which done, they tyed a Rope to the Feet, and dragged it throughout the Camp; after which having the Hair and Beard torn from the Head, it was caſt out unburied in the ſame place, where he had been ſlain. The Town they plundered, put all to the Sword they found in it, and then burnt it, no kind of Perſons, things or places being ſpared. Lendegiſilus returning to the Camp with his Priſoners, Mummolus, Sagittarius, Cariulfus and Waddo, ſent privately to the King, to know what ſhould be done with them. Guntram returned word they ſhould be put to Death, for a Terrour to others in time to come, which was executed ſpeedily upon Mummolus and the Biſhop; for Waddo and Cariulfus having left their Sons as Hoſtages were got away, Waddo who was the Major Domus of Rigunthis, afterward betook himſelf to Brunichild, and being kindly entertained was diſmiſſed with great Gifts; Cariulfus took Sanctuary in the Church of St. Martin. Of all the Treaſure which Lendegiſilus brought home, Guntram beſtowed the greateſt part upon Churches and the Poor, and of another vaſt ſum (two hundred and fifty Talents of Silver, and above thirty of Gold, which being an old Treaſure was found by Mummolus as it was thought, and was now by his Wife diſcovered) that part which fell to his ſhare (for he divided it betwixt himſelf and his Nephew Childebert) he beſtowed (or the moſt of it) upon ſuch like uſes. Thoſe that had been too ſlow in the expedition againſt Gundobald were fixed, and amongſt the reſt, ſuch as belonged to a Cell of St. Martin, which our Hiſtorian, the Succeſſour of that Saint takes, very ill. This year was there great Famine throughout all Gall, many of the poorer ſort periſhing for want of Victuals.

Mummolus and the reſt faring little better.

75. Childebert having received Money from the Emperour to fight againſt the Lombards, was ſo wearied with the Importunities of the Imperialiſts, or aſhamed to have received the Money, and not performed this part of the Bargain, that he ſent his Army into Italy; but his Captains it ſeems being too many, and equal in Power, quarrelled one with another, and returned without having any thing of moment performed. This year was notable for the great Rains, which ſeemed to turn Summer into Winter; but neither they, nor the Water of the Sea it ſelf was ſufficient to extinguiſh two Fires, which if we may Credit our Authour, conſumed two Iſlands, in the ſpace of ſeven days, with the Inhabitants, and all other things upon them. In another Iſland near Vienna was there a Pool, which being full of Fiſh, the Water of it was for the depth of an Ell turned into Bloud, ſo that for many days together multitudes of Dogs, Fowls, and ſuch like Creatures came and fed upon it. The year after, Guntram ſent his Armies to invade Spain, and revenge the Death of Ingundis his Niece, the Siſter of Childebert; who having been married to Herminichild, the Son of Lennichild, the King, was grievouſly perſecuted for her Orthodox Religion, and her Husband being put to Death, was before (or after) delivered into the hands of the Emperour's Officers, (he having an Army in thoſe Quarters) and died in Africk, as ſhe was going with her young Son to Conſtantinople, who, as others write, after his Mother was dead in Italy, was thither conveyed in

An Army ſent into Italy.

Spain alſo invaded by the Franks.

Gregorius hac in re non ſibi conſtat.

Sect. 3.

in ſafety to the Emperour's Court. The Armies of Guntram and his Nephew Childebert made ſeveral Inrodes and Attempts upon certain places, upon the Fronteers, but uſually with bad Succeſs, and one time with very great loſs of Men. Of this defeat Fredegund was thought to be a principal Cauſe, by the cloſe Intelligence ſhe was preſumed to have in Spain, though nothing could be proved againſt her. However, ſhe attempted to Murther Childebert by her Emiſſaries, whom ſhe furniſhed with poiſoned Knives, and though this her deſign was diſcovered by the Men themſelves, who confeſſed ſhe had ſent them to doe the Deed, under the diſguiſe of Beggars; yet Prætextatus the Biſhop of Rouen, againſt whom ſhe had long time born a great Grudge, ſhe procured to be wounded to Death in his own Church, as he was celebrating Divine Service.

76. About this time, the whole City of Paris in a manner was burnt, yet were the Churches and the Houſes of the Prieſts ſaved; a Report going, that the City was ſo Conſecrated of old, that no Fire ſhould abſolutely prevail againſt it, neither any Mouſe nor Serpent be found in it; but in his time Gregory tells us, the River about the Bridge being cleanſed, a Serpent and a Mouſe of Braſs were found in it, after which both Mice and Serpents appeared without number, and it was thenceforth ſubject unto Fire. This ſame Year, which was the eleventh of Childebert, was a Son born unto him, and called Theodobert, at whoſe Birth King Guntram ſo very much rejoyced, that upon the News received, he ſpeedily ſent away his Ambaſſadours with great Gifts to the Child: “Saying, that if it pleaſed God, that Father and Son ſhould live together, the Boy might prove a great Inſtrument for advancing the Honour and Reputation of the Franks. Fredegund was much out of Humour, to ſee the Family of her Rival thus proſper, and though of late ſhe had had but ill Succeſs, as to the Bloud Royal; yet ſhe reſolved to make another Tryal, and that now upon the Perſon of Guntram, thinking that if he were once out of the way, ſhe ſhould be better able to deal with young Childebert and his Relations; but neither would this Project take, for the Man was diſcovered in the Church e'er he could come at the King as he went to Prayers, and rewarded as he had deſerved. The ſame Year, which was the twelfth of Childebert, he had another Son born, who was named Theodorick, and a little after by the means of his Uncle Guntram, he diſcovered a dangerous Conſpiracy for taking away his Life, entred into by one Rauchingus Urſio, and Berthefred, Men of prime note and Employment in his Kingdom. Not long after, was Guntram Boſo by both Kings at a meeting judged to Death for Treaſon; whoſe Death broke the Heart of Agenius Biſhop of Verdun, that paſſed his Word for him. About this time the Britains inhabiting Aremorica, made great Devaſtations in the Countries about Nantes and Renes, and though upon apprehenſion of an Invaſion to be made into their own Territories, they humbled themſelves, and condeſcended to terms, yet when the Danger was over, they again renewed their Hoſtilities. The Lombards now courted Childebert, and deſired a Marriage betwixt their King and his Siſter Clodoſuinda, to which he at firſt was minded to condeſcend; but Leunieldus the King of Spain being lately Dead, Richardus his Son and Succeſſour, having abjured the Arian Hereſie, purged himſelf of the other Siſters Death, who had been married to his Brother, and moſt earneſtly deſired his Alliance. This made him break his Promiſe made to the Lombards, and becauſe he knew not well how to excuſe himſelf, and come off by fair means, he reſolved to begin the Quarrel firſt, and in Complyance with the Emperour's pretenſions, ſent an Army to invade Italy.

Gregor. Turon. lib. 9.

The Britains make great Devaſtations about Nantes and other places.

77. This Army had the ſame Succeſs, as others that had been ſent before, and was to be expected from the joynt and equal Command of ſeveral Officers. So great ſlaughter was made of them, as if we may Credit an Hiſtorian, and a Biſhop, the like never had happened unto this Nation. Childebert upon the News of the defeat, was touched with ſo great a Senſe of the Diminution of his Honour, that he reſolved to raiſe another Army, and lead it himſelf into Italy, of which deſign they having notice given them, ſent to him, gave him fair Words, and by a Promiſe of Tribute diverted him from his purpoſe; though when they ſaw the ſtorm was over, they never became ſo good as their Word. Guntram his Uncle had adviſed him to a Peace, as indeed being more favourable to the Lombards than the Goths, whom he diſtaſted for the Cruelty ſhewn to his Neice, the Wife of Herminfredus; and for that in the ſeveral Attempts he had made to revenge her misfortune, and to gain upon the Territories of the Goths, he had moſt commonly come off with diſadvantage. Notwithſtanding what his Nephew Childebert had deſigned

Two expeditions in Italy, but with loſs.

deſigned about the Match, he ſent another Army into Septimania, where it was ſurprized, lying in great ſecurity, by the Goths, and utterly routed, above two thouſand being taken Priſoners. This made Guntram ſuſpect his Nephew of having held Intelligence with the Enemy, and, as it was uſual with thoſe Kings, upon any miſunderſtanding he ſhut up his frontier Towns, and denied all paſſage to his Subjects, and this increaſed his jealouſie, that Childebert had lately thoughts of ſending his eldeſt Son Theodobert to reſide at Soiſſons, which he interpreted as done with deſign to make, as it were by ſtealth, a paſſage to Paris, by which means gaining the Hearts of the Citizens, he would puſh then for the whole, and deprive him, if it might be, of his Kingdom. He ſpake now very harſhly of Brunichild, as having laid the platform of this deſign, and affirmed ſhe had ſent for one of the Sons of Gundobald to marry him. He cauſed a Synod of Biſhops to be ſummoned to meet on the firſt of November, and many were on their way from the utmoſt parts of Gall, when News was brought that Brunichild had purged her ſelf by Oath of the things laid to her charge. Hereupon they returned, and the ways were again opened to any of Childebert his Subjects, that had occaſion to paſs into theſe Quarters.

Several Prodigies.

78. Childebert now dared to ſend his Son to Soiſſons, without fear of giving Offence and matter of Jealouſie to his Uncle. Keeping his own Court with his Wife and Mother near Stratzburg, he conſented he ſhould reſide there, at the earneſt deſire of the principal Inhabitants, who received him with all demonſtrations of Kindneſs and Affection, with his Train and Equipage, which was every way appointed as for the Son of ſo great a King. Preſently after a diſcovery was made of a Conſpiracy betwixt Sunegiſilus, his Comes Stabuli, and others, who had made a compact with Septimina, the Nurſe of his Children, to poiſon or bewitch Failenba his Queen, which being done, when he had married another Wife, they thought they ſhould rule him as they pleaſed; if not, he was alſo to be ſent out of the way, and then, as Guardians and Protectours of his Children, they were to ſhare the Government. This Year, which was the fourteenth of Childebert, after Eaſter-Week, ſo great Rains fell, that in the ſpace of three Hours great Rivers ſeemed to run through the Vallies. In Autumn the Trees bloſſomed, and Apples appeared as in the Spring. In September Roſes were found to grow, and Rivers overflowed their Banks to ſuch an height as never formerly had been known, to the great hindrance of ſowing the Winter Corn. But theſe Overflowings not onely happened in Gall; for Gregory tells, that the year following his Deacon returning from Rome with certain Reliques, made relation, that the River Tiber, in the ſelf ſame Month, had, by an unheard-of Inundation, drowned all that City, deſtroyed the ancient Buildings thereof, and overturned the Barns belonging to the Church, wherein ſome thouſands of Meaſures of Wheat were laid up. A Multitude of Serpents, with an huge Dragon, as big as a Beam of Timber, ſwam down the River into the Sea, and being ſuffocated in the ſalt Water, were caſt dead upon the ſhore, and then followed a dreadfull Plague (called Lues Inguinaria, from the Bubo's that aroſe in the groin) which ſwept away a great number of People. This is the Plague wherewith many being ſeized, fell into a fit of ſneezing, and ſuddenly died, whence ſome would derive the cuſtome of praying for ſuch as ſneeze, which Opinion we confute in another place. As for this Dragon which ſwam down the River, it could not be of that ſort of Creatures which Naturaliſts properly call Dragons, but ſome other Serpent, monſtrous for bigneſs, and therein exceeding all ſuch creeping things, by Pliny called Boæ, which he himſelf relates to have been ſometimes ſeen in thoſe parts of Italy which lie upon Tiber. From the noiſome Vapours iſſuing out of their Carcaſſes, a Venome might be tranſmitted into the Air, already ſubject to putrefaction through exceſs and moiſture.

Lib. 8. c. 14.

79. About this time Childebert ſent his Ambaſſadours to Mauricius the Emperour, who touching at Carthage in their way, there happened a great Fray betwixt their Train and the Townſmen, a French Boy having taken ſomething out of a Tradeſman Shop, and refuſing to reſtore it. The Magiſtrate of the Town, to revenge the injury, which was utterly unknown to the Ambaſſadours, fell upon them and their followers at their Lodgings, and though they promiſed to ſpare their Lives, if they would ſurrender their Perſons, yet in the heat of their Fury two of them they killed, Bodegiſilus and Evantius by Name, and Grippo, the third Man that bore this publick Character, hardly eſcaped their violence, ſtanding upon his guard, and ſo gaining time to reaſon the matter with them, and ſhew them the danger they had incurred. Moved with his Arguments they pacified themſelves, and at length withdrew to their Houſes, and the Magiſtrate came to Grippo, and would have excuſed, or at leaſt extenuated the Fact, offering him his utmoſt aſſiſtence for his ſafe travel to the Emperour's Court. Thither being come, after the ſignification of the buſineſs for which he was ſent, he complained of the violence offered to the Law of Nations in the Murther of his Fellow-Ambaſſadours, of which Mauricius ſhewed a great Reſentment, promiſing to give all ſatisfaction that Childebert ſhould require, who being ſatisfied with what Grippo reported at his return, by virtue of the League lately renewed, ſent twenty Captains into Italy, to deſtroy the Lombards. Several of theſe Officers uſed in their paſſage their fellow-Subjects and Countreymen no otherwiſe than as Lombards indeed, acting all things Souldiers are wont to doe in an Enemies Countrey, and when they were come into Italy, through their variety of Opinions, and ſeparating themſelves, did little of moment, but being expoſed to the Strategems and Arts of the Lombards, after a vain expectation of ſuccours from the Emperour, which was promiſed would be with them after three days, having ſpent three Months in the Countrey, and moſt of them being conſumed with Sickneſs and Famine, the reſt returned home. And before they could reach the ſeveral places of their abode, they were forced to ſell their Arms and their Clothes to buy them Victuals.

80. The Army of the Franks being thus retreated, Apracharius, the King of the Lombards, to prevent all farther Inconveniences of this nature, ſent his Ambaſſadours to King Guntram, hoping by his Authority to prevail with, and pacifie his Nephew Childebert. Guntram by his good words was moved to recommend Peace as a deſirable thing to his Nephew, but while the Ambaſſadours expected their diſpatch in his Court, News came that the King their Maſter was dead, whereupon Childebert reſolved to take farther time to deliberate, and telling them he would after mature conſideration ſignifie his Mind to thoſe concerned, therewith diſmiſſed them. Mauricius, the Emperour, mindfull of the Affront which had been offered Childebert, ſent twelve Men, who were conceived the guiltieſt in the violence made upon his Ambaſſadours in Africk; but he, whether to reſerve an occaſion to make uſe of againſt the Emperour, or for other reaſons, ſent the Men back unhurt, ſaying, he could not accuſe them particularly as Authours of the Injury, and that he would ſend Meſſengers of his own to him about this Affair. While theſe Tranſactions were in hand, the Britains inhabiting Aremorica renewed the uſual Devaſtaſion into the parts about Nantes and Remes, where committing all ſorts of Inſolencies, King Guntram ſent an Army againſt them, under Command of two Captains Beppolenus and Ebracharius, who being equal in Authority, a pernitious courſe, which yet our Franks ordinarily practiſed, fell out by the way, and thereupon the expedition had a ſucceſs ſuitable to thoſe principles. In their march yet they agreed in this one thing, to commit all manner of Villanies upon the Countrey, and having paſſed the River Vicinonia, came as far as the other called Ulda. It happened Fredegund, that Fury of France, had a grudge to Beppolenus, and therefore hearing that he was employed againſt the Britains, ſent to the Aid of Warocus, their Prince, a Party of Baio Caſſine Saxons, with their Hair cut, and apparelled after the Britiſh Faſhion. Beppolenus ingaging with both Nations, though forſaken by Ebrachartus his Collegue, who would not come near him out of deſign he ſhould miſcarry, for two days together had good ſucceſs, and ſlew many of them, but the third day was overpowered and ſlain; which done, Warocus flattered Ebracharius, and ſent him back with fair words, promiſing to ſubmit himſelf in all things unto Guntram. Yet forgetting both his Oath and Hoſtages, he had delivered, he ſent Canaon, his Son, to fall upon ſuch of the Army as loitered, which he made Priſoners, killing thoſe that reſiſted him. The Franks in their retreat fearing to come nigh the Countries they had ſo much injured, leſt they ſhould be prepared for them, took other ways, and did as much miſchief where they came unlooked for. Some accuſed Ebracharius the Dux, and Wiliacharius a Comes, as having for money betrayed the Army, whereupon the former was ſorely taken up by Guntram, and diſcharged the Court; the other withdrew, and concealed himſelf till the ſtorm ſhould be over.

The Britains again infeſt the Countrey.

81. The Year following being the fifteenth of Childebert, and the twenty ninth of Guntram, this King, who was eminent otherwiſe for his Mildneſs and Moderation, (conſidering the fierceneſs and precipitancy of his Nation and Anceſtours,) committed a Fact, for which he was taxed even by himſelf, with great cruelty and

An Act of Cruelty in King Guntram.

Cabillonum (Chalon ſur Saone) oppidum Æduorum Cabillonenſium. Alluitur fluvio Arari hodie Saone.

The Villanies of Fredegundis.

and raſhneſs. Hunting in the Royal Wood or Foreſt, called Woſac, he perceived by ſome evident tokens, that a Deer had been killed, and examining the Keeper, he accuſed Chundo, the King's Chamberlain. Chundo being taken into cuſtody, ſtiffly denied the Fact, and the other as earneſtly maintaining that he did it; for deciding the Controverſie, the Combate was appointed to them. The Chamberlain had a Nephew which undertook it for him, who wounded the Keeper mortally, but falling upon him, the other received him upon the point of his Dagger, and ſo they periſhed together. Chundo ſeeing this, and that his Innocency was left as doubtfull as before, made his eſcape towards the Church of St. Marcellus, at Cabillonum, but the King being in a great Paſſion, commanded him to be purſued and apprehended, e'er he could reach the Sanctuary, and then to be tied to a ſtake, and ſtoned to death, which he much afterward lamented, and blamed himſelf, that in ſo precipitous and violent an humour, for ſo ſmall a fault, he had cauſed to be made away a very faithfull and uſefull Servant. In the mean time young Chlotharius, the Son of Chilperick, fell dangerouſly ſick, and all hope of Recovery was over, which cauſed Guntram to take a Journey towards Paris, to ſettle matters, and prevent all diſorders, in caſe he died, but e'er he reached his Journeys end, news was brought that he was on his Recovery, a great means whereof was a rich Preſent his Mother had made to the Church of St. Martin, in the Opinion of our Gregory his Succeſſour, who farther tells us, that Fredegund her Devotion being now very warm, ſent to Warocus into Britain to diſmiſs thoſe that had been taken Priſoners when the Forces of Guntram made the laſt Invaſion, whereby he judges it was evident, that by her tricks and devices Beppolenus had been ſlain, and the Army defeated in that Ingagement. The temper of the Woman conſidered, a very ſlight occaſion might juſtly miniſter matter of ſuſpicion, for about the ſame time when Childebert was come into his Chapel, a fellow was there taken upon ſuſpicion, and being tortured, confeſſed he was ſent on purpoſe by her to kill him. He affirmed her Emiſſaries were twelve in all, whereof ſix were come thither, and the reſt were ordered to Soiſſons, to intrap, if poſſible, his young Son, there as then reſiding. Such of thoſe Men as could be found, were ſubjected to mutilations of Members, and ſeveral ſorts of Torments; and ſome, to prevent ſuch Sufferings and Indignities, killed themſelves. Above all, Sunnigiſilus was moſt plied with tortures, his wounds being ſtill again opened when they began to heal. In his pains he confeſſed not onely what related to the death of Chilperick, but ſeveral other Villanies, and diſcovered that Egidius, the Biſhop of Reimes, was a party with Raningus Urſio, and Buthefred, for taking away Childebert his Life. The Biſhop was ſummoned before a Synod of his Equals, who upon the King's Command, convened for this purpoſe, and being not onely found guilty of this, but of other notorious Treaſons, was depoſed, and afterward baniſhed his Countrey, another being put into his place.

82. Fredegund was become ſo obdurate in cruelty, at leaſt had brought her ſelf into that opinion with the People, that no Murther ſcarcely could be committed, no Bloud ſhed, but ſhe muſt be thought to have an hand in it. The People of Campania, upon ſuch an occaſion, fell into a Mutiny, deſiring Childebert that ſhe might be apprehended, and put to death, and ſhe was forced to make uſe of her Friends and Dependents for her removal to another place. To divert theſe ſtorms, at leaſt to procure her ſelf ſhelter againſt them, ſhe betook her to her flatteries, and now wrote to Guntram, to whom giving the Title of her Lord, ſhe beſought him to take the pains to come to Paris, and there cauſe her Son to be baptized, and be Godfather to him, looking no otherwiſe upon him than as his other Child. The King ſhe had often heretofore amuſed with this Complement, but had ſtill put him off from time to time, he ſuffering her not onely to enjoy her Life, and a Fortune becoming her condition, but alſo to order her young Son's matters, out of reſpect to the place ſhe had born, and her preſent quality of a King's Mother. Now aſſoon as the Gout would give him leave to Paris he went, and commanding a Font to be prepared at the Village called Nemptodore, where attending the ſolemnity, Ambaſſadours come to him from his Nephew Childebert, who no ſooner had received the News of his Uncle's Progreſs, but was ſeized with a fit of Jealouſie and Emulation. They expoſtulate with him for joyning himſelf in Friendſhip and Amity with his Enemies, contrary to their former Accords, and complain that he deſigned to inthrone the Child in the City of Paris, a thing which conſidering what regard was ever had to that place by all former Princes could not but tend to the diſrepute and damage of Childebert and his Succeſſours. Guntram gave them good words, profeſſed he would make good to a tittle what he had ever promiſed their Maſter, who had no reaſon to be offended at ſo good a work, as being Godfather to his own Brother's Son, an Act of that Piety, that no Chriſtian ought to refuſe. He called God to witneſs, he did it not with any deſign, but in the ſimplicity of his heart, and out of fear of divine Vengeance. In ſumm, he bad them go and tell him, that he would keep the Agreement inviolable, and would never in the leaſt infringe it, except he firſt gave ſome juſt occaſion. Coming then to the Font, he gave the Child the Name of Clotarius, wiſhing that he might grow to that Height, Eminency and Power, as he did formerly whoſe Name he bore. Then, after mutual Feaſting and Preſents, he returned to Chalon, where, about two years after, he died in the three and thirtieth year of his Reign. In goodneſs he ſeems to have ſurpaſſed all his Predeceſſours, his bounty to the poor, his Piety toward the Church was remarkable. Leaving onely one Daughter, Chlothiardes by Name, Childebert his Nephew, the King of Auſtraſia, ſucceeded him in his Kingdoms of Orleance and Burgundy. He was buried in the Church of St. Marcellus, (which now they call a Priory,) at Chalons, of his own foundation, being ſo well accounted of by Poſterity, as to have his Name put into their Martyrology, in which the eight and twentieth day of March is conſecrated to his Memory. His Death fell in or about the thirteenth Year of Mauricius, the ſeventh of Gregory the Great Biſhop of Rome. A. D. 596.

Clotarius chriſtened at Paris by Guntram.

King Guntram dies.

Childebert ſucceeds him.

Appendix ad Gregor. Turonenſ. Hiſt. & Aimoinus lib. 3. c. 81.

83. Childebert his Dominions being enlarged by the Acceſſion of two rich and powerfull Kingdoms, had the ſame Itch of Ambition and Covetouſneſs in his bloud as had been uſually in his Anceſtours. To cover yet this Paſſion of his Mind, he was not deſtitute of very ſpecious pretences. Fredegund was yet alive, not onely his Enemy in particular, but the Plague and Bane of his whole Family. To revenge the Death of his Father and Uncle he would take up Arms, both who had periſhed by her Villany, not to mention others of their bloud, as the ſeveral Sons of her Husband, whom, as the moſt wicked of all Step-Mothers, ſhe had cauſed moſt cruelly to be made away. He raiſes his Forces, and commits them to the Conduct of two Captains, Gundoald and Wintrio, whom he commands to invade the Enemies Territories, to plunder and burn all before them, and take as many Priſoners as they could lead away, and with theſe Inſtructions they march from Campania, lying about Reims, to Soiſſons, which they beſiege. In the mean time Fredegund knowing how much ſhe was concerned to beſtir her ſelf, omitted nothing requiſite for an effectual reſiſtence. Having called together ſuch of the Franks as had been ſubject to her Husband, ſhe ſhewed them their young King hanging at her Breaſt, and by words and geſtures, fitted every way to the preſent occaſion, moved their Pity toward the Infant, and their Indignation againſt thoſe that had no regard to his Tenderneſs and Innocency. She promiſed large Rewards to ſuch as ſhould ſhew themſelves zealous and courageous in his behalf, and deſiring them to obey the Orders of Lauderick, (whom King Guntram, as Aimoinus writes, had left Guardian to her Son,) told them, ſhe her ſelf would find out a Strategeme, whereby they ſhould eaſily overpower their Enemies. Having in the night ſeaſon entred a Wood, Lauderick their Captain takes an Hatchet, and cuts down a bough of a Tree, which done, he hangs a little Bell at the neck of his Horſe, and commands all his Followers to doe the like. This they did, and marching all the Night, by break of day came up with the Enemy.

Who prepares an Army againſt Fredegund and her Son King Clotair.

84. One of the Sentinels that belonged to Childebert's Army, when the day dawned, perceived ſomething he had not ſeen before, and ignorant of what had really happened, demanded of his Companion what ſhould be the matter, for here was a Wood all on a ſudden grown up in that place, where the night before not ſo much as one ſtick appeared. His Companion told him he was drunk the day before, and having not yet digeſted the crudities of his Intemperance, had forgot what he had formerly ſeen; for he affirmed they were in a Foreſt where he might hear the Bells that hung about the necks of the Cattel that were feeding, it being a cuſtome amongſt the Franks, eſpecially thoſe of Auſtraſia, to hang thoſe Bells at their Necks, that if they wandered far, or were got amongſt Thickets, they might eaſily be diſcovered by the ſound. But while the Centinels continued their diſcourſe, down fell the Wood, and inſtead of green Trees Men appeared in bright Armour, who advancing, fell upon their Enemies unexpected, and taking them at this advantage, while ſome were aſleep, and others lay upon their Pallets, but all were well wearied with their Travel the day before, killed very many, ſome ſay thirty thouſand Men, and put the reſt to flight, amongſt which the Captains

He is overthrown.

themſelves hardly eſcaped. Fredegund having obtained ſo great and ſo unexpected a Victory, with Clotair her Son, and a numerous Army invaded Campania, by Rheims, waſting all as ſhe paſſed with Fire and Sword, which done, in a triumphant manner ſhe returned to Soiſſons. Such was the ſucceſs Childebert had in his deſign againſt her and her Son. The Year following his endeavours againſt the Britains had little better fortune, for he loſt as many of his own men, well-nigh, as he ſlew of the Enemy. But his ſucceſs againſt the Varui or Varni, made him ſome amends, who attempting to rebell, he put almoſt all the whole People to the Sword. He ſurvived this their defeat not long, periſhing, together with Faileuba his Wife, by Poiſon, as was reported, (for they both died on one day) in the fourth year of his Reign over Burgundy, and the twenty third of that over Auſtraſia, the five and twentieth of his Age, A. D. 600. Aimoinus, the Monk, gives us this Account of his Death. The Continuatour of Gregory the Biſhop his Hiſtory, ſaith nothing of the Poiſon, but tells us onely that he died in the fourth year after that he had ſucceeded his Uncle Guntram. Some of the modern French Chroniclers, after their manner of Haranguing, uſe many words, and as generally they make more of every ſtory than ancient Authours do warrant, deſcant upon his defeat, and will have him to have died of Melancholy, and they make his Uncle Guntram to have outlived this Battel. To be ſure Childebert left a great miſs of him amongſt his Subjects, not onely for that his Sons were young, and the inconveniences uſually happening in the Reigns of Children, ſtruck them with apprehenſion of future troubles, but out of reſpect of the worth of his Perſon, and his fitneſs to govern.

King Childebert dies.

Aliis Faleuba, aliis Falumbe, & nonnullis Sedelande.

85. He left two Sons behind him, Theodobert and Theodorick, and one Daughter, named Tandellema. Some write that he had both his Sons by his Wife Faleuba, others ſay, he had Theodobert by a Concubine, and they found their conjecture upon this, that Brunechild, their Grand-mother, made Theodorick afterward believe, that he was not his Brother, which ſhe would never have attempted, had they been born of the ſame Mother; but hereupon Theodorick ſought his Life, and alſo deſired to marry his Daughter. By what ties of Bloud ſoever they were related, their Father's Dominions were divided betwixt them. To Theodobert, being twelve years old, fell his Grandfather's Kingdom of Auſtraſia; to Theodorick, but ten years of Age, the Kingdom of Guntram, his Great Uncle, to which his Father ſucceeded by right of Adoption; the one reigned from the Moſelle to the Rhine, and thence to Albis, or Aube, far and wide, and the other over Burgundy, and down the Rivers Arares, Saone and the Rhoſne, as far as to the Sardoan Sea. Brunechild, their Grandmother, had the Protection of them, and by her conduct their matters ſeemed well ſettled, which muſt needs be a great Eye-ſore to Fredegund. To bring them into trouble, if not into danger, ſhe, ſay ſome, procured the Hunnes (or Avares) to invade Thoringia, which having done out of Pannonia, they could not thence be driven, but by a receipt of great ſumms of Money. Before this, while the Reputation got by the defeat of Childebert's Army was yet freſh and vigorous, ſhe ſeized on Paris, and the other Cities of thoſe Parts, in a barbarous manner, as our Authours phraſe it, and ſent an Army againſt the Forces of the two new Kings, which taking them at unawares, made great ſlaughter of them. This was the ſame Year that Childebert died, and in the ſecond Year of Theodorick, (for by his Reign our Writers chuſe to count) ſhe her ſelf was ſummoned to give an account of all her Murthers and Villanies in another World, (for by a ſtrange Fortune ſhe eſcaped Judgment in this) being the moſt wicked of all Women that ever breathed the Gallick Air. But dying thus peaceably in her Bed, her Son, or his Governours for him, buried her honourably by her Husband, in the Church of St. Vincent, now St. Germain des prez, where yet at the Feet of Chilperick her Monument is to be ſeen, on which her Image was pourtraicted, but is now ſo worn out with treading, handling, or with age, that the Lineaments thereof cannot be diſcerned.

Vide Tillium in Comment. & Diſquiſit. de Rebus Gallicis, pag. 16.

Theodobert and Theodorick his Sons ſucceed him.

Author Appendic. ad Gregorii Turonenſ. Hiſt. & ex illo Aimoinus, lib. 3.

Fredegund, Mother to Clotair, dies.

86. The news of her Death brought no little Joy to Brunechild, who though as yet ſhe was ſhort of her in reſpect of Villanies and Murthers, yet bore as high a mind (as well ſhe might,) and was of a very reſtleſs and ambitious temper. Her Carriage toward her Grand-Son Theodobert and his Nobility was ſo uneaſie, that they drove her out of that Kingdom, and that in ſo deſolate a Condition as the ſtory is told, that ſhe was alone found in the Fields by a certain poor Man, with whom ſhe prevailed to bring her to the Court of Theodorick her other Nephew. Theodorick received her with that reſpect which became her Quality, and ſo near a Relation, and of her Guide ſhe was ſo mindfull, as of a poor Shepherd (it may be,) ſhe made a rich Biſhop of the Dioceſe of Auxerre. Whether by her Importunity, or their own Inclinations induced, the two Brothers now longed to be revenged on their Couſin Clotair, for the advantage he had taken of their Youth, and the unſetledneſs of their Affairs. Matters growing ſtill worſe, at length they come to an open declared War, and to an Ingagement, near the River Arvenna, not far from a Village called Doromell, where ſo great a ſlaughter was made, that the River was filled with dead Bodies, and was ſtopped in its Current. But Clotair had the worſt of it, who not able to ſee his Men Butcher'd in that manner fled away, and coming to Milidunum, a Caſtle ſeated in an Iſland of the River Seine, thence paſſed to Paris, his two Couſins following him, but not ſo faſt, but that they took in a great part of the Cities belonging to him in their paſſage. They forced him to ſubmit to terms very diſadvantageous, giving him no time to breathe, nor well to conſider what he did. For by this accord the Kingdom of Theodorick was inlarged, betwixt the Loire and the Seine as far as the very Ocean, and the limits of Aremorica or Little Britain. And betwixt the Seine and the River Iſara, the entire Dukedom of Deutelenus, as far as the Sea, fell to the ſhare of Theodobert, ſo that twelve Villages in thoſe parts were onely remaining ſubject unto Clotair.

Clotair beaten by his two Couſins Theodorick and Theodobert.

Hic miſerè moderni quidam Francorum Chronographi tempora & res Confundunt.

Milidunum ſeu potius Melodunum hodie Melun oppidum Carnutum Vaſtiniorum Vadicaſſium.

Iſara, hodie Iſere, Amnis Allobrogum utrorumque.

87. After this, the two Brothers ſubdued the Waſcons, and ſet over them a Duke called Genialis, concerning which People, here we muſt make a little Enquiry. This the Reader is firſt to underſtand, that the Waſcons or Vaſcons were anciently ſeated, where now is the Kingdom of Navar, than which yet their Countrey was more large and ſpacious; and under the name of Vaſcones the Cantabrians are, by reaſon of ſome Conqueſts the Vaſcones made in Cantabria, included; for whom the French called Baſques and Biſcainers, and the Spaniards Vaſcongados now, amongſt Learned men, is a common Cuſtome to call by the Latine Name of Cantabri, their Language being by the French called Baſque, by the Spaniards Vaſquenze, and Cantabrica in the Latin Dialect. In what State and Condition theſe Vaſcones lived before the coming of the Carthaginians into Spain, is utterly unknown, as indeed the General Condition of that Countrey, but that after the taking of Saguntus, in conjunction with Hannibal they invaded Italy and fought againſt the Romans, is evident from divers paſſages in Silius Italicus, who reckoning up the ſeveral ſorts of People, that came with that Punick General, mentions them amongſt the reſt, and takes notice of them upon ſeveral occaſions during that War. But this alliance with the Carthaginians ſeems not long to have continued, our Vaſcons, as well as the other Nations of the hithermoſt Spain, imbracing the Friendſhip and Society of the Romans, as may be gathered from Livy. And that their Faith once given they kept inviolable, notwithſtanding all the other Nations of Spain almoſt Rebelled, no War being by them undertaken againſt the Commonwealth, onely in that betwixt Sylla and Marius, the Calagurritani, and not one other ſort of People amongſt the Vaſcons joyned with Sertorius, for whoſe ſake they indured great Miſeries, but could not be the leaſt ſhaken in their fidelity. Therefore did they ever retain their Native Liberty; for no Colonies do we reade of that were ſent into their Countrey, nor any of their Cities made ſubject to Tribute and Impoſitions, which were laid upon moſt of the Nations of Spain. And in this freedom without any alteration in any reſpect, did they continue down till the coming of the Goths, as may be made appear by ſeveral Teſtimonies. That their Valour was highly prized by the Romans, and made uſe of in long and difficult expeditions, appears from Tacitus, who relates, how in the War managed by Vitellius his Men againſt the Britains and Germans, the Leader of whom was Civilis, when the Enemy was in a fair way to become Conquerour, the Romans were reinforced and made Maſters of the Field, by the gallant demeanour of the Vaſcon Cohorts.

The Original of the Vaſcons or Waſcons or Cantabri.

Nec Cerretani, quondam Tyrinthia Caſtra.

Aut Vaſco inſuetus galeæ, ferre arma morati, Lib. 2. Vide eundem lib. 5. in narratione prælii contra Flaminium Conſulem geſti, item, lib. 9. de pugna Cannenſi, & lib. 10. de eadem pugna & Paulo Conſule.

88. Theſe Vaſcons lived in Spain beyond the Pyrenæan Mountains, which is agreed on all hands; but when they came into Gall, and when they ſeized on part of Aquitain is difficult to be determined. Joſeph Scaliger was of opinion that the Cantabri and Vaſcones being overthrown by Meſſala, paſſed over the Pyrenæans, and placed themſelves in the Seats of the Tarbelli; but Strabo, Ptolemy and Pliny, who all lived after Meſſala, place both theſe Nations in Spain, and neither of them in Aquitain, neither is there any other Authour that makes mention of any War betwixt them and Meſſala. Tibullus indeed celebrates the Triumphs which Meſſala had over the Inhabitants of Aquitain, but not a ſyllable is to be found in that place, concerning the Cantabri and Vaſcones. Some tell a ſtory of Pompey, that having ſubdued the Vaſcones in Spain, and fearing the reſtleſs humour of this fierce People, he forced them to tranſplant themſelves into that part of Aquitain where the Convenæ now inhabit

Their Seats.

Lib. 1. c. 6. Lection. Auſon.

Lib. 1. Eleg. 8.

inhabit, and thence was the name given to their City; but this opinion having none more ancient to patronize it, than Iſidorus Hiſpalenſis, and the current of all ancient Geography running againſt it, which after the time of Pompey finds the Vaſcones in Iberia, (or that part of Spain on this ſide Iberus,) and no ſuch People in Aquitain, it is as obnoxious to exception as the other. As for that People of Aquitain called Convenæ, they derived their Original from the Vectones Arrebaci, and Celtiberi, Nations inhabiting the farther Spain, and not from the Vaſcones as Iſidore believed, for ſo we are taught by St. Hierome in his Book againſt Vigilantius. Others more probably gather from Auſonius the Poet, that as long as till the Reign of Gratian, the Vaſcones contained themſelves within their own bounds, and that that part of Aquitain which after they poſſeſſed, was then held by the Tarbelli the ancient Inhabitants, for * he in his Epiſtles to Paulinus both calls the Countrey Arva Tarbellica, and placeth the Vaſcones in a Countrey far differing from that there, both in ſituation and Cuſtome, even in Iberia, or the Pyrenæan Mountains, which the anſwer of Paulinus to him doth ſufficiently confirm.

The Original of the Convenæ.

C. 2. Unde & Convenarum nomen accepit. Huc uſque latrocinetur contra eccleſiam Dei & de Vectonibus Arrebacis Celtiberiſque deſcendens incurſet Galliarum eccleſias, &c.

* Vide Auſonii Epiſt. 23. & 25. & proxima Paulini Carmina Auſonio reſpondentis.

89. But after the Death of Gratian, the Roman Empire mightily declining even to Ruine in Gall and Spain, and eſpecially the Coaſts about the Pyrenæans, being waſted by the Alans, Vandals, Suevi and other barbarous Nations, then might our Vaſcons a Warlike People, and ambitious of inlarging their Bounds, ſeize on that Mountainous part of Gall, which adjoyns to the Pyrenæans. But by what degrees, and in what method and manner it's very difficult, if not impoſſible for any to aſſert, we may conjecture with others, that beſides that Region which the Baſques or Biſcainers hold at this day, the Principality of Bearne, and the County of the Bigerrians were now taken and held by them, for this very reaſon, that at this day are to be ſeen the Ruines of old Towers, in thoſe Mountainous tracts, diſpoſed as our Beacons one againſt another, to receive and give warning by Fire upon any Invaſion. But the plain Grounds together with the fortified Towns, as Lapardum now Baion, Benearn or Orthes, which gave name to the Principality; Bigorra of old the Metropolis of the Countrey, and now a Village, and Convenæ now St. Bertrand were yet under the Dominion of the Kings of the Franks, as may be underſtood from ſeveral places of Gregory Turonenſis. Thence came it to paſs, that ſo Mountainous and barren a place not being able to maintain ſo numerous a People, they were conſtrained to make ſeveral Inrodes into Novempopulania, which was then alſo ſubject to the Dominion of the Franks. Hereof Gregory Turonenſis aſſures us, where he writes that the Vaſcones deſcending from the Mountains, depopulated the Fields and Vineyards, burnt the Houſes, and led ſome Men and Cattel away with them, to incounter whom Aſtronaldus the Duke was ſent, but was able to doe little againſt them. * Venantius Fortunatus alſo after his manner hints to us the Incurſions they were wont to make. But before this expedition of Aſtronaldus, we find in Gregory that Blandaſtes by Command of Chilperick the firſt, made War upon them, but with ſuch ſucceſs, that having done nothing of moment he loſt his Life, together with the greateſt part of the Army. Theſe Events ſhewed that this Strenuous and Magnanimous People was not to be overcome, but by the power of two Kings in conjunction together. Theodorick and Theodobert having overthrown Clotair, and become Maſters of the greateſt part of Gall, eſpecially of Aquitain they were unable to reſiſt their Power and Majeſty, and ſo were forced to ſubmit and accept of a Duke called Genialis. How afterward they ſhook off the Yoke and invaded and made themſelves Maſters of Novempopulania, which from them received the name of Gaſcoigne, as alſo concerning the places they left, we ſhall ſpeak upon a fitter occaſion.

Bigerrionum vel Bigerronum.

Vide Notitiam utriuſque Vaſconiæ ſcriptam ab Arnaldo Oibenarto Mauleoſolenſi, & Philibertum Monetum Jeſuitam in Geograph. Galliæ Aquitanicæ.

Lib. 9. c. 7.

* Cantaber ut timeat, Vaſco Vagus arma timeſcat.
Atque Pyrenææ deſerat Alpis opem.

Lib. 10. c. 22.

The Vaſcons ſubdued.

Lib. 6. c. 12. & Fredegarius in Hiſt. Franc. Epitom. c. 87.

Hujus cap. § 2. paragr. 14, &c.

90. The two Brothers having this ſucceſs againſt the Vaſcons, farther ſtrengthned their intereſt by a ſtricter League and Alliance with the Lombards, the Daughter of Theodobert being contracted to their King's Son, and ſo Peace and Proſperity now ſeemed to be returned to the Franks. But all things were again put out of order by the wicked practices of Brunechild, who being as we ſaid expelled the Court of Theodobert, was kindly entertained by Theodorick her other Grandſon, and now began to play her Pranks more dangerouſly and with greater ſucceſs. Being vitiouſly inclined her ſelf, ſhe hated and oppoſed all about him that were vertuouſly given, Egila a Patritian, a man of great Integrity and excellent parts, for no other fault but becauſe he was rich, ſhe loaded with grievous Complaints, and cauſed to be put to Death, and his Eſtate confiſcated. Deſiderius Biſhop of Vienne, a Prelate eminent for Holineſs, ſhe procured to be removed from his See, and, one Dommilus being put into his place, to be recalled out of Exile and cruelly Murthered, Brunechild's Vilanies.

Sect. 3.

red. He that ſtood moſt in her way was Bertoald the Major of the Palace, a perſon of great Wiſedom, Conduct, Fortitude and Fidelity, whom though ſhe endeavoured to remove, yet armed by his Innocence and Prudence, for a time he withſtood all her Aſſaults, till a furious luſtfull paſſion ſeized on her, which rendered her ſo fierce and violent, that he muſt needs at length give way and periſh. There was one Protadius a Roman by Birth, with whom as old as ſhe was, ſhe was wont to be too familiar, and out of her filthy love to him, had already advanced to the dignity of a Dux or Patritian, in the parts that lay beyond the Mountain Jura. But thinking this too ſmall Preferment for her Minion, as ſhe burnt with Luſt towards him, ſo with greater Envy and Malice toward Bertoald, whom ſhe muſt now by one means or other ſend to another World, that in this Protadius might enjoy his place and Dignity; and for this purpoſe, ſhe had the impudence to move her Nephew that he might be put to Death, upon ſlight and trivial pretences. Theodorick whether to gratifie her in her humour, in ſuch a way as the Vulgar could not diſcover, or to divert her purpoſe, ſent Bertoald away into Neuſtria, or that part of it which called him Maſter, to protect the Countrey, but with ſo ſmall a Power, as if he intended he ſhould want protection himſelf, for he allowed him no more than three hundred men. He as fortified againſt the Event, and ſenſible for what Encounters ſuch an Army was moſt proper, ſpent his time in the Hunting of wild Beaſts, which Clotair underſtanding, and hearing what numbers of men he had with him, imagined, as well he might, that he was come to affront him upon the Borders.

Et ob id in pago Ultra jurano, poſt Wandalmarum, ab ea Dux conſtitutus. Sic Aimoinus, lib. 3. c. 90. at vero Author Appendic. ad Gregor. Hiſt. hoc modo: Defuncto Wandalmaro duce in Pagó ultra Juranum & Scotingorum Protadius patritius ordinatur, inſtigatione Brunechildis & c. 23.

Pagus hoc in loco idem eſt ac Ducatus. Pagus Comitis eſt Comitatus Gallicè Pays & Comtè dividebatur in Vicarias, Centenas & Decanias, in quibus Judices erant Vicarii, Centenarii (Belgis Honderſteman) & Decani. Sed de his alibi.

91. He diſpatches againſt him his Son Meroneus, together with Lauderick his Mothers Minion, of whoſe Villany as to his reputed Father's Death, he ſeems all this while to have been Ignorant, or elſe muſt have ſpared him out of a more than ordinary, (if not filial) ſympathy. Bertoald was ſo wiſe as upon notice of their approach, to leave off his Sport and ſeriouſly to betake himſelf to Orleance, where he was kindly received by Auſtronus the Biſhop. Lauderick diligently purſues and brings his Army before the Gate, where he upbraids him with Cowardiſe for running away, and challenges him to come out and Fight. Bertoald ſends him word, that he made an hypocritical ſhew of Valour, knowing how much he was ſuperiour in Numbers, but if he would demonſtrate himſelf a true Cavalier, he ſhould ſet his Army aſide and fight with him a ſingle Combat, to which he ſent him a formal Challenge. Lauderick refuſing to accept it, he then gave him to underſtand, that for the affront and injury he had offered to Theodorick his Maſter, in invading his Dominions, he was very certain that ſatisfaction would be demanded in an high manner, and that a ſtrong Army would ſhortly be in the Field, where when the Battel joyned he would meet him, deſiring they might put on ſuch Clothes, as might diſtinguiſh them, and make them known to each other, and then he ſhould find proofs of the Cowardiſe wherewith he charged him, and have opportunity to give a full evidence of his own ſuppoſed Valour. Lauderick would not reject this Propoſal, and promiſing to meet him, both laid heavy curſes on themſelves if they failed of their word. This paſſed on the Feaſt of St. Martin, and Theodorick having notice of the Invaſion, on Chriſtmas-day following began his March, and coming to Stampa, a Town ſtanding upon the River Junna, there expected his Couſin Clotair, who was nothing ſlow in his preparations for the Encounter, for before Theodorick could paſs all his men over the River, the fight began. Here was Bertoald mindfull of his promiſe, and amongſt the Ranks of Armed men, ſought for, and provoked his Adverſary to make good his word, but he thought fit to ſave one, and by degrees giving back into the Rere, declined the Combat. Bertoald inraged hereat ſtill bore forward, and conſidering what Ginns were laid to intrap him by Brunechild, and that he muſt looſe his Office, thought it better to Die an Honourable Death in the Field, than to end his Life in an ignominious manner, and ſo ruſhing amongſt the Troops of the Enemy, after he had killed many men, was at length overpowred by multitudes and ſlain. But Theodorick got the day, Clotair and Lauderick being put to flight, and Meroneus taken Priſoner, or as ſome ſay killed. He entred Paris in triumph, and had purſued his Victory, but that Theodobert being jealous of his Power, thought fit to balance him, and therefore joyning his Forces with the remainders of Clotair his Army, came with him to Compendium, and obliged his Brother to return home, without having any thing farther attempted.

Junna ſeu potius Juina fluvius Carnutum Vadicaſſiorum Pariſiorum (hodie Juine) Salioclitam ſeu Stampas (hodie Eſtampes) oppidum interfluit medium atque ad Metioſedam oppidum, ſeu Joſſedum vel Corbilium, ad meridiem Sequanæ (nunc Seine) infunditur.

Clotair beaten again by Theodorick.

92. Brunechild therefore in effect was the onely Perſon, whoſe Deſigns ſucceeded by the Death of Bertoald, into whoſe place of Maſter of the Palace, or Major Domus, Protadius her Gallant was ſpeedily advanced, in the tenth year of Theodorick his Reign. This yet would not ſatisfie this wicked Woman, whoſe paſſions would not be terminated by the ſatisfaction given to Ambition and Luſt, to theſe ſhe muſt joyn Revenge, elſe all things ſeemed to be nothing to her. Her expulſion from the Court of Theodobert ſhe ſtill bore in an exulcerated mind, and no Plaſter was large enough for the Sore, but the utter Deſtruction of himſelf and Family. Calling in then to her aſſiſtence her Friend Protadius, (whom ſhe had by her tricks brought into great grace and favour with her Nephew, though for his Pride and Covetouſneſs, he was grievouſly hated by all the Nobility of Burgundy;) ſhe inſtilled by degrees the venome of Jealouſie and Malice into the mind of Theodorick: She tells him that Theodobert had got into his hands all their Father's Treaſure, and that it was a diſhonour for him to be ſo ſleepiſh, as to let him run away with it all, without once demanding his ſhare; ſhe perſwades him he was altogether alienated from him in his affections, and (taking occaſion of what had lately paſſed,) makes him believe that all his inclinations are for their Couſin Clotair, in ſum, that he envied him for his parts, (conſcious to himſelf how meanly he was furniſhed,) and had reſolved upon his Ruine, as ſoon as time and opportunity ſhould ſerve, but it was no wonder for one of the bloud Royal to be hated by the Son of a raſcally Gardner, who had not onely robbed him of his Father's Treaſures, but gaped alſo after his two Kingdoms. Protadius ſupplying this flame continually with Oil, Theodorick burns with that rage and malice againſt his Brother, that nothing but Fire and Sword in the Bowels of his Territories can allay his fury. An Army he raiſes and comes as far as Cariacum, where he incamps himſelf, prepared the next day to incounter Theodobert, who was not far off with a very ſtrong force of his Auſtraſians. In the mean time, his Leudi or Leudes as our ancienter Hiſtorians call them, meaning his Subjects or the Nobility of Burgundy, remonſtrated to him how unnatural a quarrel he had undertaken, at the ſuggeſtion of ſome violent Spirits, and petitioned him, that in a friendly manner it might be compoſed. Protadius finding himſelf concerned took the wrong Courſe, and diſſwaded him from making a Peace, affirming the quarrel to be good, and a War the fitteſt means for reſtoring a perfect underſtanding betwixt the two Brothers.

Aſſerins illum non Childeberti ſed cujuſdam hortulani filium fuiſſe, Aimoinus, lib. 3. c. 91.

Theodorick and Theodobert quarrel.

93. The Nobility bearing him implacable malice before, was now out of all meaſure inraged, finding him to be the man, who upon all occaſions thwarted what ever they propounded for the publick good, and they began to lay their Heads together, affirming it were better that one man periſhed, than that ſo many ſhould loſe their lives as muſt inevitably be killed the day following. The King underſtanding they held ſuch conſultations would himſelf in Perſon have gone to diſſolve their meeting, but being hindred by thoſe about him, for fear of danger he ſent one Uncelenus to forbid them expreſly to attempt any thing againſt Protadius, but he found them already to have ſurrounded the King's Tent, where Protadius was playing at Tables with one Peter, a Phyſician. Coming to them he changed his tale, and ſaid it was the Command of King Theodorick his Maſter, that Protadius, as an Enemy to Peace, ſhould be put to death, which heard, they all unanimouſly ruſhed in with their Swords drawn, and there ſlew him. By this Act (though illegal, and of dangerous conſequence) the impending miſchief was diverted, and Theodorick was compelled inſtead of a War, to make a Peace, and to return home, as he came, without having any thing performed. But however he bore it out, Brunechild neither could nor would digeſt the Injury. Beginning with Uncelenus, who had prevaricated away the Life of her Friend, ſhe procured him to have one of his Feet chopped off, and to be reduced to the condition of a Beggar. Wolfus, a Patritian, who had been a principal Agent in the Murther, ſhe alſo, by command of Theodorick cauſed to be killed, reſerving Theodobert to a more convenient ſeaſon. And the late defeat ſhe had received in the death of her Minion, did but incite her to other Acts for the Eſtabliſhment of her threatned and tottering Power. All this while Theodorick lived moſt unchriſtianly in Whoredom, having no lawfull Wife, but gratifying his Luſt by ſuch Imbracements as were moſt pleaſing to him, and by ſuch unlawfull Copulations had got four Sons. At length he bethought himſelf what infamy he incurred, and how uncertain the ſucceſſion might be for want of Legitimate Iſſue, he caſt his thoughts then on Hermenberga, the Daughter of Bertrick King of Spain, and ſent his Ambaſſadours to deſire her in Marriage, giving Oath that he would never deprive her of the Society of his Bed, nor of the Royal Dignity.

Which concludes in a Peace.

Theodorick Marries.

94. Upon this Condition Bertrick ſends her with a Portion ſuitable to her Quality, and Theodorick receives her with as much Love and Reſpect, as becomes a Royal Bridegroom. But his Grandmother was far from wiſhing them Joy, for though to bring her ſelf into a better Opinion with the People, ſhe might ſeem to have Conſented, nay propounded the Match, yet now ſhe found her ſelf in danger of a Rival, who by her Royal condition, the Beauty of her Perſon, and her conjugal Alurements might make her Husband totally her own, and exclude her from that Domination. Of which his Reverence to her Perſon, as a near (but neither ſo near, nor dear) Relation had poſſeſſed her. She goes to work, and by her Inchantments ſhe effects that, how much ſoever he deſired it, he could never enjoy his Bride; and this bringing him into ſome diſlike with her, ſhe follows him cloſe, cauſes him to diſcard her, for I wot not what Womaniſh impotency, and to ſend her back to her Father without her Portion. Bertrick finding himſelf concerned no otherwiſe, than as Nature and Reaſon required; proteſted to the World his Reſentment of ſo foul an Injury, and ſent to Clotair to complain of the affront, and invite him to joyn in a League with him for Chaſtiſing a Prince, who had no regard either to Conſcience or Decorum, and doubtleſs, would as little ſcruple to commit any other piece of Injuſtice againſt the reſt of his Neighbours, when he ſhould be tempted to it, by any thing that gratified his Luſt or Appetite. Clotair entred into the League, and promiſing him Aſſiſtence, ſent ſome of his own with his Ambaſſadour to the Court of Theodobert; who moved with the ſame Arguments entred into League, as alſo did Ago King of the Lombards, who when he had given his Faith, that he would joyn his Forces for depriving Theodorick both of Life and Kingdom; the Ambaſſadour, having diſpatched as he thought all effectually, for which he was ſent, returned by Sea into Spain. But Alliances of thi Nature made for Puniſhment of a fault, which redounds to the Detriment but of one of the Parties, and elſe carries onely ill Example with it, ſeldom take Effect; and Theodorick accordingly ſlighted this, as a Scar-crow, the King of Spain dying not long after.

Another difference betwixt them.

95. Yet had this League ſuch Effect upon Theodobert, as to incourage him to ripen ſome Deſigns he had in his Head, though thereby he extremely ſerved his Grandmother in the Machinations, ſhe laid for his own Deſtruction. Thinking himſelf ſecure of thoſe that would back him, he complained of a moſt unequal Diviſion of his Father's Dominions, and required that a New and more equal Partition might be made. The matter proceeded to that height, that had not ſome of the wiſeſt on both ſides moſt diligently interpoſed, all had been ſuddenly in a Flame; but they procured both Kings to hold their hands, and agree to come to an Interview at a place appointed, for a fair and Friendly deciding of the Controverſie. Theodorick came with ten thouſand Men, with pure and ſimple Intenſions, altogether free from Deſign and Treachery; but Theodobert brought with him a far greater number, wherewith having incompaſſed and caught his Brother as in a Net, he forced him to ſubmit to ſuch terms as he himſelf propounded: Theſe were to quit ſeveral Provinces, as that of Champaigne, Tours, Artois, and that which in the days of Aimoinus had the Name of Sugitenſis, and ſo they parted with ſeeming Love and Friendſhip, though covered by deep flattery and Diſſimulation. For Theodorick being got out of his Brother's hands, and coming ſeriouſly to ruminate upon what he had, was ſo inflamed with deſire of Revenge, that he renounced the Agreement as wreſted from him by force and Terrour, and ſet himſelf ſeriouſly how to Revenge the affront; Brunechild ever being at hand, and ſpurring him on to that, to which of his own Diſpoſition he was ſufficiently inclined. In the mean time, Theodobert by an Act full of wickedneſs, provoked the hatred of God and Man againſt him, and made way for that Deſtiny, which was but ſutable to his Actions.

96. He had to Wife one Bilechilde, a Woman indeed much inferiour to him in Birth and Quality, for his Grandmother, while ſhe reſided in his Court, bought her of certain Merchants, and for the rareneſs of her Beauty as ſhe made him believe, but indeed that ſhe might have none to controll her, this Woman by reaſon of the Obligation being wholly at her Devotion, married her to him. By her he had ſeveral Children, but falling in Love with another called Theudechilde, he Murthered her to be in a Capacity to marry his new Miſtreſs. But long he had not reaped the Pleaſures of this new Conjunction, when he was diverted by the noiſe of his Brother's Arms, and forced to exchange the Combats of Venus for thoſe of Mars. Their Couſin Clotair was ſo near a Neighbour, and of ſuch Power, that to which ſide ſoever he would pleaſe to incline, in all Probability he ſhould bring the Victory. Theodorick therefore, reſolving not to miſs the advantage thence offered, ſent to him, and by a promiſe of reſtoring to him the Dukedom of Deutelenus, which as he ſaid, Theodobert detained unjuſtly from him; he perſuaded him to ſtand Neuter. He muſtred then all his Subjects that were very fit to bear Arms, in the month of May, and the ſeventeenth year of his Reign, and from the Lingones coming through Vernona, to a place called Tullum, in the County adjoyning he met with his Brother, and they joyned Battel. Theodobert was beaten, but eſcaping with his Life, fled to Coloine upon the Rhine with intenſion to renew the War, and hopes of better Succeſs in the next Ingagement, for which he provided himſelf of freſh ſupply of Saxons, and other Nations of the upper Germany. Theodorick aware hereof, made what haſte he could after him, and diſdaining he ſhould prevent him from reaping the Fruits of his late Victory, fell upon him with all Fury imaginable. Yet he uſed ſuch diligence, as that he was not ill provided to receive him; and another Battel was fought with equal Valour and Animoſity. Our Authours report, that ſo great was the Croud through the Pertinacious reſolution of the Combatants, that ſuch Troopers as were killed ſate upon their Horſes, no otherwiſe than as Men alive, being kept up ſo as they could not fall. But Theodobert was ſo unfortunate as to looſe this day alſo, and fled again to Coloine, his Brother purſuing him with reſolution, that now he would not be hindred from finiſhing the War. Entring the Territories of the Ripuarii that lay upon the Rhine, he deſtroyed all things in his way, and refuſed to give over till they ſhould bring Theodobert to him, either alive or dead.

Wherein Theodobert is twice beaten by his Brother.

In Campania Tulenſi adverſus fratrem congreſſus. Aimoin. lib. 3. c. 97. Tullum hodie Toul oppidum eſt Leucorum Moſellæ appoſitum. Lingones ſunt hodie les Langrois qui ad Ortum determinantur Matrona fluvio & aſſidentibus ipſi Campanis Belgicis, tenuiore juxta Matronam ſemita prementibus Mediomatricis ſeu Lotarenis.

97. This perfidious People, thinking the Price not too great wherewith to purcaſe their Security, ſend ſome into Coloine to Theodobert. The Meſſengers make great Complaints of the Miſeries they had undergone by ſuch Devaſtations, Rapines and Murthers, as never had formerly been committed. They tell him a formal ſtory, that his Brother complained of the defrauding him of his ſhare of his Father's Treaſures, which if he might but receive, he would be Friends with him, and remand his Forces. Theodobert conſidering his preſent Eſtate and Condition, was glad he could come off ſo well, and giving them Credit carried them into his Treaſury, where he buſied himſelf in ſearching and Collecting ſuch things as he intended to Preſent the Conquerour, which as he was doing, and bowed down his Head, one of them drew his Sword and ſlew him. His Head was cut off, and ſhewed about upon the Walls, which done, Theodorick was received into the Town without any impediment, and in the Church of St. Gerion took the Oath of Allegiance of the Inhabitants. As he was doing this, he thought that ſome Body ſtruck him on his ſide, and knowing the treacherous Humour of the Ripuarii, commanded the Doors to be ſhut, and a ſtrict inquiry to be made after him that did it. But upon ſearch no ſuſpicious Perſon could be found, and his Clothes being removed, no Wound was there to be ſeen, onely a Purple ſpot appeared, as Aimoinus gueſſeth the ſign of his Death, which ſpeedily followed; with the Treaſures, and Children of his Brother he returned in Triumph to Metz, where his Grandmother Brunechild found him, and congratulated with him for his Victory. To make the Triumph complete, ſhe would have him put to Death his Priſoners. And ſhe prevailed for the Sons of Theodobert, whereof the youngeſt Meroneus by Name an Infant that ſucked, ſhe her ſelf took by the Heels, and daſhed out his Brains againſt a ſtone; but his Daughter eſcaped, for which ſhe was not to thank her Grandmother, but attribute her Life to the rare Beauty of her Perſon. And ſuch was the end of Theodobert according to the general Opinion; though ſome wrote, that after his defeat he retired beyond the Rhine, where he was apprehended by Bertarius the Chamberlain of Theodorick, who had ſent him to make the diſcovery, and confined to Cabillona. Here ſome add, that Brunechild cauſed him to be made a Monk, and that he was afterward put to Death.

Theodobert kill'd.

98. By Virtue of the late Agreement, Clotarius was now to ſtand poſſeſſed of the Dukedom of Deutelenus, and he accordingly got Poſſeſſion of it. But Theodorick having as he thought done his buſineſs, and elevated with his Succeſs, and the Acceſſion of his Kingdom of Auſtraſia, began to grudge not onely that he enjoyed that Dukedom, but indeed any thing elſe in Gall; and reſolving to pick a Quarrel with Mennaces, required him to quit what he had newly got into his hands. So great was his Ambition, that no moderate or ordinary Matter could divert him; but a certain Fire had of late begun to kindle in his Breaſt, which by indulging and continually Ventilating, within a little time grew to that ſtrength, as to conſume and obliterate Theodorick ſeizes on his Kingdom.

Sect. 3.

obliterate all other Paſſions. He fell grievouſly in Love with the beautifull Daughter of Theodobert, but was ſo honeſt withall, as to deſign the Satisfaction of his Deſires, no other way than by that of Marriage. Brunechild was wonderfully concerned at it, and ſenſible in what danger her domineering Authority ſtood, uſed all the Arts and Devices ſhe could to hinder it, and at laſt, as her utmoſt refuge declamed againſt it, as a moſt wicked and Inceſtuous Copulation of an Uncle with his Brother's Daughter. He grew to ſuch impatience upon hearing this, that calling her a Woman hatefull to God and all good Men, he demanded whether ſhe had not told him that Theodobert was not his Brother, and why ſhe had cauſed him to commit ſo great a Crime as that of Fratricide? And he was ſo far tranſported as to draw his Sword and make at her, but ſhe was ſaved by thoſe that ſtood by, and conveyed to ſome place out of the Houſe, where thinking it time to beſtir her ſelf, ſhe reſolved to kill rather than be killed. It's certain, that ſhortly after he died, being as was generally believed, taken with a Dyſentery. It was ſaid by ſome, and thought by moſt, that ſhe hired his Attendants to poiſon him in a Cup of Drink, when he came out of the Bath. Others reported, that he periſhed with Thunder; that Breaſt being pierced by Fire, which already burnt with Ambition, Luſt and Cruelty. He married Heronneberta the ninth Daughter of Berterius, or Terius King of the Viſio Goths, by whom he ſeems to have had no Children at leaſt that lived, but by Concubines he had four Sons, Sigebert, Chorbus, Childebert and Meroneus. He died in the eighteenth Year of his Reign, about the ſeventh Year of Heraclius the Emperour, A. D. 618.

Jonas Abbas in vita Sancti Columbani, c. 28.

Theodorick dies.

99. Brunechild now thought her Condition as ſecure as ever, not doubting but to Domineer as ſhe had done formerly, in the Minority of Theodorick his Children. Sigebert the eldeſt ſhe named King, but her Trade could not always hold, this was the third time ſhe had Uſurped the ſupreme Power. The Nobility could ill brook the Domination of theſe, whom all knew to be Baſtards, and they were quite tired out with her Cruelties and Inſolence. Two of the chiefeſt of them, Arnulph and Pipin, began now to hold Intelligence with Clotair, and they prevailed with him, to come as far as to Captoniacum. Brunechild hearing the News was ſufficiently alarmed, and lying then at Wormes, ſent to him to expoſtulate his Invaſion of the Dominions of King Sigebert. He anſwered, that he would doe nothing, but what the Nobility of the Franks aſſembled together ſhould approve, and promiſed to ſtand to their Determinations, for which purpoſe he willed her to call them together. She was too old and cunning to be lulled aſleep by fair Words, and therefore to provide againſt the worſt, ſhe ſent Sigebert into Thoringia, attended by Warnarius the Major of the Palace, and Alboinus moſt eminent for Nobility of all the Auſtraſians, to hire Souldiers from amongſt the Nations, inhabiting beyond the Rhine. But not long after their departure, ſhe imagined ſhe had reaſon to believe that Warnarius was ſecretly inclined toward Clotair, and out of Jealouſie ſent a Letter after them to Alboinus, wherein ſhe deſired him, to take ſome fitting opportunity to make him away. Alboinus having read the Letter, tore it in pieces, but did not ſo much deface it, but that one of his Servants out of Curioſity gathered the pieces together, and perceiving the Contents, therewith acquainted him, who was moſt concerned. Warnarius perceiving the danger he was in, was very carefull to ſecure his Perſon in the firſt place. Then reſolving to uſe his utmoſt endeavour for the Deſtruction of Brunechild and her Race; thoſe Nations he went to ſolicite about ſuccours, he quite alienated from the Service. After this, going with her and Sigebert into Burgundy, he held private Caballs with the Nobility and Prelates, into whom he ſufficiently inſtilled the Doctrine of Revolt. Then ſent he to Clotair, to come with an Army, promiſing on Condition to be maintained in his former Eſtate and Dignity, to deliver the two Kingdoms of the Auſtraſians and Burgundians into his hands.

Sigebert his Son King of Auſtraſia and Burgundy.

100. Clotair was not ſlack in his endeavours, to become ſole Lord and Maſter of Gall, and with his Neuſtraſians as Aimoinus calls them, met Sigebert and offered him Battel, in Champaigne near the River Axona, or Aiſne; where when the Armies faced each other, Warnarius according to former Agreement with the greateſt part of the Army revolted to him. The reſt ran away as far as the River Araris, (Clotair being not eager after the perſuit of thoſe he now looked on as his own Subjects) which putting a ſtop to their flight, three of Theodorick his Sons were there taken, viz. Sigebert, Chorbus and Meroneus, for the fourth Childebert by Name eſcaped, and was never after heard of: With them he returned to a Village called Sion, upon the River Vincenna, whither at the Inſtance of Warnarius and the other Great

In Campania Catalaunenſi ſuper fluvium Axonam.

Ad Ararim uſque fluvium (qui nunc Ragonna dicitur) per.

Sigebert is overthrown and killed by Clotair with Brunechild.

ones, Brunechild and Theudelina the Siſter of Theodorick were ſent for. In her ſight he commanded Sigebert and Chorbus to be killed, ſparing Meroneus, becauſe he was his Godſon; then Brunechild her ſelf being condemned by Sentence of the whole Army, as well Burgundians and Auſtraſians, as thoſe that came out of Neuſtria, was for three days together ſubjected to various Tortures, and then ſet upon a Camels back, and ſo carried in deriſion like a Witch up and down the Camp. At laſt, having ripped up her Life paſt, he laid to her Charge, that ſhe had procured the Death of no leſs than ten Kings, reckoning up her own Husband Sigebert, Meroneus the Brother of Clotair, and Son of Chilperick, with Chilperick himſelf, whom miſinformed it ſeems, as to the true ſtate of his Family, or willing to conceal the Vilanies of his own Mother, he affirmed to have periſhed by her Devices. Having ſummed up her Crimes, he demanded of the Souldiers, what Puniſhment was fit for her to undergoe. All cryed, that ſome one unheard-of was but ſuitable to her Deſerts: Whereupon he commanded a wild Horſe to be brought, to whoſe Tail the miſerable Woman was made faſt by her Hair and Armes, and then was the Horſe let looſe and provoked to take his Heels, wherewith having firſt daſhed out her Brains, he drew her Carkaſs over Thorns, Stones, Hills and Dales, till it was daſhed and all torn in pieces. Such pieces yet as could be found were gathered together, and buried in a Church at Auguſtodunum, or Autun of her own founding.

Brunechild's Buildings.

101. Such was the end of this wicked and miſerable Woman, not too ſevere, if we fully conſider the merits of her Life and Actions. Yet together with her prodigious Vices, were great Vertues joyned as ſome eſteem them, and theſe were Magnificence and Devotion, which appeared in the Religious reſpect ſhe gave to Saints, and the very many Churches ſhe built, and dedicated to their Memory. Aimoinus tells us, that the Fabricks which ſhe raiſed and remained till his time were ſo numerous, that it ſeemed incredible, that one Woman ſhould build ſo many, not onely in Auſtraſia and Burgundy where ſhe Reigned, but in ſo many ſeveral parts of France at great diſtances. In our days theſe poſſibly may be decayed, yet in the Low Countries there ſtill remain ſome Monuments of her Manly Spirit. Theſe were the Military High-ways of the Romans, which through Gallia Belgica and Burgundy ſhe cauſed to be repaired, being by the Gallo Belgæ ſtill after her called Chauſſeos de Brunehault, by the Flandro Beligæ, Groote Caſſie (in Engliſh Great Cawſeys) and by the Modern Franks Chemins ferrez in their ſeveral Dialects. Now the Reader may take notice, that theſe Roman Cawſies, or High-ways, were firſt in Gall begun, to be made by Agrippa the Son-in-Law of the Emperour Auguſtus, who cauſed four to be raiſed and paved, one from Lugdunum Seguſianorum (Lyon ſur Saone) leading toward Spain, through Aquaitain; another toward the Rhine; a third through the Countries of the Bellonaci, and Ambiani to the Ocean, and a fourth through Gallia Narbonenſis, extending it ſelf towards Italy. Afterward other Emperours, and Roman Captains applied their minds, and the Hands of their idle Legions to this work, and through Gallia Belgica, cauſed other High-ſtreets to be raiſed; being either paved with four-ſquare Stones, or ſtrewed with Gravel or ſmall Flints. Of theſe ways, the remainders of ſeveral are to be ſeen in many places throughout Hainault, Artois, Flanders, Brabant, Loraine, Champaigne, Picardy, in the Countries belonging to Luxenbourg, Leige, Cleeve, Juliers, Coloine, Triers, Mentz and others, the ſtructure whereof ſtrike all lookers on with Admiration. From Banacum (now Mons ex Hainault) the Rome of Belgium, where in the middle of the Forum was erected a Column, as anciently in that and other Cities, at the beginning or end of Miles, eight of theſe ſeveral Cawſeys took their beginning or Centre. But theſe and the reſt being by length of time decayed, and by the Irruption of Barbarians into Gall neglected, did Brunechild the Queen Regent of Auſtraſia and Burgundy, repair as we ſaid before, whereby her Memory, however her Body was uſed, remains whole and entire, they being by Learned men in the Latin Tongue ſtill called viæ Brunechildicæ, and by the Burgundians and others, Chauſees de Brunehault.

De viis iſtis Militaribus Banacenſibus conſule Aubertum Miræum in Chron Belgico ad A. 613. de reliquis verò per Arteſiam, Flandriam aliáſque Provincias Vicinas ducentibus Typum Galliæ Belgicæ veteris, Antuerpiæ, An. 1633. Cura ejuſdem Miræi æri inciſum.

102. But ſo fell the Family of Sigebert with Brunechild his Wife, and Auſtraſia with Burgundy were united to the Dominions of Clotair. Here we find our ſelves obliged for the better underſtanding of the Reader, to tell him what we particularly mean by the ſo often repeated Word of Auſtraſia. He muſt know then, that the Victorious Franks having wreſted a great part of Gall out of the hands of the Romans, divided it into Auſtraſia and Neuſtria. Auſtraſia (by St. Remigius in his Teſtament called Auſtria) reached from the Borders of Burgundy, as far as the Friſian Sea incloſed by the Rivers Rhine, Meuſe and Schelde.

Auſtraſia what.

Sect. 3.

A Catalogue of the Kings of Auſtraſia.

Clotair ſole Monarch of the Franks.

Therefore it comprized the ſeveral Countries of the Mediomatrices, Treveri and Ubii, thoſe about Mentz, Cleeve, Gelderland, Brabant, Hainault, Holland, Zealand, Haſburg, the Eburones and Tungri, the Dukedoms of Lauenbourg and Luxembourg, with Alſatia, Loraine, the Palatinate of the Rhine, Burgundy and Ardenne; the Metropolis being the City of the Mediomatrices, afterward called Metz. Now Neuſtria, or Weſtraſia being the Weſtern Kingdom of the Franks in Gall, as the other the Eaſtern, comprized Flanders, Artois, Picardy, the County of Boloigne, Normandy, and all other Countries lying betwixt the Schelde, the Seine, and the Loiere, the Metropolis being Paris; ſo that they mightily err, who would reſtrain this ample Kingdom within the narrow bounds of ſingle Normandy. But of Auſtraſia, the firſt King as we have formerly ſeen was Theodorick the natural Son of Clodonæus the Great, to whom ſucceeded his Son Theodobert, as to him Theodebald his Son. Theodebald dying without iſſue, Clotair, the Legitimate Son of Meroneus, held Auſtraſia with his other Kingdoms. Afterwards a Partition of his Dominions being made amongſt Clotair his Children, it fell to Sigebert, who by Brunechild had Childebert, and left him his Succeſſour. He left two Sons Theodobert and Theodorick, whereof the later outed the former; but leaving no Legitimate iſſue, Sigebert his natural Son was, as we ſee, deprived both of Life and Kingdom by Clotair the ſecond, the Son of Chilperick, who hereby obtained the Monarchy of the Franks. Afterward Auſtraſia had other Kings, as in due place may be diſcovered; and then as time altereth all things, this Kingdom exchanged the Name of Auſtraſia, for that of Lotharingia or Loraine, which it received from Lotharius the Son of the Emperour Lotharius the firſt, whom it had for King, as after him many others in Order, and at length exchanged Kings for Dukes, the Title of whom, though not the extent of the Dominion, at this day continueth.

Aimoinus, lib. 4. c. 1.

Settles his Kingdom.

Ultrajurani qui Ultra guram habitabant. Jura autem ſive Juraſſus Mons eſt Sequanorum vetere Celtico vocabulo ab Indigenis quondam vocatus eſt Jou quo Mons exprimitur ac nominatim Mons Sylvaſus quo eodem nomine Montanæ Sylvæ appellantur. Celſo jugo ab ripa Rhodani, lacu Lemano ad Genevam egreſſi, Sequanos inter & Helvetios verſus Boream obliquè porrigitur ad fines Mediomatricorum; contra occaſum verò in varia promontoria tributus Sequanorum oppida & agros frequentibus clivis & Vallibus diſtinguit. Hodie Mont jou, Mont gura Accolis.

103. So many Kings of the Franks, who had Reigned for the ſpace of about fifty Years, periſhing in ſeveral manners; Clotair now remained the ſole and Legitimate Inheritour of all their Kingdoms and Dominions. Having got ſo great a Charge, and ſo heavy a Burthen upon his Head (ſo good Kings really eſteem their Crowns) he provided himſelf of the beſt Supporters he could find, and firſt having had good experience of the Abilities of Warnarius by his Conduct of the late great Revolution, which he had effected without any conſiderable expence of Bloud, Treaſure or Time, he made him Major Domus, or Governour of Burgundy for Life, ingaging by Oath that he would never remove him. Over Auſtraſia he ſet Rado, a Perſon of great Deſert, and one Erpo over the Ultrajurani, who by his Love of Juſtice became inſupportable to the Rabble, and was killed through the Inſtigation of Aletheus a Patritian, and Leudemund the Biſhop of Sedunum (or rather Segodunum, at this day Rhodes.) The King happening at this time to lye not far off, cauſed a ſtrict Inquiſition to be made of the Murther, and puniſhed many that were found Guilty, and the proceſs went ſo far that Aletheus apprehending that now all muſt be diſcovered, adviſed Leudemund to try if he could prevent it by a Trick wrought upon Berthtrude the Queen. The Biſhop tells her a Tale of a Revelation he had, that Clotair muſt infallably dye this Year; he would make her believe, that her Affairs ſtood in a dangerous Condition, and that there was no way to provide ſufficiently for her ſelf, but by retiring with her Treaſures to ſome ſtrong Town, and chuſing ſome Perſon eminent for Nobility, and Intereſt in the People wherewith to marry; and to make Application of his Ghoſtly diſcourſe, he tells her, Sedunum his City was the fitteſt place, and Aletheus that Noble Burgundian, the moſt proper Perſon. The Queen, who was eminent for her Modeſty and other Vertues, heard him with great Indignation, and ſtarting from him as ſome dangerous infecting Perſon diſcovered the whole Matter to her Husband, who ſpared the Biſhop out of Reſpect to his calling, and at the Interceſſion of a certain Abbat, permitting him to return to his See. But Aletheus he Commanded to be tryed by the Nobility, and being able to ſay little for himſelf to be put to Death.

104. Thus by the fidelity of his Wife, and his ſeaſonable ſeverity, he evaded the danger, and eſtabliſhed his Power; but through the corruption of thoſe about him, and his own remiſſneſs, ſhortly after committed an errour, which tended to the diminution both of the greatneſs of his Name and Nation. The Lombards having formerly made Incurſions into Gall, were ſo received by the Kings of the Franks, that they not onely drove them back, but followed them into Italy, and conſtrained them to purchaſe Peace, by parting with ſeveral of their own Towns, and a yearly payment of twelve thouſand Solidi. This Tribute had been duely paid in the Reigns of Guntram, and Childebert, and downward, till the time of Agi- lulſ, the King of the Lombards, who feeling the burthen heavy, and not conceiving himſelf in a capacity to be eaſed by Steel, reſolved to try what he could effect with Gold and good Language. Having picked out ſome fit Men for the Errand, he ſent them to the Court of Clotair, where having ſtopped the Mouths of his principal Miniſters, they had the better opportunity to open their own, and cunningly effected what they were ſent for. They much inſiſted upon this plauſible Argument, That the Friendſhip of any People is better founded upon Love and Goodwill, than Force and Servitude: That the Lombards quit of this ingratefull duty, would exchange it for others more generous and ſincere of Gratitude and Fidelity. In concluſion, by their pleaſing Language and Deportment, and paying down 3600 Solidi, (beſides 3000 wherewith they had bribed three of the principal Miniſters,) they ſtruck up the Bargain, and bought off the perpetual Tribute at three years purchaſe.

Releaſes the Tribute that was formerly paid by the Lombards.

Makes Dagobert his Son King of Auſtraſia.

105. Herewith Clotair of what conſequence ſoever it was, reſted ſatisfied, but ſhortly after, in the ſix and thirtieth Year of his Reign, he was overwhelmed with grief at the death of his Queen, who for her excellent Vertues and Endowments, left a great miſs of her amongſt the People. To make up this loſs, aſſoon as ſorrow would give leave, he married another Wife called Sichild, by whom he had a Son called Hairbert; and conſidering what Jealouſies and Enmities are wont to ariſe in Families where Step-mothers have opportunity to ſhew their biaſſed Inclinations, he thought fit to ſend away Dagobert, whom he had by his former Wife, and made him King of Auſtraſia, delivering all the Countries formerly ſubject to that Crown into his Hand, except Ardenna and Voſagus, lying toward Neuſtria and Burgundy, which he thought fit to keep to himſelf. Having given him a Kingdom, in the next place he provided him a Wife, and ſuch an one as by the Alliance was likely to preſerve Unity, and a good Underſtanding in their Family. Sending for him to Clippiacum, a place near Paris, he married to him Gomadinde, the Siſter of Sichild his Wife, and two days together they kept the Wedding with all Joy and Magnificence ſuitable to ſuch an occaſion. But the third day the Bridegroom fell into a diſcontent, not that he was now tied and bound by the Bonds of Matrimony, but ſtraitned and confined within the limits of too narrow a Kingdom. He complained that he was not rightly called King of Auſtraſia, whereof the beſt and principal Parts were withheld from him, though, if his Judgment did not flatter him, he was now of Age and Abilities ſufficient to take the Government of the whole.

Ardenna Sylva, Voſagus Mons.

And of all the reſt, except Provence.

106. Such were the complaints of the Son, but the Father thought he had no reaſon to make them, who had no right to any thing, nor could claim one foot of ground as his due, but had received all from his mere bounty. The Conteſt grew high, and the difference ſeemed to threaten the Franks with miſchief, of which being aware, they interpoſed, and the matter being committed to twelve of the Nobility, they perſuade the Father for Peace and Quietneſs ſake, to yield to the youthfull heat and ambition of his own Son, (whoſe all muſt be at laſt,) and ſo they were throughly reconciled, the whole Kingdom being delivered into Dagobert's Hands, except that Region called Provence, and thoſe places that lay on this ſide the Loire. The following Year Warnarius the Governour of Burgundy died, who was hardly cold in his Grave, when Godinus his Son married the Widow his Step-mother. This coming to the knowledge of Clotair, he commands him as an Inceſtuous Perſon to be put to death, but the noiſe of the Sentence anticipating much the Execution, he flies to Dagobert, and eaſily obtains of him to intercede for his Life, which at length was granted, in conſideration of the great and eminent Services of his Father. His Life he was content to purchaſe with a Divorce, but ſhe was not therewith ſatisfied, but as if it more behoved him to gratifie her ſenſual Appetite, than to deſire Life it ſelf, fell into an implacable Paſſion and Hatred, which ſo far tranſported her, as to accuſe him of deſigns againſt the King's Life. The King being in this point credulous enough, commanded him to make Oath, he had no ſuch Intention, which, at the importunity of Chranulph and Wandalbert, he did, both in the Church of St. Medard at Soiſſons, and St. Vincent at Paris; yet this would not ſatisfie, they would compell him to reiterate it at Orleance, in the Church of St. Anian, and at Tours in that of St. Martin, whither as he travelled to doe it, thoſe fawning Courtiers, the King conniving at it, ſet upon him as he ſate at Meat with ſeveral Friends, and, notwithſtanding their oppoſition, cruelly murthered him.

Provincia Phocenſi, ut quidam interpretatur.

107. Clotair being exaſperated by this imaginary Conſpiracy, or his hand being now in, reſolved to be very ſevere. This ſame Year he baniſhed one Palladius, with Sedocus his Son, the Biſhop of Tolouſe, as being privy to the Rebellion of the Vaſcons, and having laid to the charge of one Boſo, an Inhabitant of Stampa, that he had debauched Sichild his Queen, cauſed him to be put to death. Aſſembling the Eſtates of Burgundy together, for the Election of a new Major of the Palace, into the place of Warnarius, they declared, that they deſired to be governed by none but God and himſelf, which he took kindly, and would not impoſe any new Governour upon them. In the mean time Dagobert highly concerned himſelf about the Saxons, who deſpiſing his Youth, diſdained to be ſubject to him. He diſdained as much to bear the affront, and getting an Army ready, paſſed the Rhine, and ingaged in battel with Bertoald their Captain. Here he was ſo hard put to it, that fighting manſully in his own Perſon, he received a wound in his Head, from which a piece of his Helmet was cut, with part of the Skin, Hair and all, which, having retreated to his Camp, he ſent with the Skin, bloudy as it was, unto his Father, deſiring him to make all the haſte he poſſibly could to his relief. Clotair then was making a more gentle ſort of War with wild Beaſts, but the ſight of the Preſent ſent him by his Son quickly diverted him to a ſerious Hoſtility, and he rather flew than went to his ſuccour, not giving himſelf reſt, day nor night, till he reached the place. His preſence filled the Franks with exceſſive Joy, of which they were not wanting to give ample demonſtrations, and the noiſe eaſily reached the Ears of the Saxons, the two Camps being but parted by the River Viſcere. Bertoald was unwilling to believe (at leaſt that his Souldiers ſhould) that Clotair was ſo near them, and gave out that the Enemy did but dream, foraſmuch as he had certain Intelligence, that the old King was dead. Hereupon he ſhews himſelf upon the Bank of the River, uncovering his Head, that his reverend grey Hairs, known to all, might convince them of his preſence, but kept ſilence, to ſtrike them with the greater apprehenſion of his Deſign.

The Saxons rebell.

108. Bertoald, to make amends for his miſtake or fraud, fell into opprobrious Language, uſing this Expreſſion, Art thou there, dumb Beaſt? Wherewith Clotair inflamed, takes the water, and over he will paſs, to be revenged, which his Men ſeeing, ſwim after him, and to ſhore he gets ſafe and ſound, and ſets upon his Enemy. Bertoald, not able to ſuſtain the violence of their Fury, takes his heels, and Clotair, though burthened with his Armour, and with his Boots, which were full of water, follows after ſo faſt as almoſt to come up with him. Bertoald ſeeing the danger he is in, now expoſtulates, then chides downright, and ſtill profeſſes himſelf his ſlave and vaſſal. But Clotair not giving heed to his hypocritical Expreſſions, which he knew a mere ſenſe of neceſſity wreſted from him, ſtill preſſed forwards, and getting ground, at length came up with him, and ſlew him, being the ſecond Frank, if a modern Authour rightly obſerveth, who obtained the opima Spolia. Having cut off his Head, he returned back to his Son, and the reſt of the Franks, whom he found all in ſorrow and lamentation, becauſe they could not keep pace with him, and had given him over for a loſt Man. The Franks at the ſight of him reaſſuming their courage, and under his Conduct invaded the Saxons, where waſting the Countrey, all Males they put to death, which exceeded the length of Clotarius his Sword. This Exploit and his Retreat he not long ſurvived, dying A. D. 631. in the four and fortieth Year of his Reign, and the fifteenth of his Monarchy over the Franks, and was buried in the Suburbs of Paris in the Church of St. Vincent, now St. Germans, where as yet his Tomb (by whom, and at what time ſoever built) is yet to be ſeen on the South ſide, overagainſt that of his Father Chilperick, Bertrude his Wife being buried a little higher. He had two Wives, as we have ſaid, viz. this Bertrude, or Berotride, by Fortunatus, in his Epithalamium, called Richilde, a Saxon, and of the Family of Athanachild, King of the Viſigoths, who makes mention alſo of Clotair, her Husband; this diverſity of Names, as Tily obſerves, flowing from diverſity of Speech, as he inſtanceth in particulars of the French, and we might as eaſily of our own Language. By this Lady he had his Son Dagobert, and a Daughter named Biltilde, married to Aribert, a Duke of Auſtria. His ſecond Wife was Sichild, and by her he had Aribert, Haribert or Charibert, another Son. As for Meroneus, who was taken or killed at the Battel near Stampæ, he ſeems to have been baſe born.

But are ſubdued by Clotair.

Who dies.

Tune hic muta aderas Beſtia? Sic Aimoinus, lib. 4. c. 18. Alii hoc modo O vetulum & Canum Jumentum adésne hic? Lingua ſcilicet Vernacula, unde liquet Francorum & Saxonum idioma inter ſe affine fuiſſe. Convitii formula & ratio apud Danos adhuc obtinet, qui vulgò ſuâ linguâ hominem ſenem probroſè volentes excipere, Thet Gammel Oegh, id eſt, hoc vetulum Jumentum ſolent dicere.

109. Dagobert having notice of his Father's death, ſent with all ſpeed certain ſelect Perſons to the Nobility of Neuſtria and Burgundy, to ſecure his Intereſt. They without much heſitancy cloſed with him, as the rightfull Heir, and received him at Reims with great concourſe and ſolemnity, Aribert, his younger Brother, and for him Brunulf, his Uncle by the Mother's ſide, in vain contending for the Inheritance. The Eſtates thought Aribert far inferiour to Dagobert in parts, and for that reaſon, as well as others, declined his Intereſt. Dagobert having ſettled his matters, Dagobert ſucceeds him.

Sect. 3.

And makes his Brother Aribert King of Aquitain.

matters, took occaſion to be revenged upon Brunulf, but was ſo good natured, as by the Advice of the Nobility, to give his Brother a good ſhare out of his Dominions, viz. all the Countries lying betwixt the River Loire, toward Waſconia, as far as the Pyrenæan Mountains, covenanting with him by writing, that content with this Portion, neither he, nor any of his, ſhould ever lay claim to any other Part of their Father's Kingdom. Arilert having taken Poſſeſſion, choſe Tolouſe for his Seat, and buckling himſelf to his buſineſs, ſhortly made it appear he was not the Man for which the Nobility had taken him. He proved exceedingly induſtrious, and ſharp witted, and in the third Year of his Reign increaſed his Dominions, by the Conqueſt of all Waſconia. Dagobert reſerving for himſelf the intire Kingdoms of Auſtraſia, Burgundy and Neuſtria, and uſing the Counſel and Direction of his Tutour, Arnulf the Biſhop of Metz, with other ſober and judicious Perſons, ordered his matters at firſt with great Prudence, Juſtice and Moderation. Into Burgundy, not long after his Father's death, he made a Progreſs, where he got great Fame by his impartial acting betwixt all Parties. But after his return to Paris, entertaining new Favourites, and giving ear to the Whiſpers and Inſinuations of the Paraſites about him, he began to enter into a contrary courſe, whereat the good Biſhop diſcontented, and not able to obliterate the Impreſſions which, ſuiting his Appetite, the Courtiers had made upon him, with grief departed home to his See. Pretending that Gomatrude his Wife was barren, he married another by their Advice, Nantilde by Name, whom he took by force out of a Monaſtery. But this being as barren, it ſeems, as the other, or her Fruit miſcarrying, he married a third, called Raguetrude, by which he had a Son by the years end. The Child was offered to the Font by Aribert, the King of Aquitain, ſo was he ſtyled, and being baptized at Orleance, by the Name of Sigebert, when none would ſay Amen to the Prayers of the Biſhop that officiated, he himſelf is ſaid to have opened his Mouth and have done it, though he was not above thirty days old.

110. After this our Authours complain, that Dagobert forgetting all the good Leſſons his Tutour had taught him, turned an open Robber of Perſons and Places, both ſacred and civil. Under pretence of giving to that of St. Denis, which he founded, he took away from other Churches, and his Luſt, by gratifying it, grew ſo extravagant, that beſides his three Wives which he maintained, both in the Title and Port of Queens, he kept a great number of Concubines. Theſe Vices of his were but rather ſtrengthened and increaſed by Proſperity and good Fortune. In the ninth year of his Reign, his Brother Aribert, the King of Aquitain, dies, who having a young Son, called Chilperick, he ſtaid not long behind, but, in the Opinion of Men, was ſooner ſent after him by his Uncle's Procurement than Nature had intended, which done he diſpatched an Officer to ſeize upon his Kingdom and Treaſures. His Coffers being now full, what with the Rapines he had made, and what by the Death of his Nephew, he took an occaſion ſoon after to empty them, and firſt by the War he made with the Sclavi. Theſe were a People inhabiting that Part of Pannonia, formerly called Pannonia Valeria, and Interamnia, now appertaining to Hungary, lying betwixt the two Rivers Dravus and Savus. The Roman Empire going to decay, firſt the Goths pierced into this Countrey, and quitting it upon better hopes, theſe Sclavi, a Hunniſh Nation, barbarous and fierce, whoſe Dominions extended as far as Odeſa, and were ſeparated from the Saxons onely by the River Albis, as wrote Helmoldus, though others ſay, formerly ſeated upon the Lake of Mæotis, invaded and made it their Habitation. Sclave, it's ſaid, ſignifieth in their ancient Language Glory, or Glorious, but afterward an accident happened, which might well cauſe it to be taken and uſed in a quite contrary ſenſe, and to denote a Man ſubjected to the higheſt degree of Servitude. For theſe Sclavi, or Vindi, * Vinidi, or Vinduli, (for ſo alſo they were called, and from them the place, as ſome think, which at this day retaineth the Name of Vindiſchland,) after their fixing in this Countrey, were conquered by the Hunnes properly ſo called, and oppreſſed in no ſmall degree of miſery, but with ſuch ſort of bondage as fully anſwers to the word of Slavery. Firſt, they ſerved them as Auxiliaries, then as Tributaries and Stipendiaries, and at laſt as the vileſt Slaves indeed, or Bondmen; in Summer in the Field, in Winter in their own Houſes, where not onely they lived upon the ſpoil, and took what they had, but abuſed their Beds, lying with their Wives and Daughters at their pleaſure.

Aribert and his Son dying, Dagobert adds their Dominions to his.

Then he makes War upon the Sclavi.

Dravus Δρᾶβος Straboni Δάρος, Ptolemæo Draus, Plinio vulgò Dra, teſte Lazio, Pannoniæ fluvius quem Danubius excipit.
Savus Plinio & Straboni Σάος, ſed Ptolemæo Σάυος & Σαύιος, Pannoniæ flumen, in Danubium etiam ſe exonerans, hodie Saw. Strabo ſcribit Savum in Dravum influere, ſed errat.

* Aut cum duplici V Winidi ut apud Aimoinum, lib. 4. c. 23.

111. An Offſpring in this manner begotten of ſlaviſh Women, but by lording and domineering Hunnes, the bloud of their Fathers, it ſeems, being predominant, and boiling in their Veins, ſcorned, if not the Name, yet the modern ſignification of Sclaves, and being come to ripeneſs of Age ſtrenuouſly aſſerted the Liberty of themſelves, and the Nation, on which they were ingrafted, maintaining a long and tedious War. While this was hotly managed on both ſides, it happened that one Samo, a Frank, or Gall by birth, of the Senones, being a Merchant, and following his buſineſs in thoſe parts, was importuned by theſe Sclavi to put himſelf into the Army. Being prevailed with, he behaved himſelf with that Valour and Conduct, that thinking none ſo fit to rule as the moſt valiant, who could keep as well as get, they choſe him for their King. And he carried himſelf ſo as they had no reaſon to repent them of their choice, being beloved at home, and terrible abroad. He eſpouſed with the Title and Dignity their whole Intereſt, not ſticking at Religion it ſelf, which he exchanged for Paganiſm, after the manner of the Nation, marrying twelve Wives, and he ſo far forgot all reſpect for his native Countrey, and his firſt trade of Life, that ſuch French Merchants as came into Sclavonia to traffick, he ſpoiled of their Wealth, and cauſed ſuch as made reſiſtence, and appealed to the Law of Nations, to be put to death. Dagobert herewith much offended, ſent one Sicharius as his Ambaſſadour, to demand reſtitution of the Goods, and ſatisfaction to Juſtice, for violence offered to his Subjects. Of Samo he demands audience, but can have none, till he puts himſelf into the Habit of the Countrey, and ſo in a diſguiſe gets into his Preſence, where diſcovering himſelf, he complains of the Injury, and demanding ſatisfaction, flies into reproachfull Language, telling them, they were the Subjects of Dagobert, not onely the Tributaries, but the Bondmen or very Slaves of his Maſter.

Samo, a Gall, choſen King of the Sclavi.

Senones, hodie Senonois, quorum fines quondam ita laxi fuere, ut in circumjectis Tricaſſium, Æduorum Biturigum, Carnutum agris, multa oppida, ipſas verò Medas univerſos obtinerent.

112. Samo, with more temper, replied, that he was ready to comply with the King of the Franks in all things, not becauſe the Nation was at all obnoxious to him, as Vaſſals, but by virtue of their ancient Friendſhip and Alliance. The Ambaſſadour indiſcreetly anſwered, there could be no Alliance nor Communion betwixt Chriſtians and Dogs. Be it ſo, ſaid the other, you are the Servants of Chriſt, and we are Dogs, but remember, that Dogs do often revenge upon Servants what they have ſaucily and naughtily committed againſt their Maſter; and therewith he commanded the Ambaſſadour to be hurried from his preſence, and out of his Dominions. Dagobert with the report hereof was ſo exaſperated, that he reſolved to raiſe a mighty Army, and ſubdue this malapert Nation. The Lombards and Alemans alſo under Conduct of Rotbert, he procured to join with him, who demeaned themſelves with that courage, that they eaſily overthrew the Sclavi, and returned home, inriched with booty, and many Captives. The Auſtraſians being now left to themſelves, beſieged a Fort, called Vogaſtrum, to which many of the moſt valiant of the Enemy had fled for their ſecurity. But they managed the Siege with remiſsneſs, that thoſe within acted by neceſſity, and deſperation made ſo effectual a Sally, that having killed many of them, the reſt moſt ſhamefully ran away, leaving their Camp, Baggage and Proviſions, a ſeaſonable Prey, to the almoſt ſtarved Enemy. The Sclavi incouraged by ſo unexpected good fortune, purſued their Victory, and invading Thoringia, and other Parts of Germany, ſubject to the Franks made ſuch deſtruction of all places, and ſtruck ſuch terrour into all round about, that Dervanus, who commanded certain Cities of the Sclavi, that were in the Dominion of Dagobert, out of deſperation, revolted to them; there being ſmall hopes of any effectual ſuccour to be had from the King, who was now altogether enervated by his Luxurious practices.

113. Luxury is accompanied often with Cruelty, though ſeldom with true and ſubſtantial Valour. At this time there happened a contention betwixt the Bulgari (a People which from the Banks of the River Volga, had paſſed into the inferiour Mœſia, and there ſeated themſelves) and their Neighbours the Avares, or Hunnes, with whom they had joined and embodied themſelves, out of which Nation their King ſhould be choſen. To blows it came, and the Victory remained with the Hunnes, who dealing now with the Bulgari, as with abſolute Enemies, many of them fled their Countrey, and humbly beſought Dagobert to beſtow on them ſome place to inhabite. He ordered them into Baioaria (or Bavaria) there to winter, till he might conſult where to beſtow them, and they were accordingly diſperſed in the ſeveral Houſes of the Inhabitants, whom at laſt, by advice of thoſe about him, for fear, as was pretended, that they ſhould attempt ſome dangerous matters, he commanded to kill them, every Houſholder, his Gueſt, with his Wife and Children. This was done according to his command, all their Throats being cut in one and the ſame night, as they innocently ſlept, onely ſome ſeven hundred eſcaped, and by one Alticeus were brought unto the Sclavi. About this time Siſebodus the the King of Spain died, and was ſucceeded by Sentila, who by his cruelty and other vices, quickly alienated the minds of his Subjects from him. Amongſt them Siſenendus a Nobleman, more unwilling to bear his Inſolency than the reſt, came to Dagobert, and deſired his Aſſiſtence for expelling Sentila out of Spain. He was willing enough to doe miſchief to whomſoever, and appointed the whole Force of Burgundy to attend him, which being noiſed abroad in Spain, all forſook Sentila, being already offended at his Carriage, and aſſoon as Siſenendus arrived made choice of him for their King. Abundantius then and Venerandus, the Leaders of the Franks, having brought him as far as Cæſar-Auguſta, where he received the Homage of the Nobility, returned home with good rewards. But Dagobert was not therewith ſatiſfied, for Siſenendus had promiſed, in caſe the Deſign took, to give him a great veſſel of Gold of five hundred pound weight, adorned with Gems and pretious Stones, which formerly had been preſented to Toriſmund, King of the Goths, by Ætius, the Patritian of the Romans. Dagobert therefore ſends back Venerandus, with Amalgarius, to demand a performance of the condition. Siſenendus very willingly delivered the Veſſel into their hands, but in the way, the Goths having had notice of it, took it from them by force, not enduring that their Nation ſhould be deprived of ſuch a Monument. Therefore did Siſenendus, in ſatisfaction of the loſs, pay afterward to Dagobert two hundred thouſand Solidi in Silver, which he beſtowed in building and beautifying the Church of St. Denis, a work which put him to very great Expence.

A Maſſacre.

Dagobert ſends an Army into Spain.

114. Hitherto, with the Affront received from the Sclavi, Dagobert ſlept ſupinely; but at length awaking, and coming to himſelf, it roſe upon his Stomach, and he could not poſſibly digeſt the Injury. In the tenth Year of his Reign he raiſed a choice Army, and himſelf, in Perſon, reſolved to lead it. Having paſſed through Arduenna, the Foreſt, as far as Moguntia, or Mentz, and being now ready to paſs the Rhine, the Saxons, though Tributaries, and in perfect Peace with him, yet fearing the Approach of ſo great a force, came and offered their ſervice for the chaſtiſement of the malapert Sclavi, profeſſing themſelves ever to be at his Devotion, and without an expectation of Reward, onely they deſired that he would remit the yearly Tribute they paid, of five hundred Cowes, called Vaccæ Inferendales, which Petition he granted, by advice of his Counſellours, on this condition, that they ſhould, for the time to come, faithfully protect theſe Borders of his Dominions. Oath hereof was made (as they were wont to ſwear) upon their Arms, but was never confirmed by any Act, though they got free of the Tribute, and nothing came of this expedition. The Sclavi therefore finding they had been more ſcared than hurt, the following year renewed their Incurſions into Thoringia, which put Dagobert upon new Counſels, finding that thoſe former, relating to the Saxons, had not ſucceeded. By the Advice of his Counſellours, he ſet over the Auſtraſians his Son Sigebert, in Name as King, but in Effect Governour, by direction and management of his two Tutours, or Guardians, Chimibert, the Prelate of Campania, or Rheims, and Adalgiſus, the Major of the Palace. He aſſigned them a ſufficient Revenue, and other things, all which he cauſed to be inſcribed into his Teſtament, and ſealed. Thenceforth, ſo long as Sigebert lived, by the Prudence and Induſtry of the Auſtraſians, all Irruptions of the Winidi were reſtrained.

Collegit lectam è Franciæ bellatoribus Scaram, quam nos turmam vel Cuneum appellare poſſumus. Aimoinus, lib. 4. c. 26.

Scara Teutonica vox, quamvis moderni Franci eâ utuntur ut Fauchetus in Carolo magno: il commanda aux plus habilles Scares Francoiſes enclorre par derriere les Italiens, &c.

Quæ ideo, inquit Aimoinus, inferendales dicebantur: eò quòd ſingulis annis inferrentur. Ibid.

Et quæcunq; conceſſit teſtamento cuncta inſeri ac ſigilli impreſſione ſignari mandavit deinceps, &c. Ibid.

Sigebert his Son made Governour of Auſtraſia, by which means the Incurſions of the Sclavi are reſtrained.

115. In the twelfth Year of Dagobert his Reign, he had another Son born by Nautilde, his beloved Wife, called Clodonæus, or Hludonicus, betwixt whom and Sigebert, his elder Son, by advice of his Nobles, he deſigned an equal Diviſion of his Dominions. Sigebert he left, as now he found him, King of Auſtria, and therefore to Clodonæus the younger, he aſſigned Neuſtria and Burgundy, together with the Dukedom of Deutelenus, which hitherto had been unjuſtly, as was accounted, poſſeſſed by the Auſtraſians, who, though ſorely againſt their Wills, yet for fear of Dagobert, confirmed the perpetual annexion of it unto Neuſtria. In the Year that followed, News was brought that the Vaſcons rebelled, who having been found guilty of the ſame Crime by his Brother Aribert, and forced to ſubmit to the yoke, had, after his death, deſpiſed Dagobert's Orders, and infeſted all the Countries adjoyning, with Murthers and Rapine, till Sadrageſilus being made Governour of Aquitain, reſtrained their Incurſions, and cauſed them to keep at home. But he (whether by the knowledge of Dagobert, we know not, who formerly bore him Malice) was privily murthered, and his Sons being idle, or worſe, and not proſecuting with Arms thoſe that were guilty, were in a publick Aſſembly of the Franks, as Aimoinus tells us, according to the Roman Laws, deprived of all his Eſtate, which the King then conferred on the Church of St. Denis. He being made away, away, the Vaſcons thought they might renew their former Trade of Life, but Dagobert, as looſely as he had lately lived, would not ſuffer the Affront to paſs uncontrolled, but gathered a great Army out of Burgundy, which he committed to the conduct of no fewer than twelve ſeveral Captains. They ingage in Battel with the Vaſcons, put them to flight, which done, they waſted their Countrey, and having driven them up for ſhelter into the Mountainous places, returned with Honour untouched, but for one Accident. Arembertus one of the Captains as he ingaged indiſcreetly, or ſtaid too long in the Valley called Robola, was cut off with the greateſt part of the Nobility, and the old Souldiers that followed him: But Audoenus (or Audonius) the chief of the twelve who was eminent for many Battels, fought in the time of Theodorick, and was now held by all in chiefeſt Rank of Subjects, ſo demeaned himſelf, that the Vaſcons were forced to beg Peace, and Promiſe obedience for the time to come; whereupon he drew off his Army.

The Vaſcons forced to beg Peace.

Robola Aimoino ſed aliis Subola quæ hodie Sola. Audoenus aliis Chodoinus. Vide Othenarum in Notitia Vaſconiæ, lib. 3. c. 1.

116. Dagobert a little elevated with his Succeſs againſt the bold Vaſcons, began to conſider who there were, that by the like Fault committed, had merited a ſuitable Puniſhment, which he thought himſelf able now to inflict by means of his lately Victorious Army. The Britains of Aremorica or Armorica, had often made Incurſions into his Dominions, and as well ſince his coming to the Government, as before, had contrary to ſeveral Leagues and Agreements, made great Waſtes and Depredations in the adjoyning Countries. Dagobert ſends to Judicahil their Prince (or King, as our Hiſtorian calls him) Eligius a Perſon of great Prudence and Integrity, by whom he demands Satisfaction might be made for former Injuries, or he muſt expect the whole force, which was coming from Vaſconia, would be ſent to fetch it. Eligius ſo wrought upon Judicahil, that he not onely prevailed with him to conform himſelf to the Pleaſure of the King of the Franks, but to come with him to the Court of Dagobert, who then lay at the Village Clippiacum, where he not onely Promiſed an Amendment of what was paſt, but ſubjected himſelf and his People, to the obedience of the King, and made a perpetual Peace with him. Dagobert being now at his eaſe, and having brought to his beck all the Nations round about him, was, as is reported, bettered by his Proſperity, and, contrary to the common Inclination of Mankind, his good fortune kindled in him a Zeal after Piety and true Religion. In a place called Bigargium, on the one and twentieth of April he ſummoned a General meeting of all the Nobility and Prelates of France; to whom, and to his two Sons he ſignified his Intenſions, to leave ſomething to moſt of the Churches within his Dominions, for his Souls health, ordering that of his Teſtament, one Copy ſhould be kept at Paris, a ſecond at Lyons, a third at Metz, and a fourth in his own Treaſury; and charging his Sons to ſee his Will performed, as they ſhould expect the ſame Office of Duty from their Poſterity. Whether he had a Proſpect of death which put him into ſo good a Mood, or by a true Senſe of things he was brought into a due eſtimate of earthly Enjoyments, he died the Year following, of a Flux in a Village called Spitrogillum upon the River Seine, not far from Paris after he had Reigned fourteen Years. Perceiving his laſt hour to approach, he ſent for Ega his Councillour, and the Major of the Palace, and to his Care and Government recommended his Son Clodonæus with Nautildis his Mother, deſiring all the Nobility and Prelates alſo of Neuſtria and Burgundy to be aſſiſting to them. He died on the nineteenth of January, and was with much Solemnity buried in the Church of St. Dionyſius, or Denis near Paris, which he himſelf with very much Charge had built and endowed, about the the fifth Year of the Emperour Conſtans, the fifth alſo of Theodorus Biſhop of Rome, A. D. 646.

The Britains of Armorica ſubmit.

Dagobert dies.

Tillio Spinæum.

117. Hitherto the Franks had been Governed by their Kings, who though they had Miniſters under them, by whom they acted; yet had the Adminiſtration ſtill in their own hands. But from this time, the Majors of the Palace reigned in Effect, thoſe Kings (of this Race) which followed, enjoying nothing but the Title, which may partly be attributed to this ſolemn Act of Dagobert, whereby as it were he inſtated Ega in the Government, and left a Preſident to future times; but eſpecially, it is to be aſcribed to the Sloth, and voluptuous Life of ſome of the Princes themſelves, who being on purpoſe by theſe their Governours, indulged in their ſenſual Courſe of Life had little Mind, and much leſs Ability for publick Employments. Dagobert being dead, Sigebert continued in the Poſſeſſion of Auſtraſia, and Clodonæus ſucceeded to Neuſtria and Burgundy, being called Ludovicus the firſt, though Clodonæus and Ludovicus be the ſame Name, and the firſt Chriſtian King of this Nation, is Conſequently to be called the firſt; but to ſhun Confuſion, we muſt with Tily ſubmit to, and follow the vulgar Errour, though ſome Learned men do call him Clodonæus the ſecond. So were his Dominions parted, but his Treaſure was all ſtill in the hands of Ludovicus, or his Governours. By advice therefore of Pipin, who after his Father's death had betaken himſelf to him, and in Conjunction with Chumbert the Biſhop, Governed all about him; Sigebert ſent and demanded an equal Partition to be made of it, which Lodovick and his followers not able to refuſe, all the Wealth was brought forth, and by Ega at Compendium was weighed, and an equal diviſion made betwixt the two Brothers, onely a third part of what Dagobert had got ſince their Marriage, was conferred on Nautild. This is to be aſcribed to the Juſtice, and Integrity of Ega, who indeed was a very worthy Perſon, and however he was accuſed of Covetouſneſs, by ſuch as are never ſuffered with any in Authority, demeaned himſelf with all uprightneſs, and procured ſuch things as had been by violence, and without any right taken away by Dagobert, to be reſtored to the right Owners.

He is ſucceeded by Sigebert and Clodonæus his Sons.

118. But to the great loſs of the King, in the third Year of his Reign, Ega dies of a Fever, and Erchinoaldus the Kinſman of Dagobert, by his Mother is advanced to his place of the Major of the Palace; a Man given to Peace, of a modeſt Temper, and exceedingly beloved; things under his Circumſpect eye went very well, till by the means of Nautilde, who rightly thought it the Intereſt of her Son and the Nation, not to have too much Power inveſted in one Man, troubles began unfortunately to ariſe. Going with him to Orleance the Metropolis of Burgundy, where he received the Acknowledgments and Homage of the Nobility and Clergy, ſhe procured one Flancatus a Frank by Birth, to be made Major of the Palace for that Kingdom, giving him in Marriage Ragnoberta her Niece. Erchinoaldus and he joyned together, and kept all France in very good Order, adminiſtring Juſtice with all Impartiality, till one Willebald a Patritian of the parts beyond the Mountain Jura, a Man of great Nobility, and as great Wealth began to ſtomach, and take it in great ſcorn to be ſubject to him, and obey his Orders. He gave ſufficient Demonſtrations of his diſdain, but Flancatus took no notice of it, and went with Clodonæus to the General meeting held at Cabillonum, whither Willebald followed with ſo great a Train as ſeemed to threaten a War, or ſome great deſign he had formed in his Head. Yet would not he enter the Palace, knowing what advantage his Enemy might there have againſt him, which Flancatus perceiving, went toward him with intenſion to kill him where he was, but he was diverted by the advice and Intreaties of Amalbert his Brother, though onely reſolved to defer the Revenge, and wait ſome more convenient occaſion. This was given him within a little time: Nautilde the Queen dying this Year, whom they buried in the Church of St. Denis by the King her Husband.

Nautilde the Mother of Clodonæus dies.

119. She being buried, he carries the King from Paris to Autun, accompanied with Erchinoaldus and ſeveral other Noblemen, where a Summons is ſent for Willebald ſpeedily to appear: He ſuſpects the matter, and not daring to diſobey the King's Commands puts himſelf upon the way, but with a ſtrong band of Men, and a Meſſenger meets him, to perſuade him to haſten to his Prince his Preſence, and to Promiſe him all ſecurity, both in coming and returning, He holds then on his Courſe; but to make all as ſecure as he could, he ſends before one Agilulfe a Biſhop, and Wiſco a Count, to diſcover how matters ſtood, and to give him ſpeedy Intelligence. But Flancatus cauſes them to be ſecured as ſoon as they had entred the City, and then with a ſtrong party haſtens out againſt Willebald, who encounters him, and makes ſtout oppoſition, but is ſlain manfully fighting at the Head of his Troop, and his followers killed or put to flight. Flancatus having plundered the Camp, returned to the Court, but the next day left Autun, and went to Cabillonum, where he had not ſtaid two days, but the Town hapned to be on Fire, which it ſeems kindled ſuch a Fever in his Veins, that being carried by Boat down Aratis to Dijon there he died, and ſo had but ſmall time as well as any real cauſe to rejoyce in the Revenge he had taken upon his Adverſary; ſo went matters in Neuſtria and Burgundy, through the Minority of the King, and the too great Power and Intereſt of a particular Subject. In Auſtraſia things were not in a much better poſture, occaſioned by the Death of Pipin the Major of the Palace, who left a great miſs of him to the People. He had a Son called Grimoaldus, a Perſon of great Courage and very active, who for his Father's ſake was in high Favour, both with Prince and Subjects, and he worthily ſeemed to appear as a Candidate for his place. But there was in the Court one Otho, who by his Familiarity with Sigebert (whoſe Attendant and Play-fellow he had been in his Infancy) thought to obtain the Office, and having ever before emulated and hated Grimoaldus; now he ſhewed it openly, and made all oppoſition he could againſt him. But the Fame and Reputation of old Pipin prevailed, and though he could not now expell him the Court, yet Grimoaldus procured him afterward to be ſlain, and ſucceeded his dead Father in his Employment.

The Thuringians rebell againſt Sigebert.

120. Grimoaldus being ſetled in his place, Sigebert the King ingaged himſelf in War upon this occaſion. Rodulphus the Prince of Thuringia, having been formerly a Vaſſal and Tributary to this Kingdom of Auſtraſia, now deſpiſed Sigebert, and contracting a ſtrict League and Alliance with the Sclavi, denied obedience. Sigebert taking this in great diſdain, levied a ſtrong and numerous Army, and therewith having paſſed the Rhine gave Battel to Faro the Captain of the Thuringians and quite defeated him. Rodulphus upon this retires to a ſtrong Fort on the top of the Mountains, and Sigebert follows and cloſely beſieges him, with intenſions to take him, and put an end to the War. But a Council being called to deliberate what Courſe ſhould be taken, ſome, and thoſe the better ſort were for ſtorming the Caſtle; others, amongſt whom were Grimoaldus and Adelgiſilus, were for delaying the thing, and drawing out the matter into a tedious Siege, and accordingly while the other party was ready to ſet upon the Fort, they withdrew to their Camp, and there fortified themſelves, having the King with them. Rodulphus all this while was not aſleep, nor wanted Intelligence: By ſome Fugitives underſtanding what difference there was riſen amongſt the Beſiegers, he took his beſt advantage, and fell upon them with ſuch Execution and Succeſs, that he put them all to flight that ſurvived the great ſlaughter which he made, and forced the Auſtraſians remaining with their King, to accept of his Service and Obedience as it had formerly ſtood, which indeed ſignified as good as nothing; he being in Name a Tributary, but in reality an abſolute Lord and Independent of any other. After this, Sigebert ſpent the reſt of his days in Peace, but wanting Children lay open to the Arts and Projects of his Major of the Palace, who perſuaded him to adopt his Son Ildebert by Name, to which he was drawn, partly by Inconſiderateneſs, and partly by that Reſpect, if not awe or fear which he bore to the Name of Grimoaldus. But after his Adoption was over, the King had a Son born, whom after his Grandfather he named Dagobert, and died not long after he had Reigned ten years. Sigebert being dead, Grimoald ſhaved the young Child for a Monk, and delivering him to Dido, the Biſhop of Poictiers, who was travelling into Scotland, proclaimed and maintained his Son Ildebert for King.

King Sigebert dies.

Clodonæus dies.

Clotair ſucceeds.

Who dies.

121. This was for a little time, but then the Nobility of the Franks taking it in high diſdain to be ſubject to one of his Condition, roſe up in Arms, and ſeizing on Grimoaldus brought him before Clodonæus the King at Paris, by whom he was Sentenced to death as a Traitour, and Execution accordingly was done upon him in a ſevere manner. Clodonæus, or Ludovicus, from a Prince of good hopes fell into the great diſpleaſure of the People, giving up himſelf to all Exceſs of Gluttony, Wine and Women, for which nothing can be pleaded in his excuſe, but that toward his latter end he was crazed in his Brain, onely our Authours were Church-men or Religious Perſons, and upon that Account they bore him no Good Will for ſome Reaſons, we ſhall diſcover in their proper place. He Reigned ſixteen Years, and by Baltilde his Wife a Saxon by Birth, both a beautifull and Vertuous Perſon; he had three Sons, Clotair, Childerick, and Theodorick, whereof the Eſtates proclaimed Clotair the eldeſt King in his ſtead, and made his Mother Regent, or rather joyned her in the Adminiſtration with Erchenoald the Major of the Palace. Matters ſeemed now to be in a ſetled Condition, when to the miſchief of France, Erchenoald dies, and after a great Conteſt, his place is conferred on one Ebroinus, a Man of neither Conſcience nor Honeſty, who for a while covered his Inclinations and Deſigns by Diſſimulation, fearing the Queen, and not altogether ſecure of the young King's Favour. But the King dies, when he had ſcarcely Reigned four Years, and by his Death gave occaſion to the Major of the Palace, to bring about what he had deſigned. The Nobility and People were for Childerick, the ſecond Brother to ſucceed, but he found the youngeſt moſt for his purpoſe, and in deſpight of them preferred him to the Title: Childerick being ſent as King into Auſtraſia, under the Tuition and Conduct of Vulfoaldus a Duke. But the Nobility could not ſwallow this Indignity. They riſe in Arms, and laying hold on Theodorick cut off his Hair, and depoſe him; and as for his Miniſter Ebroinus, they ſhave him too, and put him into a Monaſtery. Then ſend they for Childerick out of Auſtraſia, and with univerſal Applauſe they make him King. But they did not their Work for all this: They had not made ſure enough of Ebroinus. And as for their new King, he fell into all ſorts of Debauchery, and ſo Proudly and Tyrannically demeaned himſelf, as gave them cauſe rather to repent of what they had done, that they had made ſuch a choice, as did not in the leaſt anſwer their Expectations.

Theodorick being ſhaven.

Childerick is made King.

122. For ſome time yet things were kept from extremity by Leodegarius the Biſhop of Autun, whoſe Wiſedom and Sanctity ſtruck ſome Reverence into the King, ſo as he ran not to ſuch Exceſs of Riot, as elſe he would have done; and gave ſuch force to his Words, as made them prevalent to keep the Nobles in their Duty and Alliance. But he being quite tired out, withdrew from Court to his own See, and then, as if the Bank or Fence had been removed, a Deluge of miſchiefs broke in, and bore down all before them. The Debauchery, Pride, and Tyranny of Childerick increaſed, and with them the diſdain and Impatience of his Subjects. One of the Nobility Bodilo by Name, he cauſed to be tyed to a Stake, and beaten like a Slave for ſome frivolous matter, which put them into ſuch a Rage that they conſpired againſt him; but Bodilo prevented all other Deſigns, by meetting him in a Wood, as he was diverting himſelf with a very ſmall Train, and there killing him; which done, he cruelly Murthered Bilitilde his Queen, though great with Child. Childerick being thus made away, they pull Theodorick out of his Cell, and reſtore him to his former Eſtate. Leudeſius the Son of Erchinoald they make Maſter of the Palace, by the advice of Leodegarius the Biſhop, and Gerinus his Brother, and this they doe in haſte to prevent the recalling and Reſtitution of Ebroinus, towards whom they had ground to believe that the King's favour ſtill continued. But Ebroinus reſolved to render this Policy inſucceſsfull, and though there was not means left to out-wit them, yet to doe that by force, which Cunning and Art could not effect. He caſts off his Cowl, abjures the Monaſtical Life, and gathering together a multitude of his Friends ſets upon the Court, overtakes the flying King at Cariſiacum, after he ſeized his Treaſures, and taking upon him his former Employment, kills Leudeſius, tortures to death Leodegarius the Biſhop, with Gerinus his Brother, and having put to Death many others, baniſhes the reſt, and Confiſcates their Eſtates. This done, he permits Theodorick to enjoy his Life with the Title, but uſurps the whole Power and Authority over the Kingdom.

Childerick is ſlain, and Theodorick reſtored.

123. In the mean While Auſtraſia was governed by Vulfoaldus, who after the Death of Childerick had fled thither, and he dying ſoon after, by Martin and Pipin the Sons of Anſegiſilus a Noble man. They had not been long in Power, but they began to conſider the Greatneſs, and demeanour of Ebroinus, and as well for prevention of miſchief intended toward themſelves, as to yield to the Importunity of the Franks, who groaned under his Tyranny, levied an Army with reſolution to bring him to Condign puniſhment. They marched toward him, and he being aware of their Deſign had made good proviſion for a Battel, wherein he defeated them after a great ſlaughter on both ſides, and they fled for their Lives; Pipin into Auſtraſia, and Martin to Laudanum, where he fortified himſelf, which Ebroinus hearing ſent and invited him to Court, promiſing him not onely his Life, but other matters of great Conſequence, but could not overcome him without the Strategem, he was wont to uſe in all other Caſes. He cauſed Oath to be made for his Security, upon the Relicks of ſome Saints, as was imagined, but there were in Truth no Relicks there, onely empty Coffers; and therefore accounting this no Oath, he Circumvented Martin, and cauſed him to be Murthered with all his followers. Being now as he thought pretty ſecure, he had leiſure to meditate what farther Courſe he ſhould take, for gratifying his Ambition and his Cruelty. There was one Ermenfrid a Frank, who was a great Eye-ſore to him, and he reſolved to remove him out of the way, which being made known to him, Ermenfrid reſolved to begin with him, and preſerve his own Life by the Death of his Enemy; at the worſt, he could but periſh. He was ſo proſperous in his Enterprize, that ruſhing upon him when he leaſt thought it, he eaſily killed him, and not well aſſured of impunity for the Fact, fled to Pipin into Auſtraſia.

Civil Wars at home.

124. He being Dead, the Franks with the King's Conſent, made choice of one Warato to ſucceed him, who for ſecuring his Employment made a ſtrict Alliance with Pipin, from whom he received Hoſtages for his Faith and Sincerity. Thus was he ſecure as to matters abroad, but in his domeſtick Affairs was very unhappy. He had a Son called Giſlemar, a young Man of a furious Spirit, impatient of quiet, and as undutifull as could be imagined. He takes the Reins out of his Father's hands, and will needs manage the Kingdom. He breaks the Alliance made with Pipin, makes War upon him, brings the Kingdom into great troubles and inconveniences, but for his undutifulneſs, and other Sins, as our Authours obſerve, was ſmitten by God Almighty, and called to give an account in another World. He being removed, his Father reaſſumed the Government, and managing matters very calmly and proſperouſly, died after ſome time, leaving behind him Auſeſlidis his Wife, a Woman very Nobly deſcended, and of very great Parts. She procures Bertarius her Son-in-Law to ſucceed him, one that was as mean in his Intellectuals as he was in his Perſon and Stature, to which, though the Franks at firſt conſented being it ſeems ſurpriſed, yet afterwards conſidering how bad a choice they had made, they fell into a Mutiny, of which Pipin takes advantage, and invades the Kingdom with a great Army and ſuch ſucceſs, that he defeated Bertarius in Battel, and forced both Theodorick the King and him to run for their Lives. Yet did he uſe this Victory moderately, for no harm do we hear that was done, but Bertarius not long after was ſlain by his greateſt Flatterers, and that through the inſtigation of Auſeſlidis, who was aſhamed ſhe had preferred a man ſo deſpicable. He being gone, Pipin was ſent for out of Auſtraſia, and made Major of the Palace, the whole Government of the Franks being now in his Hands. But he judged it moſt for his intereſt to reſide in Auſtraſia, and therefore left one Nordebert as his Deputy with the King, and returning, of the two Sons he had by his Wife Plectrudis, viz. Drocus and Grimoaldus he made the former being the Eldeſt, Duke of Campania.

Theodorick dies.

Clodonæus firſt, and then Childebert ſucceeded him.

125. Theodorick at length Dies, after he had Reigned ſome ſay nineteen years, ſome almoſt three and twenty, and others no fewer than twenty eight. He left by Clodoilde his Wife two Sons, whereof the Eldeſt though a Child Clodonæus by name was King in his ſtead, but died after four years, and Childebert his Brother ſucceeded in his Title being very hopefull. Shortly after Nordebert alſo leaves the World, and then Grimoaldus the younger Son of Pipin is made Major of the Palace. Pipin having thus the whole power of the Franks in his hands, and ſecure at home, reſolved by his Victorious Arms to make himſelf terrible to his Neighbours. He firſt ſet upon the Friſii an ancient people of Germany, ſituate upon the Ocean beyond the Rhine, the Prince of whom Radbodus a Pagan he overthrew in Battel, which done, he ſubdued the Suevi and other ſorts of People, of which our Authours have not left us ſo much as the names, ſo negligent were they in Writing, what their Anceſtours were ſo induſtrious in performing. But the joy and triumph of Pipin for theſe publick felicities were within ſome time interrupted by Domeſtick ſorrow. Drocus his Eldeſt Son departing this World without Iſſue, and he himſelf falling ſick not long after, his other Son Grimoaldus coming to viſit him was Murthered by Langarius a Pagan and attendant on Radbod. Grimoaldus Married the Daughter of this Radbod the Prince of the Friſians, but by her had no Children, onely one Son by a Concubine named Theudoaldus, whom his Grandfather procured to ſucceed in the Office of Major of the Palace. In the mean time Childebert dies, A. D. 718. after he had Reigned thirteen, ſome ſay ſeventeen, but others twenty years, a Prince both of good Morals and Intellectuals, however ruſted over by idleneſs, and clouded by the extravagant Authority of the Majors of the Palace. He left a young Child called Dagobert, who ſucceeded to the naked and empty title of King.

Childebert dies.

Dagobert ſucceeds.

Sepultus eſt Atrebatibus in æde Vedaſti ubi ex rudi at inciſo in antiquum lapidem elogio apparet uxorem illi fuiſſe Dodam nomine, ſic enim habet.
Rex Theodoricus ditans ut verus amicus
Nos ope multimoda, jacet hic cum conjuge Doda.
Vide plura apud Papirium Maſſonum, p. 83.

Aimoinus & Annales ab Ann. 714. Uſque ad Ann. 83. ab Anonymo ſed vetuſto Auctore ſcripti & à Petro Pithæo editi unde quibuſdam Annales Pithæani Audiunt. Sed eoſdem titulo Annalium Fuldenſium recudendos curavit Margnardus Freherus cum aliquot Annorum Acceſſione. Auctor vixit Moguntiæ Lothario imperante Rabani Mauri ævo.

126. At length Pipin having been King in effect, or King of thoſe Kings for the ſpace of ſeven and twenty years and an half, as Aimoinus computeth, breathes out his Soul in the heats of a very acute and briſk Fever. He being dead, Plectrude his Wife had the courage to ſeize upon the Government, making uſe of the names of King Dagobert and Theudoald her Nephew the Major of the Palace. The Franks either ſurprized or to trie concluſions, for ſome time were ſilent, not diſdaining to be commanded by a Woman, and ſhe ſo ordered her matters as by one means or other to keep them in obedience. Having as ſhe imagined ſetled her ſelf in the Government, ſhe began (as well ſhe might, being very old) to think of Death, and how to eſtabliſh her power in the hands of her own Relations. Her Husband by another Wife, (rather by a Concubine,) had a Son called Charles, a Man excellently qualified for the greateſt buſineſs, the more therefore ſhe had him ſuſpected, and Aimoinus paſſim eum Principem appellat.

De eo ſic Aimoinus: Habuit quoque præfatus Princeps Pipinus filium ex alia uxore nomine Carolum Virum elegantem, egregium atque utilem. Plerique tamen eum ſpurium apertè dicunt cui mater fuit Alpais concubina quæ Pipino Herſtillio peperit etiam Childebrandum patrem Nebelungi: qui Nebelungus ſcripſit chronicon nondum tipis Editum ut Quercetanus in ſua Hiſt. Burgundiæ, l. 2. c. 1. tradit. Alpais verò demum pœnitens, Orpii in Gallo-Brabrantia Monaſterium ſtruxit, in eoque ut credebatur veteris vitæ delicta eluit, & Hungardienſe Canonicorum Collegium inchoavit, Miræus in Chron. Belg.

Sect. 3.

this jealouſie added to the uſual paſſions of a Stepmother, ſo far tranſported her as to lay hands on him, and commit him to cloſe Cuſtody. But thence roſe her Troubles, whence ſhe promiſed her ſelf the greateſt ſecurity. As well as ſhe thought ſhe had ordered her matters with the people, and ſecured their fidelity, ſuch as either had been diſobliged by her Husband, or were now tempted by their own ambition began to repine firſt, and afterward openly to declame againſt the preſent poſture of Affairs, and in concluſion, raiſed ſuch tumults as procured a War wherein her party was born down, Theodoald hardly eſcaping with his Life from a Battel, fought in the Wood called Cocia. Hereupon the Victours deſpiſing his Title, chuſe for their Major of the Palace one Reganfredus, and entring into an offenſive and defenſive League with Ratbode the Friſian, they invade Auſtraſia with a great Army, waſting all things as far as the Meuſe, while Plectrude keeps her ſelf cloſe in Coloine.

Who dying Daniel or Chilperick is ſet up.

A. D. 723.

Annal. Pith. Aimoinus.

127. Not long after dies Dagobert, after he had Reigned ſome five years, leaving a Child behind him who was Nurſed in a Monaſtery. The Franks waved him becauſe of his Age, and gave the Title of King to one Daniel, a ſhaven Clerk, whoſe name for greater grace they changed into Chilperick. Reganfredus ſtill thought it his intereſt to weaken, and if poſſible, to deſtroy the remainders of Pipin, his intereſt and power in Auſtraſia, and for that purpoſe levied another Army. But he preſently found he had not to deal with a Woman onely. There was a Youth ſprung from the Loins of Pipin, who had ſo much courage as to bid him defiance and ſtrenuouſly to maintain his Father's cauſe againſt all oppoſers, even Charles whom we lately mentioned, who proved the Achilles of the Franks, and the Mars, or rather if you will the Marteau or Hammer of all their Enemies. He had eſcaped out of Priſon, and wound himſelf out of the hands and devices of Plectrude his Father's Wife, which having done, he could not be idle nor ſuffer the Enemies of his Houſe to doe their pleaſure without reſiſtence. He raiſed an Army, and made Head againſt them, but it was his fortune to be bred a perfect Souldier, and therefore he muſt lay the Foundations of his Military excellencies in adverſity, being in the firſt ingagement defeated, and forced to run and ſhift for his Life. The Enemy incouraged by this ſucceſs, and ſmiling at the attempts of this young Adventurer, renewed their Hoſtilities, and the ſecond time carried their Victorious Enſigns as far as the Rhine and Coloine, deſtroying all things in their paſſage, and forcing Plectrude to redeem the liberty of that City, and her own Life with a vaſt Sum of money. Yet did Charles lie in ambuſh, and ſetting upon them as they returned, looſely and without all care of Order or apprehenſion of Danger, made great ſlaughter of them in their retreat, at a place called Amblana. This they looked upon onely as a misfortune, altogether accidental, and far from the product either of Valour or good Conduct, and therefore to chaſtiſe him who durſt offer ſuch an indignity to the King of the Neuſtrians, they make new levies and oblige Charles to trie his fortune, and ſhew his proweſs the ſecond time. He offered them good terms, and deſired to compoſe the difference betwixt the Kingdoms, but they were bent upon a Battel, as not doubting to put an end to his Life, his boldneſs and the War altogether. But in the Battel (which was fought at a place called Vinciacum the Lord's day before Eaſter,) they were defeated, and Victorious Charles after he had purſued the flying Enemy as far as Paris, remembring he had an Enemy at his Back, returned and beſieged Plectrude his Stepmother, as ſome call her, in the City of Coloine.

Vinciacum in Pago Cameracenſi hodie eſt villula vulgo la cenſe de Vincy, ad Abbatiam Sancti Auberti Cameracenſem pertinet, ſita prope Crepicordium oppidum.

128. He had no paſſion in him, which tempted him to deſtroy or deface the Town, and therefore ſet upon it with arguments and good Language, whereby he ſo won upon the Inhabitants, that notwithſtanding all the oppoſition ſhe could make, he had it delivered up to him, and therewith his Father's Treaſures which were great at his Death, but were now much increaſed by her parſimony and ſcraping. Having diſmiſſed her with expoſtulations onely and rebukes, for the humour ſhe bore of a true Stepmother, he began to conſider how to eſtabliſh himſelf, and finding his intereſt too weak, either to aſſure the Title and Government of a King both together, or the Power and Authority without ſuch a Title in ſome Perſon, he complied with the humour of the times, and as in Neuſtria they had ſuch an Image they worſhipped, ſo in Auſtraſia he ſet up the like Idol, giving the name of King to one Clotair deſcended of the bloud Royal, but how, and in what degree we find not expreſſed. The Neuſtrians now perceived they had no Fool to deal with, but foraſmuch as his Authority was but green and freſh, they concluded it was to be ſuppreſſed, before it ſhould ariſe to maturity, and knowing he was not to be deſpiſed, they ſtrengthned themſelves with the acceſſion of Eudo the Governour or Duke of Aquitain, who not onely commanded the Vaſcons that had broke into this Countrey, but having governed the bordering Regions of the Volcæ both inſeriour and ſuperiour, for the King of Spain, when the intereſt of that Crown went to wreck, had repreſſed the inſolence of the victorious Saracens, and now held them in his own Right. He was willing enough to engage in the Controverſie, though it had been for no other reaſon than to divert the Franks from the incroaching Vaſcons, and to cauſe them to ſpend their fury one upon another, joyning therefore with Erganfredus they began their march, Charles was aware of their coming, and would not ſo far gratifie either their Ambition, or diſcourage his own men, as to ſuffer them to pierce into the Bowels of Auſtraſia, and make that the Seat of the deſigned War, but met them and gave them Battel with ſuch induſtry and Conduct, that he routed their Army, and forced them to flie to Paris, whence Eudo carried the King Chilperick and his Treaſures with him as far as Orleance, and thence by degrees returned into his own Countrey with great difficulty, Charles ſtill preſſing him at the very heels.

Clotair made King in Auſtraſia.

Clotair of Auſtria dies.

Chilperick of Auſtria dies.

Theodorick Cala made King of Auſtria.

Hodie Chelles in agro Pariſienſi, A. D. 729.

129. He being got ſafe home, Charles thought it not prudence by an Invaſion, too much to provoke thoſe Warlike Nations which he ruled, eſpecially at this time, when he underſtood that Clotair whom he had advanced to the title of King was lately Deceaſed. That he might not want another mock King, to keep the People in good humour, (which could not be without the diverſion of ſuch a Pageant,) and to be a Rival to the like mock Prince, Daniel or Chilperick, he indeed thought it beſt to retreat, but yet in his paſſage thought fit to ſet upon Audeganum, whither Erganfredus had betaken himſelf after the Battel. He took the City, and therein his Enemy, whom all men expected he would diſpatch out of the way, not onely out of deſire of Glory as his Æmulatour, but out of a principle of ſelf preſervation, and from the immediate Dictates of natural Policy. But his Heroical Diſpoſition, and his innate Generoſity and Courage, being inconſiſtent with all dark Clouds of jealouſie and fear, he not onely gave him his Life, but the Government of that Town wherein he took him. Shortly after this he made Peace with Eudo, receiving from him Chilperick the King, though not all his Treaſures. Chilperick died not long after, in the ſixth year of his Titular Royalty, which cauſed Charles, for that the temper of the times ſo required, to fetch the Son of Dagobert out of the Monaſtery of Cala, where we ſaid he was bred, and to give him the Honour of King, which he bore by the name of Theodorick Cala, this addition for Deſtinction ſake being given him from the place of his Education. He either through the arts of Charles, uſual to all the Majors of the Palace, or his own dull and ſlow diſpoſition, gave himſelf up to ſloth and idleneſs, not regarding any thing tending to Government. Therefore Charles having now in his hands the whole power of the Franks, and being ſecure at home, caſt in his mind how he might obtain glory and renown by foreign Conqueſts.

The Saxons reduced to obedience.

The Countrey of the Alemans Suevi and Bavaria waſted by the Franks.

De Plectrude nihil aliud niſi quod vitæ à Carolo acceptæ demum finem impoſuit & ſepulta eſt Coloniæ Agrippinæ ubi tumulus ejus viſitur ſic inſcriptus:
Legali thalamo Plectrudis juncta Pipino Drogonem genuit, magnúmque ducem Grimoaldum.

130. His firſt adventure was againſt the Saxons, whom e'er they could perfect a deſigned Revolt, he ſurpriſed and forced to return to their former obedience. A year had ſcarcely paſſed after this Victory when he was called into Germany, where work was made for him by Plectrude his Stepmother, whom with Sinichilde her Niece, he had diſmiſſed after the Siege of Coloine. Carrying with her her old novercal hatred, (which an act of ſo great generoſity as he had ſhewed toward her could not diminiſh,) into the inner parts of that Countrey; ſhe ſtirred up the ſeveral Nations againſt him as a Baſtard, who had baniſhed his Father's true and legitimate Wife in her old Age, to beg her Bread in a ſtrange Land. She ſo moved the hearts of the unwary Multitude, that Charles perceived there was a Storm impending, and to drive it off from his own dore, reſolved to paſs the Rhine, and ſuppreſs them e'er they could be quite prepared. Without much labour he effected this upon the Alemans and Suevi, and paſſing as far as the Danow up the Countrey, waſted Bavaria, and beſides many others, with rich ſpoil brought Plectrude and Sinichilde away Priſoners. Such were the beginnings of Charles, which being Crowned with ſucceſs, inabled and prompted him on to greater matters. Eudo repenting it ſeems of the League and Alliance he had made with him, out of confidence of his own ſtrength, and the aſſiſtence he could procure out of Spain, utterly renounced it, which as ſoon as he perceived, judging expedition the greateſt advantage in all performances, he thought it requiſite to begin firſt, aand paſſing the Loire ſpeedily invaded Aquitain. Eudo either ſurpriſed, or to let the heat of his fury abate, retired into the moſt fortified place he had, and ſuffered him to haraſs the Countrey at his pleaſure, which daving done, with much booty he returned home.

An Invaſion of the Saracens.

131. Charles thus trained up, and prepared for great Atchievements, a moſt conſiderable Subject ſhortly after preſented it ſelf, whereon he muſt make a trial of his Valour and Conduct, and this was a War he was forced to undertake with the victorious and terrible Saracens, who having ſubdued a vaſt part of Aſia and all Africk, had tranſported their victorious Arms over into Europe, and made themſelves Maſters of the Gothick Kingdom in Spain. The Reader muſt know, that moſt Authours the ancient eſpecially write, that Eudo to be revenged upon Charles, and to put a ſtop to the Carriere of his good Fortune, invited them firſt into Gall. Others affirm, that from Spain they invaded the Vaſcons, Aquitain, and the Province of Narbon, and having defeated Eudo himſelf, next invaded the Territories of the Franks, having paſſed Garumna or the Garonne. Conſidering the fierceneſs of the People, the ſucceſs they had had in Spain, the hopes which their good fortune, together with their numbers, (whereby they bore down all before them,) had raiſed in them, and the Rapacity of the Nation, we cannot but incline to their opinion, who think that they needed no invitation, but having overrun all as far as the Garonne, were by their own deſires induced to make a trial upon the Franks, the rich Territories of whom they had ſome kind of reaſon to promiſe to themſelves. However it was, that having once paſſed that River they took Burdeaux, and having burnt all Churches, as well as other things they could not carry with them, that thence they marched to Poictiers is agreed on all hands, where having dealt in the ſame ſort with the Church of St. Hilary, they held on their courſe to handle in the ſame manner that of St. Martin at Tours. But here Charles put a ſtop to the progreſs of their Confidence, having raiſed as conſiderable an Army as all Auſtraſia, Neuſtria, Burgundy, and other parts could afford, the flour of the Nobility, as well as the ſtrength of the Commons flocking to him; foraſmuch as the Controverſie now in hand, was not on their part for Glory or Dominion, but their very Lives and Fortunes, and what was dearer to them their Religion, for thoſe Infidels having thus far proceeded, and deſtroyed Chriſtian Worſhip, France is now the Wall and Rampart to ſtop their Current, elſe all Chriſtendom muſt ſpeedily be overwhelmed.

Aimoinus Annal. Pith.

132. To what number of men his Levies amounted is utterly uncertain, thoſe Writers who have taken upon them to be Publiſhers of his worth, having tranſmitted but a mere ſcantling of his Actions, and an unperfect account of his great performances to Poſterity. As for the Saracens, we are told they were no fewer fighting men than four hundred thouſand, beſides Women and Children, for in France they intended to plant themſelves. Now ſome will have it that Charles and Eudo, by common danger were induced to an hearty accommodation of their Differences, and with joynt force to attacque this ſtupendous Multitude. Near to Tours they met them, where Charles ſo formed his Battalia, as to place his Horſe, wherein his greateſt hope remained, in two Wings to protect his Infantry, which elſe might ſoon have been overrun and troden down by the numbers of the Enemy. The method that was uſed in fighting, we cannot deſcribe, neither the particular paſſages in the Battel, becauſe we reſolve not to write Romances, nor to imitate the Modern French writers, who deviſe Harangues of Generals to their Souldiers, and feign ſuch ſtories as poſſibly might agree with the nature of the Enterpriſes whereof they write, but have no Foundation in any Monuments of the Ancients. 'Tis certain Charles had the better which way ſoever. There are that tell us, that while he ſtrugled with the confuſed Multitude, Eudo ſet upon their Camp, and plundring the Baggage, and killing ſome of the weaker Sex and Age which there they had left, the Women made ſuch an hideous lamentation, that their Husbands hearing it, were put into ſuch a diſorder, as gave ſufficient opportunity to Charles to doe effectual Execution upon them, and then Eudo coming in and falling upon the Rere, the Victory in proſpect before was fully completed. Abderaman the King of the Saracens or Moors, (for ſo alſo the Reader muſt take notice they are called in Authours from Mauritania whence they came,) was ſlain and with him three hundred and ſeventy five thouſand of his followers as ſome compute, who to take off from the wonder tell you, that the Battel was fought on both ſides with that Animoſity, that fifteen hundred Franks alſo periſhed, amongſt whom many of the choiceſt of the Nobility. Time has been ingratefull in burying in Oblivion the gallant demeanour of particular Perſons, but doubtleſs many deſerved exceeding well, and Charles moſt certainly who obtained the Sirname of Martell or Hammer, from this Victory

Who are overthrown by Charles the Major of the Palace.

Pallus eo prælio trecenta hoſtium & ſeptuaginta millia cecidiſſe autor eſt: ſed Eudo literis ad Gregorium ſecundum Papam (quarum mentio fit in vita ejuſdem Gregorii) trecenta ſeptuaginta quinque millia.

Marteau Franciis hodiernis, an Hammer.

ry which indeed deſerves to be eternized, (and he by it) as having prevented infinite miſchiefs wherewith the Chriſtian World might elſe have been overwhelmed.

133. Yet though he had got ſuch a Reputation by this and his other Victories, and had the whole management in his hands, did he not take the title of King, but left it to Theodorick, contenting himſelf with that of Prince, which our Authours give to him, as to his Father Pipin. Having now ſecured France as to matters abroad, like a good Prince, he reſolved to free it from all inteſtine Diſtempers, and for that purpoſe made a progreſs into Burgundy firſt, as having moſt need of his helping hand, where he delivered the Borders into the hands of Leudes or Feudataries for its better ſecurity, and made eſpecial proviſion for the ſafe keeping of the City of Lyons, the Key of the Countrey. While he buſied himſelf in thoſe and the like matters; it happened that Eudo the Duke of Aquitain died, whereupon he burnt with a vehement deſire of adjoyning that Region to the Dominions of the Franks, and the thing being approved by the Nobility, he raiſed an Army, paſſed the Loire, and thence marching to the Garonne, made himſelf Maſter of Burdeaux, and a Fort called Blanium (now Bloye,) and ſo in order of all the Countrey, notwithſtanding the reſiſtence of the three Sons of Eudo, one whereof, Aznar by name, went to ſeek his Fortunes in Spain, where having overthrown the Saracens, and ſubdued many Towns, he laid the Foundations of the Kingdom of Aragon, which for many Ages continued ſubject to his Poſterity. Charles was ſcarcely returned from this Expedition, when news was brought him that the Friſians rebelled, whereupon he rigged up a ſtrong Fleet, and having ſeized on Amiſtrachia and Auſtrachia, two Iſlands belonging to that People, paſſed up the River Burdo into the middle of their Territories, where in fight he overthrew their Captain Radbode, (ſome ſay Popo, for that Radbode was dead,) and then deſtroying their Pagan Temples with other Monuments of Idolatry, with great ſpoils and as much fame returned into France, which now ſtood in great need of his Preſence. A great multitude of People out of the Weſtern parts had poured themſelves into Gall. Aimoinus makes onely mention of the Vandals, who he ſaith deſtroyed Churches, ſubverted Monaſteries, took Cities, pull'd down Houſes, demoliſhed Caſtles, and made ſlaughter of an innumerable multitude of men.

Aimoinus, lib. 4. c. 53. &c.

Aquitain added to the Dominions of the Franks.

The Friſians corrected for Rebellion.

Burdo nonnullis Amiſia fluvius eſt.

Radbodus iſte Frizonum ſeu Rex ſive Princeps mortuus eſt Idololatra. Inde Belgis Rabbont idem eſt ac Nequam hodiernum diem uſque.

134. Others make this Invaſion the product of the Revenge, and machinations of Eudo's other two Sons Hunnold and Gaifer, who while Charles was employed abroad, invited the Moors and Spaniards, eſpecially thoſe of the Province Bætica to make an Inrode, propounding the Plunder of rich Provinces, as a reward of their Travel, and wiſhed ſucceſs, not in the leaſt to be doubted over a moſt contemptible People if compared with themſelves. Whatever gave the occaſion to the Invaſion, like a furious Tempeſt it bore all down before it, ſparing as to Perſons neither Sex, Age, nor Condition, nor as to places, and things either Sacred or prophane. They proceeded as far as Lyons, waſting all the Countrey far and wide, yet Vienna or Vienne by wonderfull providence eſcaped their fury, to which at length a ſtop was put by the Senones, the Biſhop of whom Ebbo by name fortified himſelf in his City, and ſo cheared up the hearts of his People, that in all Aſſaults they ſtill had the better, and when the Beſiegers had loſt many men, and were all quite tired with their frequent Attacques, he cauſed ſuch a ſally to be made, as after very great ſlaughter obliged them to quit their Poſts, to raiſe their Siege, and to be gone. Charles had hereby the work half done to his hands, for ſetting upon them when they had loſt many of their men, and even all their Courage, he eaſily expelled them out of all the Coaſts of Burgundy and recovered Lyons, which done, and the Countrey ſetled, ſo as might beſt ſecure it againſt all future Inrodes, he returned into France, for ſo they call Auſtraſia and Neuſtria, as contradiſtinct to the other Dominions of the Franks. Here he could not reſt, but conceiving himſelf affronted by the Refractary Saxons, who refuſed to perform the accord formerly made with them, with great expedition he paſſed the Rhine, and ſpeedily reduced them to obedience.

The Rebellious Saxons once more chaſtiſed.

135. Thus proſpered Charles, and flouriſhed in Martial Glory, carrying Victory along with him whitherſoever he had occaſion to move. But in the late action with the Saracens, his hands more than his Head (although they not very much neither) ſeem to have been employed. For the miſchief ariſing from the Sons of Eudo, he was concerned in policy to have paſſed into Septimania, and to have cut off the ſource and Original of it by ſuppreſſing them and their Intereſt, but either his great Inclinations to the War with the Saxons carried him away, elſe ſome reaſon we are not able to diſcover, or he committed this Errour through Inadvertency, of which the wiſeſt of Men are not always guiltleſs. Whereever the fault lay the Cauſes remaining the ſame, ſpeedily produced the ſame effect, for Eudo's Sons, irritated with the late defeat, now drew into Confederacy Mauricius the Count of Marſeilles, one who envied Charles his Glory and Authority, and all of them in conjunction together, invite Ancupa the new Mooriſh Governour of Spain, (who was as ambitious to propagate his Mahometan Superſtition, as to inlarge the bounds of the Saracenian Power,) to make a new Invaſion, promiſing him great matters in caſe he were Maſter of the City of Avinion, which they affirmed would ſecure the parts of Septimania, and the whole Province of Narbon unto himſelf. He being with them in a manner as ſoon as called, had by the means of Mauricius Avinion betrayed into his hands, and as the Rampart and Bulwark of theſe Countries uſed his utmoſt endeavour to fortifie it. Charles having notice, haſtned his Levies as much as he could, but reſolving not to be too haſty, ſtaid till he could form together a ſufficient Army, and in the mean time to be doing and divert the Enemy, ſent away Childebrand (his Brother or Kinſman) with conſiderable Forces.

Sect. 3.

The Saracens again invade the Countrey of France.

136. He was not long behind them, but coming up with all ſpeed ſate down before the City. Here after ſome Conſultation he reſolved to try it by a way of Storm, as more convenient for his Deſigns, and ſuitable to his Diſpoſition, than a tedious and lazy Siege. And his proviſions of Ladders and Engins were ſo good, his Courage ſo great, and his Dexterity ſo ſucceſsfull, that notwithſtanding the Defendants made very ſtout oppoſition, yet he carried the place, having promiſed the Plunder of it to his Souldiers, as a great means to animate them. Having here ſetled matters as he ſaw convenient, he purſued the flying Saracens, and paſſing the Rhone invaded the late Territories of the Goths, wherein he beſieged Narbon their Metropolis, and therein Athima the Mooriſh Captain, for all this tract or the Inferior Occitania the Saracens had lately ſubdued. Here he found he had not to doe with Avinion, a City ſituate in an Hilly Countrey, and very convenient to aſſault and batter. Narbon was ſeated in a mooriſh Ground incompaſſed when the Inhabitants pleaſed with water, beſides fortified with a very ſtrong Wall, and by a moſt ſelect Garriſon of Saracens, who fought not as they had done at Avinion, for Booty, Conqueſt and Reputation; but for their Lives and Liberties, for all that was neareſt and deareſt to them. Charles therefore perceiving he muſt ſtarve them out, accommodated himſelf accordingly, drawing a Line round the Town, to ſtop up all the Avenues, and in the River placing Engins like Rams upon Stakes driven down into the bottom to hinder all paſſage of Veſſels, and whatſoever might convey Relief to the beſieged. The news of this Leaguer flew faſt into Spain, where the Saracens were deeply concerned for their Friends and Relations in ſo great danger, and as much for the loſs that was threatned of ſo conſiderable a Province. They beſtir themſelves and raiſe new Forces, which they commit to the Conduct of Amonus another Captain, who animated his men by words, preſuming that the Franks were already tired out with the Siege, and would not abide the firſt Onſet.

But are beaten.

137. But ſo far were the Franks from declining the Combat, and refuſing to receive their firſt Onſet, that they haſted to ſet on them, and were very greedy to give them Battel; For Charles hearing of their coming, thought it better to meet them, and by a ſudden and unexpected Charge to try his Fortune, than ſuffer them to come up to the Leaguer, and while he ſtrove to defend his Camp againſt them, to have the beſieged iſſue out upon his back. The main thing was ſecrecy, that thoſe within the Town ſhould not know of his Departure, and he muſt leave a ſufficient number ſtill to make a ſhew of a Siege. In theſe points it ſeems he failed not, but imitating therein the glorious Adventure of the Roman Nero, (who beſieging Annibal, went and defeated Aſdrubal his Brother, and that with ſuch privacy and expedition, that Annibal knew nothing of the Adventure, till he perceived the ſucceſs by the Head of his ſlain Brother, caſt over into his Trenches,) went as far as the River Birſa, and the Valley Corbaria to find them out. Here they joyned Battel, which was fought on both ſides with Courage enough and Animoſity, but Charles ſtill in Fortune as well as Valour was Superiour and got the Day, the Saracens being utterly diſcouraged after the Death of Amonus their Captain. Many of them fell in the Fight, but many more in their Flight, for being to paſs by Boat or ſwim over the River, they periſhed both ways, being ſwallowed up by the Waves, either through their unſkilfulneſs, the violence of the Water, or the overcharging of the Veſſels; the Enemy looſing no time all the while, but preſſing ſtill upon them, and conſpiring for their deſtruction with that watry Element. Charles with great booty, and a multitude of Priſoners, triumphantly returned to the Siege of Narbon, which revenging with all violence imaginable, after Athinus had, upon report of the defeat of the ſuccours, fled away by Sea, be eaſily took it with other eminent Cities of thoſe Parts, as Nemauſam, Biterræ and Agala, as Aimoinus calls them, which, as infected with the venome of Mahometiſm, he burnt to aſhes, and then returned with his victorious Army into France.

And in their own Countrey receive a great overthrow.

Sunt oppida Volcarum Arecomicorum. Nemauſus hodie Nimes. Blitera & Bliteræ. Beſiers ad Obrim fluvium & ad mare. Agathe Rhoe, hodie Age in ora & peninſula inter Araurarim & Ledum fluvios ipſúmq; mare. Aimoinus, lib. 4. c. 57.

Another Invaſion by the Saracens, but with loſs.

138. It might have been imagined that this Nation of the Saracens, by ſo many Rebukes would have been deterred from any farther Attempts upon France, but having multitudes of People to ſpare, and allured by the Riches and pleaſantneſs of the Countrey, they make another Inrode firſt into Gallia Narbonenſis, their own late Poſſeſſion, then take Arles, and in conjunction with Mauricius, the Count of Marſeilles, invade Provence, and pierce as far as the River Varus. Charles finding himſelf perpetually intangled with this troubleſome People, thought fit to call to his Aſſiſtence ſome foreign Prince, and having none at preſent more in his Eye than Luitprand, King of the Lombards in Italy, to him he ſent an honourable Embaſſy with Pipin his Son, who was now grown up to years of Puberty, that according to the cuſtome of Chriſtians in thoſe Ages, he might firſt cut his hair, and by ſuch a Religious Ceremony, become his ſpiritual Father. Luitprand took this as a great honour, and ſending the youth back with rich Preſents, in return to the Embaſſy he undertook an Expedition into Gall. Charles, e'er his Arrival, had ſent his Brother Childebrand before him to Avinion, and afterward in Conjunction with the Lombards, marched himſelf; but his Fame and Reputation got thither firſt, and alone effected what was the deſignment of ſo great preparations; For the Saracens hearing of his Approach forſook the Countrey and ſhifted away. Mauricius being left to himſelf, who, conſcious of ſo great Treachery as he was guilty of, both toward the Franks, and the Chriſtian Religion, quitted Marſeilles, and hid himſelf in the rocky and mountainous places, near the Sea. Charles, with eaſe enough cleared all the Countrey and forced the Saracens once more to contain themſelves within the Pyrenæans, which done, and all Chriſtendom freed from the impending ſlavery, both temporal and ſpiritual, he once more returned home.

Ut more fidelium Chriſtianorum, ejus capillum primus attonderet, ac pater illi ſpiritualis exiſteret. Aimoinus, lib. 4. cap. 57. Paulus Diaconus.

139. Shortly after this Luitprand being returned, took or found occaſion to quarrel with Gregory the third, the Roman Biſhop, for protecting Traſimund, the Duke of Spoletum, who being his Tributary, renounced his Obedience, and fled to Rome for ſuccour. Betwixt the King and the Prelate enſued an heavy War, and Gregory was ſo much put to it, that he implored the aſſiſtence of Charles, and conjured him by all things ſacred, not to hold dearer the Friendſhip of the Lombard, than the Good of the Church, but haſten with all ſpeed to its Relief. But whether that Charles diſtinguiſhed betwixt the Cauſe of the Church, and the Miſtakes and Paſſions of Gregory, or was ſo unmoveable in point of Honour and Generoſity, as to be deaf to all incitements againſt his Friend and Allie, who had ſo well deſerved of him, he was not at all moved by Gregory his Arguments to ſet one foot towards Italy, whatever he might doe by his Pen and Ambaſſadours, to recover a good Underſtanding betwixt the Parties. But neither had he much time to doe any thing this way; for ſhortly after his return from the Expedition againſt the Saracens, he fell ſick of a Fever, at a place called Verberia, ſituate upon the River Iſaca, which caſt him into a Conſumption, whereof, after he had removed to Cariſiacum, at length he died, on the twentieth of October, in the fifty fifth Year of his Age, and the twenty fifth of his Rule or Domination, for his Reign we muſt not call it, though in effect, it was really ſuch, yet doth not onely Aimoinus, but our Beda alſo, give him the Title of Rex, or King, and in the Church of St. Denis, where he lies interred, his Tomb is to be ſeen thus inſcribed, Carolus Martellus Rex, ſo that Pope Gregory may ſeem not to have been altogether well adviſed in his Letters of Addreſs, whereby he deſired aſſiſtence againſt the Lombard, to give him the diminutive Title, and pitifull Complement of Subregulus. But elſewhere the ſame Gregory, with Paul the Deacon, and the Continuatour of the Hiſtory of Gregory of Tours, call him Prince of the Franks, as alſo doth Ludovicus Pius, the Emperour, his Great Grand-Son. Though his Title was but Prince, or Major of Verberie ſur la Riviere d' Oiſe, qui donne le nom d Pontoiſe.

Charles Martell dyes.

In Epitome.

Literis ad Hild. ſcriptis.

Sect. 3.

the Palace, (which he himſelf ſeems to have uſed,) yet ſuch was his Government, and ſo renowned his Actions, which concerned War, that Poſterity gratefully looks upon him as worthy of any Appellation that words (which ought to expreſs things as emphatically as may be) can confer upon him.

Diploma donationis factæ monaſterio cuidam Trajectino prout recitatur ab Heda in Hiſtoria Epiſcoporum Ultrajectinorum habet has ſubſcriptiones: ſignum Illuſtris Viri Caroli Majoris Domus. S. Carlomanni filii ejus, &c.

140. He left ſeveral Children, both legitimate and illegitimate, behind him. By Suanichilde, the Niece (or Daughter) of Odilo, Duke of Baioaria, he had Carloman, Pipin and Gripho; by others, we know not whom, Bernard, St. Remedius, (Archbiſhop of Roan,) Hierome, Hildrude, (or Altrude,) the Wife of Odilo, Duke of Baioaria,) and Landrada, married to Sigiramnus, or Sigramnus, a Potent Man in Hasbania. Before his death he diſpoſed of the Dominions of the Franks (by conſent of the Nobility) to ſome of them, in this manner. To Carloman, his Eldeſt Son, he aſſigned Auſtraſia, with Thuringia, or the Nations inhabiting beyond the Rhine, ſturdy and active People to a ſtout and reſolute Perſon; and to Pipin Burgundy, Neuſtria, Provence, or the other parts of France, Nations more ſoft and gentle to a ſuitable Nature. His other Sons he paſſed by, whether as ſpurious, or for other Reaſons, we know not, but the indignity would not down with Gripho, whoſe Mother (Sunahilde, ſome ſay, the Mother onely of him and Ægidius,) was as impatient as himſelf, and ſeeing he was not admitted as a ſharer, perſuaded him to puſh for the whole Inheritance. They were both more forward than wiſe, and he ſo fool-hardy, as without any conſiderable preparations, to break out into Rebellion, and to ſeize on the City Laudunum, which he ſlightly fortified, as the ſhortneſs of the time and opportunity would permit him. For the two Brothers, upon notice given of his Revolt, ſpeedily raiſed a conſiderable Army, wherewith they laid Siege to the Town, and within a while obliged him to ſurrender and yield himſelf to Mercy, without any terms or conditions whatſoever. This danger was thus happily over, but the Brothers had their handfulls elſewhere; for thoſe People that, living upon the Borders, had by the victorious Arms of Charles been ſubdued, and forced to ſubmit to the yoke, upon his death reſolved to withdraw their Necks, and, as they judged, with ſecurity enough, concluding, that though he had left his Power and Dominion to his Children, yet ſcarcely his Fortune, at leaſt, not his Courage and Dexterity in War.

Aliis Sunabilde.

Aliis Ægidius & Remigius.

Carloman Governour of Auſtraſia, &c.

Pipin in Burgundy and Neuſtria, &c.

Laudunum (hodie Laon en Picardie) oppidum Veromanduorum.

Who ſubdue all their revolting Neighbours.

141. Amongſt the reſt Hanoldus, the Son of Eudo, bore himſelf very high, having, while Charles was yet living, began to practiſe a Revolt, and held Lanfred, the Abbat of St. Germans, who was ſent to perſuade him to deſiſt, as an Enemy, and a Spie, many months in Priſon. The Brothers reſolved to reduce him betimes, e'er he rendred himſelf too conſiderable; and when they were ready to march, to prevent miſchief in their abſence, by advice of Carloman, they committed their Brother Gripho cloſe Priſoner to a ſtrong Caſtle, near the Foreſt Arduenna. They invade Aquitain, and having taken a certain Caſtle, called Lucas, preſently obliged their Adverſary to come in, and ſubmit to Terms, which were, that with the Title of Duke he ſhould hold Aquitain as a Tributary to the Franks. This danger being alſo over from without, to prevent all Jealouſies and Miſunderſtandings betwixt themſelves, e'er they quitted this Province, at a place called Vetus Putavis they parted the Territories of the Franks, according to the Preſcript left them by their Father. Each then departing to his own Poſt, Carloman invaded the Alemans, who had lately revolted, and waſting their Countrey with Fire and Sword, reduced them to obedience, which done, they jointly ſet upon Odilo, the Duke of Baioaria, who renouncing obedience, had uſurped the Title of King, and taken their Siſter Hiltrude to Wife without their conſent. They ſo managed the War, that they made him aſk pardon and leave to retain his Wife with Baioaria, not as an abſolute King, but as a Tributary Duke. This done, Carloman invaded the Saxons, who, upon his Father's Death, had alſo renounced obedience, and having taken the ſtrong Caſtle, called Hoſcoburg, forced Theodorick, their Captain, to crave Peace. This, upon reaſonable terms, was granted; but no ſooner was Carloman withdrawn, but he defied the Franks as formerly, which obliged the Brothers once more to unite their Forces, and jointly to ſet upon him, which they did to ſuch purpoſe, that they ſpeedily wreſted from him another Recantation. Yet did he this ſecond time obtain pardon, it being hard to ſay whether the Love and Union, or the mercifull Diſpoſition of theſe two Brothers was moſt remarkable.

Loches.

Leviel Poictiers.

142. Thus flouriſhed theſe two Sons of Martell, as Succeſſours to his Conduct and Fortune, as well as his Arms, when in the middle of their Glory a thing happened ſo ſtrange, as ſtruck the whole World with admiration. This was, that a Man, a young Man, in the flower of his Age, a Major of the Palace, or rather a Prince, a King, amongſt his Pleaſures, Conqueſts and Triumphs, when he had no reaſon to be melancholy, but to be contrarily affected with his Condition, that ſuch an one ſhould exchange his Robe of Eſtate for the Cowle of a Monk, and the Wealth and Glory of a Kingdom for the Poverty and contemptible Eſtate of a Religious Beggar. But ſo did Carloman, and having given up all into the hands of his Brother, no otherwiſe than as about to die, (as all doe to the World, that take upon them Religion, in which reſpect, before their entrance, they make their Teſtaments,) he went into Italy, and there took upon him the Monaſtical Habit, which, with extraordinary ſelf denial and hardſhip, (though conſidered otherwiſe than as the Son of Charles,) he is ſaid to have retained to his dying day. Such was the temper of Carloman, but Gripho, though his Brother, was nothing at all of his Opinion; for being by the favour of his Brothers ſet at liberty, and living in very good Equipage with Pipin, he could not therewith be ſatisfied, nothing on this ſide Sovereignty could content him. He made his eſcape, and went to the Saxons, whom he knew ſo inclinable to Troubles and Rebellion, that he could eaſily perſuade them to make a War. And for a War they made preparation, putting an Army into his Hands, who incamped himſelf upon the River Onacra, expecting his Brother. Pipin did not much deceive his Expectations, but haſtened with formidable Forces into Saxony, whither when come, he ſo wrought upon the affections of the young Man, as well as thoſe that aſſiſted him, that Pardon being granted for what was paſt, they laid down their Arms, and Gripho was as kindly received, and liberally entertained by his Brother as formerly. But here his Ambition could no more terminate it ſelf than heretofore. Odilo his Brother-in-law was dead in Baioaria, having left a young Son, Taſſilo by name, to the Tuition of his Wife Hiltrude. Thither he goes, and being by his Siſter kindly received, in way of requital, turns her and her Son out of all, and uſurps the Government. Pipin having notice hereof, was more enraged at this baſe Act, than at any thing formerly he had committed, and with a very great Army invades the Countrey, depoſes Gripho, and returns the Government into the Hands of his Siſter, for the benefit and behoof of her young Son the Duke; yet deals he no more ſeverely with his unruly Brother than formerly, but coming back into France, ſtrives to win him with kindneſs, making him a Duke, and according to the cuſtome, giving him the Government of twelve Counties. But neither did this ſignifie any thing to him. He fled once more, and betook himſelf to Wacfarius, the Duke of Aquitain, whoſe beautifull Wife, when he tempted to lie with her, had the Modeſty to refuſe him, with the Diſcretion to acquaint her Husband, who yet had no patience to endure the affront, but took his Life for reparation, though ſome reported, that making a Journey into Italy, after he was baniſhed Acquitain, to provoke the Lombards againſt France, he was killed, as he travelled over the Alpes, by ſome of his Brother's Followers.

Carloman turns Monk.

Pipin ſole Governour.

Onacra vel Ovacra quidam eundem eſſe putant cum Neccaro fluvio.

Griſonem more Ducum duodecim Comitatibus donavit. Aimoinus, l. 4. c. 61.

Annal. Pith.

143. All this while here's ſuch a noiſe of the Maſters or Majors of the Palace, that ſcarcely is there any muttering of the poor Kings of France, for ſuch there were who to this very time wore the Habit and bore the Title. Theodoricus Cala died before Charles Martell, though how long, amongſt ſeveral Opinions, it's uncertain. Some ſay he died ſeven years before Charles, who governed till his death, without ſuch an Image of Authority, ſo that for ſo long a time there was a ridiculous Interregnum. Then did the Sons of Charles, they not as yet daring to aſſume the Name, ſet up another Idol or repreſentation of Royalty, one called Childerick the Third, whether the Son or Kinſman of the late Theodorick it's uncertain, nothing more being upon record concerning him, than that he was ſet up for a time, and then pulled down again, according to the Occaſions and Intereſts of thoſe that promoted him. Such was the condition and ſtate of this Royalty, that no man of Parts or Spirit could poſſibly endure it. The Name of King, the long Hair, the Robe and Idleneſs were the things peculiar to it, onely once a year like a Pageant he muſt be drawn into the City, to be gazed on, in a princely Chariot, according to the cuſtome of theſe times, and afterward returned to the Village or Farm from whence he came, there to be ſhut up from the Eyes of the People, and the Noiſe of all buſineſs, while the Major of the Palace carried it like a King indeed, diſpoſing of all things concerning Peace and War, Life and Death, and all other Rights of Majeſty, Childerick the third made King.

Majeſty, as he himſelf pleaſed, without controll. The onely thing that prolonged the continuance of this Mock Royalty, was the wonderfull Zeal and Devotion the Franks had to the Name and Lineage of Clodonæus, accounting it the fouleſt Crime in Nature, to be guilty of the leaſt Act of Diſloyalty toward it. But the Name of Clodonæus now began to decay with time, and that of Martell was ſo freſh and flouriſhing, as had drawn all Mens Eyes and Expectations upon it. Pipin his Son had the whole Power in his Hands, was in the flower of his Age, was bleſſed with an hopefull Iſſue, and by his own Atchievements had got ſuch Reputation, as this, added to his Father's Name, ſeemed ſufficient to merit the Title of what in effect he was already poſſeſſed. Beſides the whole Nobility, both Churchmen and others, were, by reaſon of their Preferments, obnoxious to his Family.

144. Theſe Conſiderations joined with the Natural temper and Inclination of Mankind to Honours, put him upon the reſolution of aſſuming the Title, and diſpoſing ſome other way with him that at the preſent bore it, who, that he might be puniſhed, muſt needs beforehand be made guilty. He inveighs againſt his ſloth, and the meanneſs of his Capacity, inſiſts upon the grand diſproportion there was betwixt the great Name he bore, and the Abilities he had to diſcharge the Duty, and preſſes it as a thing which mightily reflected upon the Nation of the Franks, to be thought to have ſuch a Ruler as was not in any tolerable capacity to govern himſelf. The truth is, theſe Kings did not govern, neither poſſibly had abilities to doe it; but who was in the fault, whether themſelves, or their Grand Miniſters, the Majors of the Palace, (the Intereſt of whom it was to have them idle and enervated in their minds,) there needs not much ſcrutiny to determine. But it's eaſie to trample upon ſuch as are already down. Pipin inſinuates theſe things into thoſe Noblemen, of whom he could be moſt confident, and they into the People, and at length it is generally affirmed, that it is moſt convenient for the ſafety and grandeur of the Nation, that his ſhould be the Title to whom already belonged, by Cuſtome and Uſage, the whole Power and Juriſdiction. This ſomething ſatisfied their Conſciences, as to the Allegiance they ought to the Houſe of Meroneus, that little more damage could hereby accrue to Childerick, who would be deſpoiled of nothing but a vain and empty Title; and it was beaten into their Ears, that Pipin himſelf was deſcended of the ſame Houſe, by Biltilde, the Daughter of Clotarius the Great, married to a certain Duke, Aribert, or Arbert. But to gain complete ſatisfaction and countenance to the thing, Ambaſſadours are ſent to Zachary Biſhop of Rome, to lay open theſe matters before him. He, without hearing the other Party, adjudgeth Pipin's pretenſions to be very good, and ſends order to Boniface, the Biſhop of Mentz, to anoint him King accordingly, which was done at Soiſſons, and he was carried out upon a ſhield, as the ancient cuſtome was, unto his Throne; Childerick being ſhaven, and thruſt into a Monaſtery. So here the Line of the Meroningi, or of thoſe that deſcended from Meroneus, receiveth its period, in the tenth Year of Conſtantinus Copronymus, and the tenth of Zachary the Roman Biſhop. A. D. 751.

But is ſoon after ſhaven by Pipin, Major of the Palace.

Fuit autem Childericus detruſus in Monaſterium Berlinenſe; ut in Fontanellenſi, Marchianenſi & Bertinenſi Chronicis legitur.

SECT.

SECT. IV.

From the Ruine of the Royal Family of the Meroningi, and the Riſe of that of the Carlovingi, to the ſupreme Height of its Grandeur.

From the Promotion of Pipin, the Son of Charles, to the Title of King, to the Advancement of Charles, the Son of Pipin, to that of Emperour, by the ſame means.

The ſpace of fifty Years.

Sect. 4.

Pipin King.

His Pedigree.

1. THis ſecond Family which from the famous Atchievements of Charles Martell is known by the addition of his Name, was yet joined, as we ſaid, in Affinity with that of Meroneus. For Clotair the Great, the Father of Dagobert the Firſt, married his Daughter Biltilde, or Blitilde, to Duke Aribert, to whom ſhe bore a Son called Arnold. This Arnold was Father to St. Arnold, or Arnulf, the Archbiſhop of Metz, who, before he entred into Orders, begat four Sons, Fendulf, or Ferdulf, Anſigiſus, or Anchiſus, Arnolf, or Clodulf, Biſhop of Metz, (who lies buried in Lay, a Village of Lorrain, but one mile diſtant from Nancy) and Galiſius (or Galchito, or Walchito, or Wandregiſil, or Walgiſus, for all theſe names we meet with) the Father of St. Vandril (ſome call him St. Wandregiſil) the Abbat. Fendulf begot Martin Duke of Auſtria, who was killed by Ebroinus, the Major of the Palace of Neuſtria, and Pipin, ſirnamed Craſſus, or the Groſs, who by Joane his Wife had St. Gertrude, the Abbeſs of Nivel, founded by her Mother, beſides ſeven Sons, and a Daughter, married to Anſegiſus, by ſome called Beggua, and by others Begga, with the addition of Saint, for this is ſhe that founded the Order of the Beguinns, or Nuns, not unknown to any that have viſited the Spaniſh Netherlands, and lies buried at Audenna, in the Countrey of Namur, in the Church of the Monaſtery which ſhe her ſelf had built. Grimoaldus, the Son of Pipin the Groſs, called alſo Laudenſis, being Major of the Palace of Auſtria, in the Reign of Sigebert the Second, endeavouring to diſpoſſeſs Dagobert his Son of his Inheritance, that he might prefer his own Son Ildebert to the Kingdom, was juſtly put to death, and Ildebert was ſlain in the Reign of Ludovicus, or Clodonæus the Firſt. Therefore did Anſegiſus ſucceed to Pipin his Father-in-law, after he was ſlain by Godanus, or his little Son, as they called him, to whom he was Godfather, and whom he had preferred to the greateſt Honours.

Vide Joan. Tilium in Comment. de Rebus Gallicis, lib. 1. De Rege Pipino & Majoribus ipſius. Vide etiam ſtemma Pipini Regis apud Aubertum Maſſonum in Chronic. Belg. qui illud hauſit ex Genealogia Regum ac Principum, Anno 1261 ſcripta, quam titulo Genealogiæ S. Arnulfi P. Pithæus primus edidit. Vide & Notitiam Eccleſ. Belg. c. 3. 20, & 26.

Quem Godanus ut vocant filiolus, hoc eſt ab ipſo oblatus ſacro baptiſmati, ſic Tilius.

Sed pro Godan certè legendum Godſon, ſive Godtſon, ita enim appellatur Teutonibus quibuſdam ille qui oblatus eſt ſacro baptiſmati.

2. Anſegiſus on Begga begot Pipin the Second, (from the place of his Birth it's probable, viz. Hariſtall, or Herſtall, near Leige, where was a ſtately Palace in the time of Charles the Great,) ſirnamed Heriſtallius. This Pipin, by Plectrude had two Sons, Drogo, or Druides, who by Auſonde, the Daughter of Warento, the Prefect of the Palace of Neuſtria, had Hugo, who in his Father's Lifetime was Major of the Palace of Neuſtria, and died in the Mock Reign of Childebert the Third, through his Wife's jealouſie, and the careleſsneſs of Tierdaldes his Son, who ſucceeded his Grandfather Pipin in the Government, but was hindred by Ermanfredus. Pipin's ſecond Son by Plectrude was Grimoaldus, and by Alpais, or Elpida, his Concubine, he had a Son called Charles, and ſirnamed Martell, beſides another named Childebrand, begotten, as Tilly thinketh, of another Concubine, though Aimoinus calls him his Germanus, or full Brother. Charles Martell had four Sons and a Daughter by Sigibert, called Lanladra, and by Aimoinus Hiltrude, who being ſtoln by Odilo or Bacillo bore him two Sons Taſſilo, who ſucceed him in the Title and Office of Duke, by the favour of his Uncle Pipin, and afterward ingratefully rebelled againſt him, and his Son Charles the Great, and Grodogand Biſhop of Metz, who founded the Abby of Gorza in Loraine. The four Sons of Charles were Carloman, Pipin the little, and by ſome Sirnamed Pius, Ægidus or Remigius the Arch-Biſhop of Rouen, and Grypho begot on his Concubine Nachilde the Niece of Odilo Duke of Bavaria. Tilly thinks it probable, that the Arch-Biſhop and Grypho were Baſtards, becauſe in the Partition of France, they were left out by their Father, ſo great incertainty is there both of Names and other Circumſtances in theſe Genealogies. To be ſure Pipin after the Receſs of Carloman became Maſter of the Kingdom of the Franks, and at length dared to take the Title as well as the thing, being thereto incouraged by his good Friend the Biſhop of Rome: And ſo much of the Pedegree of the Kings of that ſecond Line, from John Tily, which how far it agrees with the former Hiſtory the Reader is to conſider, though for the main he cannot but approve it.

He invades Saxony.

3. Pipin having thus aſſumed the Title of King, and rejected that of Major of the Palace, after he had held it about ten Years from the Death of his Father, with a great Army invaded Saxony, either to take Mens minds and Tongues off from the late Revolution, or to let them ſee that he very well deſerved the Title; and the expedition ſucceeded according to his Wiſhes, the Saxons being beaten at the River Veſera notwithſtanding they made ſtout oppoſition. By the late Incouragement and Aſſiſtence which Pope Zachary had afforded him, in obtaining the Crown he had contracted ſuch a Debt to that See, as very difficultly could ever be diſcharged; for though Zachary died ſoon after, yet the Biſhop of Rome being alive again under the Name of Stephen, exacted it as his proper Creditour. It happened that a Quarrel aroſe, betwixt Aiſtulphus the Lombard and him (upon what account in the Hiſtory of that Kingdom, we ſhall more nearly enquire) which came to that height, that the King having taken Ravenna, and baniſhed the Exarch out of Italy, ſeized on Narnia, and brought his Army before Rome it ſelf. Stephen was at his Wits end, not knowing what Courſe to take, but remembring how his Predeceſſour had obliged Pipin, he ſends to him, deſiring he would, as the phraſe was, Undertake the Protection of the Prince of the Apoſtles, and by ſome means or other make way for his ſpeedy coming to his Preſence. Pipin ſends his Ambaſſadours and gets the Biſhop out of Rome, Aiſtulph being perſuaded for the preſent to forbear Hoſtility, and to Pipin he comes, who as he was obliged receives him with very great Reverence, intending to make farther uſe of him, for ſtrengthening that lately received Title, which by the means of Zachary he had firſt procured.

Is anointed King by Pope Stephen.

4. That the matter might proceed with the greater Shew of Religion, he is lodged in the Monaſtery of St. Denis near to Paris, where he falls dangerouſly ſick; but by the Procurement of St. Peter, St. Paul, and that Saint is reſtored again to Health, for ſome notable end, ſome great Work doubtleſs to be performed. He was ſo much in the favour of thoſe Saints as to obtain his Life and Health, and in ſo much eſteem farther with them, as by Revelation to underſtand that it was by their means, and ſpecial Procurement; what Credit therefore ought not to be given to ſuch a Perſon, who in any thing of the greateſt Conſequence could not be ſuppoſed, but to be indued with an infallible Spirit. After his recovery, he ſends for Pipin, his Wife, and two Sons, Carloman and Charles to be preſent at the Conſecration of a new Altar, which he had erected as a Monument of his Gratitude to theſe Saints, and this muſt not be in private, but a great Concourſe of People muſt be admitted. There, and then takes he occaſion ſolemnly to anoint and inaugurate afreſh Pipin for King, together with his two Sons, and Bertrude his Wife for Queen; openly pronouncing him a true and Legitimate King, his Sons Heirs of his Kingdom, and that it was utterly unlawfull for the time to come for the Franks to chuſe any but of his Lineage. Pipin we are told endured this, good Man, with Patience, having been formerly anointed by Boniface, and ſubmitted to it out of Prudence, knowing that the Opinion of the great Sanctity of the Man, and the mighty Reverence that was born to his high place and Dignity, would be as a Religious Curb upon the People to reſtrain them from any Attempt, which might be Inconſiſtent with his Royal Intereſt.

5. But being paid his Wages before-hand, he could not be ſo unjuſt as not to doe his Work, and therefore an Aſſembly of the Franks is held, to deliberate upon the War to be made againſt the Lombards. Here the matter found great oppoſition;

A Conſultation about the War with the Lombards.

Sect. 4.

Eginhartus.

for many of the Nobility conſidering what danger might ariſe from ſuch a Quarrel, declared that Charles Martell his Father out of his great Wiſedom, and forecaſt had refuſed to undertake the Expedition againſt Luitprand, and they plainly declared, that in Caſe he was reſolved to make a War he ſhould go alone for them, for they would inſtantly depart to their Houſes. But there was a greater rub than this in the way, which had not been thought of, and with much greater difficulty could be removed. Carloman the Monk, and Brother of Pipin lived at this time in the Monaſtery of Caſinum within the Dominions of Aiſtulph the Lombard King, who bethinking himſelf what Service he might doe him in this Caſe, ſent to the Abbat and Commanded him to ſend his Monk into France to his Brother, to diſſwade him from aſſiſting Stephen, vowing elſe to fire the Monaſtery over his Head, and utterly to deſtroy the Neſt and Harbour of ſo many Traitours. Carloman by Virtue of his Holy obedience is bound to comply with the Abbat, and into France he comes, where he is no doubt lovingly received by his Brother. He lays the Law ſorely to him, and both to him and the Aſſembly affirms it, to be a point of the greateſt Wickedneſs for the ſake of Stephen to have War made upon ſo famous a Seminary, and that brought to Deſtruction, which had been the Nurſery of ſo many Saints. And Stephen himſelf ſeemed to be wonderfully afflicted with the thought of War, like a pious Biſhop, conſidering that he was the Father of all, as well the Prodigal as the obedient Children, and therefore with the greateſt Reſentment imaginable, the good Man abhorred the Effuſion of Chriſtian Bloud.

Chronicon Caſinenſe, lib. 1. c. 7.

6. But Pipin having already taſted of Royalty, his Appetite was thereby inflamed with a greater deſire of Honour and Dominion, and having had hitherto very good Succeſs in France, by dealing with the Biſhop of Rome, ſhould his Arms prove Succeſsfull againſt the Lombards, he knew not what great uſe he might make of his Friendſhip in Italy, for laying the Foundations at leaſt of more Empire and Glory, to his Poſterity in the time to come. He reſolves to undertake the War at any Rate: The good old Man he perſuades at length to admit of Conſolation, ſeeing this Expedition would tend to the Eſtabliſhment of the Right of the Prince of the Apoſtles, and the Advancement of the Church. His Brother Carloman he permits not to return into Italy, but when he would needs retire from Court, perſuades him to live in the Monaſtery at Vienne, where the Religious Prince died not long after, and ſo put an end to all difficulties, which had ariſen on his part. There wanted nothing now, but to make the Nobility ſwallow the Pill, which at length was effected by the guild of Religion, an Holy and meritorious War, being of ſo great moment with the King, that he vows he will go in Perſon, though it were with no more than one or two Attendants. He affirms, he was not biaſſed by private Reſpects, but was ingaged for the good of the Church, to which he promiſed to deliver the Exarchate and Pentapolis, as ſoon as he had recovered them by Arms, which he confirmed by a publick Inſtrument, Signed and Sealed by him and his Sons, and ſolemnly ſworn to. And to give clear and full Satisfaction, as well to the Biſhop as others, he ſent once or twice to Aiſtulph, offering him Peace upon ſuch Terms as he might well aſſure himſelf he would not accept.

Pipin reſolves upon it.

7. Now nothing but the ſound of Trumpets, and the Neighing of Horſes, and the ratling of Armour is to be heard: The Nobility are aſhamed to deſert ſo meritorious a Cauſe, and the Biſhop is at laſt perſuaded to accept of St. Peter's Patrimony, though redeemed by the price of Chriſtian Bloud. Pipin marches toward the Alpes, and Aiſtulph being deaf to ſuch Propoſitions as come out of France, prepares as effectually as he can for Reſiſtence. But Anaſtaſius the Popes Library Keeper, here makes him a Fool as well as a Knave; to be guilty of ſo great an Overſight, as to leave open the paſſages of theſe Mountains, which he might eaſily have ſeized, and ſo barred to the Franks all Acceſs into the Countrey. He adds that perceiving too late his Errour, he ſent multitudes of armed Men againſt them, but they eaſily maſtered them, and broke into Italy with that violence, that Aiſtulphus himſelf who beheld the ſight, concluded they were not to be reſiſted, and putting Spurs to his Horſe, never ſtopt till he came to Pavia the Metropolis of his Kingdom. But Aimoinus writes, that the Straits of the Alpes were before-hand ſeized, and guarded by the Lombards, and he (or ſome other, for it's evident, that the Book that goes under his Name, was compoſed by ſeveral Authours) is ſo faithfull to his Countreymen, as to give them the full Honour of the Enterprize, which the more difficult it was the greater muſt needs be the Conduct of the General, and the Courage of his Souldiers. He tells us, they were conſtrained to fight in a place moſt difficult of Acceſs to them, and moſt advantageous for their Enemies, whom yet they beat off from their Poſts, made them run away, and with great Glory, and ſome prey became Maſters of their Camp. This Victory thus obtained, Pipin reſolved to follow it on, and marching to Pavia there beſieged Aiſtulphus, who bethinking himſelf what advantage the Franks had againſt him, the Alpes now lying open to all the Inrodes they would pleaſe to make, reſolved to grant ſuch terms as they ſhould be obliged to accept, and cut off all their Pretences. Theſe were to doe Juſtice to the See of Rome, in order to which he ſwore to give up the Exarchate and Pentapolis to Stephen, and in Confirmation of the Agreement, delivered up into the hands of Pipin, forty Hoſtages.

And forces the Lombards to agree to his Terms.

Which being not performed,

He makes another Journey with his Army, and ſees it done.

8. Pipin hereupon returned home, after whoſe departure the Quarrel betwixt the King and the Biſhop revived, and returned to that height, that Aiſtulph refuſed to give up the places formerly mentioned, and in Concluſion went and laid Siege to Rome it ſelf, as unjuſtly alſo detained from him. Stephen cloſely beſieged, and not knowing of any help nearer at hand, writes and ſends once more into France, giving to the King thereof, his Sons and Nobility mighty good Words, and perſonating St. Peter and the Bleſſed Virgin with melting Arguments inviting them, to take upon them the defence of the Church, promiſing them in recompence not onely Happineſs here, but alſo in that World which is to come. Pipin was not deaf to this Charmer, but raiſing an Army with ſpeed, returned into Italy, but in his way was encountred by an Ambaſſadour ſent from Conſtantinus Copronymus the Emperour, who expoſtulated with him for endeavouring to deliver the Exarchate, and Pentapolis into the hands of the Roman Biſhop, to whom they did not at all belong, but were the Inheritances of the Empire, and had been Governed by Deputies or Exarchs, for the ſpace of no leſs than two hundred Years. He put off the Ambaſſadour with Words, profeſſing a deep Senſe of Religion, and a Zeal for the Church, and he followed on his Journey; which underſtood by Aiſtulph he broke up his Siege, and got him again to Pavia, where being beſieged as formerly, he perceived there was no way to cut off the Pretence of the Invaſion of Italy, and the Ruine of his Kingdom from the Franks, but by delivering up the places in Contention; which he really did, and ſo ſufficient Order being taken therein, and Pipin's work being done at preſent nothing farther remained, but to return home.

More Francico in manus Regis Vaſſalicum manibus ſuis ſemetipſum commendavit: fidelitatèmque tam ipſi Regi Pipino quam filiis ejus Carolo & Carlomanno jurejurando ſupra Corpus ſancti Dionyſii promiſit, &c. Lib. 4. c. 64.

He gives another defeat to the Saxons.

Stirs in Aquitain.

9. After his return, he held an Aſſembly of the Eſtates at Compendium, from which ſome idlely Divine the Original of the French Parliaments. Thither came Taſſilo his Nephew the Duke of Bavaria, with the chief of his Nobility, and did Homage to the King according to the French Cuſtome, as Aimoinus Words it, which what it was, we ſhall Diſcourſe in another place more proper to a Diſquiſition about the Nature of Feodataries and Vaſſals. Pipin much ſatisfied with this Honour done him by his Nephew, marched againſt the Saxons, who being Idolaters, and bearing minds truely German, or impatient of the Yoke, continually rebelled. He pierced far into their Countrey, and though they oppoſed him to the utmoſt, conſtrained them once more to beg Peace, which they were to purchaſe by a yearly Tribute of three hundred Horſes to be ſent to the Annual Aſſembly of the Eſtates, a means both to furniſh the Franks with War, and to weaken them by a conſtant Diminution of the numbers of ſo fit a Creature for that Service. Thus ſucceeded his Projects which way ſoever he turned him, when new Work was made for him in Aquitain through the differences that were riſen betwixt Gaiffar his Vaſſal the Duke of that Countrey, and the Church-men, who complained that he dealt violently and injuriouſly with them, not ſuffering them to enjoy thoſe Poſſeſſions, which the Bounty and Piety of good Chriſtians had conferred on their Predeceſſours. He anſwered to theſe Criminations, that Aquitain having been lately held by the Saracens, and before that by the Viſiogoths, that were Arians, the bounds of the Inheritances and Poſſeſſions, as well of the Eccleſiaſticks as private Perſons, were confuſed and uncertain, that it was a difficult matter to diſpoſſeſs thoſe who had long been ſeized of Contentious Titles, which they affirmed to be very good, and that it was better to let things reſt as they were, than out of Countenance to ſome extreme Pretenſions to imbroil the State with ſuch a multitude of Suits as muſt needs follow, if a Door ſhould ever be opened to this violent and conceited ſort of People.

10. Pipin not ſatisfied with this Anſwer, thought that a Convenient opportunity was offered, for abating the height of Gaiffar and his Adherents, and raiſing a very conſiderable Army invaded Aquitain, Gaiffar was ſurprized, as not having imagined the King would either have brought ſuch a Force, or uſed ſuch Expedition, and found himſelf obliged to try all means poſſible to ſend him back; therefore he promiſed promiſed to reſtore the Church-Lands to thoſe, to whom of Right they belonged, and for that purpoſe gave up into the hands of Pipin, two Hoſtages of the prime Nobility of the Countrey. The Satisfaction being adequate to the complaint, Pipin could not but ſeem ſatisfied, and receiving the Hoſtages returned back to Cariſiacum, where he wintred and kept his Chriſtmaſs and the Eaſter following. In Summer, he held the Aſſembly of the Eſtates in a Village called Duria, whither News was brought him, that Gaiffar notwithſtanding his Oath, and the delivery of the Hoſtages, to be revenged for the former Invaſion of his Territories, had made an Excurſion into Burgundy as far as Chalon, which troubled him the leſs, becauſe the Eſtates being now met together, he could have the better, and more ſpeedy Aſſiſtence for another Expedition. And another expedition he made, wherein ſome places he took by Force, as Borbonum, Cantilla and Clarus Mons, and others yielded themſelves, eſpecially ſuch as belonged to the Arverni. All that he found unfortified he burnt in his paſſage as far as Lemonices, and then returning home kept his Chriſtmaſs and Eaſter in the ſame place, where he had celebrated theſe Feſtivals the Year preceding. But all the while his mind ran upon the Inſolence of Gaiffar, which he thought he had not yet ſufficiently chaſtiſed, and therefore the Summer following he made a third Voyage into Aquitain, where he took the City Bituricum with the Caſtle Toarcum.

Sect. 4.

Quel'on penſe eſtre Crecy ſur Oiſe.

Pipin makes three expeditions into Aquitain.

Bourbon ſurnomme le Noble, Chanteles, Clermont d'Auvergne Limoges.

Bourges & le chas teau de Touars.

11. Gaiffar perceiving he was not able to keep ſo many places, either for that they wanted due Fortifications, or he Men to Garriſon them, or becauſe he durſt not truſt the Inhabitants, diſmantled ſeveral of them, thinking to render them uſeleſs to the Enemy, not perceiving that hereby he gave him a notable Advantage. For thoſe that were moſt tenable, Pipin cauſed to be repaired and Garriſoned by his own Men, and chaſing all that belonged to the Duke out of the Countrey, lying betwixt the Loire as far as Limoges, he returned to Crecy, where having paſſed Chriſtmaſs and Eaſter, in the Spring following he was fit for another Voyage. He appointed the Rendezvous to be at Nivernæ, and by that way entred Aquitain deſtroying all with Fire and Sword he met with as far as Cadurcia; which done, he returned to Limoges, where he gave ſeveral Lands to the Churches, and to that of St. Martial the Bannum Aureum, he had taken from Gaiffar. In this laſt Expedition Taſſilo, who as his Vaſſal had all this while ſerved under his Uncle, pretended Indiſpoſition of Body, and getting him home afterward, denied to pay that Service, which was due to him. That put Pipin to a ſtand, not knowing what Reſolution to take, for ſhould he go about to chaſtiſe the Temerity of his Nephew. Gaiffar might recover all again in Aquitain, and render uſeleſs the Travel of ſo many Years; and ſhould he march to perfect his Work in this Countrey, he feared an Invaſion from the Bavarian Duke, who had newly married the Daughter of Deſiderius King of the Lombards, and he knew not what farther Alliance with the Saxons, and others of his Neighbours he had contracted.

A fourth.

Nevers.

Cahors.

Je croy la banniere d'or.

12. He was ſo diſtracted in his thoughts, that after an Aſſembly of the Eſtates held at Wormes, he reſolved neither to march one way nor other, but keep himſelf at home, as appears from Aimoinus he did the Year alſo following, wherein he held the uſual Aſſembly at the Village Actiniacum, and wintred at Aquiſgranum. But Sigebert writes that this Year he made another Expedition into Aquitain, and Conquered Agennum, Petrogorica and Engoliſma with almoſt all the Countrey; and Fauchet the Preſident it ſeems had a Copy which hinted farther, that he made one Apto his Arch-Chaplain Biſhop of Engoliſma, which promotion of his, he thinks might poſſibly give occaſion to the Privilege, challenged ſtill by the Biſhops of that place, that as ſoon as the Kings ſet Foot in Aquitain they are chief Chaplains, which yet Lewis the younger would not grant to Lambert, the Biſhop of the ſame See, who when the King was in Germany laid claim to it. To be ſure the Year following, Pipin being inflamed with a deſire of ending this War, commanded his Forces to meet at Orleance whence he marched again into his Enemies Countrey, and in his way cauſed the Caſtle of * Argentomagna, which Gaiffar had demoliſhed, to be built up again, and having both therein, and in the City of Bourges procured Garriſons of his Franks to be placed to hold theſe parts of Aquitain in Subjection, he returned and celebrated the Nativity of our Lord at † Salmontiacum, and at Gentiliacum kept his Eaſter, where he cauſed a Synod to meet, to debate ſome Queſtions riſen about the Bleſſed Trinity, and the Worſhipping of Images.

Palais d'Atigny. Aix la Chappelle Ad A. D. 765. Agen Perigueux & Angouleſme.

A fifth.

 Argenton.*

† Salmontiacum Fauchet conde eſtre Mont Saulgeonon chas leau prochain & appertenant al Eveſque de Langres. Gentiliacum l'on peuſe eſtre le village vois in de Paris portant ce nom.

13. Sigebert tells us, that in this late Expedition Remiſtanius the Brother of Eudo, and Uncle of Gaiffar was taken Priſoner, and for his often turning, ſometimes to his Nephew and ſometimes to the King, was hanged by his Command upon a Gibbet. Now alſo the report of his Succeſs was ſo ſtrong amongſt the Saracens, that Amyrmonon their King in Spain ſent an Honourable Embaſſy with great Preſents, deſiring a Peace and Alliance with him. Winter being over, he once again renewed the War, and reſolved to make one Expedition more into Aquitain by the way of Narbon, which he took with Toulouſe and Arles and many other places, and then returned to Vienne to refreſh his Army; which having done for ſometime, not willing to looſe the latter end of the Summer, he again marched to Bourges, and there held an Aſſembly of the Eſtates, as ſome Authours ſay, in the Field according to the ancient Cuſtome of the Franks. Thence marched he as far as the River Garonne, and having taken many Forts and Retirements, where the Enemy had fortified himſelf, he returned back to Bourges and there wintred. Aſſoon as the Seaſon of the Year would permit, he haſted to perfect his Conqueſt and came to the City * Sanctonica, where the Mother and Siſter with a Niece of Gaiffar were preſented to him, whom Commanding to be Civilly treated, he returned to the Garonne, and coming to a place called Montes, there Eronnicus came in to him with another Siſter of Gaiffar ſuppoſed to be his Wife. Having done ſome few more Exploits he returned, and in a place called Fels kept his Eaſter, which Feſtival being finiſhed he marched back to Sanctonica, and there leaving his Wife and Family; reſolved before his return to find out Gaiffar, who had put him to ſo much trouble which he did in the Territories of Petragoricum, and having ſlain him in Battel, or otherwiſe it's not very certain how, his Work being done, he returned thither from whence he had ſet forth.

Nos Auciens, dit Fauchet, appelloyent ce Seigneur, Miramamolin, jazoit q'uille faille dire Emir Momin, C'eſt a dire Empereur en langue Arabeſque.

Et priſt de force Arles que je penſe eſtre la ville de Provence pour je ne Scay queile raiſon appelle le bluna par tous nos anciens Francois.

* Xainctes.

Having ſlain Gaiffar Duke of Aquitain he finiſhes the War.

14. Such is the general Account of this War, which is given us by very good Hiſtorians. But as to the particular Nations or People, that were ingaged, Fredegarius by Name mentions the Vaſcons or Waſcons, who, when Pipin marcht the laſt time to the Garonne, inhabiting beyond this River came to his Preſence, and gave both their Oaths and Hoſtages, that for the time to come, they would ever be Subject and Obedient to him, his two Sons Charles and Carloman, and their Poſterity. He adds, that ſeveral others who had followed Waifar or Gaiffar did the like, and that King Pipin kindly accepted of them. Now by theſe Words, Vaſcones qui ultra Garonnam Commorantur, The Vaſcons who dwell beyond the Garonne, is hinted, that this ſort of People had at this time Conquered and ſeized on that part of Aquitain called Novempopulania, which is bounded by the River of Garonne. This is confirmed by Teſtimony of an ancient Authour, of the Life of Ludovicus Pius, who reckoning up the memorable things performed by Charles the Great; and making mention occaſionally of the Garonne lets fall this Expreſſion, that, It bounded thoſe of Aquitain and the Vaſcons. That they now inhabited that Countrey, we do little doubt, but at what time they ſhould make this Invaſion and Conqueſt is the great Queſtion. An ancient Parchment of the great Church of Auſes, written by a Prieſt thereof, near ſix hundred Years ſince, relates that the Vaſcons in the days of Clodonæus the Firſt, left the Mountains, and invading Aquitain, having ſlain thoſe Counts and Viſcounts which that King there had placed, put others in their Room. Elias Vinetus would have this to have happened about the Year 590; but his, and the Conjecture of the Prieſt are both built upon weak Foundations, for in the Reign of Dagobert that they inhabited yet about the Pyrenæans, and were not deſcended into the Plain, is evident from ſeveral ancient Authours, particularly from the Chronicon of Fredegarius, the Life of St. Amaidus written about the ſame time, and Iſidorus Hiſpalenſis who lived in the days of that ſaid King. Some there are who Fanſie that they were invited by Eudo the Duke of Aquitain, and placed by him in that Region now called Gaſcoigne, but without any Ground at all, upon frivolous Suggeſtions. The Authour of the Life of St. Julian the Biſhop of Bearne, refers this bold Attempt of the Vaſcons to the time of Ebroinus the Major of the Palace, when, as he ſaith, they and other Neighbouring Nations made choice of one Lupus for their Prince, who did much miſchief to the Kingdom of the Franks. This probably is that Lupus who about the Year 670, aſſiſted Paul againſt Wamba the King of the Goths, as St. Julian the Archbiſhop of Tolouſe, hath left recorded in the Hiſtory which he writ concerning the ſaid Wamba.

The Vaſcons ſubmit to him.

Ad Ann. 767. Prædictus rex Pipinus uſque ad Garonnam acceſſit, ibi Waſcones, qui ultra Garonnam commorantur, ad ejus præſentiam venerunt, &c.

Garumna nobilis Aquitaniæ fluvius ex Pyrenæo oritur, ſcil. Auræ ſaltu: Toloſam primum alluit. Inde Aginnum & Burdigalam nobiliſſimas Aquitaniæ urbes perlabitur, unde æſtuoſus & majorum navium patiens in Aquitanicum ſinum fertur.

C. 78.

Hi (Vaccei quos cum Vaſconibus confundit) Pyrenæis jugis peramplam montis habitant ſolitudinem, iidem & Vaſcones quaſi Vaccones C. in S. literam demutata.

Vide Notitiam Vaſconiæ, p. 393.

15. Some there are, who will have this Lupus Father to Eudo the Duke: Others will have him not the Son of this, or any other Lupus, but of Bertrand the Duke of Aquitain. All theſe are mere Conjectures founded upon no material Arguments, and therefore no otherwiſe than as ſuch are to be regarded. We may conclude ſafely yet, that in the latter time of the firſt Race of the Kings, when the

UMI

The time of their coming thither.

Valour of Clodonæus his Poſterity was degenerated, when the Majors of the Palaces contended amongſt themſelves, and ſeeking to eſtabliſh their Power at home, little regarded what was done upon the Borders, that then the numerous and Courageous Vaſcons took the Advantage, and pouring in themſelves into Novempopulania, there fixed; the Officers of theſe parts being not able to reſiſt them, or content to let them alone, on Condition, that in theſe Turbulent times they might have their Governments ſecured to them. This we are apt to believe from the Caſe of Eudo and his Succeſſours, Hunald, and Waifar or Gaiffar, who in theſe great Wars they managed againſt Charles Martell, Pipin, and Charles the Great, ſeldom made uſe of any other Souldiers than the Vaſcons, to the chief of which Nation they committed their principal Towns and Caſtles, as appears ſufficiently from the Appendix of Fredegarius, the ancient Annals publiſhed by Pithæus, Marquardus, Freherus, Andrew du Cheſne, and others. Now that from theſe Vaſcons the Countrey was called * Gaſcoigne or Gaſcony, V being changed into G (as is ordinary in other Words) is confeſſed by † Elias Vinetus Sancto lately mentioned, as alſo by the Natives of that Countrey, as || Belleforeſt, * Scipio, Dupleix, and † Joſeph Scaliger himſelf, although he ſeems to have erred in this point, that he thought them placed in this Countrey partly by Pipin after his Conqueſt of them, and afterward by Ludovicus Pius.

* Petrus Chiniacenſis in Provincia Novempopulana, quæ vulgo Guaſconiæ vocatur.
† In Auſon. ep. 25. num. 493.
|| Lib. 3. c. 43. deſcript. 4. orbis partium.
* Comment Rerum Gallic. l. 4. c. 16. & in Annal. in vita Clotarii. 4.
† In Notitia Galliæ.

Aquitain what, and how ſo called.

16. But theſe People ſeated themſelves in Novempopulania, a part of Aquitain; we are therefore obliged to tell the Reader firſt, what is meant by Aquitain, and then by Novempopulania. The Name of Aquitain Originally, and properly was given to that Tract of Ground lying about that City, which the French at this day call Acs, the Gaſcons Dacs, by Ptolemy named Aquæ Auguſtæ, by Vibius Sequeſter Tarbella, in Bentingers Itinerary Table, Aquis, and Aquiſe in the Baſque Language. It took this Name from the hot Waters iſſuing out of the Earth, which were famous in the times of the Romans, as appears from thoſe ſtately Marble Seats, yet to be ſeen on the Brink of the Fountain, as Vinetus relateth. The frequent Concourſe out of Italy to theſe Waters, after the Romans had ſubdued the Countrey, in probability gave occaſion to the building of it, for that it was the Work of the Romans, we are perſuaded not onely from the Latine Name, but the Aqueduct and ſeveral others of ſuch like Monuments yet remaining. That this Countrey was in the Poſſeſſion, and Power of that People long before the coming of Cæſar into Gall, is both evident from * himſelf, and from another † Teſtimony; I mean that which is terminated by the River Garonne, the Ocean and the Pyrenæan Mountains, that part eſpecially lying upon the Sea and the Hills, and probable it is, that then this received the Name of Aquitain, which by degrees was Communicated to all thoſe Parts that lye beyond the Garonne, as appears from || Pliny; who farther informs us, that before this Region had this Name of Aquitain, it was called Arecomica, or Aremorica rather, as others reade it with better Reaſon, becauſe from * Cæſar it appears, that all the Cities of Gall which lay upon the Sea, were of Cuſtome, called Armoricæ the Word it ſelf † expreſſing their ſituation.

Ubi hodie eſt Præfectura Aquenſis Seneſcall. Landarum dicta.
* De bello Gall. l. 3. c. 20.
† Livii epitom. l. 93.
|| Vide Plin. l. 4. c. 17. & 19.
* Lib. 7. de bello Gallico. e. 14. & l. 8. c. 5.
† Armor enim ad mare vel ſupra mare ſitum ſignificat ex eo forte Poſteriores aviti Idiomatis memores Lemonicum quod eſt Aquitaniæ primæ oppidum, etſi in interiori ejus parte, in Armoricana Regione ſitum dixere. Ut bene innuit Alteſerra Rer. Aquitanic. lib. 1. c. 1.

17. To Water therefore it hath been ſtill beholding for its Name. As from the Sea it was firſt in the Gallick Language called Armor or Armorica, ſo afterwards Aquitania from the Medicinal Waters found therein, which flowed out of the Earth in ſeveral other places beſides Acs, for we reade of Aquæ Bigertonum, Thermæ Oneſiæ, Aquæ Convenarum, Aquæ Calidæ in Armoricorum finibus, beſides others of which it is not here proper for us to inſiſt. And if the Conjectures of ſome be true, the laſt name of Guienne given to that part of it which remains in the juriſdiction of the Senate of Bourdeaux, at ſuch time as a Conteſt aroſe about the Countrey, betwixt the Engliſh and the French Nations, owneth no other Original; ſome affirming it corrupted from the word Aquitain, and others deriving it from Aigne, which in the Language of the very place ſignifieth Water. They tell you the firſt ſyllable is cut off according to the Cuſtome of the French with Vowels when they are to meet with Le and La. To be ſure others more improbably derive it from the Guilielmi or Williams, the Dukes thereof, as if it were Guielmia, (this being the ordinary Name of thoſe Princes, as thoſe of Pharaoh and Ptolemy for the Kings of Ægypt.) For in their days there was no ſuch Name as Guienne, nor to be ſure till that of the Williams was quite forgotten. We ſhall diſmiſs Aquitain with this farther hint to the Reader, that till Auguſtus his time, it was terminated with the Garonne and the Pyrenæans; But he inlarged it as far as the Loire, and then was it divided, and afterwards otherwiſe altered, that which retains the Name at this day, containing not above a third part of what was ſo called by the Emperour.

Garumna Cæſari Veteris Aquitaniæ terminus, ſed ex quo auctior facta uſque ad Ligerim, & diviſa in primam, ſecundam & tertiam quæ Novempopulania dicta eſt, tandémque Vaſconia, tertiæ Aquitaniæ ſeu Vaſconiæ terminus fuit Garumna: unde in vita Ludovici Pii, Garumna fluvius Vaſconum & Aquitanorum conterminus dicitur. A Garumna fluvio Cæſari Garumni dicti populi hujuſce fluminis Accolæ, vulgo le pays de Riviere. Alteſerra Rerum Aquitan. lib. 1. c. 21.

18. But that part of Aquitain (or Aputain more properly ſo called) lying betwixt the Garonne, the Pyrenæans and the Ocean, which our Vaſcons ſeized, was alſo called Novempopulania, ſometimes reckoned a Province of it ſelf, and Aquitain taken as contradiſtinct to it, being divided onely into two, the firſt and ſecond, and otherwhile called Aquitania Tertia, or reckoned as the third part of this Diviſion. Whence it ſhould be called Novempopulania, from what Nine ſeveral People is not agreed; for in the Notice of the Provinces, twelve ſeveral People are attributed to it; ſome therefore think the true Name of the Province to be Duodecimpopulania. Others would have it's name Undecimpopulania, from the eleven Dioceſes of Auſcs the Seat of the Metropolitan, as if the Limits of Provinces and Nations which were ſet long before there were any ſuch things as Dioceſes ſhould be regulated and bounded by them, than the Rules and bounds of which nothing can be more uncertain. For Dioceſes by no certain Law are meaſured, but ſometimes like Wedges, otherwhiles obliquely are inſerted into Neighbouring Provinces, nay ſometimes run far into foreign Nations, as it's certain ſome Gallick Dioceſes bordering upon Spain, Italy and Germany, penetrate into thoſe very Countries, as theirs again do into Gall it ſelf. Now it would be excellent Logick, thence to infer that France is in Germany, Spain or Italy, or part of them are in France, ſo ſilly is the courſe of determining of Provinces and People by the limits of Dioceſes, which yet is practiſed by moſt of the French Writers. The way to aſſign the Names of People is not to expreſs the ſeveral Towns of the Dioceſes, as the Authour of the Book of the Roman Provinces practiſed, but the Names of the Nations themſelves which in Novempopulania (ſo called after that Adrian the Emperour had reduced them into the form of a Province) were theſe: the Meduli, the Vibiſci, Boii, Tarbelli, Vaſalii, Bigerri, Tabali, Auſcii, Convenæ, and Datii.

Novempopulania what.

Qua in re etiam Cæſar erravit Belli Gallici libro tertio, ibi enim gentes tres duntaxat Aquitanicas recenſet, pro gentibus autem oppidanos & paganos novem hoc probat Monetus Jeſuita in Geographia Aquitanica, p. 102.

19. Since we have brought the Vaſcons into Novempopulania, and have diſcovered the Names, Situation, and nature of this their new Seat; we muſt not be forgetfull of thoſe they left behind them, for that the Elder ſort of People ſtaid behind, and that thoſe are their Poſterity which ſtill live about the Pyrenæan Mountains, and are called Vaſci or Baſques, cannot be doubted by any that have been the leaſt converſant amongſt ancient Hiſtorians. Betwixt the Names of Vaſcones and Vaſci there is no difference, but that of Declenſion, as might be made evident by ſeveral particulars, but this may ſuffice, that thoſe People that live at the bottom of the Pyrenæans, and at this day are both by French and Spaniards called Vaſci, were known in old time by that of Vaſcones. Both the Gaſcons and Baſques or Biſcainers alſo in ſome Authours paſs under the Name of Vaccei, corruptly framed from Vaſcei or Vaſci, although in later times it be appropriated unto the Vaſci, who are alſo diminuitively called Vaſculi, and by way of Contraction Vaſcli and Baſcli. Their Countrey by ſome called Vaſcitania, although lately annexed to Gaſcoigne, and reckoned to be in Aquitain, yet anciently was a Territory diſtinct, and now the Inhabitants differ both in manners, Cuſtomes and Language from the Gaſcoigns and their Neighbours. It's Situate in the utmoſt part, and as it were an Angle or Corner of Gall, there where it borders upon Spain to the North-weſt; On the Weſt it is bounded by the Ocean, on the South by the River Bidaſſus, and the Pyrenæan Hills, on the Eaſt by the Principality of Beame, and on the North partly by the ſaid Principality the River Aturris and otherwiſe. In length it contains about fifty Miles, in breadth four and twenty. It's divided into three parts, whereof the firſt is that of Lapurdus or Baion, the other that of the lower Navarre, and the third that of Sola. Baion and Sola are governed by the King's Governour of all Aquitain, and the lower Navarre by his Lieutenant of Beame. Baion and Navarre, for Juſtice have recourſe to the Parliament of Bourdeaux, and Sola to the Parliament of Pale.

Vetus Auctor vitæ Ludovici Pii ad Ann. 809 & 816.

Confer Iſidorum Hiſpalenſ. Authorem vitæ Sancti Amandi atque Iſidorum Pacenſem cum Appendice Fredegarii, ad Ann. 766.

The Language of the Vaſcons.

20. The Language of theſe People by the French called Baſque and Biſcaine, and by the Spaniards Vaſquenze, Joſeph Scaliger in Latine calls Cantabriſmus, and reckons it among the Mother Tongues of the Europeans. He adds that the ſpeech of it begins not far from Baion, and reaches ſix or ſeven days Journey within the Mountainous parts of Spain, that the French call thoſe that uſe it Baſci and Baſculi, and the Spaniards the Countrey wherein it is ſpoken by the General Name of Baſcuença, that it hath nothing of Barbariſm wharling or puffing in it, but is moſt mild and ſweet, and without doubt the moſt ancient; and in thoſe parts in uſe before the times of the Romans. In ſhort, thoſe that ſpeak it are, on the Spaniſh ſide of the Pyrenæan Hills, the Inhabitants of the greateſt part of Navarre, all Ipuſena, Alava and Biſcay, and on the French ſide thoſe three Diviſions of Baion, the lower Navarre and Sola lately mentioned. Some give this General account of it, that moſt of its words in the ſingular Number end in A, and in the Plural in Ac, but others tell them they are miſtaken, for when they ſo end, A. and Ac. added to them, ſupply the places of ſyllables onely, as in the word Guiçon a Man, Guiçona ſignifieth the Man, and Guiçonac the Men. Their Poſterity that ſeated themſelves in Novempopulania, or Gaſcoigne by degrees forgat this Language, and learnt the Romance or corrupt Latine, though much differing now from that of the French. But enough of the Vaſcons, the Motions and Conqueſts of whom we could not omit, without a great gap and overſight committed in Hiſtory.

In tractatu de Europæorum linguis & diatriba de hodiernis Francorum linguis.

Marin. Sicul lib. 4. c. ult. Rerum Hiſpanic. ex eo alii.

Arnaldus Oihenartus in Notitia utriuſque Vaſconiæ

King Pipin dies.

21. To our buſineſs. Pipin having ſubdued the Vaſcons, with the other People adjoyning to the Garonne, and killed Gaiffar his Enemy, returned home; From Sanctonæ he came ſick to Tours, where having done his Devotions he removed to Paris, and having in the Church of St. Denis fitted himſelf for another World, on the twenty fourth of September he died of a Dropſie, in the fifty fourth year of his Age, and in the eighteenth of his Reign. A great Man, though but four Foot and an half in length; for he laid the Foundations of great Power and Sovereignty, and like another Philip, made way and gathered materials for that Grandeur, at which his Son afterwards arrived. He was Buried in the Church of St. Denis, and had this Inſcription made upon his Tomb, Pipinus Rex Pater Caroli Magni, but this was ſometime after, for that his Son had the Sirname of the Great, preſently after his Death cannot be imagined. By Birtha his Wife, (called Birtha with the great Foot, becauſe one of her Feet was bigger than the other;) he had three Sons, Charles, Carloman and Pipin, who died before his Father, being ſcarcely three years old, beſides Ægidia a Nun, to which ſome add Rotende and Altende, Buried in the Church of St. Arnald at Metz; as for the ſecond Wife which Lazius mentions, and the ſeveral Children he had by her, we think them not of that Credit as to relate their Names. Of his two Sons, Carloman had thoſe Provinces which had formerly belonged to Carloman his Uncle, and Charles ſucceeded to the remainder of the Dominions of the Franks.

Obiit Ann. 783 juxta Ms. Chronicon Ultrajectinum.

Alii dicunt filium Pipino fuiſſe Ægidium Monachum in monte Soracte in Italia & aliam filiam nomine Giſlam quæ fuit Abbatiſſa.

Charles and Carloman ſucceed.

22. They were both Crowned on the ſame day, Carloman at Soiſſons, and Charles at Noviodunum, or as ſome ſay at Wormes, the one over Auſtraſia, and the other over Neuſtria and the Territories thereto belonging. Charles whoſe Tyrocinium, or firſt Foundation of matters of Arms had been laid in the War of Aquitain, or that againſt Gaiffar, was immediately upon his Promotion preſented with a new Subject, whereon to employ his skill and valour from that very Countrey. For the Sons of Eudo being all Extinct, one Hunoldus as he called himſelf, its uncertain who he was, or of what Family, but the Name he thought would be a great means to bear him out, affected the Sovereignty of that Province, and eaſily perſwaded the People to accept of him for their Duke. Charles to whom Aquitain fell at the Diviſion of the Provinces, thought himſelf concerned as well in Honour as in Intereſt, to follow the Example of his Predeceſſours, in not ſuffering any ſuch Uſurpers and unruly Neighbours there to reſt, and reſolving to march, and endeavour to reduce him, ſent to his Brother to joyn with him in the Attempt wherein though not ſo much, and ſo nearly, yet by way of Conſequence, he muſt alſo be concerned. But Carloman made no haſte to joyn with him, his Courtiers having done ill Offices betwixt them, and raiſing ſtill jealouſies in his Head, of his Brother's reſtleſs and ambitious Spirit. Charles was no whit pleaſed to find him of ſuch an humour, and to remove all miſunderſtandings, deſired an Interview and a Conference which was granted, and given at a place called Duaſdines, but without any good Effect, for Carloman returned back, but Charles purſued his Voyage and came to Angouleſme, where he drew up his Forces and then went in queſt of Hunoldus.

Noviodum hodie Noyon.

De iſto loco ſic Fauchetus ex Aimoino: les freres ſe virent en Poitou, enon lieu nominè Duadines, que il n'ay pew remarque.

23. Hunold was not ſo wiſe, as to be ready and well prepared before he broke out into Rebellion, and therefore durſt not ſtand his ground, but fled from place to place; Charles ſtill dogging him at the Heels, till he forſook the Countrey, and fled to Lupus the Duke of the Vaſcons, thoſe which at this day are called Baſcli. Charles thither alſo purſued him by a Meſſage, Commanding Lupus to deliver him up, or to expect him ſpeedily to fetch him with a great Army. He was ſo ſenſible of his diſability to grapple with the King, that he not onely delivered him up with his Wife and Children, but promiſed all farther obedience to his Commands; Charles in the mean time, while this buſineſs was agitating, laying the Foundations of a Caſtle upon the River Domonia, called as Aimoinus tells us Frontiacum, or as Eginhart will have it Franciacum from * the Franks that Built it, which Original is more probable than that of Gillius, who would have it ſo named, becauſe it was formerly known by that of Fons Saracenorum. Having received Hunold, he returned with him into France, where he kept him in free Cuſtody, that he might doe no farther miſchief, without any other Puniſhment inflicted. This year he kept his Chriſtmas at Dury, and his Eaſter at St. Lambert near Liege, paſſages which we ſhould not relate, but that from thence we may hint theſe two things to the Reader. The firſt is, that about theſe times when Authours take ſuch notice of the places where Pipin and his Son Charles celebrated theſe Feſtivals, Kings began in an extraordinary manner, with great Pomp, Magnificence and Bounty to perform this Duty, this Charles afterward known by the addition of the Great, being wont to ſit in his Robes with his Crown on his Head, upon theſe occaſions. The other is, that from his keeping his Eaſter at this place of St. Lambert, it appears as Fauchet obſerves, that the two Brothers had not yet made any certain and determinate Diviſion of the Provinces. For Liege and conſequently that Village or Palace lies beyond the River of Meuſe, and ſo belonged to the Kingdom of Auſtraſia, this River being ever accounted the limit and Border betwixt Neuſtria and it.

Fauchetus hic dicit : ſe ſanna ex Gaſcoigne es bras de Loup. male. Gaſconia enim & Aquitania hoc tempore deerant, atque vox Gaſconia non niſi aliquot abhinc ſæculis reperta. Si fugiſſet in Gaſconiam, fugiſſet in Aquitaniam. Repete quæ ſupra de his Regionibus notantur.

* Sed negat hoc Dominus de Scala, quia non legitur Franciacum ſed Fronciacum vel Frontiacum. Addit Gallis veteribus in uſu fuiſſe hoc nomen Acum adjungere nomini illius qui villam condidit vel ejus Poſſeſſoris ut Martiniacus, Lucaniacus, Frontiniacus, quod nihil aliud ſonat niſi Martini Villa, Lucani villa, Frontini Villa. Vbi invenitur Acus prior pars nominis denotat nomen proprium hominis ut in lingua Teutonica Martins dorph, Hanſdorp, & in lingua Angloſaxonica Normanton, Normanby, Ketelthorpe, & centum alia.

24. The Brothers were divided in their affection, and ſo ſtill continued, however the limits of their Juriſdictions were Indiſtinct. This grieved their Mother Bertha not a little, who to bring them to a good underſtanding, omitted nothing becoming a Parent's care, travelling from the Court of one to that of the other for this very purpoſe. They both were Batchellours, and none but the Daughters of Kings ſeemed fit for their Royal Beds. No King was there in view, who was in a Capacity to ſuit them, but Deſiderius King of the Lombards in Italy; his Daughters would fit them as to their Dignity, and having one for each, their Mother thought this double Marriage would be the greateſt means imaginable to reſtore them to a good and perfect underſtanding betwixt themſelves. To the Court therefore of Deſiderius ſhe haſtes, and eaſily obtains what ſhe came for. But there happened to be a Rub in the way, which might eaſily have been foreſeen by any one that underſtood the Affairs of Italy. The Biſhop of Rome was wonderfully concerned at this new Alliance, dreading nothing more than that the Houſe of Pipin which had done ſuch Services for his See againſt the Lombards, ſhould be drawn off to their Party, it being his onely Refuge, and danger now threatning him from the ſame hand every moment. He takes his Pen and writes a moſt paſſionate Letter, which cannot but affect him that reads it, though perhaps in a very far different manner. From top to bottom it's full fraught with Religious pretences and Expreſſions. " He begins with a ſerious admonition, that they were of the ſnares " and deceits of the Devil, who entiſed firſt, and deceived Man by the means and " Inſinuations of a Woman; then after this Preface coming nearer to the Matter, " affirms, that if what he heard were true, viz. That one of them was perſwaded " by Deſiderius, to take his Daughter to Wife, it was properly a Diobolical Im- " miſſion or Inſinuation, and ſeemed no Matrimonial Conjunction, but a Fellow- " ſhip of a moſt wicked Invention.

A marriage propoſed to the Kings, with the Daughters of Deſidireus King Lombardy.

Extat apud Baronium ad Ann. D. 770 num. IX.

The Pope's Letter upon that account.

Quod certè ſi ita eſt hac propriè diabolica eſt Immiſſio & non tam matrimonii conjunctio ſed conſortium mequiſſiæ adinventionis eſſe videtur.

25. " His Arguments to prove it are theſe. From Scripture it appears, that " ſuch grievouſly ſinned as mixed in Wedlock with ſtrange Nations, and with a " Nation ſtrange indeed ſhould they mix, the moſt generous and Noble bloud of " the Franks, the glory of whom excelled the Beauty and Luſtre of all other Peo- " ple, muſt be polluted, which God forbid, by the perfidious and moſt ſtinking

---perſida (quod abſit) & fætentiſſima Longobardorum gente polluatur, &c.

“ Nation of the Lombards, a Nation not reckoned in the number of Nations, and
“ from which Nation it's certain, ſaith he, that a ſort of Leprous Perſons do iſſue;
“ he adds, that none in his right Wits can imagine, that Kings of ſo great a Name, “ ſhould be involved in ſo deteſtable and abbominable a Contagion; for what fellowſhip
“ is there betwixt Light and Darkneſs, and what Communion betwixt a “ faithfull Perſon and an Infidel? The next Argument he uſes is of more weight, “ though it make leſs Noiſe, (and little Noiſe indeed it may well make, for not the “ leaſt whiſper of the thing is to be perceived in any other good Authour,) and
“ that is, that they were already joyned in Marriage by their Father's procurement,
“ with two beautifull Ladies of their own Nation. Having been formerly anointed
“ with Holy Oil, by the hands of the Vicar of St. Peter, and being ſanctified
“ with Heavenly Benediction, he bids them beware how they involved themſelves
“ in ſo great guilt. Then comes the Argument indeed, to which the other Reaſons “ are but ſubſervient. They muſt remember they had ingaged themſelves to St. Peter,
“ and Pope Stephen his Vicar and his Succeſſours, that they would be Friends
“ to their Friends, and Enemies to their Enemies; he demands then how they can “ now act againſt their Souls, and make ſuch a Conjunction as they were about to “ do, with the pernicious Nation of the Lombards, who were manifeſtly their Enemies,
“ in that they had ſet upon the Church, and had invaded their Roman Province.
“ This he inforces with inſtances of their Father, who when Conſtantine
“ the Emperour would have had their Siſter Ghyſila for his Son, anſwered, that it “ was not lawfull for you to be joyned with a ſtrange Nation, neither durſt act any “ thing againſt the Will and Pleaſure of the Biſhops of the Apoſtolick See. He “ asks them then how it comes to paſs, that they ſhould indeavour to act contrary
“ to the Will of the Vicar of the Prince of the Apoſtles, which thing their Father “ never attempted, and whether they were not ſenſible that it was not him, unhappy “ man, but bleſſed St. Peter, whoſe Vicegerent he was, though unworthy “ whom they deſpiſed, foraſmuch as it is written: He that receiveth you receiveth “ me, and he that deſpiſeth you deſpiſeth me.

26. “ After this as the whole Letter abounds with Tautologies, he again inculcates “ their promiſes of Obedience made to St. Peter and his Predeceſſours, and “ himſelf both by Letters and Meſſengers. He puts them in mind how Stephen “ had written to them a little before his death, and by terrible adjurations, had admoniſhed “ them firmly to abide in their love towards God's Holy Church, and “ the Apoſtolick See, and that they performed to a Tittle what they had ingaged to “ God's Apoſtle. And is this now your promiſe, ſaith he? O what Labour did “ that moſt bleſſed and beſt Stephen undergo! what a dangerous Journey did he “ undertake when he was in ſo weak a Condition! and except the Lord be ready
“ at Hand, his pains ſhall be now fruſtrated, and that Journey which that our Predeceſſour “ took into France will prove miſchievous to us, our Enemies being now
“ more Elevated than formerly they were, in the height of their Pride and Arrogance.
“ Behold, that which we feared is come to paſs, our Joy is turned into Lamentation,
“ the laſt miſchief is greater than the former, and whence we expected “ Light to ariſe, thence Darkneſs hath broke out upon us. Now comes he to the “ buſineſs. Wherefore, he adds, bleſſed Peter the Prince of the Apoſtles, to whom
“ the Keys of the Kingdom of Heaven are delivered by the Lord God, as alſo “ Power is given to bind and looſe in Heaven and in Earth, by our Infelicity earneſtly “ admoniſheth your Excellency, and we alſo together with all Biſhops, Preſbyters
“ and other Prieſts, and all the Nobility and Clergy of our Holy Church,
“ as alſo the Abbats and all Religious Perſons, thoſe of chiefeſt Rank or Judges,
“ and our whole People of this Province of the Romans, by denouncing of Divine “ Judgment, conjure you through the living and true God, who is the Judge of “ Quick and Dead, and by the ineffable Power of his Divine Majeſty, and by the “ tremendous day of the Judgment to come, when we ſhall have all Princes and “ Powers, and all Mankind to ſtand by trembling, as alſo by all Divine Myſteries,
“ and by the moſt Sacred Body of bleſſed Peter, that neither of you in any-wiſe “ preſume to take in Marriage the Daughter of the ſaid Deſiderius King of the “ Lombards, nor give your Siſter Ghyſila to his Son, nor dare to put away your “ own Wifes. Then follows, that, remembring what they had promiſed to St. Peter,
“ they ſhould reſiſt the Lombards his Enemies, and force them to reſtore what “ belonged to the Holy Church, to the Commonwealth of Rome. For all their “ promiſes they have broken, ſaith he, and they inceſſantly afflict and oppreſs us,
“ are nothing inclined to reſtore any thing to us, and now as is notoriouſly known

“ invade our Borders, in preſence of your Ambaſſadours, making a ſhew of Juſtice, “ but nothing is brought to Effect, neither can we receive any thing of our Right. “ Having admoniſhed them to give eard to his Meſſengers, at length he concludes “ with an Anathema, to any that ſhould act contrary to this his Admonition, who is “ hereby cut off from the Kingdom of God, and appointed with the Devil and his “ moſt deteſtable Pomps, and all other wicked Perſons to everlaſting Burnings. On “ the contrary, who obſerves and keeps to his Exhortation, ſhall by our Lord God “ be made remarkable with Heavenly Bleſſings, and be found worthy to be partaker of the reward of Eternal Joys, with all the Saints and Elect of God.

27. Thus far the Zeal of Pope Stephen, as to the Reaſon of which its ſource and Original we ſhall ſay nothing, but leave the Reader to his Meditations on the Affairs of Italy, how they ſtood at this Conjuncture. For his Arguments; the Examples he produces out of Scripture, where Marriage with Foreigners was always forbidden and curſed, how they are pleadable in this point is above my Capacity, and perhaps even the Reach of ſome who are moderately verſed in Theological Speculations. The opprobrious Language he gives to the Lombards, not to thoſe onely that had offended him, but the Nation it ſelf, and ſo to many Innocents, as to the matter in hand, how Civil or Chriſtian it is, I had rather his Friends ſhould Judge than I; but one thing we may hence learn by the way, that the Jews are not the onely People that have ſtunk, but the Lombards were involved in the ſame Puniſhment, becauſe guilty of the ſame Crime, for as they were, and are Rebellious againſt Chriſt, ſo theſe Lombards were againſt his Vicar. Our late Authour of the Heroick Poem called Gondibert, had certainly little Judgment, to leap over the moſt Noble Nation of the Franks, and omit ſo many other fit Subjects of wit, and pitch upon ſuch a vile and ſtinking Nation as this, whereon to Paint out and Imbelliſh thoſe rare and excellent Qualities, which make Princes Glorious both for Peace and War; we ſhall hear by the next Ragguagli, that he hath ſmarted ſoundly for it in Parnaſſus. But the greateſt wonder is, the News he tells us of Charles and Carloman, being e'er this Married to two beautifull Virgins of their own Countrey, a thing which no Hiſtorian, or other Authour doth in the leaſt hint at, though the Life of Charles hath been written by ſome that lived in his own time, and ſome later Writers have uſed all diligence imaginable, to give us an account of his Wives and Iſſue. Indeed there are that tell, that, while he was Prefect of the Palace, he had ſeveral Concubines, whoſe Names are unknown, by ſome of which he had a Daughter called Botede, and Pipin the Baſtard, who Conſpired againſt his Father's Life. If the good old Man took theſe for Wives, (it being poſſible that true Stories might tire through the length and tediouſneſs of the way, e'er they could get over the Alpes, and Lies flie to Rome before them,) to put them away, he certainly neither ſtood in need of his Connivence or Diſpenſation.

Johan. Tillius in Diſquiſit. de Rebus Gallicis in Carolo Magn.

The Marriage conſummated.

28. Notwithſtanding ſuch an Impediment, and what was more this thundring Letter, the two Brothers not dreading that which hath cauſed Nations, if not Devils to tremble, Married their Wives; yet we are told by the Importunity of their Mother, more than out of their own Inclinations, for this Reaſon, that they were already Married to others. That this may appear, they inſtance in the matter of Charles, (for as for Carloman his Marriage as to the Perſon is very obſcure,) that his Wife Birtha by name he put away not long after, as they would make us believe out of remorſe of Conſcience, foraſmuch as they ſay, no cauſe at all is alledged of their parting. But the thing that was alledged was Womaniſh Impotence, as at laſt it appeared, (though ſomething elſe might be in the Bottom,) and now Charles was to take his lawfull Wife again, and had ſo done doubtleſs, if he had not been Satisfied in the lawfulneſs of this laſt Conjunction, except perhaps the poor Woman in the mean time died Heartbroken with ſorrow. Had he had a Wife before, ſo great offence would not have been taken at the leaving of this, which was indeed never his Wife, and St. Adelradus his Kinſman would never have left the Court for being ſcandalized with ſo great a Crime, as we are told he did by thoſe that have written his Life. Neither can it be ſaid that Hildegardis whom he afterward Married could be his true Wife, which he reaſſumed, for all Writers with one conſent affirm, he Married her after the putting away of Birtha, and her Epitaph produced by * Baronius, if it was hers indeed, ſhews that ſhe was his Wife but twelve years, and therefore ſhe dying in the year of our Lord 786; ſhe could not be Married to him till he had Conquered Italy, and had both that Countrey and the City of Rome in his Power, as is by the Cardinal confeſſed. The Roman Biſhop therefore ſeems to have wanted good Intelligence, and at this time not to have been infallible Baronius Tomi 9. Editione prima qui demum invenit ante Editionem alteram in duobus libris Rerum Geſtarum Caroli Magni à Monacho Sangallenſi Conſcriptis cauſam divortii fuiſſe, quia eſſet Clinica, & ad propagandam prolem Inhabilis. Vide Bar. ad Ann. 771. n. 3. qui eam Bertam vocat. Alii ſcribunt uxorem Carlomanni fuiſſe Bertam nomine & ſororem ejus Caroli Conjugem nonnulli dicunt fuiſſe Hermangardem.

* Alter ab undecimo rurſum te ſuſtulit annus, &c. extat apud Baronium ad Ann. 786. n. 7.

fallible in matters of Fact, which one ſort of People now begin to aſcribe to him. He was not onely miſtaken in this particular, but in that alſo of the number of Deſiderius his Daughters, for he heard but of one, that was to be Married to one of the Brothers, whereas the ancient Annals make it manifeſt that the two Brothers Married two Siſters. How would he have ſtormed at this double Alliance! But as much as he ſtormed at the Conjunction, he was calm enough at the ſeparation, and what Noiſe ſoever other Godly men made, the intereſt of God's Church (which he foreſaw now might be advanced, goodman,) ſtopt his mouth and perſwaded him to Patience.

Carloman dies.

Charles ſeizes his Kingdom.

Carlomannus Rex deceſſit 11. Nonas Decemb. in villa Salmuntiaco ſepelitur Remis. Ita Annales Pith. ad Ann. 771.

29. The true reaſon of his Divorce we may gueſs at hereafter, noting this at preſent, that what Reputation with good men he loſt thereby, was ſcarcely repaired in the opinion of Loyal and ſober Perſons, by another Revolution which ſhortly after happened. Carloman his Brother not long after died, and left at leaſt one Son behind him. Aimoinus writes he had Children, one he might have by his late Marriage, and his Wife might by this time be great with another. But Charles aſpires after the Inheritance, and either finds or makes ſuch a Party in his Brother's Court, as cloſeth with him out of pretence that the dangers are great, which threaten a Nation in the Infancy of its King, and that it was better for the Franks univerſally to be Governed by a Monarch. He being advanced, the Widow of Carloman flies with her rejected Children, and ſuch of the Nobility as deteſted the Treaſon into Italy to her Father, who by theſe Forerunners might eaſily gueſs what in a ſhort time would follow after. The thoughts of Charles were not bounded by the limits of France, theſe were too ſtrait and narrow for his ambitious Soul, yet had his Brother lived, little out of fear of him, could he abroad have attempted, and to what purpoſe ſhould he ſeek out Foreign Countries to Conquer, when he was but Joynt Tenant at home, and in his own? This therefore was eſpecial Service the Nobility of Auſtraſia did him, and now that Fortune had ſo luckily put him in a way, he was reſolved not to diſoblige her by neglect, but to purſue his opportunities to the utmoſt. The firſt was preſented by the Saxons, whom the Neighbourhood of their Countrey made obnoxious rather than any fault, that at this time they had committed. Having called an Aſſembly at Wormes, he invaded their Countrey, and deſtroying all things in his way with Fire and Sword, took the Caſtle Eresburg, and deſtroyed a famous Idol named Irminſul. Here as it's ſaid was his Army miraculouſly delivered from Imminent Ruine. The ſeaſon and the place wherein they incamped, both Conſpired to kill them with Thirſt, when in the heat of the Day, as according to the Cuſtome they took their reſt, a great Torrent of Water poured it ſelf down from the Mountain whereon the Idol ſtood, into the Valley where they lay, which abundantly ſatisfied their parched Bodies. Then the Idol being deſtroyed, he marched to the River Wiſara, where he received twelve Hoſtages from the Saxons, and ſo returned into France.

And invades Saxony.

The Lombards and the Pope quarrel.

30. By this time, the Quarrels betwixt the Lombards and the Biſhop of Rome were come to an height, and the two Daughters of Deſiderius being returned home, the one as a forlorn and rejected Creature, the other like a poor Widow with her Children at her back ſpoiled of their Patrimony, and turned out of Houſe and Harbour, had raiſed, as well they might, ſtorms of Anger and Revenge in their Father's Breaſt. Yet having digeſted his Anger, he reſolved to go Calmly to work, and try if by fair means he could compaſs what elſe Nature obliged him by force to attempt, and that was the Reſtitution of his Nephews. He applies himſelf to Adrian the Succeſſour of Stephen, who he hoped might entertain more milder Councils, and prove more Neighbourly than the former Pope, and knowing in what Repute his See was abroad, eſpecially in France with the Kings and Princes, of which his Predeceſſours had done wonders, he deſires him to acknowledge their Title, and doe his indeavour for their Reſtitution, as a means whereunto he deſired they might be anointed by his Hands. Adrian was not ſo ill inſtructed, nor unacquainted with what was paſt, as to be ignorant in how fair a way he was for gaining a farther intereſt in Italy, and by what means his Predeceſſours had got what he now enjoyed. He refuſed to diſoblige Charles, and by his anſwer Deſiderius perceived that he had rouzed a ſleeping Lion, who in expectation of aſſiſtence from France, would not ſtick at doing him all miſcheif imaginable. He thought it his intereſt to begin firſt, knowing in caſe he could bring the Biſhop and his Adherents to a compliance, his work with France would be the eaſier. He therefore attacques and takes ſeveral places belonging to the Exarchate, making as if he would beſiege Ravenna, and upon ſome farther diſguſt Rome it ſelf. Hereupon to procure delay, Adrian ſent him ſome frivolous Meſſage, but an effectual one into France to Charles, to haſten away relief with all ſpeed imaginable.

The Pope ſends to Charles for aſſiſtence.

31. Peter his Meſſenger or Legate à Latere, if you pleaſe, found the King at Thionville, where he expoſed to him the danger wherein the Holy Church at preſent ſtood, and the Example of his Predeceſſours upon ſuch occaſions, backed with this ſtrong Motive, that this preſent Attempt was made upon him for his ſake, for refuſing to anoint his Nephews. Deſiderius fearing what might come of Peter's Negotiation, thought fit to ſend Ambaſſadours of his own to recriminate the Biſhop and excuſe the late Hoſtility. Charles gave Audience to the one Party, as well as the other, but knowing how nearly he was concerned to abate the Power and Intereſt of the Lombard, and that if his Neighbours houſe was burnt, his own might ſpeedily be on Fire, reſolved to prevent it with a ſpeedy Invaſion. Yet to uſe the ſame Arts Deſiderius had done, he ſent Meſſages to him, requiring ſuch things as the King thought himſelf obliged not to grant, and vailing his own Deſigns and Intereſt, with the great Zeal he had for the Church. “ Deſiderius receives the Ambaſſadours kindly, profeſſes his Actions warrantable before all equal Judges, both “ in reference to the Recovery of his Rights in Italy, and the Reſtitution of his “ Grandchildren; and he deſires his Brother Charles would not give heed to the Biſhops “ of Rome intereſſed Perſons, and his profeſſed Enemies, but ſeriouſly weigh what “ Juſtice he had on his ſide, and that he would be Chancellour betwixt himſelf and “ his two young Nephews (for Uncle he was unto them both) whether their “ Fathers Inheritance could juſtly be detained from them. This ſaid, he ſent his Ambaſſadours to Rome, to try if he could bring the Biſhop off to his Party. But this not ſucceeding, he himſelf reſolved to go thither in Perſon, as to perform his Devotions with his Wife and Children, and an ordinary Train; which Adrian underſtanding, commanded the Gates and Walls to be manned againſt him, and becauſe the Churches of St. Peter and St. Paul ſtood without the Walls, he ordered they ſhould be faſt locked up. And to ſtop his proceeding he ſent certain Churchmen to meet him on the way, and denounce the Eccleſiaſtick cenſures againſt him, in Caſe he would not deſiſt. He obeyed, and after the Ambaſſadours had gone betwixt them ſeveral times to no purpoſe, they returned into France to him that ſent them.

Who prepares for an Invaſion of Lombardy.

32. Charles to make the World believe how unconcern'd he was to any Intereſt of his own, and that the Protection of the Church was the onely thing he ſtudied, ſent once more to him, offering him ſuch a ſum of Money in exchange for the Towns he had taken, as would have been much to his loſs to have received. Upon his refuſal, he thought he had made Proviſion enough for his Reputation, and reſolving upon an expedition before-hand, aſſembled his Eſtates together to Conſult. The Franks were not all of the ſame mind; for many declared againſt the War, and ſome perhaps addicted to the party of the Sons of Carloman, flatly refuſed therein to ſerve him. This notwithſtanding, he was ſo bent upon his Journey, as he reſolved by no advice or other rubs to be hindred, and for this purpoſe made ſuch Levies, and got together ſuch a Company of Men as evidently ſhewed (which Sigonius obſerves) that the deſire he had to Conquer Lombardy rather was the Motive that ſpurred him on to this Enterprize, than any Zeal he had for the defence and ſecurity of the Church. The Rendezvous was at Geneva, and there he alſo held the Aſſembly of the Eſtates, though in Aimoinus, as now we reade it, it be ſaid that he held a Conſultation at Germana, a City of Burgundy upon the Rhoſne, and that there alſo he divided his Forces. But this City has had the misfortune to lye under miſtakes, as to its Name, as well as of late Years, in reference to its Government and Laws in force, before the laſt Revolution. It's moſt probable, that as well the little Province, as Territories about it were in ſucceeding Ages ſometimes under the ſame Lord; yet it is clear from Hiſtory, that ſix hundred Years agoe or more, they were under ſeveral Princes or Potentates, yet neither in this ſpace of time, nor that which went before, nor that which followed (to uſe the words of a learned [*] Jeſuite) was the Town of Geneva ever under the Power and Juriſdiction of any of her Biſhops.

The ſituation of Geneva.

33. This City is ſeated at the Weſtern Head of the Lake Lemanus, where the River Rhoſne iſſueth out of it, at the Confines of five ſeveral People (as they were reckoned of old) there meeting with the Angles of their Territories, viz. the Antuates, tuates, Focunates, Genevenſes on the left ſide of Rhoſne, and the Brannovii and Latobrigi on the right. Its Name hath been variouſly changed and corrupted by unskilfull Hiſtorians and Geographers. As beſides this of Aimoinus, in Authours of a thouſand Years ſtanding or thereabout, for Geneva you ſhall ordinarily find, Genava and Jenoba; but thoſe that have ſcribled within theſe three hundred Years, as unskilfully, as commonly call it in Latine Gebenna, and its Citizens with the Inhabitants of the places adjoyning Gebennenſes, moſt corrupt Words forged in the ignorant Heads of ſome Pedants, who had read a moſt groſs and ſilly Interpretation of that paſſage in Lucan: Qua Montibus ardua ſummis, Gens habitat cava pendentes rupe Gebennas: This taught them that Gebenna was a Mountain, which ſeparated the Arverni from the Helvetii, and had a City upon it called by the ſame Name. By this fond Comment the Youth was generally cheated throughout Europe, which drunk in the Notion as proceeding from an Oracle, and in ordinary writing uſed the word Gebenna, rejecting the old and true one of Geneva. This filthy Errour was eſpecially propagated amongſt the Eccleſiaſticks, ſuch as commonly wrote, their Books lying open to the Cheat above all Men. But to undeceive the Reader; theſe Mountains * Gebennæ or Cebennæ (in French les Ceneines) in no reſpect appertained to the City of Geneva, nor yet to the Helvetii, from which they are diſtant above fifty Leagues; but lye amongſt the Helvii (not Helvetii) the Arverni, Volci, Ruteni and Cadurci, of which People † Lucan ſpeaks, and not of Geneva, the Inhabitants whereof with others adjoyning he had mentioned before.

---

[*] Neque tamen aut illo, aut priore aut poſteriore tempore Genevam oppidum in ullius ſuorum Epiſcoporum fuiſſe poteſtate. Monetus in Geograph. Galliæ Celticæ, p. 312.

34. Charles at Geneva divided his powerfull Army into two Parties, whereof one he committed to the Conduct of his Uncle Bernard, to march before by the way of Mons Jovis, or Jupiter his Mount (by Fauchet called Mont jou, by others, ſaid to be that which now is known by the Name of Genebra, the Top of the Alpes Cottiæ) to ſeize upon the Straits. The other he purpoſed to lead himſelf by the Road which lay toward the Hill Caniſius. Deſiderius upon Notice of their Intenſions, had ſent ſome Companies to ſecure the narrow Paſſages, he himſelf with his Army marching after and expecting what ſhould be the event: The Franks coming to make their paſſage, found ſuch oppoſition as diſcouraged them; and here, if you pleaſe to believe thoſe that favoured one of the Parties, a great Miracle was wrought; and doubtleſs it was in his behalf. For the Franks not knowing what Courſe to take, as utterly unable to break through, ſtood gazing with their Fingers in their Mouths, when all on a ſudden to their no little wonder, they ſaw their Enemies run away in a Panick fear without any at their Heels, without as much as one Man got through the paſſage to look at them, or any Accident at all arrived to affright them. Seeing ſo great a Miracle was wrought, they muſt not be wanting to it, and themſelves, but through they paſs, and Manfully hew down all before them. Poſſibly ſome might diſcover a new Path, and climbing over the Mountains come upon the Backs of thoſe that poſſeſſed the Straits, a thing as the Reader may remember practiſed in other places of this Nature, and they being either killed or running away the Army might take a falſe Alarm, and run for Company, as hath been uſual. Deſiderius was now in an ill Caſe, as Aiſtulph his Predeceſſour had often been upon the like occaſion, and no wonder he and his Countreymen might ſmell unſavourly, being put into ſuch and ſo many frights by Procurement of thoſe, who firſt cryed foh and ſtopt their Noſes.

Vide Anaſtaſium.

Charles beats the Lombards.

35. Deſiderius with Aldegiſus his Son, and the Captains of his Army ran towards Pavia as faſt as their Horſes could carry them, whom when the fit of Wonderment was over, the Franks followed, and there cloſely beſieged him. The King thinking it not prudence to venture all in one bottom, ſent his Son, a young Man of ſingular hopes, together with the Widow and Children of Carloman to Verona, he himſelf ſtaid in Pavia which was very well fortified, and to inable it the better to endure a Siege he had ſent out into the Countrey all the Weak, and unprofitable multitude. Charles perceived the Town would endure a ſhock, and thinking it no good Husbandry to have all his Men idle here, when fewer would ſerve the turn, and there was Work elſewhere, left his Uncle before Pavia, and led part of the Army againſt Verona. Adalgiſus, the Son of Deſiderius, finding this City in no Caſe to hold out, made his Eſcape, and got him to Conſtantinople, hoping to reſerve himſelf Alii ut Godefridus de Viterbo Gaguinus & Paulus Æmilius aiunt magnum prælium fuiſſe commiſſum quo multa millia ceciderunt.

---

* Gebenna Mons Cæſari, Cebenna Plinio, Cemmenus Straboni, Aquitaniam à Gallia Narbonenſi dividit, ut definiunt idem Strabo, Plinius & alii, & Arvernos ab Helviis diſcludit ut ſcribit ipſe Cæſar. Cebennarum pars Loſera vulgo Lozere, Mons altiſſimus in finibus Gabalorum, Caſei laude celebris, ex eo Tarnis fluvius Oritur.

† Et ſparſas Cæſar per Gallica rura Cohortes,
Evocat & motis Romam petit undique ſignis.
Deſeruere cavo tentoria fixa Lemano,
Caſtráque, quæ Vogeſi curvam ſuper ardua rupem.
Pugnaces pictis cohibebant Lingones Armis. Lucan. lib. 1.

himſelf to better times, which the Inhabitants perceiving, thought it not amiſs to provide for themſelves alſo in the contrary way, and upon good Terms yielded to him, who they had good reaſon to believe would prove the Conquerour. The Wife and Children of Carloman became his prey, whom having got into his hands he ſent away ſpeedily into France, and as the French Annals will make you believe there they were entertained very Honourably, though how, and in what manner, they either cannot or will not, or rather dare not tell you; to be ſure they paid well for their Entertainment be it as good as could be, for we do not hear that they were ever reſtored to their Inheritance. Verona being thus delivered up, all the reſt of the Cities of Lombardy followed their Example, onely Pavia ſtill held out, being every way furniſhed for a Siege of long Continuance. Charles perceiving this, and reſolved to tire them out, having now ſpent ſix Months in the Siege, and Eaſter drawing nigh, reſolved to ſatisfie his Curioſity in ſeeing Rome, as well as pay his Devotions at the Sepulchres of the Apoſtles.

And ſubdues all Lombardy, except Pavia.

36. How he was there entertained, and what farther paſſed betwixt him and the Pope, will be more proper for us to enquire in the Hiſtory of that Countrey; here we ſhall onely ſay, that eight days after his coming to Rome, he returned to the Siege of Pavia. Here within a while his Work was done to his hands; thoſe whom his Arms could not Conquer, were conſtrained to yield to Death, that Conquers all Men, many of the ſtout Defendants periſhing by a Plague, and as it were attending the Expiration of the Kingdom of the Lombards. Deſiderius ſeeing it was to no purpoſe to ſtand out, and that the longer he did it, his Terms might be the worſe, yielded himſelf with his Wife and Children unto Charles, who ſent them to Liege in Gallia Belgita, where they wore out their days in Honourable reſtraint, and then as ſome ſay, in order to the Settlement of this his new Kingdom, made another Journey to Rome to conſult with the Pope, which done, and all things ordered as ſeemed moſt convenient, he returned back into France. Here more work was cut out for his itching hands, for the Saxons irritated with what he had done to them, and preſuming upon his abſence had invaded their Neighbours, and made great waſte and ſlaughter where e'er they came. To reſtrain them he ſent three Parties ſo many ſeveral ways into their Countrey, which did them very much miſchief by burning and plundering their Houſes, and killing and taking Priſoners as many as they could meet with. But this did not ſatisfie the King, he reſolves either wholly to Conquer them, and bring them to Chriſtianity, or to root out and quite deſtroy the Nation. As a means to accompliſh this, he Summons the Eſtates to meet and lay their Heads together at Duren, or Duria.

Which is ſurrendred to him, with their King Deſiderius.

The Saxons invade France.

37. The meeting diſſolv'd, and an Army prepar'd, he paſſes the Rhine, and preſently takes a Fort called Sigeburg by ſtorm, wherein was a Garriſon of the Saxons. Eresburg another Caſtle which they had demoliſhed, he cauſed to be rebuilt and Garriſon'd with a Party of his own Men. Then paſſed he on to the River Wiſara, where he found a great Company met together at a place called Brunesberg, with intenſion to put a ſtop to his March; but in vain, for at the firſt rencounter they were worſted, put to flight, and many ſlain. The place where Charles incamped, Krantzius tells us, in his time was ſtill to be ſeen diſtinguiſhed into the Quarters or Diviſions. Paſſing then the River after this Obſtacle was removed, he came to another called Onacer or Onacra, where he was met by Heſſi one of the Princes of the Countrey, who together with the Oſtfali, or thoſe that lived toward the Eaſt ſurrendred themſelves into his hands, and gave ſuch Hoſtages as he demanded. Hereupon he retreated, and coming to a place called Buki, the Angarii preſented themſelves, and followed the Example of the Oſtfali, in ſwearing Obedience, and delivering Hoſtages. But part of his Army he had ſent to the River Wiſara, and that met not with ſo good Fortune, by reaſon of their Careleſneſs and Negligence. For at a place they called Hadbeki incamping themſelves, and ſending out their Foragers the Saxons, who ſpake the ſame Teutonick Language with them, and it ſeems had clothed themſelves on purpoſe after their Faſhion, joyned themſelves and mixed with them, which done, without any diſcovery they returned with them into their Camp, and expecting an opportunity when the Franks were aſleep, fell upon them and killed a great number, yet by the Valour of ſuch as eſcaped the danger, were beaten again out of the Camp. Charles having notice of the Strategeme marched with all ſpeed toward the Camp, and cut off a great multitude of thoſe that fled, which having done, and waſted ſo the Countrey, that he forced alſo the Weſtfali to beg Peace, and give up their Hoſtages, he thought it convenient to return and take up his Winter Quarters in France.

Aimoinus, lib. 4. c. 70.

But are forced to beg Peace.

38. He

Charles chaſtiſes the Rebels in Lombardy.

Another Invaſion of the Saxons.

38. He was ſcarcely arrived at his Palace, when News was brought him out of Italy, that Rotgand, a Duke of the Lombards, whom after the defeat of Deſiderius, he had preferred to the Government of Forumjulii, had rebelled and drawn back many of the Cities of Lombardy, under pretence of returning to the government of their own Kings; for Adalgiſus at Conſtantinople had watched all opportunities, and hovered over Italy for a convenient ſeaſon to re-enter. After a little conſideration he cauſed his moſt active and reſolute men to make ready, and with little noiſe, but great expedition, haſted into Italy, where he preſented himſelf, and gave Battel to Rotgand, when they thought he had been ingaged in the ſame manner in Saxony. He eaſily overpowered him, and receiving the Towns which had revolted, upon their ſubmiſſion, re-ſettled all things, and returned as ſpeedily and unexpectedly into France, as he had thence departed. He knew he had good reaſon ſo to doe, for he expected fully to hear that the Saxons had once more rebelled, and ſo he did, aſſoon as he had paſſed the Alpes; for they had taken the Caſtle of Ereſbourg, and had laid Siege to the other of Sigiſbourg where they found greater oppoſition. The Garriſon made very gallant Sallies, and did great Execution upon their Enemies, who were more affrighted by a Viſion, two fiery Helmets appearing, it's ſaid, on the Top of the Church: which ſtruck them with ſuch amazement, and ſo powerfully convinced them that God Almighty fought againſt them, that in a Panick fear they quitted the Siege, and fled as for their Lives, which yet many of them loſt; for the Franks iſſuing out of the Fort, purſued them as far as the River Lippia.

Who are forced to beg Peace, and give up Hoſtages.

39. Charles ſummoned the Eſtates to meet at Wormes, where it was reſolved a ſudden Invaſion ſhould be made into Saxony. And ſo ſudden it was, that he ſurpriſed them, and prevented all their preparations for reſiſtence, ſo as they were forced to uſe the Skin of the Fox, not being now able to compaſs that of the Lion, and meeting him at the Head or Spring of Lippia, in a moſt ſuppliant poſture begged pardon for what was paſt, and many of them hypocritically offered themſelves to be baptized. Upon this ſubmiſſion he readily forgave them, and cauſing ſuch to be baptized as preſented themſelves, received their Hoſtages. Then commanded he the Caſtle of Ereſbourg to be repaired, and another Fort to be erected upon the River Lippia, wherein he placed a ſtrong Garriſon, as a Curb upon the Countrey, which done, he marched back into France. But this was with a purpoſe of returning the Year following. For aſſoon as Eaſter was over, he again invaded Saxony with a great Army, and to ſettle the People in his Obedience, which he ſtill very much diſtruſted, appointed a general Aſſembly of them to be held at Paderborn, a City of Weſtphalia. Here all the Nobility, as well as the People, met, except one Widichind, who conſcious to himſelf how much he had diſobliged and incenſed the King, durſt not adventure to be preſent, but fled to Sigifrid, the King of the Danes. All the reſt that were preſent ſubmitted themſelves fully to his Commands, and deſired Pardon on this condition, that if ever after they rebelled, they ſhould forfeit both their Lands and Liberty. Many of them now again, but onely upon deſign to pleaſe him, renounced Paganiſm, and were baptized. He cauſed to be ſeized Angrye, the principal Town belonging to Widichind, and for Inſtruction of ſuch as had been baptized in the Chriſtian Faith, founded an Epiſcopal See at Oſnaburg.

Le Latin des Annales de S. Martial dit Ingenuitatem & Alodem guerpierunt, d' ou vient noſtre d' Eſguerpir, qui ſignifie aſchir: & celles de langage ruſtic: Ingenuitatem & Alodem manibus dulgtum fecerunt, qui ſignifie le Meſme. Carie n'ay nuſicy ces mots que pour margne de l' antiquitè, & repreſenter noſtre langue. Pauchet. en Charle maigne.

Charles makes an Expedition into Spain.

40. But while he was making an end with the Saxons, an Addreſs was made to him by one Ibnalorabi, a Petty Saracen Prince in Spain, who, with ſeveral others of his Countreymen, was come to complain of his Neighbour, to deſire his aid, and give up himſelf and his Dependents wholly to his Power, on condition he would go and make War againſt the Aggreſſour. He conſidered ſeriouſly of the matter. The Saxons now ſeemed to be quieted, Italy was alſo in repoſe, and in as good a condition as he could wiſh, and in France it ſelf was no appearance of any trouble, he could not be idle, his military Men would ruſt and grow unſerviceable, if they had nothing to doe, and above all things Dominion was agreeable anſwering his Deſires, Opportunities and Abilities, hoping therefore by this means to get ſome footing in Spain, he reſolved upon the Enterpriſe. His reſolution being fixt he made all poſſible haſte to be there, and would not defer his Journey till Eaſter

Tunc ex perſuaſione prædicti Saraceni ſpem capiendarum in Hiſpania Civitatum haud fruſtrà concipiens, &c. Aimoin. l.4. c.72.

Eaſter was over, but reſolved to celebrate that Feſtival in Aquitain. This done he paſſed on to the Pyrenæans, through the Territories of the Baſques, or Biſcainers, and in his way took in the Cities, and ſubdued the Countrey, as far as the River Iberus, which ariſing in Navarre, pours it ſelf by the City Dertoſa into the Mediterranean Sea. Then paſſing the River, he took Cæſar-auguſta, the principal City of theſe parts, over which he made Ibnalarabi King, and ſo having ſettled matters as to him ſeemed convenient, and received Hoſtages, he returned to Pampelo, the Walls of which he demoliſhed, to hinder a Revolt, and then put himſelf on the way toward the Pyrenæans in order to his return home. Coming to the ſtraits and precipitous places, the Army was conſtrained to march, not in the order it was wont, but drawn out in length as the nature of the ways required. In theſe difficult places, which were alſo full of Wood, did the Vaſcons (thoſe of Iberia, or of Navarre,) lie in wait, and falling on a ſudden on the Rere, made great ſlaughter of the Waggon-drivers, and ſuch as followed the Camp, and plundered the Baggage. Then did they advance farther, and in a Valley called Roncavallis, ſet upon the Party it ſelf, and notwithſtanding all the Officers could doe, put it all to the Sword. Though in Numbers they were inferiour to the Franks, and very ſlightly armed, yet had they the Advantage by their knowledge of the place, their being accuſtomed to climbing, and the lightneſs of their Weapons. In the fight fell moſt of the great men the King had about him, of whom the moſt remarkable were Eghart, the Overſeer of his Table, Anſhelme, a Count of the Palace, and Rotland, or * Roland, Governour of the Borders of Britain, of whom many Romantick Stories have been † written. But the worſt was theſe Vaſcons could not be puniſhed, nor Vengeance taken on them for ſo foul an Affront, for having done the feat they ſecured themſelves in the Woods and Mountains, and not a Man of them was to be ſeen. This much troubled Charles, and gave a notable check to his triumphant fortune. But ſeeing here he could not make up the buſineſs, nor obliterate the diſgrace, he returned home, expecting ſome good opportunity to doe it elſewhere.

But in his return his Army is overthrown by the Vaſcons.

Eginhartus in vita Caroli.

41. At his return his Melancholy was ſomewhat mitigated by the ſight of a young Son; for Hildegardis his Queen was newly brought to bed of Twins, whereof one died; this other that ſurvived he named Ludovicus, or Lodowick. But the News of the Defeat he had received by the Vaſcons had reached the Ears of the inſtable and rebellious Saxons, who rejoiced exceedingly at it, and thought they had now a convenient opportunity offered for revenging upon his Friends and Subjects the many Injuries they had received from him and his Predeceſſours. They invaded their Territories, and deſtroyed all the parts of Germany with Fire and Sword, as far as the River Rhine. No place or Perſon, ſacred or prophane, did they ſpare, but managed their work with ſo much Rage and Cruelty, as plainly demonſtrated, in the opinion of Aimoinus, that they came not for plunder, but were drawn on by the more pleaſing allurement of Revenge. The News was brought to Charles as he lay at Antiſſiodorum, who with ſpeed commanded ſome Companies of Franks and Alemans to march, and, if poſſible, to intercept them with their booty. But they knew the fault they had committed, and unwilling to be called to an account, made what haſte they could to get home; ſo that the Forces of Charles, with much adoe, overtook them in a Village of the Haſſii, ſtanding upon the River Aterna; but there overtaking them, as they were paſſing the River, made of them ſuch ſlaughter, that ſcarcely any remained to carry home the News. But the King thought neither this a full chaſtiſement, nor a ſatisfaction to his Honour. Having kindly wellcomed Hildebrand, the Duke of Spoletum, who came to wait on him out of Italy, with great Preſents, he buckled himſelf to another expedition into Saxony. The uſual Aſſembly of the Eſtates he held at Duren, and ſo with his Army paſſed over the Rhine, which he had ſcarcely done, when the bold Saxons oppoſed his March at a place called Buocholt. But here alſo they were miſerably beaten, and put to flight, and the King entring the Countrey of the Weſtfalians, they all yielded

Another Invaſion of the Saxons.

But with the loſs of the whole Army.

---

* Rowland, or Rou-land. The reſt of the Land or Countrey. In French Roland, in the Netherlands Roeland, and Orlando for Rolando in Italian.

† Come Orlando Furioſo Mid. Ludovico Arioſto. Che Comincia:

Le donne i Cavallier, l' arme i amori
Le Corteſie, l' audaci impreſe io canto
Che furo altempo, che paſſaro i Mori
D' Africa il mare ein Francia nocquer tanto
Segnendo l' ire eil giouenil furori
D Agramante lor Re; che ſi die vanto
Di vendicar la morte di Trojano
Sopra Re Carlo Imperator Romano.
Diro d' Orlando in un medeſmo tratto
Coſa non ditta inproſa mai ne in rima
Che per amor venne in furore e matto
D' huem, che ſi ſaggio craſtimato prima, &c.

The Weſt and Eaſtfalians with the Angarii ſubdued by Charles.

yielded themſelves to him. Thence he moved toward the River Wiſera, and incamping in a place called Nuduſulli, there reſted himſelf and his Army for ſome days, and thither the Angarii and Eaſtfalians thought it beſt to come to give up their Hoſtages, and ſwear Obedience, which being paſt, the King returned over the Rhine to Wormes, and there he wintred.

42. But he thought not his work to be yet completed, and inwardly fretting that this ſtubborn Nation ſhould perpetually create him trouble, he was reſtleſs in his Mind, till he could bring them once into a ſettled courſe of Fidelity and Allegiance, and therefore aſſoon as the ſeaſon of the Year would permit, once again he led a ſtrong Army into Saxony. The Eaſtern Saxons he commanded to give him a meeting at the River Onacer, which Summons they obeyed, and a great multitude counterfeiting Chriſtian Religion, were here baptized in a place called Orehim. Thence he marched to the confluence of the two Rivers, Ora and Albia, where he ſettled matters, as well amongſt the Sclavi, who inhabited beyond, as the Saxons, that lived on this ſide the Water, which having done, he returned home. But at home in Idleneſs he could not reſt; having no matter now left in Saxony, to work upon, nor at home to diſturb his foreign Expeditions, his mind was wholly bent upon Italy, having had better fortune, and therefore more encouragement in paſſing the Alpes, than he had had in retreating over the Pyrenæans. Here our Authours that were Churchmen, would fain make themſelves and us believe, that his Deſign was purely religious, that he went to Rome to pray, and pay ſome Vows. But not to queſtion his Religious Inclinations, he might well be induced to undertake this Journey, for other very grave and political Reaſons. He had planted a new French Kingdom, as it were, in an Italian and foreign ſoil, and for it to thrive and proſper, there was requiſite a little looking after. The Lombards he had no reaſon to believe ſo much in love with him, as that their affection would not faint and cool by diſcontinuance of ſight and commerce. Aldegiſus, the Son of the late Deſiderius, hovered over Italy, and expected when a convenient opportunity would be preſented of repoſſeſſing himſelf and family of his Father's Kingdom.

Charles goes for Italy.

Thence to Rome.

43. He thought it not amiſs to carry his Sons along with him, having had by Hildegardis three, viz. Charles, Pipin and Lodowick, beſides other Children of the female Sex. He had found by experience, that the Authority of the Roman Biſhop had not been unſerviceable in the crowning of him and his Brother Carloman; and he reſolved now to deſire the preſent Pope, who he knew would hardly refuſe him any thing to give them the ſame Caſt of his Office. To Rome he came, after he had ſettled matters in Lombardy, where he was kindly entertained, and according to his deſire Pipin was firſt baptized, and then anointed King of Italy, and his other Son Lodowick over Aquitain. In his Return at Milan he had a Daughter baptized by Thomas, the Archbiſhop of that See, and named Giſla. But amongſt other things agreed on betwixt him and Pope Adrian, it was reſolved jointly to ſend to Taſſilo, the Duke of Bavaria, to put him in mind of the Oath of Duty and Allegiance he had made to Pipin, and his Sons and Succeſſours, the Kings of France. They that were ſent ſo effectually managed their buſineſs, that he promiſed immediately to repair to the King, if he could but be ſecured of his Life by fitting Hoſtages. The Hoſtages being ſent he came, as he had ingaged, and receiving the Oath of Fidelity, gave up twelve of his own for good and faithfull performance of it, which done, he returned into his own Countrey, but not long continued in Obedience. Charles, ſecure of him, now, as he thought, found reaſon in Spring to make a Progreſs into Saxony, reſolving to hold a general Aſſembly of the States, as he was yearly wont to do in France. At Coloin he paſſed the Rhine, and with all his Army came to the head of the River Lippia, where he incamped, and continued many days.

Where his Sons are baptized, and anointed by Pope Adrian.

After his return he goes to Saxony.

44. Here, amongſt other buſineſs of Importance, he gave Audience to the Ambaſſadours of Sigefrid, King of the Danes, as alſo to thoſe of Caganus and Jugunus, Princes of the Hunnes, ſent to deſire his Friendſhip and Alliance. But the Aſſembly being diſſolved, and the King returned back into Gall, Widikind, who, as we ſaid, fled to the Daniſh King, returned home, and put all into diſorder, which had in appearance been formerly ſettled. At the ſame time News was brought to Court, that the Sorabi, or Slavi, who inhabited betwixt the two Rivers, Albia and Sala, had made Incurſions into the neighbouring Territories of the Thuringi and Saxons, and had waſted certain places with Fire and Sword. Charles hereupon gave ſpeedy order to three of his Miniſters, Adalgiſus his Chamberlain, Geilo

The Slavi make Incurſions on their Neighbours.

the

Sect. 4.

The Treachery of the Saxons.

the Comes Stabuli, and Woradus a Count of the Palace, to raiſe a ſufficient number of the Eaſtern Franks and Saxons, and therewith to chaſtiſe the Inſolence of theſe Rovers. They, when they came upon the Borders of Saxony, to their wonder and diſappointment, inſtead of Aſſiſtence, found the Saxons, by the Practices of Widikind, ready to fight againſt them. It happened well that they met with Theodorick, a Count, the King's Kinſman, who hearing of the Revolt, had levied Forces all on a ſudden in Ribuaria. He offered to join with them, and ſet upon the Saxons, who had incamped on the North ſide of an Hill, called Suntel, and they ſeeming to cloſe with him, ordered him to take one way, and they would march another, ſo as to incompaſs the Hill, and ſurpriſe them. But they feared leſt he ſhould have the Honour of the Victory, and therefore reſolved to fall upon the Enemy by themſelves, before he could come up and meet them. And on the Enemy they fell, not in any order, but confuſedly, every one putting Spurs to his Horſe, and ſtriving who ſhould be the foremoſt to ſeize the Prey, which they doubted not but would fall into their Hands. They were ſo warmly received by the Saxons, that they were all in a manner ſlain, thoſe few that eſcaped betaking themſelves to the Army of Theodorick. Amongſt others fell Adalgiſus and Geilo, beſides four Counts, and twenty Noblemen.

Who are ſoundly beaten in the next Expedition.

45. The News of the defeat being brought to Charles, in great indignation he raiſed an Army, and entred Saxony, where calling before him the Nobility, he inquired into the Authours of the Revolt. All the blame was laid upon Widikind, but he, aware of what would follow had again withdrawn himſelf into Danemarke, or amongſt the Normans, as our Authours call them, and no example of ſeverity could be ſhewn upon him. Of thoſe therefore which, moved by his Perſuaſions, had riſen in Rebellion, and deſtroyed ſo many Franks, no fewer than four thouſand and five hundred Men were delivered up, whom he commanded all in one day to be beheaded upon the River Alarus, at a place called Fredi. This ſeverity was great enough, and poſſibly too great, for inſtead of awing the Saxons, it drove them into a rage, and cauſed an univerſal Defection. Then was more work made for the King, who being in honour obliged to proſecute the buſineſs to the utmoſt, made preparations in Spring for another Expedition, when by a Domeſtick Accident his Journey, for ſome time, was retarded. The laſt day of April was the laſt of the Life of Hildegardis his Queen, whoſe Funerals he ſtaid to ſee Royally ſolemnized, and then he began his march for Saxony, where the Natives were prepared to receive him at a place called Theothinelli, as Aimoinus hath it. He fell on them ſo ſuddenly, that he made a very great ſlaughter, and of ſo vaſt a multitude very few eſcaped. From the place of the Battel he marcht to Paderborne, where making ſome ſtay for other Forces, which he had appointed to follow him out of France, he underſtood there was another Party of Saxons aſſembled at the River Haſa, with Intention to give him Battel, if he came that way. The ſupplies being arrived, he marched thither, and had the ſame ſucceſs, putting to the Sword an innumerable multitude, and taking very many Priſoners. Thence triumphantly he marched Eaſtward, firſt to the River Wiſara, and then as far as Albia, waſting all things in his paſſage. This done, he returned with his Victorious Army into France, where he preſently married Faſtrada, the Daughter of one Radulf, a Count, a Frank by Nation, by which he had two Daughters. The ſame year he married her he loſt Bertrada, his Mother, who died on the twelfth of July. All the Winter he ſpent in the Village called Heriſtall, and there kept both his Chriſtmas and Eaſter.

Charles endeavours to finiſh the War with the Saxons.

46. Thence aſſoon as the ſeaſon would well permit, he reſolved to return, and finiſh the War with this ſtout and pertinacious People. Paſſing the Rhine, he waſted Weſtfalia, and coming to the Weſere, when he perceived he could not doe the ſame by the Northern Party of Saxony, by reaſon of the Waters which overflowed the Countrey after great Rains, he himſelf went into Thoringia, commanding his Son Charles to ſtay with part of the Army in the Borders of Weſtfalia. Through Thoringia he marched into the Champion Parts of Saxony, being near the two Rivers Sala and Albia, and waſting all the Eaſtern Countries, he then retreated into France, His Son Charles, in the mean time fought very proſperouſly with a ſtrong Party of Horſe, which gave him battel, with hopes, that though he was the King's Son, he might not be Heir to his good Fortune, but having made great ſlaughter, of them, he followed his Father to the City Wormes. But there his Father would not keep him company; for into Saxony again he marched, having no patience till he could conquer and ſubdue this ſtubborn Nation, and in his Camp, in a Village called Huthagoe, upon the River Amba, he kept his Chriſtmas. The Feſtival being over, he waſted the Countrey, as far as the place called Rum, at the confluence of the two Rivers, Weſere and Waharne, and the ſeaſon of the year, with the great Inundations, prohibiting him to paſs farther, he returned to the Caſtle of Eresburg, and there ſpent the remaining part of Winter.

47. The remaining part he ſpent not idly; ſecuring his Wife and Children, whom he had ſent for, by a ſtrong Garriſon placed in the Caſtle, into all parts, as he could, he made Excurſions, killing every Perſon he could light on, and burning all the Villages. Sometimes in his own Perſon, and otherwhiles by his Captains, he ſo plied the Saxons, that all Winter long they had no reſt, and when Spring appeared, for their farther comfort, a freſh Army out of France arrived. Having thus abated their Spirit, as he thought, he held an Aſſembly at Paderborne in a ſolemn manner, which being concluded, he removed to a Village called Bardengoe, where he underſtood that Alboin and Witichind, the chief Authours of ſo much trouble, were retired beyond the River Elbe. He ſent to them by ſome of their own Countreymen, adviſing them as the beſt for them, when all was conſidered, to come to him, and own him for their Sovereign Lord, which ſo wrought on them, together with the late miſeries ſuſtained by the War, that they refuſed to appear, upon no other grounds, than that they had no Hoſtages for their ſecurity. He ſent them Hoſtages by one Amalwin, a Courtier, and then he returned into France. They were not long after him, for having received the Hoſtages with Amalwin, they came to the Court at Atigny, where all controverſies were ended by their receipt of Baptiſm, and Witichind was made Duke of Angrie, being, as ſome have thought, the Progenitor of Hugh Capet. Thus Clemency effected that which the Severity of War and Revenge for ſo long a time could not bring about, and the Saxons for ſome Years continued in Obedience. Which at laſt he effects,

48. But theſe being over wearied, as it were, with Eaſe and Fidelity, they returned to their old rebellious humour, and then returned the like ſlaughters and devaſtaſions, as formerly had been committed. Neither could this humour be quite ſubdued by ſo many and grievous Calamities, till Induſtry completed that which Force and Arms had in vain attempted, almoſt for thirty years together. Such as lived on this ſide the Elbe were by the more frequent Incurſions of the Franks, ſooner tamed, their humours were ſooner ſoftened by their converſation, and their fury and violence calmed by the powerfull Charms of Chriſtian Religion, once cordially imbraced. But they that lived on the farther ſide this River, being ſeparated from the reſt, leſs accuſtomed to commerce, and dwelling in no great apprehenſion of Chaſtiſement, upon every occaſion were prone to their old wont of Rebellion. Charles therefore paſſing over the River, cauſed them to aſſemble together, and eaſily procured them to take the Oath of Fidelity, to which they had been as much accuſtomed, as to break it. This done, he perſuaded them to make an Exchange of this their Countrey, which was cold and barren, for better Lands, which he would find out elſewhere. Ten thouſand of the moſt ſtout and conſiderable among them, with their Wives and Children, he tranſported over the Rhine, and planted them amongſt the Franks in Brabant, Flanders, and other places. And that theſe that remained might not return to their perfidious practices, and the grounds lie waſte and uſeleſs, he cauſed the Abroditæ, a People he could truſt, and the next Neighbours, thither to remove themſelves. Moreover he ſettled a Council in the place, which was to uſe great ſeverity toward ſuch as falſified their Faith, the Image of which continued in thoſe parts many Ages after. The Concluſion of this War, and this Tranſplantation of the Saxons happened ſome time beyond the period of this preſent Volume; ſome ſay in the thirty third year of the War; but we were unwilling to leave the Reader altogether in the dark, as to its iſſue. By tranſplanting them.

49. Charles, by his Clemency to Witichind and his Party, ſettled the Affairs of Saxony for a certain time, when his contrary carriage to the Oriental Franks or thoſe of Franconia, living beyond the Rhine, procured a quite contrary effect amongſt them. His ſecond Wife, Faſtrade, was of a quite different humour from that of his firſt, of an high and turbulent Spirit, intermeddling with Affairs of State, and diſquieting both her ſelf and Husband, as ſuch Women are wont to doe, if her ambitious, envious and covetous deſires were not in every point obſerved. Overcome by her vexatious Importunities, he entred upon ſome ſevere Courſes, which caſt the Nobility of Franconia into a Conſpiracy, through the perſuaſion of one Hardrade, a Count. But herein, as in his other Affairs, the good fortune of Charles A Conſpiracy.

appeared, that he had notice of the Plot, e'er it could break out into any open Act, and by his Prudence and Expedition prevented the miſchief intended, the Conſpiratours being timely apprehended and committed to Cuſtody, with whom, as conſcious that his contrary acting had given them ſome provocation, he reſolved not to proceed with cruelty. Some were deprived of their ſight, others ſent into baniſhment, ſome abſolutely pardoned, and none put to death, onely three were killed by the Officers, from whom they fled. Charles having ſo happily prevented this deſigned miſchief, as the Foſter Child of Fortune was ſtill led on from one felicity to another. The Inhabitants of Armorica, or Little Britain, for all his great Succeſſes and Name, were unwilling to pay their accuſtomed Tribute, which the Kings had accounted their due, ever ſince this People being expelled by the Saxons and Angli out of the Britiſh Iſland, and having ſeated themſelves in the Territories of the Veneti and Coroſolitæ, had from Scylla faln upon Charibdis, and flying from the Yoke of one, had been forced to ſubmit their Necks to that of another. Sometimes they refuſed to pay their Money, with what ſucceſs we have formerly ſeen; now and then, as they ſaw their opportunities, they would rebell, and turn open Enemies invading and ranſacking the neighbouring French Territories, but ſtill in the end were forced to return, and join themſelves in the yoke of Servitude with the reſt of the conquered or truckling Nations. Charles diſdained to bear that Indignity which the meaneſt of his Predeceſſours would not endure, and diſpatched away Audulfe, the Overſeer of his Table, with Forces ſufficient for chaſtiſing and reducing them, who had ſuch ſucceſs, that without much adoe he brought them to crave Pardon, and promiſe all good demeanour for the time to come, for confirmation whereof they gave up their Hoſtages, whom, with many of the Nobility, he preſented to the King, then lying at Wormes.

The Britains of Armorica reduced to Obedience.

50. Gall was wholly now in repoſe, and in perfect Obedience, not the leaſt ſtir nor accident happening, which might make him work. Being ſo much at leiſure, he thought it as profitable as gratefull to his Humour, to make another Voyage into Italy, and viſite thoſe foreign Dominions, which he had not of ſo long a time beheld. He had ſome reaſon, for Aragiſe, Duke of Beneventum, began to grow very formidable, making up again a little ſhew of a Kingdom, and having never thoroughly ſubmitted himſelf, nor owned the Authority of the Franks. Upon him Charles reſolved to fall on a ſudden, and take him unprepared, to which purpoſe in the middle of Winter he took his Journey, and having made his paſſage over the Alpes, and through the Snow, kept his Chriſtmas at Florence, which over, he departed with all ſpeed to Rome. Here having for ſome time conſulted with Adrian the Biſhop, and the reſt of his Friends, he buckled himſelf to his March toward Beneventum, the Seat of the Dukedom, a City of Samnium, to which was ſubject Campania, the Salernitani, with all Calabria. Aragiſe knowing himſelf ſurprized, and at beſt inferiour to the King in ſtrength, betook himſelf to craft and policy. He ſent to him Runold, his eldeſt Son, with Gifts and good Words, to divert him from his purpoſe, but he was too tenacious of it to be ſo put off, and taking the Meſſenger along with him, marched to Capua, the chief City of Campania, which he beſieged. Arigiſe perceiving what muſt be the Iſſue, left Beneventum, and betook himſelf to Silernum, a Town both ſtronger, and ſtanding upon the Water; whence he ſent to him Grimoald, his other Son, to deprecate his Diſpleaſure, and promiſing him to obey him in all things he ſhould require, which good language and condeſcenſion ſo wrought upon him, that retaining Grimoald, as an Hoſtage, he ſent his elder Brother home to his Father, with ſome Noblemen of the French Army, who were to receive the Oaths and Hoſtages of the ſeveral Cities, which being done, he drew off his Army, and returned to Rome, where he kept his Eaſter.

He makes another Voyage into Italy.

51. Having diſpatcht his Affairs thus in Italy, though all was clear on that Coaſt, when he came out of Gall, yet now another ſtorm was gathering in Bavaria, where Taſſilo the Duke plaid faſt and looſe, being merely by fear and awe kept from openly violating that Agreement he had formerly made with Pipin and his Poſterity, and ever and anon ready to renounce obedience, when he perceived there was any probability, either by reaſon of his own Advantages, or the Incumbrances of Charles, to ſucceed in his Deſigns. But hearing now that the Lombards were abſolutely reduced, and that his Kinſman would be at leiſure to call him to an Account, he ſent his Ambaſſadours to Rome, where Charles ſtill reſided, to deſire of the Biſhop, that he would beget a perfect underſtanding betwixt them. The Biſhop was very ready to become Authour of ſo good a work, and Charles was not ſo averſe, but that he eaſily brought him to cloſe with the Offer, ſo that there wanted ted nothing but to ſign the League, and confirm the Agreement. But the Ambaſſadours being demanded what Power they had to conclude or ratifie the Treaty, denied that their Inſtructions or Commiſſion extended any farther than merely to underſtand the Pleaſure of the King and Biſhop, and return their Anſwers to their Maſter. Adrian hereat conceived great Indignation, as fooled by a trifling Meſſage, and ſent them away with Threats of Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures, in caſe Taſſilo ſtood not firm to the former obligations he had made to the Houſe of Pipin. Charles thought it beſt not to be long after the Meſſenger, and taking his leave of the Biſhop, departed to Wormes. Here finding his Wife and Family, he called an Aſſembly of the Eſtates, wherein the whole matter relating to his late Exploits in Italy, and the buſineſs of Taſſilo was reported, and foraſmuch as it was reported and feared, that this Bavarian Duke would call in the Hunnes to his aſſiſtence, it was unanimouſly reſolved to raiſe a very conſiderable Army, wherewith Bavaria in three ſeveral places ſhould be invaded.

He invades Bavaria.

52. On one ſide Pipin, the Son of Charles, with his Italian Forces, was ordered to march over the Rhetian Alpes, and invade the Countrey from the South. From the North the Oriental Franks and Saxons were to give the Onſet; and the King himſelf, with the third Party, reſolved to fall on where the River Leccus divided the Bavarians from the Alemans, at the City Auguſta, ſo that Taſſilo ſhould have no way to eſcape, except he took that of the Eaſt, toward the Territories of the Hunnes, which if he did, then would the Franks enter, and ſeize upon his Dominions. Taſſilo found himſelf ſo intangled, that he laid off thoughts of invading France, wherewith, at the Inſtigation of his Wife, and the Promiſes of the Hunnes, he had flattered himſelf, and caſt himſelf at the Feet of Charles, begging Pardon for his paſt Errours, and renewing his uſual Proteſtations. The King for this time yielded to his importunity, and receiving his Son Theodo, with twelve others, for Hoſtages, returned into France, and wintred in a place near to Mentz, called Ingilinheim. Here in the Spring following he held an Aſſembly of the Eſtates, whereat all his Subjects and Vaſſals were commanded to be preſent, and Taſſilo, the Duke of Bavaria, amongſt the reſt. He made his appearance; but his own Subjects afraid, it ſeems, of the War which threatned their Countrey with devaſtation, in caſe he ſhould revolt, laid heavy Crimes to his Charge, as that ſince his laſt ſwearing Obedience, at the importunity of his Wiſe Liutberga, the Daughter of Deſiderius, he had tampered afreſh with the Hunnes, to procure a ſtrong alliance with them, in order to a Rebellion, with other things and words, which were ſo aggravated, that he was, as a Traitour, condemned to Death, he not being able to deny what was objected. But the Clemency of the King procured a mitigation of his puniſhment, for that Head which was to be cut off, was covered onely with a Monk's Hood, and Theodo, his Son, was ſhaven alſo, and for company ſhut up with him in the Monaſtery, thoſe Bavarians that had been of the Conſpiracy being baniſhed into ſeveral places. The Hunnes, as they had promiſed, raiſed two Armies, whereof with one they invaded the Marches of Forum Julii, and with the other made an Inrode into Bavaria, but in both places were worſted, and driven back with great loſs of Men. This loſs inraged them, and to be revenged, with more numerous Forces they again invade Bavaria, but the Inhabitants receive them with ſuch Conduct and Reſolution, that having put to the Sword an innumerable Company of them, many of the reſt, for fear, took the River Danubius, and thinking to ſwim ſafe to land, are overwhelmed with the flouds.

And ſhaves the Duke and his Son.

53. Charles having fully reduced Bavaria, put the Government into another poſture. He made no one Duke over the whole, leſt he ſhould commit too much Power into the Hands of one Man, but many Counts or Governours, that their number might render them weaker, and more contemptible. His Hands being now again idle, he muſt ſome other way employ, and rather than want work, he will travell to ſeek it as far as the very Baltick Ocean: There where it paſſes by Germany, in the Territories now belonging to Pomerania, Mecleburg and Holſatia, lived a Nation of the Hunnes, fierce and barbarous, in their own Language called Welatabi, and in the French Wiltzi, or Vultzi, always adverſe to the Intereſt of the Franks, if we believe their Authours, and infeſting ever and anon their beſt Friends and Confederates, particularly the Abroditæ. The King not able any longer to indure their Inſolence, reſolved to make them feel the Effects of his Diſpleaſure, and gathering a vaſt Army together, paſſed the Rhine about Coloine, whence travelling through Saxony, he came to the Elbe, and pitching his Camp upon the River, over it he laid two Bridges, whereof one on both ſides he fortified, and thereon thereon placed a Garriſon. Then marching forwards, at length he entred the Enemies Countrey, which he waſted with Fire and Sword, till ſuch time as the Inhabitants being terrified with his Name, and his manner of proceeding, began to conſult how to appeaſe him, and laying their Heads together, the Reguli, Nobility and Senate, though they were a Nation Stout and Warlike, gave up themſelves into his hands, promiſing all Fidelity and Allegiance from which they never in the leaſt departed. This Conqueſt ſo happily performed, he returned back the ſame way he came, and in Wormes kept both his Chriſtmas and the Eaſter following. And that year, which was a wonder, he made no expedition at all, but reſiding in that City, gave Audience to the Ambaſſadours that came from the Hunnes, and ſent ſome of his own to them; a great Controverſie having ariſen about the Borders of their Dominions, which became the Original of ſuch Heats and Malice as could not be ended but by a War. Farther, to buſie and divert himſelf, he paſſed up the River Menus, to his Palace of Saltz in Germany, built upon the River Sala, and down again he Rowed to Wormes, where Wintering, his Houſe wherein he lived accidentally was ſet on Fire in the Night and Burnt. Yet he ſtill continued in the place, and as magnificently as ever ſolemnized the Feaſt of Chriſtmas and Eaſter.

He ſubdues the Vultzi.

Picks a Quarrel with the Hunnes.

Alias Magnifrid.

54. Theſe Hunnes we lately ſpoke of, were part of the Poſterity of thoſe who in the Reign of Honorius powered themſelves into Europe, and being a moſt direfull Plague to the Inhabitants thereof, had ſeized on both the Pannonia Superior toward the Weſt, where are now the Provinces of Carniola, Carinthia and the greater part of Auſtria; and the Inferior alſo toward the South, which at this day contains Boſnia, Sclavonia and that part of Hungary lying towards Iſter or the Danube, ſo named from thoſe People which were called both Hunnes and Avares, and as we are told from both words joyned together, known by the name of Hungari or Hungarians. So long as Bavaria continued a Dukedom of it ſelf, there was no occaſion of quarrel miniſtred betwixt theſe Hunnes and the Franks, but this Countrey being fully ſubdued, and laid to the reſt of their Dominions, Charles and they began to quarrel about the limits of their Territories. The quarrel aroſe to that height, that Charles diſdaining to receive the leaſt diſadvantage, and elevated by the conſtant ſucceſs he had had over their Neighbours, from ſo ſmall a beginning, raiſed a moſt tedious and grievous War, which continued full eight years, and then was completed with the Deſtruction almoſt of the whole Nation. Making Levies throughout all his Dominions, he divided his Forces into two Parties according to his Cuſtome, to diſtract and amuſe the Enemy the more, whereof the one he committed to the Conduct of Theodorick a Count, and Magnafrid his Chamberlain, with Orders to invade the Countrey at the Northern Bank of the Danube; he himſelf led the other, reſolving to make an Invaſion on the Southern part by the way of Bavaria, the Inhabitants whereof he Commanded to convey Proviſions for the Army down the River.

Waſting this Countrey with Fire and Sword.

Alias Rabus.

Alias Beamnii.

Alias Reginum. Ravensburg.

55. Thus appointed he began his March, and made his firſt incamping upon the River Ariſus, which ſeparated Bavaria from the Territories of the Hunnes, and there he ſpent three days in Prayers and Supplications to Almighty God, for a bleſſing upon his Expedition. Then invading the Countrey, he waſted all with Fire and Sword, the Enemy not daring to give him Battel, but ſecuring himſelf in his Forts, whereof two were very conſiderable; one upon the River Cambus wherewith it was exceedingly Fortified, and another near the City Comageni, upon a Mountain called Cameoberg moſt difficult of Acceſs: But the Reſolution of Charles, and the Valour of his Souldiers Conquered both thoſe places, and he went on deſtroying all things as far as the River Arrabo, over which paſſing his Men, he came to the confluence of it and the River Danubius, where he made ſome ſtay, purpoſing to return by the Countrey of Gabaria. To Theodorick and Magnifrid he ſent Orders to Retreat by the way of the Begamini as they came, and then having laid waſte a great part of Pannonia, he returned into Bavaria without any loſs or diſadvantage in all this expedition, except in Horſes, amongſt which raged ſo great a Contagion, that ſcarcely the tenth part remained alive of ſo many thouſands. Having diſmiſſed his Souldiers, he himſelf ſaith Aimoinus came to the City Regimini which now is called Reganesburg, where he reſolved to Winter, and there to celebrate the Feſtivals both of our Lord's Nativity and his Reſurrection.

56. While here he yet reſided, Conſulting how with beſt ſucceſs he might farther proſecute the War with the Hunnes, he was in danger of his Life at home by a Conſpiracy. He had a Baſtard Son named Pipin, one of a beautifull Face, but Hutch-back'd, and as deformed it ſeems in his mind as in his Body, for ſeveral great Men

Sect. 4.

Another Conſpiracy.

Men wearied with the cruel demeanour of Faſtrade the Queen, conſulted with him how to prevent her practices by her Husband's Death, and by ſending the Father into another World, to make way for his Son's advancement in this. He being either an Authour or the pretext of this Conſpiracy, they expect a convenient ſeaſon to execute their Deſigns, when the whole Plot and Contrivance is diſcovered to the King by one Fardulf a Lombard, and they as Guilty of High Treaſon were ſome of them Beheaded, and others Hanged, Pipin being ſhut up in the Monaſtery of Prumium, and Fardulf rewarded with that of St. Denis. This Conſpiracy thus hapily blown over, he cauſed a Bridge to be laid over the Danube, continuing ſtill in Bavaria and intent upon the War with the Hunnes, for which he reſolved in the ſame place to ſpend the ſecond Winter. When he began to prepare for another Expedition, News was brought that the Forces under the Command of Theodorick, in their return through Friſia in a Village called Hiruſtri near the River Wiſara were intercepted and deſtroyed. This cauſed him to put off his Journey into Pannonia, though to keep up his Reputation he diſſembled the greatneſs of the Loſs.

His endeavours to promote Navigation.

Aliis Ardantia & Alemo.

57. But leſt he and his Men ſhould be idle, he gave ear to the Project of ſome about him, who pretended they had found out a rare Expedient for the inriching of Germany, and the Neighbouring parts of Europe, by promoting Commerce betwixt the ſeveral Countries. Of the Rhine and the Danube, the two greateſt Rivers of thoſe parts of the World, the one falls into the German Ocean, and the other runs Eaſtward into the Euxine Sea. Betwixt theſe lay two more inconſiderable, in the days of Aimoinus or the Authour of that Hiſtory called Radantia and Alomora, whereof the one mingles its Waves with the Danube, and the other empties it ſelf into the Rhine. Betwixt theſe two they adviſed a Ditch three hundred foot broad ſhould be cut, ſuch as would receive large Veſſels, and accordingly the whole Autumn many men were employed, who digged ſuch a Ditch three hundred foot in breadth, and in length two Miles. But all this was loſt Labour, it being hard for Mortals to alter that courſe of Nature, which God Almighty has appointed to ſublunary things. What they digged on the Day, was by Night filled up again, partly by Earth the Ground being Fenny and looſe, and partly by Water, great Rains as is uſual at that time of the year falling in thoſe Parts, lying ſo near to the German Ocean. While he thus made himſelf work in this part of Germany, he had other work made to his hands elſewhere by the Saxons, who univerſally Revolted, and the Saracens who having entred Septimania defeated in Battel ſuch Counts and others as oppoſed themſelves in defence of the Countrey, and having put many of the Franks to the Sword, returned Victoriouſly to their own Homes.

The Saxons revolt.

58. In the beginning of the following Summer another Accident happened, which however he took it to his Subjects ſeemed not unluckly, and that was the Death of his Wife Faſtrade, who was Buried at Mentz in the Church of St. Alban. Having taken care for her Funeral, and held an Aſſembly of the Eſtates, he divided his Forces into two, and reſolved to renew his ancient Hoſtility with the Saxons, giving order to his Son Charles to paſs the Rhine at Coloin, and with one half to invade the Countrey on the Weſt, while he himſelf by the way of the South, with the reſt of the Army ſhould attacque them. This being done, although the Saxons had pitched their Camp in the place called Smetfeld, and there in appearance expected his coming as ready to give him Battel; yet the matter was ſo carried, that deſpairing of that Succeſs which they had lately promiſed to themſelves, they caſt away both their Arms and Courage, and as univerſally begged pardon, as they had committed the Offence, and without fighting a ſtroke, both gave up their Hoſtages, and according to their old Trade took the Oath of Fidelity. This being over, the King returned into France and Wintred at Aix, and in Spring following not being unmindfull of the perfidious humour of the Saxons, held another General and ſolemn Aſſembly of his Eſtates, beyond the Rhine in a Village called Caſfeſtin not far from Mentz, and thence with an Army re-entred and waſted almoſt all Saxony, and coming to a Village called Bardengum, he encamped near the place called Bardenhunck, and there expected the coming of the Sclavi whom he had ſent for.

But are reduced to Obedience.

Bardenwick.

Bardenhunck.

59. In the mean time News was brought him that Wizin the King of the Abroditæ as he was paſſing the River Elbe, was intrapped and ſlain by the Saxons, which fact farther inraged and provoked him to be revenged on this perfidious Nation. All that he could doe was again to waſte their Countrey, and receive more Hoſtages, of which doubtleſs having ſo often broken their Faith, they were not at all

Sect. 4.

all ſparing; while he was about this work, one Tudun a man of chiefeſt Rank amongſt the Hunnes came Ambaſſadour to him out of Pannonia, and willingly offered himſelf to receive Baptiſm, and to be inſtructed in the Chriſtian Religion. Into ſo good an humour this Barbarian was frighted, by the ſucceſs which the Arms of Charles though not preſent in Perſon, had lately had in that Countrey. For Henry Duke of Forum Julii being ſent thither had made very great ſpoil, and in particular taken and rifled the Royal Palace of the Hunnes called Rhing, whence he brought to the King a very great Treaſure, a great part whereof he was ordered to carry as a preſent to the See of Rome, or as they phraſe it to St. Peter, and the reſt was liberally diſtributed amongſt the great Officers and Courtiers, having been the flower as it were of that vaſt Wealth which this vagrant and thieving People had pilfred out of Aſia and Europe. Pipin alſo his Son he had ſent into Pannonia, with Forces raiſed both in Italy and Bavaria, wherewith he beat the Hunnes, and drove them beyond the River Tiza, which done at his eaſe and pleaſure, he waſted and ſpoiled their Territories, and what was left untoucht and rejected by Henry, all in a manner fell as booty into his Hands, with the Palace Rhing which he totally deſtroyed. Eginhart to this Relation of Aimoinus adds, that the Franks hitherto poor, as poſſeſſing nothing but their Arms and the fruits of their Grounds, from this plunder became very Wealthy, and France full of Gold and other things of value and wonder to them. Pipin preſented it to his Father, who was then returned victoriouſly out of Saxony to Aix, where Tudun and all that came with him were Baptiſed though to no purpoſe on his part as afterward appeared.

He beats the Hunnes.

And returns loaden with rich Booty.

Eorùmque Regia quæ ab eis dicta eſt Rhingus à Langobardis autem Campus vocatur, ex toto deſtructa Aimoinus, lib.4.c.86. Lé païs conquis bien avant juſques aux confins de Drave & Danube fuit appelle Oeſtrich Oeſt à dire en Thiois Royaume Oriental, ayant eſgarda Bauieres & partie duguel regardant l' Occident & la Rivere de Lech ſ'apelle encores Auſtriche. Fauchet, Aimoinus, c.87.

60. About this time, as if all things and places conſpired together to render Charles Fortunate and Victorious, the City Barcinona ſituate on the confines of Spain, having been ſometimes in the hands of the Franks, and otherwhiles of the Saxons, was reſtored to him by Zatis one of that Nation, who had lately got it into his hands. This incouraged him to ſend Lodovick his Son to lay Siege to Oſca, he himſelf having no patience till he was again in Saxony, which he waſted throughout as far as the utmoſt limits of it, where it lay bounded by the Ocean betwixt the two Rivers Elbe and Weſere. Thence returning to Aix, he gave audience to Abdella the Son of King Abimenanga who was come to him out of Mauritania, and to Teockſtus ſent from Nicotes the Governour of Sicily with Letters from the Emperour dated at Conſtantinople. But ſuch was his propenſion toward the puniſhment of the Saxons, that in their Countrey he reſolved to Winter, and paſſing thither, ſate down by the River Weſere, in a place which he would have called Heriſtall, and our Authour tells us was ſo called to his very time. Having diſtributed his Army into their Winter Quarters, he ſent for his two Sons Pipin and Lodovick, whereof the one was returned from his Italian, and the other from his Spaniſh Expedition, and entertained the Ambaſſadours of the Hunnes, ſent to him with great preſents. The like he did to the Ambaſſadours of Hadefonſus King of Auſtria and Gallicia, who neither came empty handed, and then remitted Pipin into Italy, and Lodovick into Aquitain, with whom he ſent Abdella to be conveyed into Spain on his way homeward.

Saxony again waſted by Charles.

Al. Aſturia.

61. Charles paſſed all this Winter in Saxony, to the great terrour of the Inhabitants, as very well might be imagined. But that this was not common to all thoſe that inhabited beyond the Elbe, ſufficiently appeared in this, that e'er the ſeaſon came, that there was Graſs enough for the Army to take the Field, they fell upon certain of his followers, whom he had ſent to doe Juſtice amongſt them, and preſerving a few for Ranſome killed the reſt, and with them Godeſcalcus who was in his way returning from his Embaſſy to Sigefrid King of the Danes. Inraged hereat, above all meaſure, he muſtered his Forces, and whatever lay betwixt the Elbe and the Weſere he deſtroyed with Fire and Sword. But thoſe that lived beyond the Elbe, elevated with the cowardly attempt they had made upon the Perſons lately mentioned, for which as yet they could not be called to account, went about to make War upon the Abodritæ, who ever after their firſt Conjunction had continued faithfull to the Franks. But the prudence and expedition of Theſco the Captain of the Abodritæ prevented them, who having timely notice of their motion met, and gave them Battel in the place called Suentana, where he made great ſlaughter, and forced thoſe that eſcaped with their Lives to run for them, with all the haſte they could make to their own homes. Charles returning to Aix, received ved the Ambaſſadours of Irene the Empreſs, who having put out the Eyes of her Son, had reaſſumed the Government, and at their regret releaſed Siſinnius, the Brother of Taraſius the Patriarch of Conſtantinople, who had been taken Priſoner in Battel. They were ſcarcely diſpatched, when others arrived out of Spain from Hadeſonſus, with a ſmall part of the ſpoil he had lately taken at his Conqueſt of the City Olyſſepona; theſe were ſeven Moors with ſo many Mules and Corſlets, being as one obſerves rather marks of Victory than any conſiderable Preſent. But the bringers he kindly received, and ſent back with rewards. Now were the Iſlands Baleares afterward called Majorica and Minorica, overrun and waſted by Mooriſh Pirates. Charles ſpent this Winter at Aix, and there celebrated the two uſual Feſtivals.

The Saxons fall upon the Abodritæ but are beaten by the aſſiſtence of the Franks.

Lisbon.

Another expedition into Saxony.

62. The Spring following, when he was again preparing for a freſh Expedition into Saxony, he was a little diverted by diſpleaſing News brought him from Rome. There Leo the Biſhop had been moſt inhumanely treated by the Kindred of his Predeceſſours, and after much Cruelty and Malaie ſhewed upon his Body, was clapt up cloſe Priſoner in a Monaſtery, but thence making an eſcape over the Walls, was kindly received by Winigiſus the Duke of Spoletum. The King hearing the News, with great ſorrow and indignation took care that he ſhould be Honourably brought to his preſence, yet reſolved not to put off the War, which he intended once more againſt the Saxons. Removing then to the Rhine, there in the place called Lippia, he held the uſual aſſembly of the Eſtates, and expected the coming of the Roman Biſhop, ſending in the mean time his Son Charles with part of the Army to the Elbe, to diſpoſe of ſome matters relating to the Wiltzi and Abodriti, and to receive ſome Saxons of thoſe called the Nordluidi. Not long after his departure the Biſhop came, and after a kind entertainment for certain days, he ſent him back to Rome with certain of his own men, who reſtored him to his See. He being diſmiſſed, he gave audience to a Meſſenger ſent from Michael the Patritian from Sicily, and preſently after received the unwelcome news of the defeat and Death of two of his Captains, whereof one * Geroldus by name, being a Governour in Bavaria was ſlain in Battel againſt the Hunnes, and the other called Erick or Henry famous for his many Victories, was by the Inhabitants of Tarſus or Tarſa a City of Liburnia circumvented and cut off. † But for this bad news, recompence was made him as ſoon as he returned to Aix where he Wintred. For Wido or Guido a Count and Prefect of the Britiſh Coaſt, || having with others his fellow Counts and Captains overrun Britany, brought him the Arms of the great men he had ſubdued on which their Names were ingraven. Other Trophies were preſented him from thoſe that had reſtrained and puniſhed the Mooriſh Rovers, about Majorica; and Azan the Saracen Governour of Oſca ſent him the Keys of the City with other gifts, and a promiſe to deliver it up into his hands if opportunity ſhould ſerve.

---

* Gerold Duc de Bavieres frere de Hilderic Duc de Suane & de Hildegarde premiere femme de Charles prim mignon du Roy Fauchet.

† Henry Duc de Frioul tuè pres Tranſiſca une ville de Liburnie (C'eſt de Frioul) Fauchet, at Aimoinus habet apud Tarſaticam Liburniæ civitatem, lib. 4. c. 89.

|| Guy Comte de la Marche, ou Marquis de Bretaigne.

63. As ſoon as Spring appeared toward the middle of March, Charles left Aix and viſiting the Coaſts of the Gallick Ocean, appointed a Fleet to be prepared for ſcouring thoſe Seas of the Nordman Pirates, who had now begun to be very troubleſome, and placed Garriſons where he ſaw convenient. His Eaſter he kept at Centulum belonging to St. Richarius, whence he Coaſted again by the Sea ſide, and ſo turned off to Rouen, where croſſing the River Seine, he travelled to Tours to doe his Devotions in the Church of St. Martin. Here he was confined for certain days by reaſon of the ſickneſs of his Wife Liutgarda, which Lady here died on the fourth of June, and was Buried in St. Martin's Church. Thence by Orleance and Paris he returned to Aix, and at the beginning of Auguſt, held a General Aſſembly at Mentz, wherein he declared he would take another Journey into Italy. Accordingly with an Army at his back he came to Ravenna, where he made no ſtay but for ſeven days, ſending his Son Pipin with the Army into the Countrey of Beneventum whom he accompanied as far as Ancona, and then took the way for Rome. But in his way into Italy we are told by ſome that he took Liburnia or Frioul; where he puniſhed the Inhabitants of Tarſatica, for the Murther of Henry their Duke, and put one Codelac into his place. And indeed the inſolence committed by them upon that man, together with the Rebellion of Grimoald the Duke of Beneventum, and the outrage againſt Leo the Biſhop, whatever elſe he deſigned ſeem ſufficient motives for his return into this Countrey. For they were evident ſigns of the ſtirring if not

De puis Bra ban juſques en Bretagne, dit Fauchet.

Centulum Cœnobium Sanct Richarii in Picardia. Sic notatur in Aimoinum. Fauchet ſic, Centulo, lieu proche de St. Richer appartenant à Engilbert ſon gendre benayme c'eſt adire du Roy Charles.

Charles goes for Italy.

Thence to Rome.

Sect. 4.

if not the growth of the Party contrary to his Intereſt, and ſeemed to threaten the Authority of a Prince, whoſe abſence incouraged a People as yet not fully ſetled to a Revolt.

Where he is magnificently received by Pope Leo.

And Crowned Emperour.

64. The day before he arrived at Rome, twelve miles off at Nomentum Pope Leo met him, and having Supped with him that Night, returned to the City to be ready for his ſolemn reception the next day. He rode on Horſeback to the Stairs of St. Peter, where Leo with all his Biſhops and Clergy received him, and with ſolemn proceſſion conducted him into the Church of that Apoſtle. After ſeven days he called the People together, and laid open to them the cauſe of his coming, the Principal whereof was, as he ſaid, to make Inquiſition about thoſe Crimes which were laid to the Charge of their Biſhop. But no Accuſer appearing, Leo with the Goſpel in his hand went up into the Pulpit, and there in preſence of all the People purged himſelf by Oath of the things objected. On Chriſtmas-day, the King being come to St. Peter's Church to hear Divine Service, as he kneeled before the Altar, Leo ſet a Crown on his Head, and all the People Acclamed to Charles Auguſtus, Crowned of God the mighty and peaceable Emperour of the Romans, Life and Victory, which Acclamations over, he was according to the Cuſtome of the ancient Princes adored by the Biſhop, and leaving off the name of Patritian, was ſaluted Emperour and Auguſtus. So was the Title of Emperour revived again at Rome, from what Inducements, how legally, and in what manner we ſhall conſider more properly and fully in the Hiſtory of that Countrey. Here we ſee the Franks advanced above all the reſt of the Weſtern Nations, and a King but of the ſecond Head raiſed prodigiouſly to ſo ſublime a pitch of Grandeur, how and by what Degrees both Nation and Family arrived at this height, we have as fully diſcovered as the nature of this Work will bear. Here we muſt leave Charles upon his Imperial Throne, but e'er we take our leave for altogether, we are obliged to return to his Cradle and take ſome notice of the Tongue he firſt ſpake, with other things belonging to the moſt ancient State and Cuſtomes and Polity of this conſiderable Nation, which in the precedent Hiſtory could not but too abruptly and confuſedly be performed.

The Sicambrian or Teutonick Dialect was their Language.

Menſibus juxta patriam Linguam nomina impoſuit quum ante id tempus, &c.

The Names of the Months.

Hæc confer cum iis quæ ſcribimus de lingua Saxonica veteri.

Of the Winds.

65. To begin with their Language, as the great both Effect and Sign of their Original on which we have already ſo largely inſiſted, it's certain it was the Sicambrian or Teutonick Dialect at their firſt coming into Gall, and ſo even to the time of Charles it continued. There were other Languages indeed ſpoken in the Countrey where they inhabited, one whereof at length partly ſwallowed up, partly expelled theirs, but this could not be but by degrees, and in many years uſe and converſation, ſo that though many words were ſtoln in upon both, and thoſe that were Learned or Nobly Educated, ſpake as well the one as the other, yet for the Rule or ſubſtance, the German or Teutonick ſtill continued in ordinary uſe and practice. Nay, it was the Language of the Court, as appears from what we are told concerning Charles the Great himſelf. Eginhart an Authour beyond all exception teſtifies, that he gave Names to the Months according to his own Language; the Franks before that time having known them partly by Latine, and partly by Barbarous words. To the twelve Winds alſo he gave Proper Names, whereas formerly ſcarce four words were in uſe to expreſs them. Of the Months January he called Vunthermonat, February Hornung, March he named Lentzmonet, April Oſtermonet, May Wunnemonet, June Brachmonet, July Heumonet, Auguſt Aernmonet, September Herbſtmonet, October Vuynmonet, November Vuindtmonet, and December Heiligmonet. On the Winds he impoſed the Names following; on that by the Romans called Subſolanus Oſtrenwindt, on Eurus Oſtſunderen, Euroauſter Sundoſtren, Auſter Sundren, Auſtroafricus Sundweſtren, Africus Weſtſundren, Zephyrus Weſtren, Corus Weſtnorden, Circius Norduneſtren, Septentrio Nordren, Aquilo Nordoſtren, Vulturnus Oſtnorden. He adds that, certain Baracons and moſt ancient Verſes whereby were Sung, the Acts and Warlike Exploits of ancient Kings he wrote down and committed to Memory, and farther began a Grammar of his Mother Tongue. If any one deſire farther ſatisfaction in this particular, and ſee what the very Language was, he may know that Orfrid a Monk of Waſſenbury in * this Language of the Franks Tranſlated the New Teſtament into Verſe or Rythme, ſome of which together with the Lord's Prayer are to be ſeen in ſeveral Authours, particularly in Pontanus his Origines Francicæ, with Verſes in Commendation of the Nation of the Franks. He may alſo there ſee part of Tatianus his Harmony

---

* Nu vuil ih Scriban Unſer heil
Evangeliono deil.
So Unir nu biar bigunnun,
In Fren Riſgu tungen.
Præf. in Evangel.

So will I write (the Dutch ſay yet Sciven) our health (for which the word Salvation is lately crept in) of the Evangel the deal (for which is crept inpart.)

mony of the four Goſpels Tranſlated into this French Tongue, which continued thus German or Teutonick, at leaſt till the Ruine of the Family of Charles the Great. This is evident from Willeramus Abbat of Mersburg his * Tranſlation of the Canticles, out of Latine into this old French, in the time of Henry the third Emperour, about the year of our Lord 1010, one of the Chapters whereof he begins thus; Stand uph Friundinna min ilego. Min duna Min ſcona aud Kim. Such like Language is all the reſt, and hereby it may be ſeen as one of our Modern Writers obſerves, that the old French and the old Engliſh, had then as great Affinity together as our Northern and Southern Engliſh have at this day. Now none will deny that our old Engliſh or ancient Engliſh Saxon was German or Teutonick.

So we now here begin,

In the French Tongue.

* Typis Plantinianis editum Extat Opera Pauli Merulæ.

Stand up ſhe Friend mine Speedily
My Dove my fair and come.

Friundinne Saxonicè Amica
Schone hodie utuntur
Verſtegan Belgæ
pro pulchro
Inde noſtrum Sheen.

66. Such therefore was the true and ancient French, a German or Teutonick Dialect, before it was corrupt, mixed and at laſt aboliſhed by another Speech, which overpowred it by the multitude of Speakers. For in conqueſts of Countries this rule is to be obſerved in point of Languages, that where the Invaders in Numbers prevailed, either in a ſmall ſpace of time puſhing in multitudes upon a weaker Nation, or in a long continuance of time perpetually ſupplying their firſt Planters, there though they mixed with the People Conquered, their Language followed the Fortune of their Arms, and at length, getting Ground every day, became Victorious, but where a far leſſer invaded the greater, and the Courage or good Fortune of a few prevailed over a Cowardly effeminate or unfortunate Multitude, there the ſucceſs was not the ſame, for as the Vulgar is Maſter of Language, which is founded upon Uſe and Cuſtome, more Voices or Words carried it, and the Tongue had better fortune than the Hand, as far greater Sounds or Noiſes do drown the leſſer. The former part is ſufficiently evidenced in the Roman Conqueſts, eſpecially in the Weſtern parts, as alſo in the Invaſion of the Saxons made into this Iſland of Britain. The later part not onely in the matter of the Franks, who Conquered a People much more vaſt in Numbers than themſelves, but in the caſe of the Goths in Spain, and Lombards in Italy, where the Languages prevailing in the Countries, at laſt got Ground, and prevailed over thoſe they brought in with them, and not to ſtir far from home, we ſee the truth hereof abundantly manifeſted in the caſe of the Normans who coming into France, and bringing in with them a Northern or Teutonick Language of their own, firſt made Shipwreck of that there as the Franks had formerly done, and then having got inſtead of that the Romantick or Baſtard Latine now called French, when they Conquered here the Engliſh Saxons loſt that alſo, and returned to their ancient Teutonick, (though altered by their Invaſion,) and this they did notwithſtanding all Arts imaginable uſed by them for aboliſhing the Engliſh, and propagating that other amongſt a People to which their Poſterity in this point was conſtrained at laſt to yield their Tongues, though not their unjuſtly got Poſſeſſions.

67. The Franks therefore by mixing and imbodying with a far more numerous People, loſt their Language, what then the ſpeech ſpoken by the Natives at this time was we muſt enquire. The Language of ſuch of them as were Originally Galls, was the firſt that was ſpoken (as far as man can know) in this Countrey, being that which was in uſe when Cæſar invaded them, viz. the Celtick or the Gallick, which though it might receive an inſenſible impreſſion and alteration from the Touching of the Phœnicians upon the Sea Coaſts, the planting of ſome Greek Colonies alſo on the Maritime Parts, the Neighbourhood of the Spaniards and Germans, and the recourſe made by the Italians to the Medicinal Waters in Aquitain, yet till his time in the Body of the Land continued pure and uncorrupted. What this Language was is the great queſtion much debated by certain Learned men, and that in two reſpects eſpecially, viz. Whether it was the ſame Originally with our ancient Britiſh, or the Welſh Tongue, or whether it was the ſelf ſame in ſubſtance with the Teutonick or ancient German Language, differing onely from it in Dialect, in ſome variety of phraſes and terminations of words. For the firſt, that the Language of the old Galls was all one with the Britiſh, unleſs perhaps in variety of Dialect, Cæſar himſelf ſheweth, where he writes that it was the cuſtome of the Galls who deſired farther knowledge or inſtruction in the Learning, or Diſcipline of the Druides to go over to them into Britain. Now foraſmuch as they had no uſe of Books, the Druides in teaching muſt have uſed the ſame Language the Galls did, which Tacitus farther confirmeth, alledging that the Britiſh Speech, and that of the Galls differed not much. But ſeeing the Language it ſelf is loſt, ſome ſcattered words onely remaining as the broken Boards of a Shipwreck, by comparing thoſe words with the preſent Welſh, our Learned Camden evinceth this truth, and that not by any wreſting or ſtraining but very eaſily, and without violence he proves them to agree to our Britiſh both in ſound and ſenſe.

The Gallick and Britiſh Language compared.

68. To give the Reader a ſhorter account of what he makes out more at large, that Divona a Fountain at Bourdeaux of which Auſonius Writes, that in the Gallick Tongue it ſignified God's Fountain, the Britains would have called by the ſame Name, for God to them is Dyw, and a Fountain Vonan, in the Latine Divona, by Analogy and for Verſe ſake. Jupiter Tonans or the Thunder, by the Galls, as many witneſs, was worſhipped by the Name of Taranis, and Taran with the Britains betokneth Thunder. The Galls had another God called Heſus, Heus or Anubis painted like a Dog, and Huad with our Welſhmen ſignifieth a Dog. Certain it is that the Galls worſhipped Mercury under the Name of Teutates, as the Inventer of Arts, and guide of their Journeys. And Diw Taith in the Britiſh Tongue, is as much as the God of Travelling. The Galls as Polybius informs us in their own Language called their Mercenary Souldiers Gæſatæ, and at this day the Welſh Britains call their hired Servants Gueſſin. As Phalanx was the Macedonian Legion, ſo was Caterva peculiar to the Galls, as may be ſeen in Vegetius. Neither is this word Obſolete amongſt the Britains, who yet uſe to call a Troop Caturſa and Warkad, and the ſtrength of War which lieth in a Legion Kaderne. The Galls that marched with Brennus into Greece, named that order of Horſe-fight, which conſiſted of three Horſes, as Pauſanias tells us Trimarkaſia or Trimarſia, for an Horſe they called Marca, which in that ſignification is mere and pure Britiſh. For Tri ſignifieth Three, and March an Horſe.

Divona Celtarum lingua fons addite Divis.

De tribus iſtis Gallorum Diis ſic, Lucanus:

Et quibus immitis placatur ſanguine diro
Teutates, horrénſque feris altaribus Heſus,
Et Taranis Scythicæ non mitior ara Dianæ.

69. The Name of Circius given to that Windo, to which Auguſtus Cæſar both vowed and built a Temple in Gall, Phavorinus the ſame Philoſopher of that Nation, as we have it from Gellius declared to be Gallick, and he ſuppoſed it was ſo called from the Whirling or Whiſtling which it makes. This Wind indeed is known to be moſt Boiſterous and Violent; and Cyrch with the Britains betokeneth Violence as may be ſeen in their Litany. The Pennine Alpes by Cæſar called the Higheſt, had that name impoſed as Livy writeth, not from Hannibal the Pœnus or Carthaginian, but from the Higheſt Top which the Mountaineers of Gall named Penninus. But Pen with the Britains, even in theſe days, ſignifieth the Tops of Hills, whence the higheſt Mountains they have, viz. Penmon-maur, Pendle, Pen and Pennigent, got their Names. Neither have the high Mountains Appennini in Italy theirs from any other Original. The Cities and States of Gall ſituate upon the Ocean, were as Cæſar notes after the cuſtome of the Galls called Aremoricæ, and with them the Welſh accord in the very ſame thing, Ar-more being as much as By the Sea, or Upon the Sea. The ancient and excellent Scholiaſt upon Juvenal acquaints us, that the Allobroges were ſo called, becauſe Broga in the Galliſh Tongue ſignified a Land or Territory, and Alla another, as one would ſay Tranſlated out of another place. But Bro in Britiſh is a Region or Countrey, and Allan Without or Eternal, ſo that the Etymology in both Tongues holds very well.

Eodem ſenſu Strabo eas Ἀπωκεανίδας vocat.

70. Pliny tells us that there is an Herb like to Plantane in Gall called Glaſtum, wherewith the Britains Died or Coloured themſelves as ſeveral Writers teſtifie, being that we term Woad, and giving a blew Colour, which the Welſh at this day call Glaſſe. This was the Greek Iſatis and Vitrum by the Authority of Oribaſius. The Galatæ who ſpake the ſame Language with the ancient Galls as St. Hierome witneſſeth, had a little ſhrub called Coccus, of which that deep red Scarlet Colour was made, and this very Colour the Britains uſually name Coch. If Feſtus Pompeius tell true, Bardus in the Tongue of the Galls ſignified a Songſter, and this is a mere Britiſh word. And like as Bard is Britiſh, ſo the other part of Bardocucullus which as Martial and others teach us, was the Cloak that the Galliſh Bardi wore, remains intire among the Welſh, who call ſuch a Cloak by the very name of Cucull. The Herb which of its five Leaves the Greeks called Pentaphyllon, was as Apuleius ſheweth by the Galls named Pempedula. Now Pymp in Britiſh is five, and Deilen a Leaf. And as the Galls by Pymp meant the Number of five, ſo by Petor Four, for as we learn out of Feſtus Petoritum was a Chariot or Waggon of theirs ſo called of its four Wheels, and the word Pedwar in the Britiſh Tongue ſignifieth Four. Among woodden Inſtruments a Leaver was among the Galls as Iſidore writes called Guoia, and the ſame in our Britiſh Language named Gwif. A Birds Bill the Galls as we reade in Suetonius called Becco, and the Britains name it Pic, Galba ſignifieth exceeding fat and the Britiſh word Galuns betokneth very big. Diodorus Siculus his Drink called Zithum, might be reduced to their word Sider, and Cerviſia unto Keirch or Oates, whereof the Britains in many places make their Drink or rather to Cwrf which we Engliſh term Ale.

71. To omit many other words, we ſhall farther take notice of what he obſerves concerning the ancient names of Places, which end with both People in the ſame termination as in Dunum, Briva, Ritum, Duram, Magus and the like. From ſuch he gathers that theſe were Originally the ſame Nation, in the ſame manner as a very good reaſon may be drawn that Engliſh men are deſcended from the Germans, becauſe the later and more Modern names of our Towns end in Burrow, Berry, Ham, Stead, Ford, Thorp and Wich, which carry a juſt and equal Correſpondence unto the Terminations of the Dutch Towns, Burg, Berg, Heim, Stadt, Furdt, Dorp and Wic. Farther he affirms, that the reaſon of old Galliſh words may be ſo fitly given out of our Britiſh Tongue, the property and nature of the thing agreeing alſo thereunto, that of neceſſity we muſt confeſs, either they were Names impoſed by the Britains; or elſe that the Britains ſpake the Gallick Language. Whence the Galls were called Celtæ and Gallathæ, the beſt learned of the French could never as yet tell. He bids them therefore conſider whether not from the Britiſh word Gualt which even yet among the Britains betokeneth the Hair or Buſh of the Head, as alſo Gualtock that ſignifies Comata or with long Hair. That the Celtæ were called Comati from the long Hair they ſtudiouſly nouriſhed all learned men do confeſs; and as for the letters C and K, Q and G how ſhould one conſidering their force and Native ſound put a difference between them? Garonne the River ſo rapid and violent, that the Poets give it the Epithetes of Validus, Æquoreus and Rapidus, he deriveth from Gaw which in the Britiſh Tongue importeth ſtrong, and ſwift. The River Arar ſo gentle that it can ſcarcely be diſtinguiſhed which way the ſtream goes, and by the Poets termed Araris tardior and Lentus Arar, he deduceth from Ara which with the Britains betokeneth ſtill and ſlow. Rhodanus into which Arar falls on the contrary runs down with a violent Current, in which reſpect it is ſtyled Incitus, Celer and Præceps, which words do not diſagree from the Britiſh Rhedeck that ſignifie the ſpeedineſs in Running.

72. The Hills Gebennæ run out into Gall, in the manner of a long continued Ridge. And Keven among our Britains ſoundeth as much as the Back or Ridge of an Hill, and there is a long Chain of Hills in Yorkſhire which the Inhabitants call the Kevin. Stones being of old time erected in Gall by the Highways ſide, at the diſtance of every thouſand and five hundred Paces, and the Galliſh Luca or League containing juſt ſo many, he bids them conſider whether it took not its name from Leach, which in the Britiſh Tongue betokeneth a Stone. That part of Gallia Narbonenſis, where as the fabulous ſtory goes Hercules and Albion fought, and where lie ſo many Stones that one would think it had rained them, the French in theſe days call Les Craux, knowing not the reaſon of the name, but Stones in Britiſh are termed Craig. The Morivi were ſo called from Mor the Sea. Arles or Arelatum ſeated in a moiſt and watery Soil, from Aripon and Laith, Moyſture in the ſame Language. Uxellodunum, which as Cæſar writes was ſituate on an high Hill difficult of Acceſs, from Uchell, Steep, or Lofty, and Dunum an high place or hill. The Promontory on which the City Tolon ſtands was called Cithariſtes, and if you ask our Welſh Britains what Cithara is in their Language, they will by and by tell you Telen. Such is the opinion, and ſo pregnant are the reaſons of our famous Cambden, wherein moſt learned Writers conſpire with him as Beatus Rhenanus, Geſner, Peter Daniel, Picardus and many others. But ſome there are albeit in compariſon of the other but few, who would have the ancient Gallick much the ſame with the Teutonick or German Language.

The Gallick and German Language corrupted.

73. Of theſe the moſt remarkable is Pontanus, one who by reaſon of his Birth, ſpeaking the German Tongue, had more cauſe to know the Roots and Originals of ſuch words, and to underſtand the Etymologies than any either French or Engliſh, or other not fully acquainted with that Language. He denies not, but that the Gallick and Britiſh were the ſame, but yet contends the Germans were near akin to them both, and that for theſe Reaſons. He cites a place of Tacitus, which relates, how the Æſtii a People of Germany in their Rites and Habit, were more like the Suevi their Neighbours, but their Language was nearer that of the Britains. He alledges a ſaying of * St. Jerome, that the Galatians or Gallogræcians, except the Greek Tongue, which was ſpoken through all the Eaſt had a Language of their own, the ſame which the Treviri uſed, which could be no other than the German, they Dextro Suevici maris litore Æſtiorum Gentes alluuntur, quibus Ritus Habituſque Suevorum, lingua Britanicæ propior.

* Comment. in Ep. Pauli ad Galatas.

they being of that Original. To this he adds Arguments, taken firſt from the Habit of Galls and Germans. Secondly, from the Names of men, Places, People, and words common to both; and Thirdly, from a promiſcuous uſe of Words which he tells us, would make up an entire Dictionary. The firſt he proves from Strabo, who more than in one place ſpeaks how like the Germans and Galls were in their Manners, Cuſtomes and way of Converſation. For the ſecond he obſerves, that Cæſar being to make Latine the proper Names of ſuch Galls that ended in Ch, was ſomething put to it, for that the Latine Speech very difficultly admits that final Termination. Such then as ended in Rich, he turned into Rix, as Orgetorix, Dumnorix, Ambiorix and others, for which the Galls themſelves it's probable, were wont to pronounce Ereutrich, Dumerich, Einberich, or Heimrich. So in Tacitus we meet with Malorix Prince of the Friſians, but in Ammianus, Malaricus or Malarick a Frank. And Deuderix a Sicamber in Strabo.

Lib. 4. & 7.

74. Livy preſents us with a certain Regulus of the Galls in Aſia called Lutarius, which Cæſar changes into Luterius, and both are plainly Teutonick, not unlike thoſe of Lotharius, Lotarius and Clotharius. Lutanicus alſo in Cæſar is the ſame with Ollonicus, Lodovicus and Chlodovicus. The Germans had many Names ending in Marus, as Othmarus, Wolmarus, and Thietmarus; ſo amongſt the Galls we find Civiſmarus, Combolomarus, Indutiomarus, Virdumarus and Virdomarus. As for People and Places, many we reade of amongſt the Galls, like to which it cannot be denied, but ſeveral are found amongſt the Germans, for as in Gall we find Santones, Pictones, Turones, Sueſſones and Lingones; ſo Jubones, Semnones, Caviones, Jugenones and the like in Germany. For the Names of Winds he ſaith, they are ſtill common, both to the Germans of Belgium, to the Britains, and the Galls, whereof he renders this reaſon, that they alone continued ſound and ſafe without any Alteration, becauſe that the Romans making War againſt the Galls, rather by Land than Sea, this People preſerved the Appellations of things belonging to the Sea and Navigation, as out of the reach of the Invaders. But now as to matter of Fact that they did keep them, and that the Names of theſe words ſtill continue the ſame amongſt the Galls, Germans and Britains, how doth it appear? He inſtanceth in that called Occidentalis in Latine, which the Engliſh naming Weſtwint (Winde he means) the low Countreymen term it Weſten, and the Galls (Galli not Franci) vent de Oveſt. In like manner, that which the Romans knew by the Name of Auſter, the Germans call Suyden-Windt, the Engliſh Soutwindt, and the Galls Sud. Moreover Orientalis as to the Germans is Ooſten, ſo to the Engliſh it's Eaſt, and Eſt to the Galls or French, which Dialect mightily agrees with the words of Tacitus lately mentioned, who calls them Æſtii, who in Language more reſembled the Britains, agreeable alſo to their Speech, who inhabit nearer to the North-Eaſt. In Concluſion, that Wind known in Latine by the Name Septentrionalis, the Engliſh and all others, even Charles the Great himſelf called Noort and Noorden; but the French term it vent de biſe. Yet though herein they ſeem to depart from us, and imitate the word Boreas in uſe with Romans, yet have they but exchanged one Teutonick word for another. For Bieſen and Biiſen, to the low Countreymen is the ſame, as to be toſſed up and down, and diſturbed. The Scarabeus or Beetle, from the noiſe it makes with its Wings, and the violence of its flight they call Biesbout. And in the Tranſlation of the Latine Pſalter into the German Language, made about the time of Ludovicus Pius, Biſa is uſed to ſignifie Turbo, or a Whirlewind.

Livius, lib. 38. Cæſar belli Gallic. l. 7. & 8.

The Gallick, German and Britiſh Language agree, and are near akin, if not the ſame.

75. But the reaſoning of Pontanus in this point is very Pleaſant, though in other things he muſt be acknowledged, a very rational and learned Man. The thing to be proved from this Inſtance in the Winds, is that the Britains, Germans and Galls, ſtill retain the ſame words they did of old, and therefore it's thence probable, their Languages were the ſame, not much different or near akin at the leaſt. Now whereas by the Britains muſt be meant, the true Britains in the time of Cæſar and before, the Britains that had the Druides amongſt them, the Britains, the Poſterity of whom are our Welſh-men, he makes uſe of the Language not of them, but of the Engliſh or Engliſh Saxons, who came out of Germany, and brought with them the German Dialect, to prove that the Britiſh Language was the ſame with the German. In like manner the thing to be proved, being that the ancient Gallick or Celtick Tongue was the ſame, or near akin to the German; he produces not the Celtick Names of Winds, but the French, or thoſe that Charles the Great and the Franks uſed, who alſo came out of Germany, and no wonder if they brought a Language with them, which was the ſame, and as near akin as could be to it, and to that of the Engliſh Saxons, though nothing related to the other of the Welſh or Britiſh, which is the matter in hand. His Succeſs is better in the laſt Branch of his Proof, and that is from the many words, which in Authours appearing to be Gallick or Celtick, in ſound and Signification came near to the German. For this he refers you to his Gloſſary of ancient Gallick words, added to the Itinerary of Gallia Narbonenſis. Without coming to his particulars, which would be too tedious, we can avouch his Teſtimony to be true in many Inſtances, and undertake for him to the Reader. Nay amongſt thoſe produced by Mr. Camden, we can find ſeveral, which without more wreſting or force, thanhe himſelf profeſſeth to uſe, we can for Pontanus his ſake eaſily make ſpeak the Teutonick Dialect. Taranis the Name of Jupiter, or the Thunderer; however, it may agree with the Britiſh word Taran Thunder, yet no doubt was the ſame with that of the German God Thaar, whence the Danes call the fifth day of the Week Thaarſda, or with the Saxon Thor or Thur, whence we call it Thurſday. The Germans by ſome Variation call it Donderdack, D and Th being promiſcuouſly uſed in the Teutonick, whence as we ſay Thunder, they ſay Donder, but the Original was the ſame in both.

76. Whatever affinity there be, betwixt Teutates the Name of Mercury and the Britiſh Taith, certainly that from which our Tueſday was derived, may ſeem to bear as great Proportion to it, being Tuiſco the Great Idol of the German Nation, from whom as they call themſelves Tuytſh or Duytſh, ſo the Italians ſtill name them Tudeſci. The word Geſſatæ, by which the Galls meant Mercenary Souldiers, comes as near Teutonick Gaeſts or Gueſts, whereby Strangers are ſignified as it doth to the Welſh-Britiſh Gueſſim; and Geſſa the Galliſh Weapon may well have hence received its Original, as being firſt taken notice of to be worn by ſuch. Trimarſia, whereby a fighting with three Horſes was meant, may as well Challenge a German, as a Britiſh deſcent, for if Tri be Britiſh, ſo is it alſo German, ſignifying Three, in this as well as the other Language; for our Saxon Anceſtours called the pleaſant Month of May, by the Name of Tri-milki, becauſe in it they began to Milk their Kine three times a day. And though Marca in Welſh ſignifieth an Horſe, ſo Mara or Mæra in the Teutonick, being uſed of old to ſignifie the whole Species, as ſome Learned men have obſerved, as Horſe now doth with us, who alſo think verily that inſtead of Trimarſia in Polybius, it ought to be read Trimaraſia. As Mor in Welſh betokeneth the Sea, ſo in the Teutonick Moeren ſignifyeth Mooriſh as we ſay, or Wateriſh places, whence from the Lowneſs and Flatneſs of their Habitations, the Morini might be ſo named. As Glaſſe in the Britiſh Tongue ſignifieth Woad, which giveth a blew Colour, by the Greeks called Statis, and by the Latines Vitrum; if an Engliſh School-boy be asked what the Saxon Engliſh of Vitrum is, he will anſwer Glaſſe.

77. We could note ſomething more upon Camden's Catalogue, but we have tranſgreſſed already in the length of this point, and it's our Duty to give the Reader but a proſpect of the Controverſie. As for what Objections are made on both ſides from Authority, concerning the main Queſtion, whether the Celtick was the ſame with the German Tongue, they may be anſwered with this Aſſertion, that there may be many words common to ſeveral Languages, which we have no reaſon to believe were ever the ſame, as alſo that of thoſe People, the Language of whom is Originally and ſubſtantially the ſame, the Dialects through diſtance of place, and length of time may be ſo divers, as the difference of Pronunciation added, very difficultly may they underſtand each other. The truth of the former part of the Aſſertion hath been ſufficiently made out by the almoſt impertinent Labours of ſeveral late Learned men, who have taken pains to ſhew how many words there are in our Modern Languages, which are almoſt the ſame in ſound and Signification, with ſeveral of the Greek Tongue, particularly in the ancient Engliſh Saxon, the preſent Engliſh, French, and the Dutch. Some find many Arabick words, others very many Phœnician, where yet they muſt confeſs the bulk and ſubſtance of the ſeveral Speeches are far different. It's certain, that Languages moſt remote in ſome points agree. And Busbequius, who was Ambaſſadour from the Emperour to the Great Turk, obſerves, that many Dutch and Engliſh words were in his time in uſe, in the very Taurica Cherſoneſus. On the contrary, a Language may be for root and ſubſtance the ſame, and yet the Dialects ſo different, and the Pronunciation ſo divers, as with difficulty can the People that ſpeak them underſtand each other living at diſtance, and obnoxious to Impreſſions, made by Strangers with other Accidents. This appears ſufficiently in thoſe that make uſe of the Teutonick, of whom the Engliſh underſtand not the Dutch, nor the Dutch the Engliſh, when they ſpeak words merely of that Original, little more do the Dutch underſtand ſtand the Swediſh or Danes, nay the Low Countreymen, thoſe that inhabit the upper parts of Germany.

78. To conclude the Controverſie ſo far as concerns us, it appears evident that, the Celtick and Britiſh were the ſame, both from the Teſtimony of unqueſtionable Authours, and the remains of that Language, which Antiquity like broken Boards of a Shipwreck hath caſt upon us. The Conſideration of the little diſtance betwixt the Iſland and Gall, brings no ſmall Addition of weight to the Argument; for that Britain was planted from that part of the Continent, is rather more than probable, as alſo that as the Iſland received its Inhabitants firſt from Gall, ſo alſo its Dialect from the Celtick Language. That the Galls and Germans ſhould have many things common, both Words, Names and Cuſtomes, ſeeing they were ſo near Neighbours, it's no wonder, ſuppoſing there was Commerce betwixt the Nations. The Galls were an active ſtirring People, made many Inrodes into ſeveral Countries,and no wonder at their return they ſhould be ſomething changed in their Manners, and their Tongues tip'd with ſome Words, Accents or Terminations witneſſes of their reſtleſs, light, and mutable Humours, to which the Inhabitants of that Air and Soil are ſubject whenceſoever they come. But to examine whether the Celtick and German Tongues were the ſame,or near akin we take in the Britiſh,which we can be throughly Confident was the ſame with the Celtick in ſubſtance, and compare it with the Modern German, we ſhall hardly be induced to incline to the Affirmative, conſidering what a vaſt difference there is betwixt our Welſh and the preſent Dutch Language, and yet that for a thouſand Years and more, neither is the Welſh nor German ſo changed in themſelves, but that at the firſt ſight one may eaſily perceive the Names and Words to be ſubſtantially the ſame, however the Teutonick be ſomething altered by Communication with other Speeches.

The Gallick and Hebrew compared.

79. As for the Opinion of thoſe few, who thought that the ancient Galls ſpake Greek, it carries ſo manifeſt abſurdity with it at the firſt look, of any one that's but meanly skilled in Antiquity, that it deſerves not a ſerious Refutation, eſpecially conſidering what Varro hath written concerning the Citizens of Marſeilles, that they ſpake three Languages, viz. the Gallick, the Greek, and the Latine; the Gallick, becauſe that was the Language of the Countrey where they inhabited, the Greek, becauſe they were a Colony of the Phocenſes planted here, and Latine as they were Subjects of the Roman Empire, and had conſtant Entercourſe with that People. That moſt Learned man Bochartus, tracing the Footſteps of the old Phœnicians finds them in Gall, and many Names of Places, Rivers, and things he deduceth from their Dialect, remainders whereof he finds alſo in our Britiſh Iſlands, being the true Caſſiterides, to which that induſtrious Nation traded for Tinn in very remote times. But though he maketh it appear, that many things were common to both Languages, yet would not he have it thought, that the Phœnicians and Galls had one and the ſame Tongue, or onely differed in Dialect. For from Polybius it appears, in the Caſe of Autaritus, and otherwiſe that the Galls learnt the Language of the Carthaginians, by long uſe and Cuſtome, otherwiſe they had no Entercourſe with them, but by an Interpreter, as is evident from a paſſage in the ſame Authour, that in the Army of Hannibal, Magilus a certain Regulus of the Galls, declared what his Coutreymen had reſolved by the means and aſſiſtence of a French-man. Although by reaſon of Commerce, of common Wars, or which he rather ſuſpects of ſome ancient Colony of the Phœnicians planted in Gall, they borrowed words one Nation from the other, yet that they had ſeveral Languages, and peculiar abundantly appears in the Names of Men in uſe amongſt the Galls, moſt of which are quite different from the Genius of the Sacred Language, though well nigh all the Punick Names be merely Hebrew. * He concludes with this Aſſertion, that there is no need of proving by Examples, a matter which is ſo manifeſt in it ſelf. But enough (if not too much) of the ancient Gallick or Celtick Tongue.

* Nihil opus eſt ut exemplis probemus rem per ſe manifeſtam Geograph. part. 2d. ſeu Chanaan, lib. 1. c. 42.

The Latine Tongue introduced by the Romans when they Conquered Gall.

80. The Gallick Tongue being ſuch before the coming of the Romans was forced to truckle to their Latine, as well as the Countrey to their Victorious Arms, but this not on a ſudden, but by long uſage and Continuance of time. The Romans wherever they ſubdued a Countrey eſteemed it a Maxime of State never to be left unpractiſed, to procure the Natives their new Subjects, to learn their Language, to bring them to a nearer Familiarity and acquaintance with them, and their Government, without which more Difficultly could they be kept in Obedience and Civil order. For this purpoſe they ſet up ſeveral Schools to inſtruct the Youth, as for ſubſtance in Gall, at Autun, Beſancon and Lyons, of which we are informed, both by Augueſtoduni, Veſontione Lugduni.

Sect. 4.

by Tacitus and Auſonius. The Natives perceiving there was no ſtrugling, and that they muſt needs ſubmit unto the Yoke, to make the burthen as light as might be, accommodated themſelves to the deſires of the Conquerours, and learnt their Language, eſpecially knowing that no preferment could be got without it. Latine then began to be the Gentile ſort of Speech, and the Celtick to be accounted Clowniſh, and by degrees to grow out of Faſhion: But as it decayed in Reputation and Practice, it made great Alteration alſo in the Latine, it being impoſſible, but that amongſt ſuch multitudes of Speakers, there ſhould be diverſity of Words and Phraſes, and a great mixture and medley be produced, for it was hard to obliterate thoſe Impreſſions, which long Cuſtome and daily Practice have acquired. Therefore though great violence was offered to the ancient Gallick Tongue, the words of which were diſcarded, and Latine intruded into their places, yet by a certain ſort of Re-action, the Gallick forced alſo ſome of it's own upon the Latine, and that very early, when the Conteſt betwixt them was but newly begun.

81. For Cicero in his time complains that a ſtrangeneſs of Speech was infuſed into the City, ſo that no remainders of the ancient quaintneſs of Language was to be found. The Roman Oratours and Poets began to affect Celtick words, and by degrees made them free of the Commonwealth, as Rheda and Petoritum, whereof Cicero himſelf for all his complaints uſes the former, and Horace thinks fit to ſerve himſelf of the latter. If then ſuch Alteration was made at Rome it ſelf, how muſt that Latine be handled, what mixtures muſt that receive, which was ſpoken in the Provinces? The Celtick Language went to wreck, but the Roman by its Conqueſt, was alſo weakened and reduced to ſuch a Conſtitution and Temper as eaſily to be obnoxious to the Impreſſions that were made upon it by other ſtrange and Barbarous Speeches. For the Roman power as well as the Purity of the Language, decaying in Gall, the Goths, the Vandals, Burgundians, Allemans, and laſt of all the Franks, made their ſeveral Invaſions, and brought almoſt as great an Alteration into the Language, as they did a change into the Power and Government of the Countrey, ſo that the true Genius of it was deſtroyed, and the ancient Face and ſhew of it quite obliterated, a Foreign and ſtrange ſort of Declenſion and Phraſe, as well as multitudes of words being brought in. And the ſame fate had the Latine Tongue at the ſame time in Spain and Italy, where by its Conjunction with the Mooriſh Language, the Gothick and other Teutonick Dialects, thoſe Baſtard Speeches we now call Spaniſh and Italian were begot.

Epiſt. ad famil. lib. 7. ep. 15.

Vide Quintilian. Inſtit. & Orator, lib. 1. c. 5. Caſnar aſſectator è Gallia ductum eſt. Plurima Gallica valuerunt, ut Rheda ac Petoritum quorum altero Cicero, tamen altero Horatius utitur. Locus Ciceronis eſt in Orat. pro Milone, hæc ſunt verba: Obviam fit ci Clodius expeditus in equo nulla Rheda nullis impedimentis, nullis Græcis comitibus ut ſolebat. Horatii locum vide l. 1. Serm. 6. —Plures calones atque Caballi, Paſcendi, ducenda petorrita; & Rheda & Petoritum genus vehiculi Gallici ſignificat. Petoritum è quatuor rotis Conſtabat.

82. This Hodgpodge or Medley, was at ſuch time as the Franks were well ſetled in Gall, called the Ruſtick in oppoſition to the pure Latine, which was preſerved in Books and underſtood, and written by Learned men, onely as it is at this very day. And yet ſo great were the Impreſſions made, by theſe many Foreign Dialects, that even the Latine writings of the moſt Learned men of theſe times, compared with the beſt Authours, appear little better than Barbarous. What a ſtrange ſtyle, and what odd Words do we find in Caſſiodorus, one of the beſt Scholars of his Age. By him we may perceive how the Roman Tongue was then decaied in Italy: And for Gall what ſlender Latine was written by the moſt Learned amongſt them, is ſufficiently evident from Gregory Turonenſis, and what a number of Gallicismes and Franciſmes were broken in upon them in his time. To give the Reader a Taſte, the word Parens and Parentes in the plural throughout his Book, he uſeth not in that Senſe, that good Latine Authours do, but as the Modern French, to ſignifie Kindred in general, wherein he is imitated by Aimoinus; Repedare, he uſeth for to retreat or go back. The word Reclauſus, as now they do for one retired or ſhut up cloſe, which they (and therefore we muſt) call a Recluſe; Metatus for a dwelling or Habitation. Aripennis the old Gallick word, for a certain quantity of Land, which as Columella informs us, was half an Acre, Mala hora in that Senſe as they ſay, Malheure for ill Luck, and thence Malheureux, for Miſerable, unfortunate or unlucky: Levare in that Signification they now uſe Leur to raiſe, lift up or carry away, as an eminent Tranſlatour of our own moſt ſtrangely miſtaketh it. Placitum for Pleas or Pleading often, and Placitare to Implead as our Engliſh Norman Lawyers now do phraſe it. Leudes and Leodes are with him the ſame with thoſe whom the Dutch now call Lieden, Vaſſals or ſuch as are obnoxious to their Prince. Cupæ are Wooden Barrels or larger Veſſels, in which Senſe with the Dutch the word ſtill remains, and thence call they the Workman that Which Hodgpodge is termed the Ruſtick in oppoſition to the pure Latine Language.

Lib. 4. c. 10.

Lib. 5. c. 17.

Ibid. c. 27.

Lib. 5. de Ruſtica, c. 1.

Lib. 6. c. 45.

Lib. 7. c. 4.

Εἰκὼν Βασιλικὴ, Latine donata ubi hæc verba in Titulo. De exercitu contra Regem levato.

Lib. 7. c. c. 13. 14. 23.

Lib. 3. c. 23. l. 8. c. 9. & alibi.

Lib. 7. c. 37.

makes ſuch Veſſels Cuper, and we Engliſh a Cooper, though Cup with us ſignifies a a leſſer ſort of Veſſel to drink in, the ſame which in another place he calleth Bacchinon, whence the Dutch Back, and our and their Beker is derived. In his Writings we find Morganegoba ſignifying a Mornings Gift, as Morgengaue and Morgengabe now do in the German Tongue, a Gift given to the Bride by the Bridegroom the Morning after their Marriage.

Lib. 9. c. 38.
Ibid. c. 20.

83. The Ruſtick Roman or Romance (as they called it in Spain) being the Medley Language generally ſpoken when the Franks had ſeated themſelves in Gall, could not for a long time expell or ſwallow up theirs, but by degrees, as it had diſpatched the ancient Celtick. For as we formerly ſaid in the days of Charles the Great, the old French was the Language of the Court, and after him (there at leaſt) it continued reaſonably pure, and unaltered during the Reigns of his Grandchildren, a Specimen whereof we ſhall preſent the Reader, to give him full Satisfaction, and a more diſtinct apprehenſion of this matter in hand. * The Sons of Ludovicus Pius, had great Diſſentions betwixt themſelves, but at length a Reconciliation and perfect Union being made, each of them took a ſolemn Oath for Confirmation thereof, and Charles particularly in the Theotiſch Language (for ſo was it called) in theſe very words. In Godes minua induithes Chriſtianes folches ind unſer bid hero Gealtenisſi fon theſemo dage framinordeſſo fram ſo mic Gat gennis ci indi madh furgibit ſe haldjihtis an minam bruher ſcal inthi utha Zormigſoſo madno indimit lukerem in nothe in mit hing nege gango theminam uvillon imo ce ſcadhen merhen. The Orthography of this Oath is very odd, and many Words by often Writing and Printing of Nithardus the Hiſtorian his Copy are corrupted, but to any one that underſtands the German Language or the Teutonick Dialects perfectly, it cannot but appear of that Original. The Imprecation is contained in the Confeſſion of the ancient German Church with very little difference, and the Danes have at this day a Phraſe, and Words not much differing from it. But the whole is to be explained, but out of ſeveral Speeches or Dialects of this ancient Language, for as Rodericus Toletanus near five hundred Years agoe obſerved, the Teutonick (properly ſo called, or German,) the Daniſh, Norwegian, Suediſh, Flemmiſh, and Engliſh Tongues were the ſame, diſtinct onely in Idioms. To this Oath of Charles we ſhall add, that Fealty or Allegiance, which their People took, and Nithardus hath alſo related in theſe very Words, as we have them from the Edition of Pitheus. Oba Karl theu eid theu er ſineno bruedher Ludhuwige geſuor geleiſtit, inde Ludhuwig min herro theu er imo geſuor forbrichit, ob ih ina nes aruvendenne mag, no ih, noh thero, no hein themihes incuenden mag nuidhar karle imoſe follus tine nuirdhit. Pontanus has turned both this and the other into the Belgick Dialect, whereby the Reader if he pleaſe may ſee that near Affinity and Proportion, which one of the Speeches beareth unto the other.

* Vide Nithardi Hiſt. de Diſſentionibus filiorum Ludovici Pii, lib. 3. p. 353. Authorum Pitheanorum, Tom. 2.

Sic Belgicè quidem interpretatur: In Godes minne ende des Chriſtlii cheu volcks ende ouſer beid er belteniſſe vau deſen dage af, ende voorts ſo my Godt Wetenſchap ende macht, verlene ſe Haldt ich au mi juenbruder, &c. Halten enim & Rehaten eſt ſervare.

In Confeſſione veteris Eccleſiæ Alemannorum, Tom. 2. Aleman. Antiqu. edante Goldaſto.

Frammordeſſo fram: Vdi fram tiden, Belgice voorts en voorts Anglicè from, deinceps lat.

P. 354.

Orig. Franc. lib. 6. c. 24.

84. The ſame Nithardus, who himſelf lived in theſe days, and was the Nephew of Charles the Great by his Daughter Bertha, hath alſo left us upon Record the Oath which Lodowick the other Brother took in the Ruſtick Roman Speech, a very choice Monument, whereby the Reader may ſee the two quite different Languages ſpoken at the ſame time upon the ſame place, by two ſeveral ſorts of People, the Franks, and the Romanized Galls, though by the better ſort, both of them were underſtood and ſpoken. This is the ſame Oath in the Romance, mutatis mutandis, which we formerly preſented in the Theotiſch or French Tongue. Pro do. amur & pro Xpian poblo & noſtro Commun ſalvament diſt di en avant in quant dis ſavir & podir me dunat ſi Saluarui eo ciſt me on fradre Karlo, & in adiudha & in cadhuna coſa, ſi cum om per dreit ſon frada ſalvar diſt ino, quid il mi altro ſi fazet & abludher nul plaid nunquam prindrai qui me on vol eiſt me on fradre Karle in damnaſil. The People moreover which underſtood and ſpake this ſame Language, made in it the ſame Oath with the former, which becauſe it is not long we ſhall alſo here preſent to the Readers Eye. † Si Lodhauig Sagramnent que ſon fradre Karlo jurate Conſervat, & Karlus meros ſerodra in ſuo part rales tanit, ſi jo returnar non lint pois ne jo neulſlui eo, returnar jut pois in nulla ajudha contra Lodhuvig nun li iner.

Pour l' amour de Dieu & pour le Peuple Chreſtien & noſtre Commun ſauvement de ceſte journie en avant en quant-que Dieu ſavoir & pouvoir me donnera ainſi je le ſaueray mon frere kar, & en aide & en Chacune choſe ainſi comme l' hom per Droict, &c.

† Si Louis le ſerment q'uil á ſon frere Charel jurè Conſerve, & Charle mon Seigneur de ſa part ne le tient, ſi je detourner ly ne puis ni je, ni nullui detourner luy ne puis, en nulle aide contre Louis avec luy iray.

85. Thus we ſee what both the Ruſtick Romance, and the Theotiſch were, into which a Canon of the Council of Tours orders that the Biſhops ſhould cauſe the Homilies lies to be tranſlated, that they might be underſtood by all. And hereby may the Reader perceive how great a change in all Sublunary things time produceth. That Language which is neweſt is always counted the beſt and moſt Gentile. The Celtick was firſt eſteemed Clowniſh and laid aſide; the Roman being moſt in requeſt, and happy he that could ſpeak it. Then when the Franks came in, their Language called the Theotiſch being that of the Court, became the Gentileſt for a while, and the ordinary Roman, as well in reſpect to it, as to the pure Latine onely preſerved amongſt the Learned, was termed Ruſtick: Yet as we formerly noted, the Language of the multitude prevailed at length, over that of a few Invaders, and what was once counted Gentile and Courtly, became neglected and out of Practice, Cuſtome, as Pindar the Poet ſaith, being King of all things. But behold ſtill more to admire. The Theotiſch, that is the Tuitſch or Duitſch, or Teutonick Dialect was at this time, whereof we write, called the Frankisga, Taugen or French Tongue; but afterward the Caſe was quite altered, the Franks by degrees forgot this their Language, accuſtomed themſelves to that of the Provincials, or Native Galls mixed with Romans, which had the ſame Succeſs over it, as it had formerly over the Celtick. This they own, this they hugg and embrace, this they admire, eſteeming all others Barbarous, and forgetting their own Original. This ſtill corrupted Latine, though it be, to uſe their own fine Words, a Jargon and Meſlange, or Hodgpodge of Celtick, Roman, Gothick, true French (or Theotiſch) and other Speeches, they think they can never trim, adorn and poliſh enough. But thou ſeeſt, Reader, what the true and firſt French was. How now by degrees this being forſaken, the Baſtard Roman was eſpouſed, and having got the Name of French, how it altered to what it is at preſent, and what its Conſtitution was and is, I think it not altogether impertinent to tell thee, to make our Diſcourſe more complete in Sum, to preſent thee with the Memoirs of the French Tongue, a Tongue moſt dear unto thee if thou beeſt not a Pedant, a mere Engliſh-man, art a Traveller, or haſt any thing in thee of good breeding.

Epiſcopus homilias apertè transferre ſtudeat in Ruſticam Romanam Linguam, aut Theotiſcam, quo facilius poſſent cuncti Intelligere.

Three ſorts of Languages in uſe among the Galls.

86. Know then, that being adopted as it were into the Name of French by the dying Language of the Franks, it conſiſted as we formerly hinted, and now again are forced to repeat, moſt of Latine, but yet had many words out of ſeveral other Speeches impoſed on it, however againſt its Genius. The ancient Celtick though ſo long agoe driven out of Gall, yet left ſome remainders of Words behind it, which by their near Affinity to the Britiſh ſufficiently ſhew what was their Original. To inſtance in a few: Guerir to Heal, which Guerif ſignifieth amongſt our Welſh-men. Guaine with the French is a Sheath, and ſo is Gwain with the Britains. They ſay Derechef for Again, and the Welſh Dercheſu: The French have Camur for Crooked, and the Britains Cam, the one Nation uſeth Bateau, and the other Bad for a Boat, the one Gourmand, for an over great Eater, and the other Gormod for over much; the French Baſton, the Britains Paſtcon for a Staff, the French Accabler, the Welſh Cablu to Oppreſs, the French call an Haven by the Name of Haure, and the Britains by that of Aber; and the word Comb is uſed by both Nations for a Valley. And as this Language retained many of the old Celtick words, ſo many more of the Teutonick. The Names of Rivers, Towns, and Places, are moſt of them Gallick, but the Chriſtian Names of men, when not out of Scripture, particularly of their Kings, are generally of the German Original, as are a great quantity of common and ordinary words, of which it would be too tedious here to make a recital. The General and moſt probable Eſtimate is this. The preſent French Tongue may be divided into four parts, whereof one half is to be aſcribed to the Latine, as to any one that is meanly skilled in both, it cannot but evidently appear. The other half is ſo to be diſtributed, as that one part may be allotted to the ancient Gallick, another to that of the Franks, and the laſt and leaſt to the Greek, betwixt which as Henry Stephen has abundantly ſhewed, and the Modern French there is great Conformity, by reaſon of the Commerce with the Maſſilienſes or old Inhabitants of Marſeilles. So weak is the ſaying of Matharell, who reſolves to oppoſe Hotoman whether right or wrong, that the preſent French is nigh the ſame Speech with the old Gallick, becauſe forſooth he finds ſome words the ſame with thoſe Gallick that are mentioned in ancient Authours, and becauſe the Names of Rivers and Places are very much the ſame.

The Compoſure of the French Tongue.

Hotomani Franco-gallia, c. 2.

In reſponſ. ad Hotom. Franco-gall.

87. To come then to the Latine, it had much more Conformity to it, in the time of Charles the Great, and thereabout than it hath at preſent, the Teutonick, or that of the Franks, e'er it ſelf became extinct giving very much Alteration to it. And indeed from the Teutonick hath it received its Phraſe, Form and Declenſion, though moſt of its words from the Latine. For no otherwiſe do the French at this day expreſs their minds, than the Germans, Low Countreymen, and Engliſh by the adjutant Verbs, Am and Have. For Example, a Roman would have ſaid Tu feciſti, which if a French-man imitate or tranſlate, he muſt ſay, Vous avez fait, nor otherwiſe then the German would ſay, Du habſtes gedaen, and an Engliſh-man, You have done; which way of Speech in Latine would be Intolerable, for who would ſay in that Tongue, Tu habes illud factum? The Reader by comparing the Oaths lately mentioned with the Modern French may be farther ſatisfied in this particular. We come to the Latine words, to ſee how they came into that form and ſhape we now behold them. This was by changing A ſometimes into E, as writing for Æſtas Eſtè, Bonitas Bontè; ſometimes into I, as Ceraſum into Ceriſe, Vacuus Vvide; ſometimes into Ou, as for Tangere, Toucher; otherwhile into Ea as Aqua into Eaue, and into ſeveral other Diphthongs, as vice verſo Ea into A, as in many Inſtances we could ſhew; as alſo their change both of the Vowels, I and O into A, and indeed mutably the ſame Alteration in them all. For Conſonants the ſame thing may be obſerved, as for a taſte, B into C, as Cubare into Coucher, Cubile into Couche. So alſo into F, as Babalus into Boufle, Trabs into Treffs; into G, as Ruber into Rouge; into P, as Turba into Troupe; and into V, as Caballus into Cheval, Debitus into Deuë, and Ebrius into yure. The like might be ſaid of all the reſt of the Conſonants well nigh, and an whole Dictionary made, but that's not our work, and the Reader if he deſire full Information may conſult the French Grammar of that Learned French-man Robert Stevens.

88. But herein the ancient Speakers of this Language imitated the Romans as in other reſpects, that they joyned not Articles with Words, as the Modern French doe in Conformity to the Teutonick, and ended divers Genitive Caſes in S, as for Liber Cæſaris in Latine, they would ſay and write Lieure Cæſars, whereas now they write Le liure de Ceſar. From this Correſpondence with the Latine comes it to paſs, that there are many proper Names ending in I, becauſe they were called by the Name of their Family, more eſpecially in Italy; but in France alſo ſome, they being ſo named in their Contracts made in Latine. But to note farther the Inconſtancy and Alteration of this Tongue, thoſe, who anciently ſpake it, ended many words in Erre and Eſſe, which now-a-days are terminated in Eur and Euſe. For example they ſaid Semerre, Gaignierre, Trichierre, Sannerre, Vainquierre, Luitierre Vergierre, Pechierre, Conoiſſierre, Decomerre, for what is now written, Semeur, Gagneur, Trompeur, Sauneur, Vainqueur, Luiteur, Vengeur, Pecheur, Conoiſſeur and Deconeur. They ſaid Taucereſſe, Trounereſſe, Lechereſſe, Mangereſſe, Repentereſſe, Demonſtrereſſe, for what now they ſay, Tauceuſe, Trouneuſe, Friande, Mangeuſe, Repentante, and Demonſtreuſe. Sometimes they ended their words in Oiſſe, as Aideroiſſe, Conforteroiſſe, and the like. To ſuch words as end now in Eau they added Aux, though they ſpake in the ſingular Number, as in Biaux, Oiſiaux, Touiaux, Aniaux, ſometimes they left out the u, terming them Biax, Oiſax. On the contrary from plurals they took the Letter S, as ſaying li autre, which is now changed into les autres, li enchantement, now les enchantements. Such as now end in jeu, they terminated in ex, writing Diex and Liex, for Dieu and Lieu. More anciently they wrote and ſaid, Soye and Moye, which now is altered into Sienne and Mienne, Sor for Sur, Ot for Eut, Pot for Peut, Seaut for Seut, Veaut for Veut, Fui and Bui for Je fus, and Je beus. In ſome words they placed H after C, where the Modern French now leave it out, and on the contrary had no H there, where it is at this day placed; for Example they ſaid Cha, Embracher, Merchy, Conchut, Puche, Cheler, Piecha, for which now you have Ça, Embraſſer, Mercy, Conceut, Puce, Celer, Pieça; on the contrary they called that Reproce, Duceſſe, France, Blance, which now is Reproche, Ducheſſe, Franche and Blanche. They ſaid Sentu for Sentir, Creez and Veez, for Croyez and Voyez, S'ame, T'ame, M'ame, S'image, T'image, S'angoiſſe, T'aucelle, M'aucelle, S'oſteſſe M'eſped, whereas now they write and ſpeak Son ame, Ton ame, Mon ame, Son Image, and the like for thoſe that follow.

Voyez les Recherches des Antiquites de la Langue Francoiſe ou Dictionaire Gaulois par Pierre Borel Medecin de Paris imprimè, 1667.

89. As more conformable to the Latine, they ended ſuch words in Ous, which their Poſterity now have changed into Eux, ſaying Pious and Religious, for Pieux and Religieux. On the contrary they changed the V into O in ſeveral words, to which thoſe that came after again added the V, and ſo retained both O and V, ſaying Poue and Pooir, inſtead of the Pource and Pouvoir, and Molt and Cort, for Moult and Court. Many words they terminated in El, which ſince have been ended by Eau, as Cremel, Mantel, Corbel, Chamel, Veel, Cheurel, Morcel, Pel, Moncel, Vaiſſel, Fournel, Bel, Fourrel, Chapel and Tumbel more agreeable to the Latine, inſtead of which now if you will ſpeak proper French, you muſt ſay Cerneau, Manteau, Corbeau, Chameau, Veau, Chevereau, and the like. Many they ended in On, as Meſpriſon, Achoiſon, Delivereſon, for which Meſpris, Occaſion, and Deliverance are now in requeſt. For Dirent, Mirent and Occirent they ſaid Diſtrent, Miſtrent and Occiſtrent, Enſoigne for Enſeigne, Pointure for Peinture, Teche for Tache, and Plaigne for Plain. The Latine O now and then they changed into V, ſaying Cuel which now is Col, Cuer now Coeur, and to O added V, as Repous and Propous, now written Repos and Propos. Moſt of the words ending now in Eur, they terminated in Or, as Trouveor and Chanteor they wrote not Trouveur and Chanteur, and Jougleor not Jougleur. The Particle de they often omitted, or underſtood as Les fils Iuain for D'yuain, which yet is continued as they ſay ſtill at Paris, l' Hoſtel Dieu, not l' Hoſtel de Dieu; and lately Le Palais Cardinal, as in the Northern parts of England, they ſeldom put the Letter S, as the ſign of the Genitive Caſe, but inſtead of my Father's Horſe, Stable, Houſe or the like, ſay my Father Horſe, my Father Stable, and my Father Houſe; and here in London, not Somerſet's Houſe, York's Houſe, Kirk's Houſe, but Somerſet Houſe, York Houſe and Kirk Houſe. Their Dux was afterward changed into Duc, their Salus into Salut, and their Capel into Capet, their Nuis into Nuit, and their Pous into Pout.

Their Contraction, or Abreviation of words.

90. The Obſervations of this Nature might be infinite, but this may be ſaid in General, that the remoter times in the uſe of Words, went ſtill farther from the Latine, although in ſome Caſes this Rule muſt admit of an exception. One thing by no means is to be omitted, and that is the ſtrange Affectation of brevity in words, in writing by Contraction of Syllables, and in Pronunciation by leaving out the Conſonants. Quadrageſima muſt be Quareſme, and then Careſme, Perdere contracted into Perdre, and Pudicelle into Pucelle, Scribere into Eſcrire, Chriſtianus into Chreſtien, and Thouſands of others ſo abreviated. But neither would theſe French-men content themſelves with ſuch a Contraction of words, but theſe words thus contracted, they muſt again in their Pronunciation contract, leaving out many Conſonants; as for Example the S in all theſe we have now mentioned. The Humour and Cuſtome of the moſt ancient French was to omit in their ſhort writing the Vowels, whence afterward proceeded new words, as Quareſme they were wont to write Qureſme, Quarrel, Qrel, for Moult Mlt, and for Chevalier Chr. But late days their Poſterity thinks fit in their Writings, to omit the quieſcent Conſonants, eſpecially the S before the T, as for Eſtant they wrote Etant, for Eſtè Etè; ſo S before C, as for Eſcrire now you find Ecrire, and the like in other Words. If we compare not onely ſome of their preſent words with the Latine, from which they are derived, but with thoſe in uſe about Charles the Great his time, we cannot but a little wonder at this Affectation. We find in the Oath taken by the People in this Romance Tongue, and lately mentioned, that one of the Brothers was called Ludhuvig, as Ludovicus in Latine, and Lodowick or Hlodvick in the French or German. Now is it ſo Metamorphoz'd, that one living in that time could not know it, for they write it Louis, and pronounce it Loüi. He that was called Clodonæus in like manner they write Clouïs and pronounce Cloui. And what is more, Theodorick they write Thierry, Landerick Landry, and the latter part of the Name of Brunichild, they have quite mangled and changed, calling her Brunehault in their modern Hiſtories.

Or qu'il ne ſoit vray que l' Etymologie ſe perd. par la nouvelle Orthographe, conſiderez ſi le mot doibt ne monſtroit pas qu'il venoit de debet, pluſtoſt que l' Eſcrivant doit; & Eſcripture venoit de Scriptura, plutoſt que Ecriture: Soubs venoit de ſub, pluſtoſt que Sous, & ainſi d'une infinitè d'autres mots que je paſſeray ſous ſilence. Ils voudroient cacher l'origine de leur Langage qui n'eſt que le Latin corrumpu ou vn jargon de meſlange, comme nous avons dit, fait par l' irruption des Barbares dans les Provinces Romaines.

91. They are ſo poſſeſſed with an humour of refining this Baſtard Latine, that there is no end of their fancies and attempts this way. The word Mademoiſelle the great Courting word of this elegant and neat Courting Language as they would have it eſteemed, they have as is congruous made ſo effemitate, that whereas not long ſince they pronounced it out in length, of late to ſoften it in the Ears of their Miſtreſſes they pronounced Madmoſelle, but this being too long, now Mamoſelle, and it's to be expected that in a little time it will come to be Melle, and afterwards

Pource qu'on conçoit quelque haine pour vn mot, on veut l' appeller vieux, & le rejeter, & faire vn langage á la mode, comme on fait des modes de toutes les Choſes du monde qui ne font qu' appauvrir le Royaume, & faire paſſer les Francois pour ridicules parmi les meſmes Nations des habits deſquelles ils ſe parent en leurs Farces. Eſt ce done que nous parlons mieux que nos peres & avons plus de Jugement? Rien moins. Mais c'eſt que nous ſommes preoccupez d'autres mots qu'on nous Enſeigne, & que nous nous y ſommes accouſtumez tellement, que le langage ancien nous choque incontinent. Si encore on en demeuroit la ou l'on en eſt, on pourroit prendre patience. Mais les Changements dureront autant que le monde, & ceux qui par leur eloquence preſente croyent avoir acquis une reputation eternelle, paſſeront pour ridicules dans moins d'un ſiecle. Hæc verè & ingenuè fatetur Borelus Pariſienſis Medicus.

Me-aire, wholly Spiritual or Angelical; ſo airy is their fancy, and light is their temper, that to avoid harſhneſs, they run upon the other extreme of Effeminacy. Certainly a due mixture of Vowels with Conſonants, and an open pronunciation of both, provided there be no rude harſhneſs ſuch as is that of the Italian Tongue, is more majeſtick and manly, and more ſuitable to the Organs of Man's Voice, as that Muſick is not always the beſt, which departs the moſt from the Baſe in ſound and proportion. But ſo great a deſire have they to poliſh this Speech with Eloquence, becauſe to them there ſeems nothing to want to the felicity of their Kingdom, but to ſeparate from the Number of Barbarous Languages, that Tongue which they ſpeak, and which all their Neighbours too will ſpeak e'er long, (they are their † own words) if their Conqueſts continue as they have begun. For ſo brave a Deſign, one of the greateſt Miniſters of State they ever had, founded a Society called the French Academy, conſiſting of the choiceſt and moſt refined Wits of France, the Conferences of whom he looked upon as the moſt aſſured means to bring it about. Foraſmuch as their Tongue which was then more perfect than any other which was ſpoken at that time, might as well at length ſucceed the Latine, as the Latine did the Greek, if there were more care taken than had been thitherto of Elocution, which is not indeed the whole of Eloquence, but makes a very conſiderable part of it.

† See Pelliſon's Hiſtory of the French Academy founded by Cardinal Richlieu.

92. Such are their hopes and expectations that their Conqueſts ſhall increaſe, and their Neighbours be forced to ſubmit both to their Language and Empire, which they think is in a fair way to ſucceed that of the Romans, as the Romans did the other of the Greeks. Now both Greeks and Romans found it a very great expedient for the Continuation of their Empire, to propagate their Language, and ſuppreſs by degrees the Original Speeches of the ſeveral Conquered Countries. They like great and perfect Stateſmen conſider this, and are ſo prudent as to conclude that it's in vain to expect and attend an after Game, where there is hope they may be beforehand. If the Speech of the Conquerours propagated amongſt their Subjects be a great means to keep them in Obedience, by rendring their Perſons and their Government familiar to them, then it muſt alſo be a means to facilitate their Conqueſts, and draw in a People not yet ſubdued, their Language making way for their Arms by communication of Councils, and a convenience of inſinuating thoſe things there, where want of underſtanding what each other ſays, increaſes a ſtrangeneſs, and ſtrangeneſs ever procures a diffidence and an Averſion. Therefore did they not onely ſet about the poliſhing of their Language as they imagined, to make it more charming and effectual; but having begot a good opinion of it in thoſe who, ignorant of better, travell into their Countrey for gallant Breeding, tranſlate all the moſt conſiderable Authours which ſpeak either the Greek or Latine into it, to render thoſe Languages uſeleſs, and to advance their own into the place of both. What their ſucceſs in this kind of Conqueſt of their Tongue hath been, and is daily we have largely ſeen; the French being now the Courtly gentile Language, and in as great Reputation in ſome other parts of Europe, as it's parent was once in Gall, it obtruding its words, and phraſes ſtill upon thoſe of the Countries, and giving good hope to its Maſters to obliterate them wholly at the length, it is already become the Gentile, and as to the Commerce of Strangers has already in a manner diſplaced the Latine, which by imprudent People, who never think nor conſider whither things drive, now begins to be drolled at as the Language of Pedants. Could it once attain to be the learned Language, the work would be accompliſhed, and this it would quickly be were it once impoſed upon the Univerſities, and had the Keys of the Arts and Sciences delivered into its Cuſtody, a fair way to which they have already made by their Tranſlations, and as they hope by the dints of their Swords. But what progreſs they have made in that other ſort of Conqueſt, viz. by Arms, it's more proper for others to conſider than my ſelf, as alſo how far this may farther confer to it, that the Latine Tongue begins to be deſpiſed, and Europe is generally Frenchified, being one would think bewitched and running a madding, both after the Speech and the Faſhions of that Nation.

93. Whatever the iſſue may be, the danger is not very much apprehended, as we may judge by the univerſal demeanour of the Chriſtian World; and however the caſe may ſtand upon a formal Examination and ſcrutiny by the principles of ancient, and therefore now-a-days dull and deſpiſed prudence, it may be hoped their whole deſign will no more ſucceed than hath the project of their Academy, for refining of the Language, in order to which by all means a Dictionary muſt be made made of true and Authentick words and phraſes. But their Founder before his Death often complained that he was fruſtrated in his Expectations, and that they did little or nothing of moment. The People in deſpight of their Rules, and Obſervations ever was and will be Maſters of Speech, which is framed by cuſtome and generality of Expreſſions, any one word in it ſelf ſignifying no more one thing than it doth another. Therefore though a Dictionary hath been promiſed and expected above thirty years, yet cannot we yet have the happineſs to ſee it, and to ſpeak truly it's Siſyphus his Work, for as they add ſtill new words to it, the firſt and oldeſt will become out of uſe and faſhion. But there is no great need of their Travel in this matter, for be it what it will, being French, it is and will be both greedily received and admired, witneſs the raſcally Bagatells, which come out every day, and by our People are bought up becauſe French, as the greateſt treaſures of Wiſedom and Ingenuity, though not one word of truth or ſenſe in them. This, Reader, is the cauſe of our ſo great prolixneſs upon this Subject, for I thought I could not doe thee a more eminent Service, than in drawing the Pedigree though at length, of that whereof thou art ſo exceedingly inamoured. Take with thee at parting, and diſpoſe of it next thy Heart, or where elſe thou pleaſeſt, the true and lively portraicture of it drawn in little, by no worſe Pencil than that of him who underſtood it well, the moſt skilfull and dextrous Joſeph Scaliger.

Sect. 4.

Si Homuncio aliquis Francus Francicè Crepitum edat, noſtrates ilico arrigunt aures, plaudunt & admirantur.

94. Art thou ignorant ſaith he, that the Tongue thou now uſeſt like as the Italian and Spaniſh, is an Abortive Brat of the Latine? The Materials of it came from Latium, which have now acquired a depraved form, are ſtuft with adſpirations, the ſounds of the Vowels being diſtorted to the forming of deformed Diphthongs, inſomuch that even at this time you cannot agree amongſt your ſelves, with what Elements (or Letters) you ſhould Write. How much more purely do the Suiſſers ſpeak who uſe no Diphthong at all? Farther, the Accents and Quantities are adulterated, the Conſonants devoured in pronunciation, in which if there be any ſenſe, why ſhould not the Orthography be the ſame, and omit them as well as doth the ſpeech? Of the Declenſions I ſay nothing, for they are nearer akin to the German ſound, whence the Franks are deſcended. But go to, if you will ask any thing requiſite for Eating and Drinking, or for War, of which neceſſary things you are very ſtudious, you muſt (though barbarouſly) ask for them in Latine, as Piſcis, Caro, Panis, Vinum, Spatha, Scutum, Lancea, Caballus & Coriacea, for this muſt come from Corium, as with them Lorica from Lora. As for theſe Madmen, who would derive you from the Greeks becauſe of the Druides, their inconſiderateneſs often makes thoſe laugh, who are furniſhed with more acute Judgments. Thus much, and too much indeed of this Language, but Reader as I ſaid thou muſt thank thy ſelf.

An ignoras linguam veſtram, qua nunc utimini, Latinæ linguæ abortum eſſe quemadmodum & Italicam & Hiſpanicam, &c. in Præf. ad Theſaurum de lingua hodierna Gallica. Vide Pontanum, in Origin. Francic. lib. ult. c. ult.

The Government Monarchical.

95. We ſhall ſpend the remainders of what we have to ſay, upon the Cuſtomes and Polity of the ancient Franks, and herein as it is fitting give their Kings the Honour of precedency. That they had Kings from that very time that we have the firſt knowledge of them in Antiquity is very evident, their being is certain, the onely queſtion is concerning the manner, and firſt how they came to that Dignity; the opinion of ſome Learned men is that the Kingdom was not hereditary, but in conformity to that Nation from which they had their Original, was conferred by the choice and ſuffrages of the People. That the Kings of the Germans were created after this manner, * Tacitus affirms, where he tells us that they choſe their Kings for their Nobility, and the Captains for their Valour. This cuſtome is yet retained by the Germans themſelves, and the Polonians, and lately both by the Suedes, and Danes. Yet have the Sons † of the Kings ever had the prerogative, or been firſt conſidered in the Choice, a great mark of the excellency of ancient Prudence. For as skilfull Hunters according to the Obſervation of || Plutarch, do not ſo much deſire a Whelp begot by a Dog of generous or Noble Breed, but ſuch a Dog himſelf; ſo good Stateſmen will not chuſe a man who is to be a Prince, but one who is a Prince already. To this may be added, that the Parents of ſuch Children upon hope of ſuch Election, and leſt they be rejected by the People, will have eſpecial care of their Education. But to prove the matter in hand, that the Kings of the Franks were Elected they produce theſe Teſtimonies. Firſt from Aimoinus they alledge theſe words: * The Franks, according to the cuſtome of other Nations chuſing a King, advance Faramund to the Throne; again, † The Franks eſtabliſh a certain Clerk Daniel by Name, his hair now growing, in the

* In libello de moribus Germanorum Reges ex nobilitate, Duces ex virtute ſumunt.

† Inſignis nobilitas, aut magna patrum merita principis dignationem etiam adoleſcentulis aſſignant.

|| In Sylla.

* Lib. 1. c. 4. Regem, cæterarum more Nationum, Franci ſibi eligentes Faramundum ſolio ſublimant regio. † Lib. 4. c. 51. Franci Danielem quendam Clericum, cæſarie Capitis creſcente in regnum ſtabiliunt, atque Chilpericum nuncupant, Lib. 4. c. 67.

Kingdom, and name him Chilperick. Out of another place, King Pipin being Dead his Sons Charles and Carloman by conſent of all the Franks are made Kings; and out of another, Pipin being Dead, the Franks in a ſolemn meeting, make both his Sons their Kings, on that condition that they ſhould part the Kingdom equally betwixt them. So much out of Aimoinus, according to what we have formerly written upon theſe occaſions.

96. The like Teſtimonies they produce out of Gregorius Turonenſis, as where he writes, that the Franks having rejected Childerick, unanimouſly make choice of Egidius, and then the Franks who formerly had an Eye to Childebert the Elder, ſend a meſſage to Sigebert that in caſe he would come, they would deſert Chilperick and make him King. A little after he adds all the Army came unto him, and ſetting him upon a Shield made him their King. In another place, Sigebert conſenting to the Franks, and being according to the cuſtome of the Nation put upon a Shield was ordained King, and obtained the Kingdom of his Brother Chilperick. To ſtrengthen theſe Teſtimonies, they produce the laſt will of Charles the Great, publiſhed by John Nauclerus and Henry Mutius, out of which they urge this paſſage. In caſe any of theſe my three Sons have a Son, to him whom the People ſhall make choice of, we will that his Uncles conſent that he ſucceed in his Father's Inheritance, and permit their Brother's Son to Reign in the portion of his Father's Kingdom. All this they enforce by what Regino hath written concerning this ſame Charles, his Diſpoſition of his Dominions to his three Sons while he yet lived; namely that, He held a Conſultation with the Nobility of the Franks, concerning the partition of his Kingdom amongſt his Sons; and a Diviſion being made into three parts, of this he made his Teſtament, which was confirmed by the Oaths of the Franks. Laſtly, Eginhart relates in his Life that ſending for Lodovick the King of Aquitain, who onely remained of the Sons of Hildegardis, in a ſolemn Aſſembly of the Nobility, met from all parts of the Kingdom of the Franks by advice of them all, he made him his Collegue or Partner in the Kingdom. Francis Hotoman in his * Franco Gallia produceth many more examples, but reſpecting the times later than thoſe whereof we write, they are not ſo proper for our Cogniſance and Diſquiſition.

Lib. 2. c. 12. Franci ejecto Childerico, Egidium ſibi unanimiter adſciſcunt.

Lib. 4. c. 51.

C.

* Libellus ſtatum veteris Reip. Gallicæ, tum deinde à Francis occupatæ, deſcribens. Editio Secunda ex Officina Hieronymi Bertulphi. 1574.

97. Hotoman having in his Franco Gallia publiſhed this amongſt other Doctrines, at ſuch time as in the Civil Wars in France he had ſided with that Party which took Arms againſt the King, and had withdrawn himſelf out of the Kingdom, a * great Alarm was taken by his Adverſaries, and the Book looked upon and that not undeſervedly as a thing contrived, and deſigned for no other end than to overturn the Government, by infuſing ſuch Notions into the Heads of the People. Papirius Maſſonus wrote his Cenſure upon it, but the intire † anſwering of it was referred to Anthony Matharell, the chief Procurer or Attorny of Catharine de Medicis the Queen Mother, who deſerves Commendations for the great Loyalty or Zeal he ſhews for his Prince and Countrey, and however in ſome particulars he may come ſhort of Hotoman both in Judgment and Learning, being tranſported with Zeal and oppoſing every thing almoſt becauſe the other affirms it, as jealous that it was written out of Deſign, yet hath generally the better of him both in his Cauſe and the Proofs he brings to Eſtabliſh it. He denies that from any of theſe Inſtances, it can be proved that the Kingdom of the Franks in Gall was Elective. To that of the Promotion of Pharamond he anſwers, that the words are to be taken as meant of Inauguration, and not of Election, or if they be it forces not much, for he might be choſen, becauſe the former Race of the Kings had failed. But after him Reigned his Son Clodio, who dying without iſſue Male, Meroneus his Kinſman was King not by Election, but Succeſſion, for Aimoinus writes, that he took the Government of the Franks upon him. After him Reigned his Son Childerick to whom by right of Inheritance ſucceeded his Son Clodonæus the firſt Chriſtian King, who being Dead, his four Sons Theodorick, Clodomir, Childebert and Clotair, equally parted his Kingdom amongſt them to uſe the words of Aimoinus * who, he tells Hotoman, four times Condemns him for lying.

And yet Hereditary not Elective.

In Scaligeranis nuper Editis hoc invenimus in litera H. Hotomani Franco Gallia eſt bonne, i'y ay aideè.

Differit ſexto capite Hotomanus utrum Regnum Franco-Galliæ hæreditate an ſuffragiis deferretur, & de Regum creandorum more: quam quæſtionem movet ille, non ut hiſtoriam nobis aperiat, ſed ut Franco galliam ſatis ſeditionibus agitatam funditus evertat.*

† Ad Franc. Hotomani Francogalliam Antonii Matharelli Reginæ Matris à rebus procurandis primarii, Reſponſio. Lutetiæ ex Officina Federici Morelli Typographi Regii, 1576. Cum Privilegio.

* Regnum interſe æqua lance dividunt ut verbis Aimoini utarqui te jam Hotomane quater mendacii arguit.

98. Of theſe Childebert dying without iſſue, Clotair Reigned alone, who alſo as the ſame Authour teſtifies, left four Sons the Heirs of his Kingdom, viz. Cherebet, Guntran, Chilperick and Sigebert, the Poſterity of whom inherited as their Anceſtours had done before them. As for Daniel the Clerk, who was by the Franks choſen King, his Hair being ſuffered to grow, and named Chilperick, he takes notice, and Complains that Hotoman ſhould ſweat ſo much to eſtabliſh a lie. He tells him a Lawyer (ſuch Hotoman was, and that a great one) ought to conſider that Laws are fitted and framed to ſuch things as frequently happen, and not ſuch as fall out very ſeldom; for from Pharamond whom he calls the firſt King of the Franks to this Daniel the Clerk paſſed three hundred years, in which ſpace of time the Kingdom was devolved not by Election, but Inheritance. And by this Election of Daniel and ſuch like, he puts him in mind that he never conſiders how that not ſucceſſion it ſelf, but the ſucceſſours were Condemned; foraſmuch as good Princes may have very bad Heirs, and yet the Succeſſion and Inheritance be juſt and good. It happened that the laſt three or four of the Family of Meroneus were lazy and Drones, and ſtupid, which gave occaſion to Charles Martel with eaſe, though he himſelf be ſaid to have refuſed the Crown, to transfer the Government upon his Children. They being not of the Royal Family, this was effected partly by force, and partly by conſent, of thoſe whom they had obliged by many good Offices, and Pipin by means of Zachary the Roman Biſhop, obtained to be Crowned and anointed King; as his two Sons Charles and Carloman were by the Hands of Stephen who was then in Exile, which thing he accuſes Hotoman for omitting and making mention onely of the conſent of the People, as deſiring to make out his Election from that place of Aimoinus, which place yet he affirms, makes nothing for his Lie and figment as may be evident to any that's half blind.

99. As neither doth the Teſtament of Charles the Great, by which it's certain he made Ludovicus Pius King of Franco-gallia, Bernard his Nephew being made King of Italy, as is clear from the Teſtimony of Nauclerus. This is farther confirmed from what Aimoinus writes of this very Subject, that Lodovick being in Aquitain, when News was brought him of his Father's Death, came to Aix, and there by Conſent and good liking of all the Franks he ſucceeded him, where the word Conſent can by no means be referred to Election, but ſignifies the wiſhes, expectation, and deſire of all the People. In like manner the ſtirs being pacified, which were riſen betwixt Pius and his Sons, to the great detriment of Francogallia, and which produced an horrid Example, the Kingdom was divided by Pius amongſt his Sons, as Aimoinus farther witneſſeth, and not by the Election of the People, ſo great a truth is it, that not onely in the times of the Meroningi, but the Carloningi alſo, the Sons ſucceeded their Fathers in the Kingdom. But as all humane things are inſtable and mutable, and nothing can laſt always, in like manner as the Meroningi when they degenerated were deprived of their Power, and their Authority transferred upon the Family of Pipin; ſo by a certain viciſſitude, and the ſecret Judgment of God, the Carloningi behaving themſelves no leſs idly and luxuriouſly, it paſſed from them to Hugh Capet, either as a Puniſhment of their firſt perfidiouſneſs and Rebellion, or becauſe the Sons of Pius had ſo impiouſly demeaned themſelves toward their Father, for God puniſhes Sons for their Diſobedience to their Parents, though it may come late.

100. That which Hotoman cites from Gregory Turonenſis, concerning Childerick the Father of Clodonæus his being expelled by his Subjects, no way proves that the Kings in thoſe times were made by Election, it being one thing to depoſe and expell, another thing to Elect a King. He upbraids him for inſtancing in a Pagan Prince, and in the endeavour of Sigebert for expelling Chilperick out of France, a thing rather to be Buried in ſilence, than revealed to the People. He tells him that Sigebert was ſent to, and provoked by ſuch like wicked perſons as himſelf, neither was it a wonder if having deſpiſed the Council of Saint German the Biſhop, he came to ſuch a Tragical end, and was puniſhed for his Infidelity, as Hotoman had ſeen from that place of Turonenſis, yet ſhamed not to produce it. As for what Hotoman affirms that Sigebert conſenting to the Franks was made King, and obtained the Kingdom of his Brother Chilperick, it's repugnant to what is written by Turonenſis in the place that's cited. For there he affirms, that Sigebert deſpiſing the advice of St. German, and being come to the Village Victoriacum, all the Army aſſembled before him, by which he was put upon a Target and ſaluted King; then two young men with ſharp Knives ran him into each ſide, whereupon he crying out fell down, and ſhortly after expired, and together with him Charegiſilus his Chamberlain. "Thou haſt here the reward of Perfidiouſneſs and Treachery, and what happened "to one that gaped after another Man's Kingdom, and thou perhaps, ſays he, ap"proveſt it, and ſaiſt it is lawfull by the Law of the Franks. By this the Reader may ſee what to judge of the reſt. Neither is that of any moment that we often find in Turonenſis, Ado, Aimoinus and others, how the Franks were wont when reſolved to have ſuch a King, to raiſe him, to lift him up on high, to ſet him upon a Target, and the like; for all theſe Expreſſions ſignifie onely Inauguration, and not Election. Upon ſuch an occaſion the Nobility was wont to meet, to ſalute the new King, and ſwear Fealty and Obedience to him, which cuſtome yet continues, as may be gathered from the ſaid Authours, which yet it's certain do not in the leaſt argue an Election. To this may be added the Teſtimony of Foreigners; particularly of George Cedrenus, the Greek Hiſtoriographer, who in his Compendium of Hiſtory writes: ‘ It's reported that the King of France, according to cuſtome, ‘ receives his Kingdom by Succeſſion from his Anceſtours. So much Matharell in his Anſwer to Hotoman, beſides much other opprobrious and reviling Language.

101. But though to an indifferent Perſon, his Language would make his cauſe ſuſpected, yet in this point he really hath the advantage. For the Inſtances of Faramond and Pipin conclude nothing, but in an extraodinary Caſe, neither do thoſe of Daniel the Clerk, of Ægidius, or any other produced out of the Hiſtories of the Meroningi; and we are taught by Julian the Lawyer, that things extraordinary, or which rarely happen, are not eaſily to be reckoned of, or eſteemed to conclude any thing in queſtion. The Franks, like as their Kings, were a fierce and untamed People for a long time; and if they ſome time depoſed lawfull Princes, and ſet up others in their Rooms, it was not ſo much as has been practiſed in other Kingdoms, not to go far off; where yet there is no ſuch thing as Election, and the Succeſſion by right of Inheritance has ever been out of doubt. The calling of the Eſtates together, and having their Conſents was a matter of Prudence, as elſewhere it is a thing of Courſe, that the Nobility be preſent at Inaugurations, to have them ſwear to defend that Crown on which they lay their hands, nay to have the People asked, whether they will have ſuch an one for their King; and yet none can have the Face to ſay that the Kingdom is Elective. Theſe Ceremonies were uſed at the entrance of the Kings of the Franks upon the Government, and thence at their Inauguration the People were ſaid to make them Kings, and yet they did it no more than thoſe who now proclaim or Crown our modern Princes. Whatever the poſture of Affairs and Convenience might ſuggeſt to Charles the Great, in ordaining that ſuch a Grandſon ſhould be King as the People ſhould chuſe, he never deſigned to put it into the power of the People to chuſe any whom they pleaſed, or one out of his own Family; or to imitate herein the Cuſtome of the Germans mentioned by Tacitus, that Sons of Kings ſhould but be firſt conſidered. For whoever ſeriouſly weighs that long and uninterrupted Poſſeſſion of the Sovereign power, by the Family of Meroneus; and that wonderfull Zeal all the Franks had for it, which affrighted the Majors of the Palace from aſſuming the Title, will eaſily perceive it never entred into their thoughts, from the time of Childerick to make any Innovation, nay they eſteemed it a point of great Wickedneſs to think of any other Houſe or Lineage, till Martel and his Sons had ſo far inſinuated themſelves into the power, that they were forced to make a Virtue of neceſſity, and forſake thoſe who were neither in a Capacity to help themſelves nor them. We ſhall diſmiſs this Point as Matharell hath done it with the clear Teſtimony of another Foreigner, more to the purpoſe than that of Cedrenus, who was not born till about two hundred Years after the Death of Charles the Great. This is Agathias, who wrote more than ſo many Years before Charles was born, and therefore his Teſtimony is more direct to the times, whereof we write. He teſtifies that it was the Cuſtome or Law amongſt the Franks, for the Sons to ſucceed their Fathers in the Kingdom, or rather to receive it from them as by Deſcent.

Ea quæ rarò accidunt, non temerè in agendis negotiis computantur D. de diverſis Regulis juris, l. 64.

Non temerè id eſt non facilè: Quod etiam apud bonos Authores in hac ſignificatione reperitur. Sic enim Quintilianus: Illud ingeniorum præcox genus non temerè, id eſt, non facilè unquam ad frugem pervenit, vide Bronſhorſt. in locum. Corona Oſtentat Regem, non facit.

Long Hair very much worn, eſpecially by their Kings.

102. From the ſame Authour, and ſeveral others we may obſerve, that ſuch Males as were of the Royal Family were not wont to cut their Hair, but have it lye diſ-ſheveled about their Shoulders, being perfumed with ſweet Ointments, as a Mark of diſtinction betwixt them, and the Inferiour ſort. This admits of no diſpute, but is accorded on all hands, and the Reader may be ſatisfied by the Courſe of the preceding Hiſtory, as alſo in this, that ſuch as were to be deprived of the Kingdom, or of the Succeſſion, had their Locks cut off, a thing which Clodonald or St. Clon practiſed upon himſelf, when he reſolved to forſake the World and enter into Orders. The Cuſtome of wearing long Hair, they brought * with them into Gall, where it had alſo been long † practiſed, inſomuch that part of it, hence got the Name of Gallia Comata, as any one meanly Converſant in Antiquity, cannot but

* Ex Chaucis ſeu Chaycis orti ſunt Franci. Lucanus autem:

Et vos Crinigeros bellis arcere Chaycos
Oppoſiti, petitis Romam, &c.

† Claudianus verò lib. 2. in Ruffin.
Inde truces flavo Comitantur vertice Galli,
Quos Rhodanus velox, Araris quos tardior ambit.

Sect. 4.

but obſerve. Afterward the uſe was confined to the Bloud of the Kings, who as ſome obſerve, from what Dagobert did in the Battel with Bertoald the Saxon Captain, were wont in fight to tye up their Hair and lay it upon their Helmet, as a Creſt and a farther Mark of diſtinction. Hence it came to paſs, that ſome Foreigners who bore them no Good-will, gave the Kings of the Franks the opprobrious Epithete of Setati or Briſtled, and whereas the Setæ, or ſtrong and upright Hairs, or Briſtles are common, not onely to Lions, Horſes and the like, but to Hogs alſo; thence came the Fable, that on their Back-bone, the Rachis or Spina Dorſi they had Hairs growing, as hath that kind of Creature. A paſſage which we learn from the Hiſtory of * Cedrenus.

103. But we leave this Mark of the Bloud Royal, as a thing not ſo conſiderable, and come to the Signs and Tokens of the Royal Prerogative, a thing much Bandied betwixt our two Antagoniſts, but with more Partiality and deſign, than evidence of Truth, more flouriſhes, and Digreſſions than real Arguments, like the Andabatæ we reade of, ſo much are they, or rather is the matter in the dark. Yet if we may judge of the Concluſion by the Premiſſes, and of the Superſtructure by the Foundation, Hotoman's Fabrick and Model of Government cannot ſubſiſt; for he makes the Sovereign power to have lain in the People, to whom he aſcribes Authority, both of electing and depoſing Kings at their Pleaſure, a thing he ſuppoſes for weak Reaſons, and to be exploded upon that account, we have already given unto the Reader. He confounds the Forms of ancient Governments, making thoſe the ſame which were far different, commends the Extravagant Liberty, the Ephori uſurped over the Kings of Sparta, whom yet he can never prove to have had any hand in Election, it being notoriouſly known to every Novice almoſt, that the Kingdom of Lacedæmon was Hereditary. Inſtead of a Government, he would aſſert a Medley of Power, which would never hang together, never thinking he can leſſen the Royal Power enough, and not conſidering that a Prince may have as well too little, as too much, to protect himſelf and his People, and keep all from running into Confuſion. The truth is, he would allow the Kings of the Franks no more than what the later Meroningians enjoyed under the Licentious and Extravagant Actings of the Majors of the Palace; but as to matter of Fact, to prove it was ſo, he is not able, and therefore flyes out, and keeps nothing cloſe to the matter in queſtion. True Royalty, or a Prerogative above the Inſolence of the Rabble, he accounts Tyranny, commending that Form of Authority, he cites out of Cæſar, that amongſt the ancient Galls, before they were Couquered by the Romans: The People had as great Authority over the Petty and Nominal Kings, as theſe ſhadows of Royalty had over the People.

104. Then gives he you three ſpecial Notes, or Marks of Tyranny; whereof the firſt is a forced Command over Subjects, when they ſubmit to them unwillingly, and merely by Conſtraint; the ſecond is, when they keep a Guard of Foreigners about their Perſons; and the laſt, when the Profit and Welfare of the People are not conſidered, but the Emolument and Arbitrary will of him that Reigns. By theſe, as ſo many Touch-ſtones he tries the Government, to ſee if it be true and Natural, or to diſcover the Sophiſtication, as he accounts it, which the Luſt and Ambition of ſome Men hath made. For the firſt he concludes, the Authority of the Kings of the Franks was not forced, or by conſtraint, becauſe the People had Sovereign power in chuſing and rejecting them at their Pleaſure. As to the ſecond worthy and infallible Mark, he will undertake to prove out of Gregory Turonenſis and Aimoinus, though he doth not doe it, that theſe Kings uſed no Guards about their Perſons: And for the third he has a ſufficient Argument to the contrary, that Matters were not ordered according to their Arbitrary Will, but for the good of the People, becauſe the chief Adminiſtration of this Franco Gallick Kingdom was in the publick and ſolemn Council of the Nation, which later Ages have called a Convention or Aſſembly of the three Eſtates.

105. To defer a little the matter of Fact, as to the Kings of the Franks, and omit Matharell's reply as too dilute, it will not be amiſs to try the Infallibility of theſe his Marks, and to compare them with his other Principles. The firſt either may be, or not be, and yet the Government may be exceeding good. For ſometimes the Commands of a Prince may be very reaſonable, his Maximes highly juſt, his Deſigns tend as well toward the defence of their Liberties, as his own Prerogative, and yet the People, or rather the prevalent Faction may not underſtand it: A matter which a very mean Hiſtorian may make evident by many particulars. On the other ſide it hath been found, that Monarchs who (to ſpeak to his Principles) neither neither could be elected by the People, nor (juſtly, and according to the Model of the Government of the Land) could be depoſed, have Reigned over the Subjects without any forced Command, any other (for the main) than to which without conſtraint or unwillingneſs they have ſubmitted. In this reſpect there are Nations, the Laws of which conſented to, or made by the People, both are againſt Election and Depoſition; and yet ſay the King can doe no wrong, acting according to the ſaid Laws, and Conſtitutions of theſe Kingdoms. The ſecond, or that of a foreign Guard is trivial; for moſt of theſe Uſurpers we meet with in ſtory, have ſeized on the Power, and maintained themſelves in it, by ſtanding Guards of their own Nations. And as to the work of this Touch-ſtone, ſcarcely is there at this preſent, any one Monarch or Sovereign Prince Elective or not Elective, who hath not theſe Protectours of his Perſon about him; a thing not denied to Vice-Roys, and very Generals of Armies. For the laſt we muſt ſay, it is a certain Mark of a Tyrant (though the Government according to Law eſtabliſhed, may not be Tyranny) when he acts all things according to his mere Luſt and Will, not conſidering the advantage, or diſadvantage of his People. But muſt needs every Prince, who is not merely Nominal as he would have him, and to be ſet up and kicked down at the Will and Pleaſure of the unconſtant multitude, needs act all things in this manner? No, a Prince may have as well too little as too much Power, to Protect himſelf and his Subjects from the violence of unreaſonable Men, and we may ſay, that without flattery to ſuch Princes, there both have been and are, who are neither Elected, neither can be depoſed by the People, but ſucceed by Inheritance, as proceeding from the Loins of their Anceſtours, who do not make their Luſt a Law, but propound the Good and Welfare of the People generally to themſelves in their Actings. When any otherwiſe diſpoſed do happen, the Men, not the Government is to be blamed; foraſmuch as Accidents, and ſuch things as do rarely fall out, are not to be reckoned on in ſuch Caſes.

* Ἐλέγοντο δὲ οἱ ἐκ τοῦ γένους ἐκείνου καταγόμενοι κριστάτοι, ὃ ἑρμηνεύεται τριχοραχάτοι. Εἶχον γὰρ κατὰ τῆς ῥάχεως αὐτῶν τρίχας ἐκφυομένας, ὡς χοῖροι.

106. Therefore as to the matter of Fact, we anſwer, that the ancient Kings of the Franks were not Elective but Hereditary, and yet their People willingly ſubmitted to them, not forced, nor by Conſtraint and Terrour. The Rules and Methods of their Government, were ſuch as the People approved, and generally they obſerved, and kept cloſe to them; when they did not, they blamed the Men, as we find, not the Ordinances and Cuſtoms of the Realm, as knowing that there will be Perſons of ſeveral Humours; and not any one Courſe of Adminiſtration can be found out, which will have no Inconveniences attending it. His deſign to Tax the Cuſtome of the Modern French Kings, in having a few Scots and Swiſſes for their Guards, is extremely ridiculous. What grand Feats of Tyranny could they atchieve in ſo great a Kingdom againſt ſuch multitudes, by ſo ſmall and inconſiderable a number? Hotoman had read how Piſiſtratus, Agathocles and other Tyrants of petty Cities or petty States, got ſome Troops of Satellites about them, ſufficient indeed, to awe and terrifie their fellow Citizens; and thence he preſently concludes, that where a few Souldiers Watch and Guard a Kings Perſon, though by reaſon of the ſmallneſs of their number, they cannot be fit for any conſiderable Attempt; yet they are a manifeſt ſign of Bondage and Tyranny. But the ancient Kings of the Franks, however he be ſo poſitive in affirming the contrary, were not without their Guards about them, no more than the Conſuls of Rome (not to ſpeak of the Dictatours or Emperours, for theſe perhaps with him were Tyrants) nor the leſſer ſorts of Magiſtrates, who had their Lictours with bundles of Rods and Hatchets. From Gregory Turonenſis the very Authour, he would wreſt to his purpoſe (but very inconſequently and ridiculouſly, as if becauſe a King doubles his Guards upon ſome imminent danger, he never had Guards before) it is evident, that Clodonæus had theſe Satellites and Guards about him: And if he, why not his Succeſſours in the Throne, upon the ſame Account; for the ſame Reaſons? That Clodonæus uſed ſuch Satellites Matharell doth well obſerve, to which we ſhall add this Obſervation farther, that thoſe whom Gregory calleth Satellites a little before in the ſame Chapter, he nameth Pueri, this word by Writers of theſe times, being uſed to expreſs ſuch kind of Attendants in general, who were uſually choſen out of young Men now called Pueri, in like manner, as when the Roman Tongue decayed, Infans came not onely to ſignifie a young Child, but a Son in general, though grown to Maturity, as at this day do Enfans and Infante in the French and Italian Tongues, and Infante a Kings Son in Spain and Portugal, as Infanta a Kings Daughter of any Age in both theſe Kingdoms. Now if Pueri and Satellites, when applicable to the Attendants about theſe Kings were the ſame, let any one who hath been Quod Satellites audientes & Deo gratias agentes, &c, l. 2. c. 37.

Maturantibus autem pueris & ad locum accedentibus, &c.

been Converſant in that Authour, but conſider how many times he ſpeaks of theſe Pueri, and conſequently of the Guards about their Perſons.

107. As for Hotoman's third and laſt Mark, we cloſe with him, that the ancient Kings of the Franks ruled not merely according to their Wills and Appetites; but we muſt needs differ from him, about the evidence or the reaſon of this our apprehenſion. For what we can gather from the ancient and faithfull Hiſtorians, we muſt ſay the bounds that were ſet to their Wills, were ſet by their Conſciences, and their Conſciences were regulated by the good Laws and Cuſtoms of their Countrey, which directed them in the Management of Affairs, but never awed them by the Terrour of Depoſing, nor by any Punctive or Coercive power, the People ought to exerciſe over their Perſons and Authority. But he is quite of another Opinion, he believes they did not rule merely after their own Wills and Appetites, becauſe they could not doe it, that they did not bite becauſe they had no Teeth, did not puſh becauſe they had no Horns, at leaſt but very ſhort ones; foraſmuch as they could doe nothing of Conſequence, nothing amounting to Empire and Sovereignty, but all this was to be tranſacted by the Convention of Eſtates, which he tells you every Year, met on the firſt of May. Here he admires the Wiſedom of his Anceſtours, and from this Rapture falls to an Enumeration of ſuch things as were handled and determined by the Sacroſanct Authority of this publick Council, as he words it. Theſe were no leſs, you muſt know, than electing or depoſing a King, which he is never weary of inculcating, determining about Peace or War, making Laws, beſtowing the greateſt Commands, Honours and Government, providing Patrimony for the Sons of the deceaſed Kings, and Portions for their Daughters, which by a German word they called Abannagium as an excluſory Part; in ſum, here were determined all thoſe things they vulgarly call matters of State, becauſe nothing that related intimately to the State or Commonwealth could legally be done any where, but in this Council. If the Caſe ſtood thus, the Kings were indeed but Idols of Wax or Puppets, which moved their Lips, Eyes and Hands, according as they had motion given them. But the boldneſs of his Aſſertion, quite over Balances the weight and Efficacy of his Arguments.

108. Indeed his Reaſons to ſpeak indifferently are very frivolous. The making and marring of Kings, he ſtrengthens by one other Teſtimony out of Aimoinus; but one ſo ridiculous, that we ſhame for him to produce it. This is, that Charles the Bald in a general Aſſembly held at Cariſiacum or Creſſy, girt his Son Charles with a Sword, and ſetting a Royal Crown on his Head, gave to him Neuſtria, and to Pipin Aquitain. A fit evidence to be joyned to thoſe he formerly made uſe of. A King is Crowned in a great Aſſembly of Nobles, and the common ſort, therefore the People elect him, and beſtow the Crown upon him, as their own Gift. It ſeems Charles their Father was the Oratour or Speaker of the Aſſembly, and how can you chuſe but believe that after a great debate, the Queſtion was put, and it was carried in the affirmative, that their ſaid Speaker Charles (who poſſibly had no Vote, neither as our Chancellours and Keepers have not in the Houſe of Lords, when they are not Peers themſelves) ſhould in their Name, and by Virtue of their Command, as their Miniſter ſolemnly inveſt them in their Royal Offices, which ſhould be but Conditional neither, held during Pleaſure, or at fartheſt, ſo long as they ſhould well demean themſelves therein, that is till this multitude ſhould ſay they did otherwiſe, for who I pray muſt Contradict them, if they affirmed a Wart to be an Horn? Almoſt as weak is the next that follows, about the ſaid Charles, now going to Rome, he held a general Aſſembly on the firſt of June at Compendium or Compeigne, where he ordained in certain Capitula, or Heads, after what manner his Son Lodowick, with thoſe were truſty to him and the Nobility of the Land, ſhould govern the Kingdom till his return. This he calls Inſigne Teſtimonium, concerning the power of this Council, in diſpoſing of the Kingdom; and judge, Reader what it amounts to. It is not ſaid, that they ordain in his Preſence, or together with him, but in the ſingular number: He ordains, uſing their Councils and Direction. But he ſubjoyns, that the Nobility finding Charles the Simple, by reaſon of his young Years uncapable to Govern, choſe Odo his Protectour or Guardian. Another wonderfull Teſtimony of the Peoples power in diſpoſing the Kingdom. If he was not able to Govern, ſome muſt; they offered not to depoſe him, and Elect another in his place. A Guardian he wanted; and he had not Judgement and Diſcretion enough to chuſe one himſelf; in ſuch a Caſe of neceſſity therefore, why might not they doe it for him?

Lib. 5. c. 17. Hic fœde memoria lapſus eſt Hotomanus, locus enim Aimoini eſt de Ludovico Imp. qui filium ſuum Carolum in hoc conventu armis virilibus id eſt Enſe cinxit.

Sect. 4.

109. As worthily doth our Authour diſcharge himſelf, in reference to the ſecond thing, wherein he aſſerts the ſupreme Power of this Council, and that is in the point of making Laws. Would not the Reader expect ſome ſuch Proofs as theſe. The Council by its own Authority enacted ſuch and ſuch things, ſuch Laws were made by the Council, the King not being at all conſidered therein, being unwilling, abſent or the like; theſe were ſome Foundations for ſuch high Confidence and Preſumption. But what think you is his Evidence? a certain place in Gagainus, which hath theſe words concerning St. Lewes, and you muſt mind them well. Lewes being come to Paris, and having aſſembled a general Convention, reformed the Commonwealth, excellent Laws being made concerning the diſtribution of Juſtice by the Judges, prohibiting the Sale of Offices with other matters. Behold here Lewes reformed the Commonwealth, how? By making Laws; for though it be ſaid, Statutis optimis Legibus, abſolutely without a reſtriction to his Perſon, yet it's ſaid, Habito generali Conventu, now who called and aſſembled the Meeting but himſelf? That in ſuch Meetings there uſed to be debated the making of Laws is moſt Evident, even in later times, when the Government was grown more highly Monarchical, as in Francis the Firſt, and Francis the Second's time, little more than one hundred Years ſince, ſuch a Deſign was ſet on Foot in the time of Francis the ſecond, and completed at Orleance, in the beginning of the Reign of Charles the Ninth, in a full Aſſembly of the Nobility, Eccleſiaſticks and inferiour ſort of Men, the product of which was a Book of Laws publiſhed the ſame Year; which work was renewed by the ſaid Charles ſeveral times after. But to ſay, that all the Power and Authority of making Laws remained with the Eſtates without the King is moſt abſurd. Certainly it's one thing for a matter to be Tranſacted or done in an Aſſembly, by its Council and Direction, another to be enacted and ordained by the ſole Virtue and Authority of ſuch a Meeting.

Cum Pariſium Ludovicus veniſſet Conventu generali habito, Rempub. reformavit, ſtatutis optimis Legibus de jure à Judicibus dicendo, & de Officiis non emendis, &c.

A. D. 1560.

A. D. 1566. & 1572.

110. If in any Authour, he can but find after his diligent ſearch any impudent Act, any Seditious and unlawfull Attempt, any Violence and Uſurpation committed by the People, or a party of the Nobility, he hath both the Logick and the Modeſty to argue from the Fact, to the Right and Authority of the Actours; with as good reaſon as from the Robberies of the Banditi, and the force they many times put upon the Inhabitants of the Countrey, he may conclude they have a Title to the Territories, and a Legitimate Sovereignty over thoſe Perſons, which are the Subjects of their Rapines. Becauſe Charles the Bald had diſcontented ſome of the Great ones, about the diſpoſing of Offices and Preferments, that is, had not preferred themſelves, they met together, they entred into a Conſpiracy againſt Lodowick his Son, who was to ſucceed, but after ſome Meſſages, ſent to and fro they agreed, and he was Conſecrated and Crowned by the Conſent of all, as well Abbats and Biſhops, as the Nobility of the Kingdom. That they mutined it appears, but that they themſelves had right to diſpoſe of Preferments appeareth no where. Neither can Hotoman conclude any thing we hope from this place, that they Elected him King, the words being that by their Conſent he was Conſecrated and Crowned, and that they ſware fealty to him. He received the Kingdom from his Father, concerning whom there is a paſſage in this very place he quotes, which Hotoman would not mention, and therefore we ſhall doe it for him. Before the Agreement fully concluded, and the Coronation, Richildis came to Lodowick to Compeigne, and thither brought him the Precept, whereby his Father before he died, had delivered up the Kingdom to him, together with the Sword of St. Peter as they called it, whereby he inveſted him in the Kingdom, and a Royal Robe, a Crown and Staff, or Sceptre, of Gold and pretious Stones: His Father it ſeems thought he could herewith inveſt him in the Kingdom before any Ceremony paſſed from the People. As much to his purpoſe, is what he cites out of the Appendix to the Hiſtory of Gregory concerning Clotair, his referring it to the Eſtates of Burgundy, to chuſe a Major of the Palace to ſucceed Warnhar. The Reader may remember, that the Burgundians had of their own accord ſhaken off the Yoke of Brunichild, and revolted to Clothair. In way of Gratitude, and to bind them to him he grants them this Privilege, and paſſeth this Complement, which had they had a Right to chuſe, it would have behoved them not to wave it; but they deſired to be excuſed, chuſing rather to live under his immediate Government, without ſuch an intervenient Miniſter.

Aimoinus, lib. 5. c. 36.

Attulit ei Præceptum per quod Pater ſuus illi Regnum ante mortem ſuam tradiderat: & Spatham quæ vocatur ſancti Petri, per quam eum de Regno inveſtiret; ſed & regium veſtimentum & coronam ac fuſtem ex auro & gemmis.

C. 54.

111. As little wonder is it, that in times of Contentions and Factions, thoſe that thought the Eſtates would be on their ſide, ſhould refer the matter in queſtion to the Determination of this Council, as Clothair did knowing Brunichild to be mortally hated by all the Nobility. Neither can we blame Charles the Great, if to ſecure to his Sons thoſe ſhares of the Empire he had deſigned them, he ſhould require the advice and conſent of the Eſtates, as that which would oblige them to Obey ſuch as they had received to be their Kings, and as a means to keep his Sons in Order, and hinder them from incroaching one upon another. From that ſingle example of Clothair, whereby to ſhun Odium, and the thought of Malice and Revenge, he referred the caſe of Brunechild to the Army and Nobility, (which he calls by the Name of this Council,) he fairly draws this General Concluſion; that it was a Cuſtome, if any Prince or great Perſon was accuſed of a Crime, to be arraigned before this Aſſembly. And from all put together, that the whole Government lay in this Aſſembly, which was called Placitum, becauſe after the cuſtome of the Latine Tongue that was properly ſo called, which after much deliberation was ſetled and agreed upon, as for Example, in Cicero and other ancient Writers we meet with Placita Philoſophorum. Hence he inforces that Conjecture which he had made in other Books he had formerly Written, that the common Form uſed by the King's Clerks at the end of Laws and Edicts, viz. Quia tale eſt Placitum noſtrum, had its Original from this Placitum whereof we ſpeak. This being written in Latine, (as he conjectures it appears from Aimoinus, the Capitulary of Charles the Great and other Monuments;) theſe Clerks or Scribes coming to uſe the Speech of the Countrey, by ignorance, or rather through an evil purpoſe turned it into this Expreſſion: Car tel eſt noſtre Plaiſir, For ſuch is our Pleaſure. That which confirms him in his Opinion is this. The People was interrogated concerning the Capitula or Heads to be added to the Laws, and after they had conſented, they confirmed them by Subſcriptions. Hence it appears, that the People were bound to no Laws but what they made themſelves. Laſtly, he obſerves again from one ſingle Teſtimony and inſtance and no more, that Foreign Princes were wont to refer their Controverſies to the Cogniſance and Determination of this Council, ſo great was its Fame and Authority.

Vide Appendic. ad Gregorii Turon. Hiſt. c. 37.

112. So great a Noiſe he made, for Noiſe it is conſiſting of words, which conclude nothing of that his Aſſertion, that the ſupreme Adminiſtration of affairs lay in this Aſſembly, which they did indeed call by the Name of Placitum. But as Matharell very well excepts againſt him, there's no need that the ordinary Form Cartel eſt noſtre plaiſir now uſed, ſhould at all be derived from this Placitum, but from the ancient cuſtome of Roman Emperours, Kings and Popes who generally uſed ſuch an Expreſſion at the end of their Edicts, to take away all doubt and Ambiguity. Juſtinian hath this expreſſion at the cloſe of his Conſtitutions. Quæ igitur placuerunt Nobis tua ſublimitas operi effectuique dare feſtinet; ſome times this: Quæ à Nobis diſpoſita ſunt, or Quæ igitur præclare Nobis & Religioni placuerunt; but Quæ placuerunt Nobis moſt commonly. Nay it's to be hoped ſo great a Lawyer as he could not affirm, that the Emperours of Rome held ſuch Placita wherein lay the ſupreme Adminiſtration, and without which they could neither make Laws, nor doe any thing elſe. But ſo great is his Deſign and Studium Partium in this matter, that one cannot but with admiration and diſdain perceive how right or wrong he drives all things in by Head and Shoulders. Surely he had never read, or he deeply diſſembles that place of Gregory Turonenſis, where he ſpeaks concerning Chilperick, who in his Edicts or Precepts ſent to the Judges added this Clauſe; if any ſhall Contemn our Commands, let him be puniſhed by pulling out his Eyes. He may anſwer us that this Chilperick was a Tyrant, or as Gregory calls him, the Nero and Herod of his time, and ſo indeed he is accounted by our Hiſtorians, but any one may ſee what was the reaſon, they were ſuch men as he was no Friend to; he complained they had got all the Revenues, and his Exchequer was poor, and ſuch Princes as he who have had the luck in theſe dark times to have their actions related and tranſmitted to Poſterity, by no other than Religious Perſons, are never well ſpoken of but rendred infamous, a thing which hath happened from Monkiſh Authours, to ſome Princes of our own Nation.

Conſtit. 2, 8, 11, 18, 19, 20, &c.

Si quis præcepta noſtra Contempſerit, oculorum avulſione mulctetur, lib. 6. c. ult.

113. But to make an end of this Controverſie as it's more than time, by peruſal of Gregory Aimoinus and others of thoſe ancient Writers, to any unbiaſſed and indifferent Reader it will appear, that the Meroningian Kings of the Franks had Jura Majeſtatis. Theſe are ſuch as theſe, Power of Peace and War, to make Laws, power to raiſe Money, and of Life and Death. The Wars of Clodonæus, of Theodorick, and in general of all thoſe that Conquered Gall, and made War in Italy and other Countries, nay, of Charles Martel who was no King, but the Prime Miniſter, or Majour of the Palace, ſufficiently evidences this thing, for who will ſhew us that it was done by a previent Vote or decree of this General Aſſembly, except he will ſay that when this preſent French King for example makes war in the Low Countries, becauſe his Nobility and Gentry accompany him in the Expedition, becauſe they do not refuſe to joyn with him, but ſerve him in this Employment, therefore Peace and War are in their power, and they are the General aſſembly or Placitum which hath the ſupreme Adminiſtration of Affairs; for this would well ſuite the way of Hotoman's Arguing, to be ſure, if the King ſhould make a Speech to them at the Head of his Troops, and they applaud his purpoſe, and incourage him to the Undertaking. For the power of making Laws, the famed Salick Laws no man hath yet ſaid to have been framed in a Placitum or aſſembly of the Eſtates, but by Wiſogaſt and his few Companions. If the Kings could make Laws for raiſing of Money and payment of Tribute, certainly they might do it in other Caſes; Clothair required the third part of the Fruits of the Grounds, even to be paid by Churches. And we find that Chilperick laid new Taxes upon the Subject, and ſeveral ſorts of ways increaſed the former Revenues of his Crown. He is blamed for this by the Hiſtorians, and we are told it cauſed a Mutiny, but what was the reaſon, viz. the exceſſive burthen he laid upon the People. Every Arepennis or half an Acre of Land muſt pay an Amphora of Wine. Gregory tells us, if he tell true, the Impoſitions were ſo great they could not be born. The thing that offended was the quantity, not the Impoſition it ſelf, not the Authority; they do not complain that he broke the Laws of Government, that he uſurped the Power which belonged to the Placitum or the aſſembly of Eſtates, that he took that upon him which his Predeceſſours never challenged, and the Laws forbade, but his Impoſitions were heavy and could not be endured.

Denique Clotharius Rex indixerat ut omnes Eccleſiæ Regni ſui tertiam partem fructuum fiſco diſſolverent, Gregor. lib. 4. c. 1. Idem Aimoinus, lib. 2. c. 17.

Statutum enim fuerat, ut poſſeſſor de propria terra unam amphoram vini per Aripennem redderet. Sed & aliæ functiones infligebantur multæ tam de reliquis terris quam de mancipiis: quod impleri non poterant. Gregor. l. 5. c. 27.

114. The like is objected as to the Puniſhments inflicted by him, not that he did punire or take the cogniſance of the caſe to himſelf, but injuſtè punire, and that for to ſeize on the Goods of the Perſons condemned. Nothing is more ordinary than to meet with examples of this kind, how not onely he but all the other Kings of the Meroningian Family, before ſuch time as the Majors of the Palace came to uſurp the Government, took this Power of Condemning or abſolving, Puniſhing or Pardoning at their own Wills or Diſcretions. When they did without cauſe, as Guntran, put to Death his beſt Servant, then are they blamed, but never for taking the Authority of the thing it ſelf, of depriving men of their Lives or Eſtates, when the Parties deſerved it. The moſt wary of them conſidering what a matter of weight the Life of a Man and the ruine of a Family is, were wont to call to their aſſiſtence, their Nobility or attendants to ſift out the matter, and give their advice for a more certain and juſt way of proceeding, it being indeed a very hard and dangerous practice for one man to aſſume the Cogniſance of matters relating to Life and Death alone. So the Tryal of Injurioſus about killing of a certain Jew his Creditour was held before King Childebert, and this was called Placitum, as indeed any meeting in General, as the Treaty betwixt Guntran and his Nephew Childebert is called by this very name. So doth Aimoinus uſe it to ſignifie a Colloquy or Treaty betwixt Clodonæus and the Goths, and an Enterview, Debate, or Colloquy betwixt the ſaid Guntran and his Nephew Childebert. The firſt time we meet with it in him when it ſignifies an aſſembly of the Eſtates, is when Dagobert ſummoned a General aſſembly together for making of his Teſtament. The cauſe was not that he could not make it himſelf without their authority, but as he tells them, that he alone might not applaud himſelf. He had already determined and reſolved what to doe, but he would have it ſigned not onely with his own Hand, but thoſe of his two Sons, whom this day ſaith he in ſo many words I make and ordain Kings, and by the Hands of the Biſhops alſo and Princes. Now Hotoman will not ſay the Subſcription of the Sons of the Kings was neceſſary, to eſtabliſh or enact a thing in the Aſſembly. Yet this he requires eſpecially and for this reaſon, that he was afraid after his Death his two Sons would endeavour to invalidate his Will. There lay his fear, therefore he conjures them to keep it inviolable, as they ſhould expect the like Duty and Obedience from their Succeſſours. No arguments, no perſwaſions doth he uſe to the Aſſembly, as having ſummoned it to give Countenance to the thing, the better to keep his Sons to their preſent promiſe and Ingagement.

Vide lib. 8. c. 36. in caſu Magnovaldis juſſu Regis interfecti. & lib. 9. c. 35. de filiô Waddonis qui à Rege obtinuit res patris.

Vide etiam lib. 10. ejuſdem Gregorii de caſu Chuldericí Saxonis qui à Rege auditis ejus improbitatibus juſſus eſt interfici.

Greg. Turon. lib. 7. c. 23.

Lib. 1. c. 20.

Lib. 3. c. 57. & c. 61.

Lib. 4. c. 30. ut de iis quæ pro remedio animæ meæ agere inſtitui, non ego ſolus mihi applauderem. Conſtitui etiam fieri uno tenore exemplaria & ea manibus ſubter firmare, non tantum meis ſed etiam filiorum meorum Sigeberti ac Hludovici, quos hodie Reges Conſtituo, veſtris quoque qui eſtis Sanctiſſimi Pontifices, nec non gentis noſtræ Principes. Pater filios Reges Conſtituit non itaque electus eſt à Populo Clodonæus vel Hlodovicus, quamvis Hotomanus hoc affirmet, quomodo vero probati pulchre ſcil. ex iſtis Append. Verbis Omneſque Laudes eum in Maſolana villa ſublimant in Regem. euge.

115. Indeed before this we find in the ſame Authour mention made of a Convention of the Nobility of the Franks, but not by the name of Placitum. This Clothair the Son of Chilperick adviſed Brunichild to ſummon to debate the matter of Succeſſion, having held Intelligence with them, and knowing moſt certainly they would be at his Devotion, and therefore he would make them Umpires in the caſe, not that by any right and authority they were ſo, neither do we find that ſhe owned or followed his advice. Not long after this time, I am verily of the opinion that thoſe Aſſemblies began to be things of courſe. Of the yearly Placita or Conventions of the Eſtates in Gregory Turonenſis not one word is to be found; neither can it be perceived by him that the Placita were held of courſe, but onely as occaſion required the Kings ſummoned theſe Conventions. Towards the decay of the Monarchy they came into faſhion, when the Majors of the Palace to gain more Power, ſought to pleaſe the Nobility by referring matters to their Cogniſance, and determination. The firſt hint we have out of Aimoinus that they were Annual, is given upon occaſion of the Saxons, whom Pipin having brought to terms; cauſed them to ingage to preſent every year three hundred Horſes at the General meeting. Pipin to obtain the Crown which he ſo much longed for, omitted nothing to court the People, and having once obtained it, that it migh ſit faſt upon his Head and thoſe of his Succeſſours, thought it ſafeſt to follow ſtill on the ſame courſe. So did his Son Charles, to prevent Seditions during his abſence in Saxony, Italy and other places, knowing very well that he was an Emperour of the firſt, and a King but of the ſecond Head. After his Death moſt grievous Troubles aroſe, through the differences and Wars of his Poſterity, Æmulation betwixt Competitours ever producing this Effect, that People gain and the Crown loſes, while every one that contends for it, is glad to make Friends and part with one or more Flowers of it, to purchaſe a quiet Poſſeſſion of the reſt, through the favour and aſſiſtence of the Eſtates. This gave incouragement to theſe Aſſemblies, to take ſtill more upon them, and the differences, through their ſidings and bandyings, of Charles his Poſterity came to ſuch height as to give incouragement to Hugh Capet a man of another Extract to ſet up for himſelf, there being none thought worthy to Reign that remained of the Carloningians, who were thus puniſhed in their kind, for their Uſurpation and Revolt from the Meroningian Line.

Idem ibid. c. 1.

Coegitque ut promitterent ſe omnem voluntatem illius eſſe facturos & annis ſingulis honoris cauſa, ad generalem conventum equos trecentos pro munere daturos. Lib. 4. c. 64.

116. Thus did the uſe and Authority of this Placitum or Aſſembly of Eſtates ariſe and increaſe, through the diminution of the Royal Authority, the ambition of the Majors of the Palace, the Uſurpation of Pipin, and the Judgments which enſued upon his Family. But from particular extravagant and illegal actions Hotoman would draw general Concluſions; So weak are his Arguments, and ſo palpable his Deſign, that his Book upon a ſevere examination, can hardly eſcape the cenſure of a Libell, which Name by certain Perſons is thought moſt fit to be conferred on it, and they confirm to us the truth of what Cujacius, that great Lawyer paſſed upon his Works, that they do Scutica indigere, need ſomething fit to chaſtiſe and correct them. A very learned Lawyer indeed he was, but addicted to a Party which was too fruitfull in this kind, and about the ſame time brought forth ſeveral ſuch Brats as this, for inſtance, Junius Brutus, and the Treatiſe De Jure Regni apud Scotos, forged doubtleſs upon the ſame Anvil, though not perhaps by the ſame hands, which ſufficiently betray the extraordinary Heat and turbulent Humour of the Contrivers; what he farther Writes concerning the Majors of the Palace in part we muſt approve, and in part reject: That they came up but towards the latter end of the Reign of the Meroningians is certain, I mean to that Power and Dignity which they uſurped. For towards Clodonæus his days, who hears any thing of ſuch an Officer? and in the very Reign of Lotharius and Childebert, where have we any mention of theſe Majors, except by the bye upon occaſion of ſome other thing, for they were then but Domeſticks and Officers in the Palace?

Franci ut plurimum non Meroningorum modo, ſed & Carolingorum adhuc temporibus ſemita idiomatis ſui ad Latinitatem nonnihil inflexi indole hoc Placitum etiam Mallum vocârunt: Hic notandum quod Dani quorum ſermo Dialecto tantum à Theutonum idiomate differt, vocem Maul non tantum pro Convivio ut Germani & Belgæ, nos etiam Angli (nam Meal hoc ſenſu utimur) ſed pro idiomate ſine ſermone quoque uſurpant. Ipſis Theutonibus Malthen erat dicere ac ſermocinari. Franci hodierni non abs re itaque Parlamentum nuncupant. Belgicum Maul & Maultidt & noſtrum Mealſmeat pro convivio & convivendi tempore ab eodem mallo dimanaſſe haud ambigendum, cum ſermo & confabulatio convivii quaſi coagulum & vita ſit. Hinc quoque exiſtimat & quidem non abſque ratione Pontanus quod noſterioribus exinde poſt Carolum M. ſeculis hujuſmodi Imperialia colloquia conventuſque apud Germanos Diata cœperint nominari.

117. Therefore do we find that their Dignity and Place was inferiour to that of a Biſhop, as appears from Gregory Turonenſis in the caſe of Badechiſil, who from a Major of the Palace was preferred to that Sacred Function, and from the ſame Authour it is evident, that not onely Kings but Queens alſo had ſuch Officers, as had Bogundis whom Waddo ſerved in this capacity. Hotoman obſerves out of Hiſto-

Gregor. lib. 9. c. 27.

ry, that beſides this they had ſeveral other Names or Titles, being called Magiſtri Regii Palatii, Præfecti Aulæ, Comites, and Comites Domus Regiæ. But as he is out in comparing them for the Nature of their Office to the Præfecti Prætorio of the Romans, ſo in this alſo that he makes the Major Domus, and the Comes Palatii to be the ſame. For Gregory makes mention of Florentianus the Major Domus Regiæ, and of Romulfus the Comes Palatii, both which were ſent by King Childebert at the Invitation of Meroneus the Biſhop into Poictou. About the time of Clothair the Second, they began to aſpire after an extravagant Power, and the careleſneſs of ſome Princes gave them opportunity to increaſe it to that grandeur, at which at laſt it arrived. Yet were not all the Kings of the Meroningian Race, in general, ſuch Sots as Eginhart the Chancellour of Charles the Great, (and from him Sigebert) out of flattery to his Maſter, and to palliate the Treaſon of Pipin would make them, witneſs the great things atchieved by them againſt the Romans, Alemans, Goths and other Nations before ever theſe Majors were heard of. As I hinted before, the Authority of the Placitum or General Aſſembly increaſed with theirs, as well that of the one as the other being not heard of till later times, whatever Sigebert Writes that once a year on the firſt of May, the Kings were wont to ſhew themſelves to the People, to ſalute and be ſaluted by them. They found it a good expedient to preſerve and increaſe their Power thus to cajoll the People; then Pipin concluded that as naturally things are preſerved the ſame way they are obtained, it was convenient to uſe the ſame means for keeping the Crown on his Head, which he had ſerved himſelf of in the ſetting of it on; and what in him and his Son Charles was highly convenient, the Diſſentions and Quarrels of their Poſterity did afterward render as highly neceſſary.

Lib. 9. c. 30.

118. To underſtand yet more fully the Polity of the ancient Franks, to that of the Kings and Majors of the Palace, we muſt add the knowledge of the Dukes and Counts, a Subject proper to have been conſidered by Hotoman in his Franco Gallia, but that he could find nothing in it fit to drive on his great Deſign. That Duces were Generals of Armies amongſt the Romans, and afterward Commanded Forces upon the Borders, we have already ſufficiently diſcovered. After the Goths had ſeized upon part of Gall, although deadly Enemies to the Romans, yet did they not much alter the State of the Provinces, ſetting after their Example Dukes over the Provinces, and Counts over the General Cities. So do we find that King Eurick appointed Victorius to be Duke over ſeven Cities and the Arverni: And about the ſame time we find that Marſeilles was under the Government of a Count, mentioned by Sidonius upon a particular occaſion. Afterwards we find Goianius and Timotheus famous upon this account, that the Breviary of Theodoſius his Code being finiſhed, Alarick ſent it unto them to be made uſe of in Adminiſtration of Juſtice, as appears by the Commonitory prefixed to the Work. In like manner the Franks having vanquiſhed the Romans, Goths and Burgundians, and become Lords of Gall, did not change the State and Polity of the Provinces, as they found them framed by the Romans. They neither aboliſhed the uſe of Dukes nor Counts, leſt by a new poſture of things they ſhould diſcontent and alienate the affections of the Provincials, but on the contrary accommodated themſelves to the Roman Cuſtoms, as both Procopius and Agathias do teſtifie, and thereby though Conquerours ſubmitted to the Conquered. Neither can this ſeem ſtrange, for the Franks ſerving in the Wars, and being in the Satellitium of Guard of the Emperours, had ſufficient opportunity to make the Cuſtomes of the Romans familiar to them; Ammainus, as we have formerly ſhewn, witneſſing that a multitude of them flouriſhed in the Court, and Gregory Turonenſis confirming this to us by this paſſage, that Valentinian being ſhut up in a private Houſe of Vienna, and almoſt reduced to the State of a private Man, the care of the Militia was committed to the Franks, who were Satellites or of the Guard about him.

Dukes.

Counts.

Gregor. Turon. lib. 2. c. 20.

Lib. 7. Ep. 17.

Lib. 15.

Lib. 1. c. 9.

119. The Franks as they found ſo continued thoſe of Dukes and Counts, and that from the firſt founding of their Kingdom in Gall, for Aimoinus makes mention of Winomadus a Duke under Childerick, and of Aurelian under Clodonæus, to whom the Kingdom of Milidunum was delivered. From the beginning of this Sovereignty of the Franks, this was the difference betwixt Dukes and Counts; that Dukes had the Command of many Cities, or of particular Provinces, whereas the Counts ruled the particular Cities or parts of Provinces. This is ſo evident from * Gregory Turonenſis, that nothing can be more; and thence came it that Counts are † compared to Biſhops in Dignity, and Dukes to Arch-Biſhops. The Power of Dukes was larger than that of Counts, but their Office and Duty was the ſame for ſubſtance.

The difference betwixt Dukes and Counts in their Power, Duty and Office.

* Conferto l. 8. c. 18. & 26. l. 9. c. 7. cum l. 6. c. 26.

† Walafridus Strabo de Reb. Eccleſ. c. 31.

ſtance. Dukes had charge of matters || concerning War, and gave Order out to the Counts concerning the levying of Forces. It was incumbent upon * both Dukes and Counts, to fortifie and protect the Cities and Places under their charge. In times of Peace Dukes precided in hearing † and deſiding Controverſies. Thence is it that in the form of the Office of a Duke extant in Marculſus the Monk, it's required that ſuch an one Govern the People committed to his truſt, whether Franks, Romans, or Burgundians, according to the Laws and Cuſtoms of each Nation. || Dukes alſo took care of the yearly Tributes of the Provinces, as did the * Preſidents and Governours of Provinces amongſt the Romans. Such as anſwered not to the Summons to the War, the Counts † puniſhed. In Peace alſo they were employed as well as Dukes in || Adminiſtation of Juſtice. It was their concern to have * the Province kept in quiet, to take care alſo of the † Tributes and publick Revenues, in which Employment they uſed the Miniſtery and aſſiſtence of their Vicarii or Vicars.

|| Vide Gregor. l. 7. c. 7.

* Lib. 6. c. 41.

† Juſtitiam pauper nunquam te Judice perdit, Nec poterit pretio vertere vera potens. Sic Fortunatus ad Bodeſigilum Ducem Maſſiliæ.

|| Marculfus.

* Cod. de Præfect. Ægypti § 1.

† Biturigum quoque Comes miſit pueros ſuos ut in domo B. Martini, &c.

|| Gregorium Vide, lib. 8. c. 18. & l. 10. c. 6. Eundem de miraculis Sanctorum, l. 2. c. 16. Fortunatum, l. 10. c. 2. Concilium Vernenſe c. 23. Cabillonenſe Secundum, c. 21. & Triburienſe, c. 9.

* Lib. 5. c. 15.

† Gregor. paſſim.

Vicarii, Centenarii, Decani.

120. For the * Vicarii were their Deputies, as were alſo the † Centenarii and || Scabinei or Decani, in the leſſer Towns or Villages, the Count's Pagus, Place of his Juriſdiction or County, being divided into Vicariæ, Centenæ and Decaniæ. Farther, let the Reader take notice theſe ſeveral Counties and Provinces alſo made up the Miſſatici or Miſſatica, which were certain Regions or Tracts, through which certain Miniſters of Princes from their ſending called Miſſi, were diſpatched abroad and diſtributed. From theſe Miſſi came the Title of Commiſſarii, and they were of ſeveral ſorts. As Miſſi Dominici, who were extraordinary Commiſſioners, ſent by the Prince into divers parts of the Kingdom for Adminiſtration of Juſtice. Miſſi diſcurrentes who were ſent into the Provinces for diſpatch of ſome particular Affair, and ſo called becauſe they ſtaid not in their Miſſatica, as did the Miſſi Dominici, but having diſpatched their buſineſs, quickly returned, moſt like to our Juſtices of Aſſize. Charles the Bald diſtributed all his Kingdom, (except Aquitain which was Governed apart, and Britannia Aremorica which had lately Rebelled,) into twelve of theſe Regions or Miſſatici, and in theſe inſtituted ſo many Colleges of Miſſi Dominici, whereof each according to the cuſtome had one or two Biſhops belonging to it, as alſo one Abbat and one Count, or more of each ſort as the caſe required. For example, in the third Miſſaticum of theſe are theſe Pagi to be taken notice of by the Inhabitants of the Low Countries: Noviomiſus or rather Noviomenſis, now Nogonnois, Vermandiſus Vermandois, Advertiſus Artois, Curtriciſus Courtray, and Flandrenſis Flandres. Of the Cortoriacenſes the Notitia Imperii maketh mention, and of Flanders Ludovicus Pius in the diviſion which he made of his Kingdom amongſt his Sons, and is extant in Pithæus his Collections.

Miſſi.

* Vide Capitular. Caroli M. l. 2. c. 28. & Concil. Arelat. quarti, c. 23.

† Tales etiam Tungini erant. Sal. leg. tit. 48. Hoc obſervare Convenit, ut Tunginus vel Centenarius mallum indicet. Gloſſ. vet. Tunginus qui poſt Comitem eſt, dictus forte à Ting, quod forum Judiciale olim Germanis & nunc adhuc Danis ſignificat.

|| Gloſſ. latino. Thootis. Judex Scepeno. Quæ hodiéque vox eadem adhuc notione apud Germanos Belgáſque uſitata retinetur. Nec aliunde Francorum Eſchevius deducuntur.

121. But to return to the Counts, the cogniſance of more weighty cauſes belonged to them, and thoſe of the leſſer to the Vicars and Centenaries. For ſome reaſon therefore are theſe Vicars of Counts and Centenarii compared to Parochial Presbyters, which held Baptiſmal Churches, and commanded the inferiour ſort of Prieſts, by Walafridus Strabo. The Dignity of a Count was a ſtep to the promotion of a Duke, which was accounted the Top or higheſt pitch of his Preferment. That the Ducatus or Dukedom contained ſeveral Comitatus or Counties is certain, but how many is not agreed on by Learned Men. Pithæus reckons no fewer than twelve, as neceſſary to the making up of a Dukedom, and herein he follows the Annals of Pipin, and Aimoinus which inform that the ſaid Pipin gave to Griffo his Brother after he was taken Priſoner, twelve Counties and this was according to the cuſtome of Dukes. But others contend that the Number was varied according to the pleaſure of the Prince, neither was the account of Dukedoms certain in this reſpect, as almoſt an infinite Number of places in Gregory Turonenſis, do abundantly teſtifie which ſeldom aſſign more than three or four Counties to a Dukedom, and conclude nothing certain. Bignonius that he may not contradict Aimoinus, very cautiouſly would fix this cuſtome of twelve Counties upon the Reign or Age of Pipin as peculiar to it. But Alteſerra doubts not to affirm, that theſe words Ducum more, according to the cuſtome of Dukes, are a Comment of the unskilfull Monk, there appearing in this Age not any one Footſtep of ſuch a Cuſtome. Nay this ſame Authour acknowledges, that in the next following Age of Ludovicus Pius, the Dukedom of Forum Julii or Friuli was divided into four Counties. Or Aimoinus might be deceived by the Conſtitution of Pelagius the Second, which

A Dukedom what.

Vide Capitular. Caroli M. l. 3. c. 79. & Sangallenſem de geſtis ejuſd. Caroli. l. 1. c. 31.

C. ult.

1 Advers. 8.

Auton. Dadinus Alteſerra in libro de Ducibus & Comitibus Provincialibus Galliæ.

Lib. 5. c. 12.

gives ten or eleven Cities to a Province, whereupon he might think a Dukedom was to conſiſt of ſo many, or one more. But he ought to have obſerved, that a Province was here deſigned, rather according to the Eccleſiaſtical than Civil form, and that in Gall the meaſure of Dukedoms was as has been ſaid, in no place certain.

122. At firſt the Duration of the Offices of theſe Dukes and Counts was various, limited onely by the Will and good Pleaſure of the King to a certain time. This is abundantly evident from Gregory Turonenſis, as well as others, who has frequently theſe forms of Speech, ex Duce, ex Comite, ex Vicario, ſignifying thoſe who formerly diſcharged ſuch Employments; but now were ſuperſeded. It were needleſs to reckon up thoſe many, which by Name we could mention to have been made Dukes and Counts of ſuch and ſuch particular places. In Caſe any one died in his Employment, the Prince appointed him his Succeſſour whom he pleaſed, ſo Charles the Bald beſtowed the Honours of Gerard Count of the Biturices, upon Boſo the Brother of his Wife Richildis, and Ludovicus Balbus diſtributed the Employments of Bernard the Marqueſs of Gothia. The firſt that began to Change this Courſe, and to take more upon him, was Bernard the Duke of Septimania, catching hold of the opportunity preſented him by the War which then raged betwixt Lotharius and his Brothers, Charles and Lodowick. Confident in his own ſtrength, he ſate as an indifferent Perſon and looker on, and then by his Son William recommending himſelf to Charles the Bald the Conquerour, required that his place and Honours he had in Burgundy, might be confirmed and ſettled on him. Afterward the Authority and Empire of the ſecond Race, or the Carloningi declining, and Charles the ſimple Reigning but precariouſly in reſpect of his Age, our Provincial Dukes and Counts began to Challenge their Governments by way of Dominion and Propriety, and tranſmitting them to their Heirs, made the Kings Vaſſi to be their Vaſſalls.

Their Honours during Pleaſure.

De Leudaſte Comite Turonenſi: Tu verò Ducatum totius Regni ejus annis quinque tenebis, l. 5. c. 14. Vide etiam, l. 9. c. 7. l. 4. c. 36. &c.

Vide Alteſerram ubi ſuprà, cap. 5.

Continuator Aimoini, l. 5. c. 27.

Idem ibid. c. 37.

Nithard. l. 3.

123. After this manner did Robert ſucceed Odo his Brother in the Dukedom of the Franks, and becauſe ſome part of the Principality which Odo had held before he was choſen King was not reſtored to him, he began to conſpire againſt Charles the Bald, and affect the Kingdom. In like manner Richard the Duke of Burgundy had for Succeſſour Rodulph his Son, and Herbert Count of Vermandois his Son of the ſame Name with himſelf. This now was univerſally Challenged as a thing of Right, but ſuch as were more dutifull to their Kings, when they divided their Governments amongſt their Children, would deſire their Conſent to the Diſtribution. So in Regino we reade, that Uto the Count at his Death, whatſoever Preferment or Governments he had by Permiſſion of the King, he divided as an Inheritance amongſt his Sons. About the ſame time ſeven Dukes or Provincial Counts, raiſed themſelves to the Power of ſo many petty Princes or Reguli, as the Duke of the Franks, the Count of Paris, the Dukes of Burgundy, Normandy and Aquitain, the Counts of Flanders, Champaigne and Tolouſe, who in a manner contended with the Kings for Dignity, and by their Ambaſſadours would diſpute with them as upon even Ground. At length Hugh Capet, having ſeized the Sovereignty, in ſome meaſure made up the Breaches of the Kingdom, but very cautiouſly like a prudent Phyſician gently handling theſe great and feſtered Wounds of the Common-wealth. Accommodating himſelf to the times, he let paſs ſuch as had been of longer Continuance, leſt he ſhould diſcover his own weakneſs, and made them with the other leſſer Feuda, as perpetual and Hereditary, reſerving to himſelf and Succeſſours the Sovereign Juriſdiction, Allegiance and Military Services. By this Agreement and League, as it were, the Face of a Kingdom was reſtored, and the Dukes and Counts became faithfull and obedient; but yet the Majeſty of the Kingdom recovered not, till ſome time after, theſe Noblemen retaining the Regalia or Royal Privileges, which during the Diſturbances they had uſurped. What theſe Regalia were it's too long for us to inſert, and the Reader may have abundant Satisfaction out of Alteſerra. Thus much at preſent we obſerve, that contrary to the Aſſertions of Hotoman, the Power of the Meroningians was free and uncontrolled; thoſe Dukes and Counts being wholly at their Devotion. And that the Wars, Seditions and Changes of Government which followed, brought forth theſe Extravagancies and Innovations for which he pleadeth.

Aimoini Continuator, l. 5. c. 41. Willielm. Gemitic. l. 8. c. 26.

Ad. A. D. 940.

Vide Frodoardum in Chronic. ad Ann. 924.

124. To omit the Seneſcallus & Comes ſtabuli, as Officers conſiderable onely in latter Ages, and ſo not proper to our preſent Work, as neither to this Diſquiſition tending to the diſcovery of the Polity and Government of the ancient Franks, we ſhall after the Governours, inform the Reader a little concerning the Ranks and Diſtinctions of the People. They were diſtinguiſhed into Edelingi, Frilingi and

Laſſi,

Sed vide ſuprà Paragr. 71.

The People are diſtinguiſhed into;

Laſſi, as were the Saxons their Neighbours. The Edelingi were the Nobility, Edel, Ethel and Etheling in the Teutonick, and our ancient Engliſh Saxon Tongue ſignifying Noble. Of theſe Edelingi mention is made in the Rythmes, Compoſed in the true and ancient French Language, ſent to King Ludovicus, and in the Offridian verſion of the Goſpel. Marculfus the Monk, who lived about the Reign of Dagobert, A. D. 660. mentions the order of the Nobility, and ſhews how Biſhops were wont to be Elected out of it, which is obſervable alſo in Sidonius, and Gregorius Turonenſis. The Frilingi were ſo named, becauſe they were Fry, or as we ſay Freemen, anſwering to our Teomen, as did the Ethelingi to our Edelmen, Noble or Gentlemen; and of them mention is often made in the Laws of the Franks. The Laſſi were Slaves, or rather anſwered fully to our Villains, who Tilled the Ground as Hirelings, and Tributaries to the Condition of which, that of the old Lacedemonian Helotæ, and the preſent French Peaſants doth much anſwer. Such of theſe as were Manumitted or ſet Free, were termed Frilaſſi, or in their own Language Frigelaſſene, concerning which the Reader may ſee enough in the Formulæ of Marculfus, and the Notes of Hieronymus Bignonius upon them, who obſerves, that there were three ſorts of theſe Manumiſſions, or three ſeveral ways they were made Free. One was by a Denarius or piece of Money, another was in the Church, and a third by a Paper or a private Letter, concerning which we have abundant Satisfaction from the Salick Laws, Gregory Turonenſis, and the Formulæ of Bignonius and Pithæus. Beſides theſe Laſſi, in Writers of the ſame Age we meet with Liti, who are thought to have been a ſort of Villains alſo little different from the other, except in this, that they parted with their Freedom for Money.

Edelingi.

Frilingi.

Laſſi.

Liti.

Formular. l. 1. c. 5.

Pontana. Orig. Franc. l. 6. c. 15.

125. Something we muſt add concerning their Laws, and then it will be more than time to diſmiſs our Franks. And to fetch things a little higher in reference to Gall it ſelf, we muſt know that the Conquerours were not onely wont to impoſe their Language, but their Laws, alſo upon the Conquered. Therefore as Livy tells us, the Crotoniatæ refuſing to ſubmit to the Dominion of the Brutii affirmed, they would rather dye, than mixing and imbodying themſelves with them, they would exchange their own for the Cuſtoms, Rites, Laws and Language of Strangers. The Romans uſing the political Courſe impoſed not onely Tributes and their Language, but their Laws and Magiſtrates, upon thoſe they had once reduced under their Subjection; whereupon their Law, called the Civil Law by way of Excellency, was propagated together with their Empire through all Quarters, and the Provincials ſtudied it, as their greateſt Comfort, as that to which of neceſſity they muſt have Recourſe. The firſt part of Gall, which received this Law in this manner, was Gallia Narbonenſis called formerly Bracchata, which being Conquered by Fabius Maximus had the Jus Italicum beſtowed upon it with Immunity from Tribute: Many of the beſt Inhabitants were taken into the Senate before the time of Auguſtus, and from the Privilege it received of wearing the Roman Gown, it obtained alſo the Name of Gallia Togata. Moreover Aquitain, the Daulphinate and Savoy were Provinces before Julius Cæſar, and all of them received the Roman Laws, being governed by Preſidents and Proconſuls, as long as till the Reign of Honorius the Emperour, who gave up his Right in them to Athaulphus the Goth. At length all Gall being Conquered by Cæſar, followed this Example. This appears firſt from the Anſwers, which the Emperours returned to the Preſidents of the Provinces, who conſulted them upon occaſion yet extant in our Law Books. Secondly from this, that the Youth of Gall frequently reſorted to Rome, there to ſtudy the Law, as appears from Rutilius, Sidonius, and Altiſſiodorenſis and others, who inſtance in Palladius, Eutropius, Germanus and the like. Thirdly, the new Conſtitutions of Princes were wont to be publiſhed at the Tribunals of the Judges in Gall, and entred amongſt their Records. And laſtly from Zozimus it appears, that at the Declenſion of the Empire, Britain, and ſome Provinces of Gall having by their own ſtrength cleared themſelves of the Germans, without the Aſſiſtence of the Romans, rejected their Laws, and returned again to their own Cuſtoms. Hence it is evident, that Gall with the Empire received the Law of Rome, although ſome Free Cities were permitted at firſt to live according to their own Cuſtoms. As were the Arverni and Rutæni by order of the Roman People, the Hedei and Atrubetes by Cæſar: the Maſſilienſes alſo retained their old Laws and Cuſtoms, whereof ſome Footſteps remain in Strabo, Valerius Maximus and others. The firſt Roman Lawyer that Gall ſaw after Cæſar's Invaſion was Trebatius, with whom Cicero makes himſelf very Merry.

The Civil Law impoſed on them by the Romans.

Lib. 24.

In Panegyr. ad Origen.
Gregorius Thaumaturgus Ep. Neocæſarienſis magnum id Viaticum eſſe prædicat, μέγιστον ἐφόδιον τὴν μάθησιν τῶν νόμων. Et Gregor. Nazianzenus ait. Ῥωμαίων μὲν νόμων μηδενὶ ἀγνοεῖν ἐξεῖναι. Orat. 21.

Ut l. milites D. de cuſtod. Reor. l. Spadonem §. Imp. D. de excuſ. Tutel. l. 2. c. de municip. & Originar.

Lib. 1. Itiner.
Lib. 1. ep. 6.
Lib. 1. de vita Sancti Germani
Philoſtratus de vita Apollonii l 7. c. 17.
Auguſtin. Confeſſ. l. 6. c. 8. de Alipio.
Sidonius ad Nammatium l. 8. ep. 6.
L. 6. p. 827.
Cæſar de bell. Gall. l. 1. c. 10.
Idem c. 10.
Idem, ibid. l. 7. c. 14.
Lib. 7. epp. 10, & 16.

126. The

Sect. 4.

126. The Roman Empire going to Ruine, and the Goths having ſeized on Aquitain, with the Province of Narbon, they indeavoured to remove, as other Marks of the Roman Dominion, ſo alſo that of the Laws. But in reſpect of the Laws, the Provincials deſpiſed them, keeping to thoſe of Theodoſius, and raiſed heavy Complaints againſt Seronatus the Prefect of Gall, as treading upon thoſe of Rome, and Conſpiring with the Goths for their Extirpation. At length Alaricus the laſt King of theſe Goths, perceiving the Minds of the People ſo addicted to the Laws of Theodoſius, that there was no hope of bringing them to have any Guſto of the Gothick, cauſed a Breviary of Theodoſius his Code, to be Compoſed by ſome Select Perſons, and to be publiſhed by Anianus his Chancellour; and leſt he ſhould diminiſh his own Majeſty, by admitting this Foreign Law, made it his own as appears by the Commonitory to Timotheus the Count prefixed to it. This Alarick being ſlain, Aquitain with part of the Province of Narbon, was ſubdued by Clodonæus, but Septimania for the preſent eſcaping the Conquerours hands, remained in the Power of the Viſigoths, as did the Province of Arby in the hands of Theodorick the Oſtrogothian and Italian King. In theſe Countries yet remaining to the Goths, to be ſure the Roman Law Continued ſafe, of which Theodorick himſelf is more than once Witneſs in Caſſiodorus. Clodonæus alſo, either becauſe he thought it impoſſible, or unſafe to make ſuch an Alteration, or unwilling to ſhew any Harſhneſs to thoſe who had invited him into the Countrey, or rather for that he had no better to obtrude upon them, ſuffered them to enjoy their beloved Civil Law, with all Freedom.

Lib. 3. epp. 17. & 43.

127. Hence came it to paſs, that the Provincials of Aquitain and others beyond the Loire, were by the Franks called Romans, as alſo the whole Countrey on that ſide of the ſame River, Romania, Romana Terra, and Gallia Romana. Moreover King Clothair, under the Name of Romans by an Edict, permitted them the uſe of Roman Laws, as alſo did Guntran, Chilperick and Sigebert by their Approbation. As agreeable hereto, did ſeveral Biſhops and others, make their Wills fully conformable to the Rules of the Civil Law which Gregory Turonenſis witneſſeth; and Aimoinus tells us, that Sadregiſilus the Duke of Aquitain being ſlain, his Sons for that they would nor proſecute and revenge the Murther, were according to the appointment of the Roman Laws, deſpoiled of all their Father's Goods. In the days of Clodonæus the ſecond, and the Son of Dagobert, flouriſhed this Law as is fully manifeſt from Marculfus his Forms of Codicils directed to the Rulers of Provinces. In the Age alſo of Childerick the ſecond it is evident enough, that the Civil Law was in high Eſteem, both in the Courts and the Schools of the Arverni. Charles the Great, following the Example of his Predeceſſours of the firſt Line, eſtabliſhed the uſe of it to thoſe that lived beyond the Loire, Commanding the Code of Theodoſius to be mended for their uſe, as appears from the laſt words added to the Commonitory of Alaricus, and prefixed to the ſaid Code. Nay he was ſo great a Friend to this imperial Law, that many things out of this Volume he cauſed to be transferred into his own Capitularies. The ſame Courſe was obſerved, by thoſe of his Family to the Ruine thereof, a notable Inſtance of which we have in Gerard, a certain Count of Aquitain, who that he might not break the famous Law called Fuſia Cialia (and Mundialis in our Authour) by his Teſtament refuſed to Manumitt more than one hundred of his Slaves. At that time flouriſhed many eminent Men in Aquitain, who were great Proficients in this Science. Particularly Abbo the Father of Odo Cluniacenſis, is ſaid by Joannes Italus the Writer of the Life of the Son, to have had by Heart the Hiſtories of the Ancients, and the Novel of Juſtinian. In Septimania indeed, by an Edict of Cindaſuindus King of the Viſigoths, the Roman Law was as it were turned out of Doors, and the Gothick prevailed ſo long as the Goths poſſeſſed that part of Gallia Narbonenſis, but after the Countrey was ſubdued by the Franks, they recalled the Roman as we may eaſily gather from the perpetual Laws of Charles the Great, Ludovicus Pius, and Charles the Bald.

Fredegarius in Chronica Ligeris alveum tranſeunt, Romanos proterunt, uſque Biturigas urbem accedunt, &c. Concilia item paſſim. Fortunatus, Luitprandus alii.

Lib. 4. c. 28.

Ex vita S. Prajecti Arvernenſis Ep. & ex vita S. Boniti itidem Arvernenſis Ep. apud Surium, Tom. 1. Januar. 15.

Et iterum Anno XX regnante Carolo Rege Franc. & Longobard. & Patricio Romano. Juſtum inquit eſt ut lex Mundialis in hoc obſervetur, & ideo numerum in eadem lege præſtitutum prætergredi non debere.

Odo Cluniacenſis vit. S. Gerald. lib. 3.

Leg. Wiſig. l. 2. c. 8.

128. But we are told by Eginart, that the Franks had two Laws very different in many places. The Reader muſt know then, that beſides this of the Romans they found in Gall, they made or brought with them another of their own which is the Salick Law, ſo much ſpoken of in later Ages. Who were the Authours of it, is ſufficiently ſet forth in the Preface, and Sigebert moreover informs us; as that it was Compoſed by four of their Noblemen choſen out of many, and known by the Names of Wiſogaſt, Boſogaſt, Salogaſt and Widogaſt, in theſe Villages of Germany, Salachaim, Bodochaim and Wingehaim. We are told that theſe four meeting in three

The Salick Law.

Nam Franci duas habent leges plurimis in locis valde diverſas.

Sigebertus Gemblacenſis ad Ann. 422.

Malli,

Sect. 4.

Malli, or ſo many ſeveral places of Aſſemblies, very carefully handled and diſcuſſed Cauſes, reſolving to Judge according as the Salick Law declareth. Whence it ſhould be called, there are different Opinions. Some derive the Name from Sal and Sala, ſignifying a Court or Hall, as if for Salica ſhould be meant Aulica. So Aventinus interprets Lex Salica, Terra Salica, Salica Prædia, and Salici Clientes, and indeed ſtill at this day the Dutch-men have this word Salbuch frequently in their Mouths, whereby they mean Salicus Codex or a Salick Book, wherein are deſcribed the Grounds belonging to the King or Church, together with the Tributes and Revenues. Moreover in the Laws of the Alemans and other Nations, the word Sala is often uſed for an Houſe, as Hall now is uſed by us Engliſh, and not onely for the greateſt Room or dining Room, as Salle in French alſo ſignifies. In this Senſe the Salick Land ſhould properly be that Land or Ground, which being Conquered was aſſigned to the Court or Courtiers, wherein the Female Sex could not ſucceed, as unable by Arms to defend and ſecure it. Lindebrogius cites an old Gloſſary, wherein Terra Salica is explained by the Teutonick word Selilant, as the Ground or Soil belonging to the Court or the King's Houſe.

Whence ſo called.

Vide Pontanum in Orig. Francic. l. 6. c. 17.

Leg. Alaman. tit. 81.
Leg. Longobar. tit. 3, 4.

129. Others derive the word from the Franci Salii mentioned by Ammianus Marcellinus, who writes that Cuſtome called them Salii, who formerly took the boldneſs to fix their Habitations in the Roman Pale at Toxiandria locus, and when Julian was come to Tungri, he adds, that there it was, that their Ambaſſadours met him. Betwixt theſe Opinions there's no Repugnancy, they may both be true. This Law might be called Salick from the People; and the People called Salii, from the Sal or Sala lately mentioned. But this Toxiandrialocus in the Judgement of ſeveral Learned Men, is that very Village in the lower Loraine, which to this day is called Teſſanderlo. For the People called Tungri in the ſame Tract, and the River Moſa flowing along are moſt certain Notes of the Habitation of theſe Franci Salii in the time of Julian, betwixt the Rivers Sceld and Meuſe, wherein during the Reign of Pharamond, the Law Salick was Compoſed. Theſe three Villages mentioned by Sigebert, in the Opinion alſo of very judicious Perſons are ſtill remaining in the Countrey of Brabant, and now known by the Names of Zelheim, Boderſheim and Winderſhoven. For the firſt Zelheim, with a little Variation of Dialect in the Teutonick Tongue ſounds no other than the Habitation of the Salii, over againſt which on the other ſide of the River Tamera, ſtands a Salick Village called Zelck: There lyes alſo a Region betwixt Herkam and Halen, at this day called Vranckriick, or the Kingdom of France; and beneath that the Salick Meadows, known by the Names of Zeelbemden, which manifeſtly prove thoſe to have been the firſt Seats of the Salick Franks.

Petiitque omnium Primos Francos quos Conſuetudo Salios appellavit, auſos olim in Romano ſolo apud Toxiandriam-locum habitacula figere, lib. 17.

Petrus Dinæus Rer. Brabant, l. 2. Chriſtoph. Bronwems Annal. Trevirenſ, l. 4. Nicolas Vigneſius Biblioth. Tom. 1. p. 881. Johannes, Jacobus Chiffletius Vindic. Hiſp. c. 5.

Germani pro S utuntur Z zel itaque pro Sel vel Sal. Heim idem cum noſtro Ham, quo terminantur multa oppidorum vocabula. Inde etiam Home. Sic Zelheim eſt Sal ham. Habitatio Saliorum.

130. But Julian the Emperour himſelf writing of theſe Franks, which living at Toxandria had made their Addreſſes to him, calls them a part of the Salii, which hints that another part of them inhabited elſewhere. Now that any which dwelt beyond the Rhine were called Salii, appears not at all; therefore Chiffletius thinks, that thoſe of the Franks which had paſſed that River, and now fixed on this ſide, were ſo named from the River Salia, which riſing out of the Lake by him called Lindrius Lacus at the City of Metz, empties it ſelf into the Moſelle. Now that this River had it's Name from Sal or Salt, Fortunatus tells us, where he Enumerates the Rivers of Gallia Belgica. Chiffletius adds, that this Etymology is founded upon very good Reaſons. For not far from the River are the Salt Fountains of Loraine, which Spring up at Dieuze, Marſal, Mogennic, Salone and Chaſteau-ſalin, at which places they boil the water into Salt: Neither is far diſtant, the Monaſtery of the Salt Valley, of the Order of St. Norbert. That greateſt Conteſts of old happened betwixt the Burgundians and Allemans, the Catti and Hermundari about ſuch Salt waters we are aſſured by ſeveral Writers, as well out of a ſuperſtitious Conceit they had of ſuch impregnated Waters, for the great Gain that ariſes out of ſuch Traffick; and why might not they have the ſame Deſires? why might not the ſame Endeavours be uſed by the Franks? But that from this Salia they were ſo named, this renders it ſtill more probable, that in the parts of Loraine ſeveral other People may be found, which took their Names from the adjoyning Rivers: As from the River Monus (by Regino called Mogonus) the Mogonciaci from Rura, the Ribuarii, in old French, les Ruyers, from Elellus the Elſatii: From Haina the Hainonii, and from the Moſella the Moſellani. Why then not as well from

In Epiſt. ad Athenienſes.
Μοίραν τῶν Σαλιῶν.

Iſara, Sara, Chares, Scaldis, Saba, Somona, Sura: Seu qui Mettin adit, de ſale nomen habens, lib. 7. c. 4.

from Salia the Salii. To ſpeak indifferently this is very probable, and Papirius Maſſonus was of this Opinion, that the Salick Law was ſo denominated from Salia the River of the Mediomatrici, as alſo Hotoman, that the People received this Appellation from the River.

131. From very many Inſtances and Examples, Chiffletius proves that in thoſe Countries, lying within the Rivers, Meuſe, Moſelle, Scelde and Somona, or the Somme, the Salick Law was uſed and in Force for many Ages, amongſt thoſe who were firſt called Salii, then Auſtratii, and afterward Lotharingi. Upon the very ſame account, Conrade the ſecond Emperour was long after called Salicus, becauſe he was born in the Salick Land, in the Territories of Wormes, within the Borders of the Eaſtern France, or the ancient Kingdom of Loraine. In like manner, St. Norbert born in the Countrey of Cleeve, in the Dioceſe of Coleine, is by Hugo Cameracenſis, his firſt Aſſociate and Succeſſour in the Pramonſtratenſian Monaſtery, ſaid to be deſcended of the Illuſtrious Off-ſpring of the Franks, and the Salick Germans, that is to ſay of the Auſtraſians, who were the Eaſtern Franks, called afterward Lotharingi, the Kings of whom were intituled, Reges Orientalis Franciæ: Kings of Oriental France. To theſe in the Opinion of Cujacius, truly and properly belonged the Salick Law, by Virtue whereof Males alone ſucceeded their Anceſtours in their Inheritances. For ſo a branch of it runs: But of the Salick Land no Portion of the Inheritance paſſeth to a Woman, but this the Male Sex acquires; that is to ſay, Sons ſucceed in the Inheritance. This is that paſſage, whereupon has been raiſed ſuch a noiſe in the World, and has coſt two Neighbouring Nations, ſo much Bloud and Treaſure.

In vita circa Annum 1140.

De terra verò Salica in mulierem nulla portio Hæreditatis tranſit, ſed hoc virilis ſexus acquirit: Hoc eſt filii in ipſa Hæreditate ſuccedunt.
Tit. 62. §. 6.

132. But Cujacius very well obſerves, and ſo doth Hotoman in his Franco-gallia, that in ſeveral Books are written the Law Salick, and the Law of the Franks: And that this belonged to thoſe of the Weſt, and that to the other of the Eaſt, or the Auſtraſians, and Lotharingians as they were afterwards called. Chifflet affirms, the Salick Land to be the Dukedom of the upper Loraine, the right of Succeſſion in it, by Virtue of this Law belonging to Males onely, as alſo in the Dukedom of the lower Loraine, till ſuch time as by Indulgence of the Emperours, the Succeſſion was alſo devolved upon the weak Sex. As by many Inſtances, he proves that the Salick Law belonged to the Eaſtern Franks, ſo by as many and more doth he ſhew, that it no way concerned the Kingdom of the Weſtern, which at this day we call France. That ſometimes the Kingdom was transferred to the Males, when there were Females remaining, viz. the Daughters of the late deceaſed Kings cannot be denied, as we have ſeen in the Caſe of Guntram, who though he left a Daughter called Clotilde, yet his Kingdom went not to her, but to his Brother Sigebert. So Childebert the third dying, the Crown came to his Brother Clothair, though he left two Daughters; and Cherebert the fifth being deceaſed, the Succeſſion was devolved upon Sigebert his Brother, and his three Daughters were excluded. Theſe Inſtances and Teſtimonies yet he over-rules by a far greater number on the other ſide, whereby he doubts not, but that he demonſtrates that the Law Salick was never obſerved nor practiſed, there where ſome in later Ages for their own Intereſts, have ſo much pleaded and contended for it.

Separatis libris habetur lex Salica & lex Francorum: Hæc eſt Occidentalium, illa Orientalium. Lib. 1. de Feudis tit. 1.

*Vindic. Hiſp. c.*6.

133. Firſt, had any ſuch Law been regarded as Sacred and Inviolable, it would have awed the Franks ſo much, that after the Death of Clodio they would not have paſſed by his Children, and transferred the Kingdom to Meronæus his Kinſman, probably deſcended of the Bloud Royal by the Female Sex. It would alſo have been a Bridle to them, againſt their rejecting of Childerick, and making choice of Ægidius the Roman Patritian, whoſe Mother or Wife probably was a Frank, becauſe we find that his Son Siagrius poſſeſſed the City of Soiſſons by right of Inheritance. Had there been ſuch a kind of Curb, a Reverence to ſuch a Law, it would have been more effectually joyned at leaſt with their Duty and Allegiance, than to ſuffer them to reject the Male Line of the Meroningians, and promote the Family of Charles Martell, which was deſcended of it by a Female, as we have formerly ſhewed, viz. by Blithilde the Daughter of King Clothair, Married to Anſbert the Duke of Auſtraſia. The like Example we find in Wido, Duke of Spoletum who was choſen King, though he was deſcended from Charles the Great, by a Daughter onely of Pipin the ſecond; but for this very reaſon that he was a Kinſman by his Mother, of Charles the Simple. Odo Moreover obtained the Crown of France, for being deſcended from the ſaid Charles, though by his Concubine, for which and no better a Reaſon, Rodulph the Kinſman of him and King Robert, thought himſelf worthy and capable of a Crown, which he put on his Head, and cauſed him-

Poſteros Clodionis Regis qui hactenus ignoti fuerunt habes in veteri Stemmate, quod ex MS. codice legis Salicæ Cheſneus publici juris fecit.

Sect. 4.

ſelf to be ſaluted King of Burgundy. The ſaid Robert pretended to the Kingdom by the ſame Title and none other, as had done his Brother Odo, who as he affirmed, had Reigned by as good Right as had King Pipin. For the ſame reaſon was Rodulphus made King of France. Neither could Hugh Capet himſelf challenge the Crown by any better Title. All theſe were actually poſſeſſed of the Crown. Where was then the Salick Law, which the Modern French ſo much boaſt of, as firmly eſtabliſhed, and ſprung up together with the Kingdom, by which alone the Liberty and Dignity of the Name of France hath ſubſiſted, as that which hath preſerved it from being oppreſſed by the Empire, and Juriſdiction of Strangers?

Vindic. Gall. cap. 16.

134. From the Rights and Pretenſions of others, it appears that this Salick Law was not in this point at all acknowledged in ancient times. Henry the firſt of that Name being dead, Baldwin Sirnamed Pius the Count of Flanders, who had married Adela his Siſter, was made Protectour or Guardian to Philip his young Son on this Condition, that in Caſe the Child Philip ſhould dye without Children, he ſhould ſucceed to the Crown in Right of his Wife, the Aunt of his young Pupill. Here Authours ſay, he ſhould be King in Right of his Wife, and that the Nobility ſwore fealty to him, as the juſt Heir of the Kingdom, in Caſe Philip ſhould dye without Iſſue. Now no Right can be againſt ſuch a poſitive Law, and Juſt and Legitimate flowing from Law it ſelf; how could he be ſaid to be King in Right of his Wife, of a Juſt or Legitimate Heir, in Caſe of ſuch an Illegality? In like manner, the Nobility after the death of Lewis the eighth, diſdaining to be governed by Blanche his Wife, in the Minority of his Son Lewis, reſolved to confer the Crown on Enguerran Lord of Coucy, for no other Cauſe, than for that he was deſcended from the Loins of their Kings in a double Line, but in both by Women, as appeareth by his Pedigree to be ſeen in Chifflet his Book. The firſt time that ever the Salick Law was objected and made uſe of in this Caſe, was after the death of Lewis Hutin, who left his Wife Clementia Great with Child of a Son called John, that died the eighth day after he was born. He left a Daughter alſo named Joanna, begotten on Margaret the Daughter of Robert Duke of Burgundy, for whom her Uncle Odo Son of this Robert, challenged the Kingdom of France in Right both of her Father and Brother. But Philip Sirnamed the Long, took off this Odo by Marrying to him his own Daughter Joanna, and as Du Haillan obſerves, Philip having a Controverſie with a young Virgin deſtitute of Help and Succour, and having bribed the Nobility by great Promiſes eaſily had the better of her. Yet did her Aunt the Dutcheſs of Burgundy proteſt againſt the promotion of Philip in Right of her Niece, neither would the Dukes of Burgundy and Flanders, though Peers of France be preſent at the Inauguration. Odo yet afterward as we ſaid renounced the Right of his Niece, being taken off by a Marriage with Joanna, who brought with her the Inheritances of the other Burgundy, and Arteſia; though had this Salick Law been known amongſt the Weſtern Franks, he would ſcarcely have aſſerted her Right at all. But now was it firſt cited and objected, almoſt nine whole Ages after it was firſt enacted in the Salick Land.

Vetus Flandriæ Chronicon apud Chiffletium ubi ſuprà, c. 7. Ea conditione ut ſi infantem ſine Hæredibus mori contingeret prædictus Comes Balduinus Francorum Rex eſſet ex parte uxoris ſuæ, &c. Aliud vetus Chron. MS. Monaſterii Sancti Giſleni- ſin autem omnino utpote juſto hæredi Regni per uxorem. Chronica vet. apud eundem à proceribus decretum jam fuiſſe Enguerrannum Couciacum facere Regem Franciæ. Poſtquam oblatam regnandi occaſionem amiſiſſet uſus eſt iſto Lemmate. Je ne ſuis Roy ne Duc auſſi je ſuis ſire de Coucey. Sire quidam derivant de voce Græca κύριος, hodie attribuitur Regi ſoli, olim vero uſurpata fuit eodem ſenſu quo vox hodierna Sieur, ut ex iſto loco probat Balzacius.

When the Salick Law was firſt made uſe of.

A. D. 1316.

135. Odo the Duke of Burgundy gave up the Cudgels, as we ſaid, as to the Right of his Niece; but when his own turn came, he was not willing to be ſo ſerved. For Philip the Long being dead, he Challenged the Kingdom for Joanna his Wife, Daughter to the ſaid Philip, and contended though in vain, he himſelf having helped to make a Preſident, with Charles Sirnamed the Fair, the Brother of the King deceaſed. Not long after, Charles had the ſame fate as had his Brother to dye without iſſue Male, which Accident procured that famous Conteſt betwixt the two Nations of France and England. Our King Edward the third, the Nephew of Charles by his Siſter Iſabell, juſtly contended that the Crown belonged to him, rather than to Philip of Valois the Couſin German of Charles, who laid claim to it. He affirmed, that though the pretended Salick Law were admitted; yet would the End and Deſign of it be accompliſhed in his Perſon, who though deſcended from the French Kings by his Mother, yet was a Man, and ſo fit to Govern; Women by it being excluded from the Inheritance, but not Men who derive their Pedigrees by Women. He produced the Example of Pipin, the Father of Charles the Great, urged thoſe of Odo and Robert, and inſtanced in Hugh Capet, who were promoted for this very reaſon, that by their Mothers and Grandmothers, they drew their deſcent from the Kings of the Franks. His Right and Title to the Crown, to be better than that of Philip he ſhewed, in that he was the Grandſon of Philip the Fair, begotten on his Daughter, and therefore it was fitter that he ſhould ſucceed his Grandfather and his Ucles, than Philip, who deriving his deſ-cent from the Father of Philip the Fair, was more in Bloud remote, though he ſeized on the Kingdom. He quartered the Arms now of France and England together, and defied Philip the Invader of the Kingdom, calling him by no other Name than Philip of Valois. Then what Wars followed none can be ignorant, than which Æmilius affirms none ever was more grievous, none more long, none more Bloudy and Contentious, nor any more frequently repeated. A later Writer adds, that this Contention involved the French and Engliſh, by reaſon of a tedious War, in the greateſt Calamities: Hence the Kings of England have taken the Title and Arms of the Kingdom of France, and as yet do take them; and affirm the Controverſie as yet not to be decided.

A. D. 1322.

Aubertus Miræus in Chron. Belg. ad An. 1328.

136. While John the ſecond of France was here Priſoner in England, Charles King of Navar, Son to the Daughter of Lewis Hutin, renewed the Claim of his Mother, and the Dolphin then Regent, was glad to buy him off with that part of Normandy he had got into his hands, before the Kings Captivity; by Virtue of which Bargain his Right was then extinguiſhed. But Charles the ſixth could not ſo ſtop the Mouth of our Henry the fifth, but Marrying to him his Daughter Catharine, ordained him Regent of the Kingdom during his Life, and after his Death Succeſſour to it. The French Writers here except that Charles was not well in his Wits; but its a wonder that the Eſtates of the Realm ſhould be ſo mad with him for Company. For it's certain enough it was done by their Conſent; if Madneſs was the Cauſe, this Madneſs neither died nor was buried with him. His Body being laid in his Grave, in the Church of St. Denis, The Officers of his Houſe brake their Staves, and caſt them into the Grave, turning their Keys alſo downwards, then the Heralds coming to the Graves ſide cryed out: Reſt the Soul of the moſt high and moſt excellent Prince Charles King of the Franks, of that Name the ſixth, our Natural and Sovereign Lord: then with an higher Voyce added; God lengthen the Years of Henry by the Grace of God, King of France and England our Sovereign Lord. Then erecting their Keys and lifting up the Lilies or their Coat Armours toward Heaven ingeminated theſe Words, Let the King live. Had the Salick Law been of ſuch Sacred and inviolable eſteem, it's not to be ſuppoſed, the Eſtates would have Conſented, eſpecially Philip the good Duke of Burgundy, who being himſelf iſſued from the Houſe of Valois, had no reaſon to make Shipwreck thus of his Hopes and Expectations. But in proſecution of the Right which roſe from the Title of our Henry the fifth, his Marriage with Catharine, and the Agreement upon that Marriage, Henry the ſixth his Son ſome thirteen Years after came to Paris, and there with the ſame Conſent was ſolemnly Crowned and anointed.

Monſtrolet Tom. 1. c. 267.

Idem, Ann. 1431.

137. The Governour of Paris with the flower of the Citizens went out to meet him, and did him Reverence. They were followed by the chief Preſident, habited like a Prince with the Members of Parliament, clad in Purple and Scarlet. Next to theſe went the Maſters of Accounts, after them they that had the Charge of the Treaſury, the Maſters of the Requeſts, and the Secretaries: All theſe kneeled before him, and acknowledged him for their Sovereign. The Provoſt of Merchants, and the Eſchenius or Sheriffs brought a Canopy of blew Silk poudred with Golden Lilies, and carried it over his Head all the while he paſſed through the City. On the ſeventeenth of December he went to the Church of Noſtre Dame, and there was Conſecrated by the Cardinal of Wincheſter. Thence returning to the Palace, he entred as it were into Poſſeſſion of the Royal Dignity, the Doors were ſet open, he ſate on his Bed of Juſtice, heard and determined Cauſes, and executed the Office of a King. Letters Patents were ſealed with his Seal Royal, and he had two Crowns, the one on his Head, and the other ſtanding by him, to ſhew openly that he was King of ſo many Kingdoms. Where was then the Salick Law? In the ſame Eſteem doubtleſs as it was more lately, not yet one hundred Years ago after the Death of Henry the third, the French King. The greateſt Faction would willingly have Cancelled it out of Enmity to the Family of Bourbon. Some were for the Duke of Loraine or one of his Children, others for the Duke of Savoy, as the Son of a Daughter of France; but moſt caſt their Eyes on Philip the ſecond King of Spain, as deſcended from the Loins of Charles the Great, and ſixteen Pariſians who had then the Care of the State upon them, wrote to him Letters full of Duty and good Wiſhes, to be ſeen in the Book of Chiffletius. What cauſe the Modern French have to bragg as they do, of the Obſervation of their Salick Law, inviolably preſerved ſince the founding of the Monarchy it ſelf; let the Reader judge by theſe Inſtances, which howſoever they tranſcend the Period, we have allotted to this Volume, yet in ſo material a Subject which Caſſanus, lib. 2. c. 5.

we here handle once for all could not be omitted. We aſſure our ſelves, that during the Reigns of the Kings of the firſt and ſecond Lines, it was never thought of, and it was ſo far from being a Check upon the French in aſcertaining the Succeſſion, that the contrary Doctrine, viz. that the Deſcent from the Royal Family by the Female Sex, gave a Right and Title to the Crown, was no ſmall Incouragement to the ancient Franks, to commit thoſe extraordinary and extravagant Practices, upon which Hotoman founds his Doctrine of Election, and opened the Door to the Succeſſion of Pipin and his Family, if not of that alſo of Hugh Capet.

138. All this is abundantly confirmed from the Succeſſions of ſeveral Dukedoms, and Counties of the Weſtern or Modern France, which have often deſcended from the Spear to the Diſtaff, have been poſſeſſed both long ſince, and lately by Women and their Children: He that deſires Satisfaction may conſult the Book of Chifflet written upon this Argument, where he may find the ſeveral Examples, and the Pedigrees he produceth for the Proof and Evidence of his Aſſertion. We ſhall here give the Reader onely a Taſte of it. Firſt, he produceth the Teſtimony of Otho Friſingenſis, who writes that it's the Cuſtome in Burgundy (as almoſt in all the Provinces of Gall) that ever to the elder Brother and his Children, whether Males or Females, the Right of the Father's Inheritance belongs; others looking upon them as their Lords. He obſerves, that the Particle Pene, or almoſt, excludes the Salick Lands of the Eaſtern France. Then for Inſtances, Conrade Count of Paris was Duke of Burgundy, in Right of his Wife Adelais, the elder Daughter of Hugh the Baſtard Son of Charles the Great. So was Hugh the Son of Conrade in Right of his Father and Mother. After Hugh ſucceeded Alaydis his Niece by his Brother, her Husband Richard the Count of Autun, being in her Right made Duke of Burgundy. In their Right ſucceeded Hugo Niger their Son, betwixt whom and Hugo Albus there aroſe a difference, for he pretended to the Dukedom, becauſe his Mother was Beatrice the Daughter of Richard and Alaydis, Married to Robert the firſt King of the Franks: The Conteſt grew ſo high, that they divided Burgundy betwixt them. Hugh the Black dying without Iſſue, Gilbert Count of Dijon the Son of Manaſſes, who had Married another Siſter ſucceeded, and in like manner left the Dukedom to Otho his Son-in-Law. Long after this continued the Succeſſion of Hugh the White in the Male Line; but at length Duke Philip Sirnamed Roboretanus dying without Iſſue, the Dukedom fell to John the French King, by Right of Joanna his Mother, great Aunt to Philip the laſt Duke, though there were ſeveral of the Male Line remaining; therefore certainly not by any Right he claimed by Virtue of the Law Salick.

A. D. 1362.

139. Which Law in the Succeſſion of Burgundy, was never heard of till Lewis the eleventh of France, indeavoured to exclude Mary the Daughter of Charles the Bald, ſlain in the Battel of Nancy; and this, ſaith Chifflet, is the Fountain of that Right, whereby the French King retains from her Poſterity the moſt noble Region of Burgundy. But to proceed, the Province, ſaith he, which the King of England aſſerts at this day as his Right, and which his Anceſtours throughout all the Kingdom of France enjoyed quietly in times paſt, belong to him no otherwiſe than by Right derived on the Female ſide. For the County of Maine, Fulco Earl of Anjoy married Eremburgis, the Daughter of Helias Earl of Maine, together with her receiving the County, and by her had two Sons and as many Daughters, whereof one married to William the Son of Henry King of England. His two Sons were Geoffrey and Helias, whereof the elder married Maud the Daughter of our Henry the firſt, the Siſter of the ſaid William, and Dutcheſs of Normandy: And at length Henry Son of Geoffrey and Maud (being Duke of Normandy by his Mother, Earl of Anjoy, Touraine and Maine) took to Wife Elianor the Daughter of the Duke of Aquitain, or Guienne, formerly called Wife to Lewis the ſeventh King of France, and by her became Lord both of Guienne and Poictou. The Hiſtorian writes, that Guienne by little and little withdrew it ſelf from the Dominion of the Franks, and paſſed into the hands of the Duke of Normandy by reaſon of his Wife: The Franks pining with Envy, but not able to hinder the effect of his Right. Our King Henry by the ſame Right, being Lord of Poictou could lay juſt Claim to the County of Toloſe, derived from the Grandmother by the Fathers ſide of his ſaid Wife Elianor by Name Philippa, the Heir of Count William, and Wife to William the eighth Duke of Guienne. And no other Right had Alphonſus, Brother to Lewis the French King, to the County of Toloſe, than for that he had married Joan the Daughter of Raimond the fifth Count of that Countrey.

A. D. 1477.

Willielmus Gemmeticenſis, lib. 8. c. 34.

Hiſtorici Normannorum & Anglorum.

Guliel. Neubrigenſis, l. 1. *c.*31. Ratione conjugis in ducis Normanni poteſtatem tranſivit: Francis quidem invidia labeſcentibus, ſed impedire non valentibus ejuſdem juris provectum.

Fratres Gammarthanus, l. 6. c. 8.

Bernardus Guido apud Gulielm. catel. in Hiſtor. comitum Toloſæ.

Sect. 4.

140. As for Bretagnes, the Dukedom of it hath four times deſcended to Females, Males and Uncles being ſometimes excluded. As to the two firſt England was concerned, and therefore we ſhall preſent the Reader with the Writers words. Concerning Peter, Sirnamed Mauclere, Brother of Robert the ſecond Count of Dreux, it muſt be known that he married Aleydis Counteſs of Bretagne, whoſe Grandfather Conan Sirnamed the Groſſe, had one onely Daughter Conſtantia by Name, which married to Jeoffrey the Brother of Richard King of England, and brought him a Son Named Arthur, together with a Daughter Elianor by Name. King Richard dying, the Kingdom was devolved upon Jeoffrey, who deceaſed alſo before ſuch time as he could receive the Homages of his Subjects. Therefore John Lackland his younger Brother ſeized on the Kingdom, procuring his Nephew Arthur afterward to be drowned, and detaining his Niece Elianor in Captivity, out of which ſhe never eſcaped. Jeoffrey being Dead, the Counteſs Conſtantia married to Almarick Count of Anjou, who begat on her this Aleydis. She then poſſeſſed of the County married Peter Mauclere, who had by her one Son and a Daughter. Thus we ſee how twice this Inheritance deſcended to Women. Another example we have in Charles the younger Son of the Count of Blois, who marrying Claudia the Niece of John the Duke of Bretagne by his Brother, in Right of his Wife aſſumed the Title of Duke, though John the laſt of the Brothers of the deceaſed Duke contradicted it, denying that this Countrey could in Equity fall back to the manly Sex. This John was in Right of his Mother Count of Montfort, whence aroſe a moſt ſharp War, King Philip aſſiſting Charles his Siſters Son, and the Engliſh Monfort. Froiſſart affirms, that by the Judgment of the Peers of France, Blois was preferred before Montfort, becauſe Claudia was neareſt akin to the deceaſed Duke. He had the better therefore upon his Wives account, and in her Right, by Virtue of which he had alſo received the Vicounty-ſhip of Limoſin. As for Anne the Daughter of Francis Duke of Bretagne, later Writers Conſent that ſhe was not onely the Legitimate Heir of her Father, but would never permit the Kings her Husbands to diſpoſe of her Duchy. And for Claudia her Daughter, ſhe was rightly enough betrothed to Charles of Auſtria, but was married to Francis of Valois, leſt ſo goodly an Inheritance ſhould fall into the hands of Strangers.

Balduinus Aveſnenſis in Chron. M. S. Hainon. apud Chiffletium.

Joannes ſine terra ita audit apud noſtros etiam Scriptores.

Papirius Maſſonus in Annal. ad A. D. 1340.

Sammarthani Fratres l. 9. c. 3.

141. Farther the County of Champagne, as Pope Honorius the third decided the Queſtion of Right, appertained to the Queen of Cyprus, which was Aleydis the eldeſt Daughter of Henry the ſecond, Count of this Province, married to Hugh Luſinian King of that Iſland. Her Couſin Theobald by ſtrength of Arms carried it from her. But the matter ſucceeded better in behalf of the Women in the Reign of Philip the Fair, to whom this County fell in the Right, and upon the account of his Wife Joan. The like might be demonſtrated concerning the ancient Counties of Creſpy or Valois, of Burſur, Aabe and Vermandois, of the County of Provence, of Flandres, which fell to Philip the Bald, in Right of his Wife, as alſo afterward to Maximilian, the Husband of Mary of Burgundy. It would be too tedious to expatiate upon the County of Arthois, paſſed to a Daughter by decree of the Parliament of Paris, notwithſtanding the endeavours of the dead Brothers Sons, viz. to Margaret Counteſs of Burgundy and Artois, who was as a Peer preſent at the Inauguration of Charles the fifth at Paris, putting her hand to the Crown, as the reſt did while the Archbiſhop prayed for the King. In like manner, it were eaſie to inlarge upon the Counties of Nevers, Auxerre, and Tonnerre, the Dutchies of Rethel, Montpenſier, Touteville, Joyeuſe, Aumale, Mayenne and Aiguillon, very lately in the hands of Women. The County of Meſconnois, to which the Privilege of Peerage is annexed, was bought by St. Lewes of Aleydis, the Widow of John Earl of Dreux. Helia, the Siſter of Robert, gave the Duchy of Alençon to Philip Auguſtus. Albret fell alſo in the laſt Age to Joan the Wife of Antony of Bourbon, and Mother to Henry the fourth. Now by theſe Inſtances, to mention no more, let the impartial Reader judge whether Caſſanus hath reaſon to write that by the Law Salick, not onely all acceſs to the whole Crown is barred by Women, but even to parts of the Crown alſo, as Dukedoms, Counties and other Fees, becauſe they are of the ſame Nature with the ſtock, from which they proceed. Of the ſame Nature they are indeed, but what this Nature is this Diſcourſe hath made very evident.

Extravag. de Ord. Cognitionum C. Aduam.

Belleforeſt in Chron. Tom. 1. l. 4. c. 54.

Lib. 2. c. 5.

142. But the Reader muſt know, that they which are for this Succeſſion cannot agree amongſt themſelves, ſome affirming, that the Law Salick onely concerns the Crown, others the Crown, and the other Feuda or Fees we have lately mentioned, and others that it neither concerns the Crown, nor any Fees neither, but the Excluſion of Females they lay upon an Inviolable Cuſtome, which hath the form of Law, as Vide Hotomanni Franco Galliam & Reſponſ. Mathurelli.

as doth Hotoman, whoſe Foundation how weak it is, we way perceive by thoſe Examples he never ſufficiently conſidered. It's not in vain to take notice of what Chifflet preſſes upon us, that by the Ambiguity of the Word France, the Modern French have endeavoured to impoſe upon the World in this particular. For there being three ſeveral Countries which have born this Name, the one beyond the Rhine, called by St. Jerome the Region of the Franks, and by others Antiqua Francia, the Habitation of the Anſinarii, and two more on this ſide that River, the one Oriental, the Inhabitants whereof were the Salii called Auſtria, Auſtraſia, Francia Orientalis, Lotharingia and Media, Pars Franciæ; and the other Occidentalis, Nova, Latina, Romana and Neuſtria, the Inhabitants whereof were called Romani, from the Baſtard Roman Tongue, the Modern French Writers have applied to themſelves or the Weſtern Franks indiſtinctly whatever was written concerning the other; making the inconſiderate World believe the new Kingdom was the very ſame with the old. An advantage and Incouragement to this, they had from this following Accident, that the Name of France onely remained with the Weſtern or their Countrey, where it had fixed before the days of Sigebert; whereas in the days of Charles the Great, under the Name of the Kingdom of the Franks, beſides the three Frances lately mentioned, all Germany was included. But as the Franks were Germans Originally, ſo their Tongue prevailing againſt the Baſtard Latine aboliſhed the Name of Franks in the two Countries firſt mentioned, and in the Occidental France, the Baſtard Latine being adopted into the Name of French carried away that Name, and blinded thoſe that were not well ſkilled in Antiquity, as if that had been the onely true French Tongue, and ſuch as ſpake it were French alone. But moſt true is that ſaying of Paulus Æmilius, that the Germans may with more Right Challenge the Glory of the ancient Kings, Dukes and Emperours of the Franks to themſelves as deſcended from them, for the Oriental Franks are ſtill amongſt them, and the Occidental or Weſtern, are onely their Progeny.

Ad Ann. 845.

Hiſt. Franc. l. 3.

143. From all that has been ſaid upon this Argument, whether or no we have reaſon to be of the ſame Opinion with Du Haillan, their own Hiſtoriographer, a Councellour or Secretary to King Henry the third, let the Modern French be Judges. Concerning the Law Salick he hath this Expreſſion, that it was aſcribed to Pharamond by thoſe who, that they might make themſelves Kings, deſired to found their Right of Convenience upon a very ancient Law, by this Antiquity to give it more Luſtre and Authority. He demands, why Pharamond ſhould be thought to have made this Law for this Modern Crown of France, who never entred Gaul which now bears that Name, to which he neither had Right, nor the leaſt pretenſion, never paſſed the Rhine, but always contained himſelf in his Province of Franconia. By that Article of Succeſſion, ſo far is it, that any thing ſhould be meant of the Succeſſion of Kingdoms, that it ſpeaks not of Fefs, but onely of thoſe Tenures they call Allodia. In another place, he tells his Reader plainly, that the more ſevere Cenſurers of their Hiſtory, affirm that the Law Salick was not framed by Pharamond, but invented by Philip the Long, to deprive his Niece the Daughter of Lewes Hutin of the Inheritance of the Kingdom, which to obtain he muſt ſtrengthen that his Act by the precept and Obſervation of ſome Law or other. Nay he ſays plainly, that although this Law be one of the braveſt that ever was made in any Kingdom, yet it hath no power in France, but by Force or ſtrong hand, on which moſt Laws in all Dominions are founded. Of the ſame Opinion was Scipio Dupleix one of his Succeſſours, both in the place of Councellour and Hiſtoriographer, a Man who by his Writings and Collections, hath very well deſerved of that Nation. He counts it groſs Ignorance in thoſe that imagine the Salick Law was made in favour of Males, to exclude the Females from the Succeſſion to the Crown, foraſmuch as in the whole Book there is not one Law, nor Title, nor Article which makes mention of it, as neither of any Right of the Kingdom or Dominion of it; but onely of the Rights of Subjects, and Puniſhments ordained for Crimes: Nay the Prologue moſt manifeſty declares, that theſe Laws were made for no other purpoſe, than to provide for the Government of Subjects, their Peace and quiet.

Eſte appellee Salique, & a Pharamond attribuee, par ceux qui pour ſe faire Roys ont voulu fouder leur droit de bienſe auce ſur une lay bien ancienne, pour luy donner par ceſtò antiquite plus luſtre e dauthoritè. Car pourquoy, cet Pharamond fait coſſe loy pour ladite couronne, veu que jamais il à entrè en Gaule maintenant appellee France ſur laquelle, &c. Hiſtoire de France. Tom. 1.

De ſtatu Rerum Franc. lib. 3.

In Prolegom. Hiſtor. Franc.

144. That there was ſuch a Law as the Law Salick, before Philip the Long, we muſt confeſs, but that this Law concerned any place, but Auſtraſia or the Eaſtern Franks, we may with good reaſon utterly deny, as that it any way reſpected the Crown, or had any thing to doe with the Succeſſion. As for Chiffletius he makes this uſe of all that has been ſaid: This Weſtern or Modern French uſe this Salick Law like a Ball, they ſtrike it out of the Tennis Court, and again bring it in as they pleaſe, to delude Poſterity. For the firſt nine Ages after it was made, they never took notice of it (in this Senſe he means) in the fourteenth Age they defended it Tooth and Nail againſt Edward the third, King of England: Again in the fifteenth they forgot the ſame Law, in favour of the two Henries the fifth and ſixth Kings alſo of England: In the ſixteenth Francis the firſt renounced it's Decrees and Abdications, by the Treaties of Madrid, Cambray and Creſpi, which Renunciation of his, afterward Henry the ſecond tacitely confirmed by another Treaty at Cambray, and Henry the fourth by that of Veruin. Then preſently again, though thus over and over rejected, they reduce it into Play again, giving it the Epithetes of Eternal and Immutable, though it doth not at all concern them, but as Du Haillan witneſſeth, is made uſe of by force and violence. Then follows ſomething, wherewith we ſhall not meddle as unconcerned in either of the Parties, whether French or Spaniſh. Thus teadious, we have been to give the Reader ſatisfaction concerning that Law, which has made ſuch a noiſe in the World, and about which our Forefathers ſpent ſo much Bloud and Treaſure.

Sect. 4.

Artic. 5.
Artic. 16.
Artic. 22.
Artic. 1.
Artic. 1.

145. The Law Salick conſiſts of ſeventy and one Chapters. To it are added the Agreement or Treaty of Peace, betwixt the Kings Childebert and Clothair, as alſo an Edict or Decree of Clothair, together with certain Capitula or Chapters of Charles and Lodowick Emperours. There were other Laws of the Alemani, Bajoarii and Ripuarii, compoſed by order of Theoderick King of the Franks. What was wanting in the Laws of the Franks, Alemans and Bajoarii he added, what was amiſs or ſavoured of Heatheniſm, he repealed, and what he by reaſon of the long rivited Uſe and Cuſtome, could not amend, afterward Childebert attempted, and Clotair fully performed. All theſe King Dagobert by aſſiſtence of the Illuſtrious men Claudius, Judomagus and Agilulfus reviſed, renewed, put into better Form, and delivered in Writing to every Nation. Of the Laws of the Ripuarii, here is not any mention, but Learned men believe them to be of the ſame Original. Theſe Ripuarii or Ribuarii (not Riparii) inhabited the Region Ripuaria lying upon the River Rura, whence the City of Ruremund took its Name, which flows betwixt the Meuſe and the Rhine. That they took their Name à Ripis, from the Banks of the Rivers, ſome have been of Opinion; but then they ſhould have been rather called Riparii, which they never are in ancient Authours, and whereas the firſt Syllable in Ripa is long and alſo in Riparia, in the Word Ripuaria we reade it ſhort. Of theſe Laws of the Ripuarii are extant, eighty nine Chapters. There are other Laws or Capitula, of Charles the Great, and other Chriſtian Princes collected by Anſogiſus the Abbat, and Benedictus Levita in ſeven Books, certain new Capitula of Lothair, and Charles the Bald being added. All theſe Laws firſt by Tillius, and then by Francis and Peter Pithon, being publiſhed apart were afterward Collected into one Body, together with the Laws of the Wiſigoths, Burgundians, Saxons, Lombards, Angili and Werini and other Nations, by Frederick Lindebrogius, and are now every where extant.

Other Laws in uſe amongſt the French.

Alias Bajuvarii ut in Prologo.

Hoc conſtat ex Frodardo in Chron. ad A. D. 923. & Rhegin. ad Ann. 870. 881.

146. Amongſt them all this is obſervable, that what Tacitus tells us of the ancient Germans, counting the time not by Days but by Nights, as our Saxon Anceſtours uſed, and we at this day ſay Seven-night and a Fortnight, not a ſeventh day and a Fourteenth day, is by theſe ancient Writers practiſed. The ſame was in uſe in the time of Charles the Great, as appears by his Capitulary; where the Reader meets with the word Allodium, he muſt by it underſtand an Inheritance, which a Man might give or ſell away as his own. In the puniſhment of Crimes they followed the ſame Courſe as our Saxon Anceſtours, not to puniſh a Man with Death for Theſt, and other Faults as at this day practiſed. To forſake the Prince or run away from their Colours, was reckoned amongſt Capital offences, which were Crimes moſt infamous amongſt the Germans, in the days of Tacitus. The Nation of the Germans being known to be given to drink, it was ſeverely prohibited that none ſhould invite their Fellow Souldier, or other to that diverſion: If any were found Drunk, he was to drink Water till he acknowledged his Fault. Dice were likewiſe prohibited, Familiarity uſed alſo by the old Germans. Beggars there were none ſuffered, each Town being to maintain their Poor, or ſet them on work. Schools in all Cities were opened for Inſtruction of Youth. Uſury was unlawfull as in the times whereof Tacitus wrote. Adultery was puniſhed both by Gelding and Whipping. The ancient Franks uſed, the way of Tryal by cold and hot Water, and by Red hot Irons, as did the Engliſh Saxons and the Danes, a Cuſtome of old much impugned by Religious men. They were wont alſo to decide their Controverſies by Duells, as Agathias informs us; amongſt the Lombards, Noblemen

Their counting of time.

Allodium* what.

Their puniſhments of Crimes.

Lege Gloſſar. Lindelirogii.

Allodia Germanico vocabulo ſic dicta quod familiæ velut Coagmentata ſint & conjuncta hoc eſt inſeparabilia à familia: Ein Anlod.

Id flagitium Heiozlas appellabant. Her enim ſive Heir eſt exercitus, & Caſſen deſerere.

men uſed this way, and Slaves hot Water to purge their Innocency. Such were the Laws of the Franks in General, beſides which we muſt not omit to tell the Reader, that the Law of Feſs or Fees in theſe times whereof we Write, ſeem to have been introduced, if not ſetled and perfectly formed amongſt them, for we reade in Gregory Turonenſis and Aimoinus, of Grounds aſſigned to Dukes and Great men, and the later expreſly writes, that Clodonæus did deliver a place called Milidunum Caſtrum to one Aurelian, together with the Dukedom of the whole Region Jure Beneficii. Hence hear we ſo often of the Leodes or Ludes, which the Age following called Vaſſi, and thence Vaſſals came to be ſo named. Some contend, that from theſe our Franks the Tenures of Fees received their firſt Riſe and Original; but this is a Paradox, and the General apprehenſion being that they came from the Lombards, concerning both the Original and Nature of theſe Fees, the Reader is to look for Satisfaction out of that part of our Hiſtory, which reſpects Italy and the Kingdom of that People, we have dwelt too long upon this Subject; but that great part which this Nation hath acted, and ſtill continues to act upon the Stage of the World, may excuſe us: And here we diſmiſs the Hiſtory of the Franks for this Period.

Lib. 4. c. 39.

Lib. 9. c. 14.

Alteſerra in libro cui Titulus Origines Feudorum pro moribus Galliæ.

CHAP. II.

The Dominion of the Viſigoths in Spain and Gall, Contemporary with the Conſtantinopolitan Roman Empire.

SECT. I.

From the beginning of this Dominion to the Death of King Eurick.

The ſpace of fifty ſeven Years.

1. THE Roman Provinces every where being waſted, and the Empire going to Ruine, as we formerly ſhewed, on all ſides and Quarters, one Marcus was by the legionary Souldiers ſaluted Emperour here in Britain, and preſently again by the ſame light Humour removed out of the way, Gratian being ſubſtituted in his Room, who was alſo ſlain within four Months after his Election, and Conſtantine advanced to the Purple. Conſtantine being in much Favour with the People, rather for a Fancy and Inclination they had to his Name, than that his Actions much deſerved, a great part of Gall and alſo of Spain was at his Devotion; the minds of the Provincials being much of late exaſperated, by the heavy and daily increaſing Tributes and Impoſitions laid upon them by the Emperours. In Spain yet there were two Kinſmen of Honorius, by Name Didymus and Verinianus, who adhered to their Allegiance, and gathering together an Army confuſedly, and as they could prepared to give ſtop to Conſtantine, who was reported to have a Deſign to paſs the Pyrenæans out of Gall, but were by his Son Conſtans defeated and ſlain. The Army of this Conſtans conſiſted for the moſt part of thoſe Nations, which having broken out of Germany into Gall, from the League and Agreement they had made with Honorius, were called Honoriani. By permiſſion of Conſtans, they over-ran and ſpoiled Spain, as far as to Palentia, and when he returned back to his Father, were appointed to Watch and Guard the Straits of the Mountains, to the great Indignation of the Spaniards, who Grudged exceedingly that Strangers ſhould be thus truſted before themſelves, whoſe Fidelity to the Roman Name and Intereſt, was ſufficiently known, and from inward Grudges they proceeded to contumelious Words and to Threats, that Spain would ſhortly provide it ſelf of new Maſters.

Vide Oroſium, lib. 7. c. 40. Caſſiodorum & Proſperum in Chronicis & Joann. Marianam de Rebus Hiſpania, lib. 5.

2. But new Maſters were ſhortly provided to their hands. For the Honoriaci we lately mentioned, whom Nature it ſelf obliged to be kind and Friendly to the

Sect. 4.

An Irruption of the Barbarians into Spain.

A Famine.

A Plague.

The diviſion of the Kingdom amongſt them.

Vandals, Alans, Suevi and Silingi, not long before let by Stilico into Gall, privily made an Alliance with them; and opening this paſſage which hitherto had been ſhut againſt them, brought them into Spain. The cauſe of theſe Nations, their changing their Habitations, was the great Fear they were in of the Goths, who by Virtue of the Agreement made with Honorius being to ſettle in Gall, they ſuſpected their ſufficiency to Grapple with them, and make good their Ground. Their Irruption into Spain was attended, as is uſual, with the greateſt Calamities. With all Barbariſm and Cruelty, they invaded the Fortunes and Eſtates, both of Spaniards and Romans without any difference, the Towns they plundered and demoliſhed, and depopulated all the Countrey. Hence inſued a Famine, and that ſo great, that one Man was conſtrained to feed upon another, and Wild beaſts on him. Famine by reaſon of ſuch unnatural Feeding, ſeldom goes without a Plague, which was now ſo grievous, that innumerable multitudes were deſtroyed, yet not at all pityed but envied by the Survivers, who were to conflict with many Miſeries worſe than Death it ſelf. Spain therefore being left in a manner deſtitute of Inhabitants, the barbarous Invaders with all Freedom, might chuſe out places to themſelves, wherein to fix. To the Suevi, and part of the Vandals, Galæcia fell, being then much larger than afterward, for it comprehended within its bounds all the old Caſtile. Luſitania with the Province of Carthagena, fell to the ſhare of the Alans, the Carpetani and Celtiberians excepted, who continued in their Fidelity to the Romans. To the Vandals and Silingi, Bætica was aſſigned. The King of the Suevi was Hermenrick, the King of the Alans, Ataco, and Gunderick of the Vandals and Silingi. This Partition being made, they concluded a Peace with the Romans, the ancient Traffick returned, and the Cities began to be inhabited as formerly. For the Spaniards partly out of Novelty, partly provoked by the Burthens laid on them by the Romans, preferred their new Slavery before their old; although ſome refuſed earneſtly to ſubmit to the Barbarian Yoke, eſpecially in Galæcia where the Suevi had to doe. This Irruption happened A. D. 409. or thereabouts in the fifteenth Year of Honorius, and the ſecond of Theodoſius Emperours, the ſame time that Alaricus beſieged Rome, Honorius the eighth time, and Theodoſius the third time being Conſuls.

Herman-riick, militibus pollens, idem quod Ermanarick. Gund-riick, Rich in Good Will.

3. In the mean time one Maximus in the hithermoſt Spain is ſaluted Emperour by the means of Gerontius, a Count, who thus ſerved his ends of Envy and Malice againſt Conſtantius. He marched into Gall, but both he and all other Tyrants quickly miſcarried, and that Countrey became fully again at the Dovotion of Honorius, who for a Guard to both the Provinces, appoints the Goths to the Roots of the Pyrenæan Mountain. By this time Alaricus their King was dead, and Athaulfus had ſucceeded him, who by the Allurements of his Wife Galla Placidia, was drawn to make a Peace with Honorius, and by Virtue thereof drew his Forces out of Italy, into theſe Confines of Gall and Spain, both which being by Honorius given to the Goths, he placed the Seat of his Kingdom at a Town known afterward, by the Name of St. Ægidius in the Province of Narbon. Hence have we that part of Gall ſometimes ſignified to us by the Name of Gallia Gothica, and great Wars happened betwixt theſe Goths and the Romans, ſometimes alſo with the Franks, as we have ſeen, who at length expelled them out of theſe Quarters. But at this time, neither did they make any great ſtay in Gall, for as Oroſius writes, they were expelled out of Narbon, and conſtrained to go into Spain by Conſtantius the Count; the Cauſe ſeeming to be this, that they had provoked the Romans, by ſetting up again Attalus the Uſurper in Gall, whom formerly they had compelled to quit the Title. Athaulfus was a Man not made for much oppoſition, being of a peaceable Temper and Inclination, acted by which as he endeavoured to compoſe the difference lately riſen with the Romans, his Men conſpired againſt his Life, and one Vernulfus ſome call him Debbius, a fellow of a Dwarfiſh ſtature, but pregnant Wit took his opportunity and ran him thorough, to revenge the Death of his Maſter formerly ſlain by the King's Command; with him periſhed ſome Sons, as appears from his Epitaph at Barcetona, which ſome count Authentick, but others eſteem it made in much later times. It ſignifies, that this Athaulfus was the firſt who dared to deſcend down the Mountains into Spain. Which he did in or about the 414*th*. Year of our Lord, the twentieth of Honorius, and the ſeventh of Theodoſius, Conſtantius and Conſtans, Father and Son being Conſuls, as ſome reckon, who muſt not be accounted the ſame with the Tyrant, and his Son lately mentioned, but that Conſtantius, to whom Honorius a little after gave the Title of Emperour.

Alaricus King of the Goths dyes, Athaulfus ſucceeds.

Who is Stab'd.

Otho Friſingenſis Chron. lib. 6. c. 21. Ado Vienenſis ad A. D. 410. Inde univerſæ Provinciæ Narbonenſi ſive Gothiæ nomen, Provincia Sancti Ægidii.

Lib. 7. c. 43.

Atha-ulf. Juratus Auxiliator. A ſworn helper, Atha in Engliſh Oath, hulf & ulf. help.

Bellipotens valida natus de gente Gothorum,
Hic cum ſex Natis Rex Ataulphe jaces.
Auſus es Hiſpanas primus deſcendere in oras,
Quem comitabantur millia multa virum.
Gens tua tunc natos & te invidioſa peremit,
Quem poſt amplexa eſt Barcino magna gemens.
Ambroſ. Moralis Chron. Hiſp. l. 11.

Sect. 4.

Sigerick ſet up for King;

But made away. Walia next choſen.

Sege-ryick, victoriis pollens, Rich in victories.

Wal-lia, bene patiens, well-ſuffering.

4. Into the place of Athaulfus was Sigerick promoted, a Man of approved Conduct both in Peace and War, and of beautifull Perſonage, onely a little lame, his Thigh having been bruiſed by a fall from his Horſe. However his former demeanour might win upon the Souldiers when King, they now interpret all things in the worſt ſenſe, and lay the ſame things to his charge, which they had done to his Predeceſſours. He was blamed as lazy, at leaſt as too much inclined to Reſt and Peace, and as guilty of the ſame Crime they impoſed on him the ſame Puniſhment, making him away, when he had not reigned one full year. The next they made Choice of was for their turn, as unquiet and buſie as any one living, his Name Walia. At his very beginning he attempted an expedition into Africk, ſome thought out of Deſperation, the Romans by Conſtantius preſſing him hard on one hand, and the Barbarians, which had already ſeated themſelves in Spain on the other. Others aſcribe it to his deſire of Conqueſt; but however it was, his Fleet gathered together in the ſtraits of Gibraltar, was broken ſo, and ſhattered by a Tempeſt, that he was forced to retreat into Spain, and there made a Peace and Alliance with Conſtantius upon theſe Terms: " That Placidia the Wife of Athaulfus, " promiſed to Conſtantius by the Emperour her Brother ſhould be reſtored; that " the Goths ſhould proſecute with War theſe Barbarous Nations that had ſeized on " Spain, and what Places and Territories they could recover out of their hands, " ſhould fall to and be annexed to the Roman Empire; they retaining what they " had already got in Gall and Spain. In proſecution of this League Walia made an Expedition againſt the Alans in Celtiberia, who now aſpired after the Empire of whole Spain, and killing Attace their King, with many of his Followers in Battel, forced ſuch as remained alive to forſake Luſitania (now Portugal) and to betake themſelves into Galatia, where being mingled amongſt the Suevi, they loſt both their Name and Nation. But ſee the viciſſitude of ſucceſs, and of Humane Affairs! The Alans had not long before domineered over the Neighbouring Nations, conſtraining the Vandals and Silingi to forſake Bœtica, and to flie for Refuge into Galatia, to the Suevi, that joining their Forces with them, by their Aſſiſtence they might recover their former Seats. With this ſucceſs they were ſo puffed up, that our Alani ſet upon the Romans, and recovered ſeveral Cities out of their hands. But now are they ſunk and buried in Oblivion by the means of Walia. Onely * Alanquer, a Town ſituate not far from Liſbon (formerly called Jerabrica) and Alanis, a Village in the Mountains of Hiſpalis or Sevil, are by ſome thought to have taken their Names from them.

Who deſtroys the Alans.

* Ab Alanis Alanqueram patriam ſuam dictam non inſcitè putat Damianus a Goes, dictam vero Alanqueram corrupto vocabulo, pro Alan per quam hoc eſt Alanorum Fanum. Kerck Scotis hodie.

Drives out the Vandals.

Dies.

5. The deſign of Walia was not completed with the Conqueſt of the Alans; from them he converted his Victorious Arms againſt the Silingi, a ſort of Vandals inhabiting Bœtica, whom in like manner he ſubdued, and by their Example the other Vandals and the Suevi were perſuaded to truckle and give good words to the Romans, the Hirelings of whom the Goths onely ſeemed to be in perſecution of the Quarrel. Walia in reward for his good ſervice had the ſecond Aquitain beſtowed on him, or rather reſtored by the Emperour, together with ſome Neighbouring Cities, viz. of Novempopulania, even all as far as from Toloufe to the Ocean. Here he reigned in quiet, but would not ſuffer the Vandals in Spain to enjoy their reſt, but ſo ferreted them from one Receptacle to another, that finding this Countrey too hot for them, they paſſed over into Africk, glad to accept of a ſlender Invitation, where making great devaſtations, they ſetled themſelves for ſome years, till at length, as we ſhall ſee at large, they made Shipwreck of all their Fortunes. Walia died at Toloufe, the Royal Seat of the Goths, but at what time, or after how many years we cannot certainly tell the Reader. Iſidore aſcribes but three to his Reign, as now we reade him, and accordingly do moſt of the Modern Hiſtorians reckon, though * John Vaſæus pretendeth to have diſcovered an Errour in the Text of Iſidore, as alſo in Sigebert, where inſtead of two ought to be read two and twenty; for ſo many doth he affirm that Walia Reigned, ſtrengthening himſelf as he alledgeth with the Teſtimonies of Proſper and Oroſius, whom he would draw in as Patrons of his Opinion. Others give ten years to his Reign, ſo obſcure are the Teſtimonies we have of theſe Ancient Times, that whereas alſo ſome place the attempt of Walia to invade Africk at the beginning of his Reign; Others fix it at the end thereof, affirming that his Hatred againſt the Goths was not terminated with the bounds of Spain, but that had he not been prevented by death, it would alſo have purſued them into that part of the World.

Proſper in Chron. Idacius, Iſidorus, Sidonius Apollinaris.

Ita intelligendus Idacius ex Editione Sermundi, cum ſcribit Conſtantium Gothis ſedes poſuiſſe in Aquitania à Toloſa uſque Oceanum, hi enim ſunt fines Aquitaniæ ſecundæ & Novempopulaniæ. Sed ampliores longe fines ditionis Gothicæ ponas, ſi qua fides Idacio edito à Sceto & Scaligero, nempe â mari Tyrrheno & Rhodano uſque ad Ligerim & Oceanum quibus finibus continetur utraque Aquitania, prima & ſecunda, ſed cave ne credas.

* In Hiſp. Chron.

Theodorick ſucceeds.

6. To Walia ſucceeded Theodored, as ſome call him, or Theodorick as others, to others known alſo by divers Names. His Predeceſſour had been ſo true to the Ro- mans, that according to Agreement, he had put the Places Conquered by him into their hands, and therefore in Spain, where the Suevi now carried all before them, the Dominion of the Goths was included within narrow bounds, where now inhabit the Catalauni. But in Gall he became very formidable, taking now more delight to inlarge his Territories on this ſide the Alps, where breaking the League with the Romans, he laid ſiege to Arles, one of the moſt noble Cities of the Countrey, which with all induſtry and reſolution he attacked, but was by Aetius the Patritian forced to raiſe up and withdraw his Army. After this he attempted Narbon but with the ſame ſucceſs, Aetius ſtill attending his motions and fruſtrating his deſigns. He had better ſucceſs againſt Littorius, a Roman Captain, who taking to his aſſiſtence the Hunns, with all Animoſity made War upon the Goths. As he paſſed through the Countrey of the Arverni, Avitus met him, put his Forces to flight, and killed an Hunniſh Trooper in a Duell, as Sidonius tells at large in the Panegyrick he wrote to him. By this Defeat Littorius was not diſcouraged, but conſulting the Aruſpices, he ventured to give Battel to Theodorick at Tolouſe, and that with ſuch Courage and Conduct, that he ſlew a great number of the Enemy, and the Victory had been uncertain, but that being taken Priſoner, he reaped the due Fruits of his Credulity and Superſtition. So write with one conſent Proſper, Aquitanus, Idacius, Iſidore, Sigebert, and Rodericus Toletanus. Onely Jornandes relates that they came off on equal terms, and the Controverſie was taken up by agreement, making no mention of the Caſe of Littorius, which conſidering he was a Goth, and a Friend to ſuch, is very ſtrange.

Who beſieges Arles.

And Norbon but is forced by Aetius the Roman General to quit them.

Gregorio Turonenſi Theudo, Iſidoro Theudoridus, Idacio Theodores, melius Jornandi Theodoricus.

Proſper, Idacius, Iſidorus.

Theude-riick, Populis pollens contracte Theudo ſive Theodo ut apud Caſſiodorum. Sic Gregorio Turonenſi Theudericus.

De Rebus Get. c. 34.

7. It appears from Salvian that Theodorick before the Battel had uſed all means for a Reconciliation, having ſent ſeveral Biſhops to Littorius to perſuade him, and bring him unto terms. Moved now by the ſame Reaſons, he made uſe of his late Victory to obtain an Honourable Peace, which was immediately clapt up betwixt the Goths and the Romans. This Peace was prudently concluded for the benefit and advantage of the Goths, though this their Society with the Romans, proved fatal to their King himſelf. Within three or four years Attila with an innumerable multitude of Hunns breaks into Gall, where he takes and burns the Towns, ſpoils the Countrey, and kills the Biſhops as well as other Lay-Perſons at his pleaſure. Avitus hereupon is by Valentinian diſpatched on an Embaſſy to Theodorick to lay open the common danger, wherein all thoſe that had any ſhares in Gall were involved. Anianus the Biſhop of Orleance, being beſieged in his City, betakes himſelf to him, and to Aetius, deſiring that by a ſpeedy ſuccour they would prevent the ruine of the place. Theodorick then leaving four of his Sons at home, viz. Frederick, Turick, Rotemir and Himmerit, takes his two eldeſt Thoriſmund and Theodorick along with him, and joins his Forces with thoſe of Aetius, and Meroneus King of the Franks. Attila is obliged to raiſe his Siege, and into the Catalaunian Fields they all draw off to diſpute the Quarrel, where, as we have already hinted, Theodorick was wounded with a Dart, and falling from his Horſe, was by the ſtroaks of his Heels diſpatched, after he had Reigned two and twenty years, leaving behind him ſix Vigorous and Courageous Sons, beſides two Daughters, one Married to Hunnerick the Son of Generick, King of the Vandals, who out of jealouſie that ſhe had a deſign to poiſon him, cut off her Noſe, and ſent her thus deformed back to her Father, as Jornandes tells us. Another Married into Spain, to Recciarius King of the Suevi.

De Gubern. lib. 7.

An Invaſion of the Hunns.

Frid-riick, Rich in Peace. Turick, Durable. Rotemir, Prince of Quiet. Him-reit, Having Domeſtick Horſe. Him, Home, Reita Equitatus. Thence Rheiter a Rider, and a Knight in Dutch. Our Rider not much altered from it.

Theodorick kill'd.

8. Theodorick being ſlain, Thoriſmund his Son was by Aetius craftily diverted from purſuing the War againſt the Hunns, whom he deſired not to have utterly overthrown, but to keep them as a Balance and Check upon the Goths and Franks. By his advice he haſted to Tolouſe, leſt his Brother ſhould attempt any thing contrary to his Intereſt, and there by univerſal conſent was received as King. Being impatient of reſt, or out of diſdain that by Aetius he had been diverted from revenging his Father's death, he broke the League made with the Romans, and laid ſiege to Arles, but by the perſuaſion of Ferreolus, the Governour, was ſo wrought upon, that he broke up his Camp and departed; which paſſage Sidonius mentions in an Epiſtle to the Governour, uſing this expreſſion, That he removed this moſt fierce King from the Gates of Arles, by a Dinner, whom Aetius could not have ſtirred with an Army. From the ſame Sidonius we may learn that at this time the Dominions of the Goths reached as far as the River Rhodanus, the Gueſt of which he calls this Thoriſmund, who ſhortly after had an occaſion offered him of ſhewing the Zeal he had for the revenging his Father's Death. Attila on a freſh invaded Gall, and by Aetius his permiſſion marched againſt the Alans, who had ſeated themſelves beyond Thoriſmund ſucceeds.

Thoriſ-mund Ferox ore. Mund, Mouth, Saxonicè; hinc Eadmund, Peace of the Mouth.

Jornandes c. 41.

Ep. 12. lib. 7.

Sect. I.

beyond the Loire. Thoriſmond perceived the weight of the War would fall at length upon himſelf, and therefore took the beſt Courſe to begin it, and drive it off, before it ſhould come to his own Doors, which he did ſo effectually, that he drove it not onely from his own Doors, but from Gall it ſelf, obliging Attila to quit the Countrey.

Who drives Attila and his Huns out of the Countrey.

9. This ſucceſs he had abroad, made him Cruel and Tyrannical at home, as by ſome Authours he is repreſented, and that to ſuch a Degree, that his Brothers and Subjects could not bear him. Being fallen into a Diſtemper, and for that Let-bloud, he was ſlain in his Chamber by ſome, that the Conſpiratours had perſwaded to the Treaſon; but to the Murtherers he ſold his Life at a dear rate (as our Richard the ſecond is ſaid to have done) diſpatching ſome of them in the Conflict with a Footſtool, or rather with his * Penknife. Iſidore tells us, that he Reigned one year, and carrying himſelf inſolently, was ſlain by his Brothers Theodorick and Frederick. Thus happens it, that when a Man is ſlain, whether Murthered or in a Duel, to preſerve the Life and Fame of the Living, the dead is uſually killed over again in his Reputation: However Thoriſmund might in ſome Reſpects be to blame, we are informed by Gregory Turonenſis, that the Goths having not yet ſhaken off Barbariſm, had this deteſtable † Cuſtome, that if any of their Kings diſpleaſed them, they made no difficulty to kill him, and appoint whom they pleaſed to ſucceed him. Therefore did the Fathers in ſeveral Councils aſſembled at Toledo by many Canons, provide for the ſecurity of thoſe Kings that Reigned over them, as by their Chriſtian Duty and Allegiance, they were obliged. Iſidore to the Government of Thoriſmund, gives but a Year. Others ſay he died in the third Year of his Reign, and there are that lengthen it to the ſixth, though with much leſs probability.

Thoriſmund murthered.

* Scalpello, ita enim legendum apud Jornandem, non Scabello monet non nemo, ut Joannes Vaſæus Hiſp. Chronic. ad An. D. 456. ex eo alii.

† Sumpſerant gothi hanc deteſtabilem conſuetudinem ut ſiquis eis de Regibus non placuiſſet, Gladio eum appeterent, & qui libuerit animo hunc ſibi ſtatuerent Regem Lib. 3. c. 28.

Concil. Toletan. 4. c. 75. Tolet. 5. c c. 3. & 18. Tolet. 6. c.c. 14. 17, 18. Tolet. 16. c. 1.

10. To Thoriſmund thus murthered ſucceeded Theodorick the ſecond, his Brother, a Prince whoſe Morals were ſtained by his Brother's bloud, and his Religion with the Arian Hereſie, but otherwiſe of excellent Accompliſhments both of Mind and Body, if we give Credit to an elegant Epiſtle of Sidonius. He had a Wife called Ragnachild, for whoſe uſe in bathing Euodius procured a ſilver Veſſel to be made, and Sidonius ſome ingenious Verſes to be ingraven on it, which he left written amongſt his Epiſtles; whence ſome Conjecture, that this is ſhe which is meant by la Reyne Pedanque, which the vulgar of Colouſe have ſo often in their Mouths, as mightily delighted with Baths and Water. Not long after the Succeſſion of Theodorick was Valentinian the Emperour murthered, and Maximus invaded the Purple and Government, who made Avitus formerly mentioned, an Arvernian by Birth, his Magiſter Militum. At this time Avitus was Ambaſſadour at Theodorick his Court about making a ſtrict League and Alliance, who uſed ſuch Arguments, and gave him ſuch Incouragement, that he aſſumed the Title of Emperour at Colouſe; afterward was both by Goths and Romans, ſaluted Auguſtus at Arles, or rather at a Caſtle called Ugernum near to that City, which done, he went to Rome and was kindly received. In Conſideration of the aſſiſtence afforded him at this time by Theodorick, he gave him Liberty to enter Aquitain, which he did with a very great Army, and there demeaned himſelf, as he himſelf pleaſed. But the Gratitude of Avitus was not confined within the Bounds of Gall, but reached to Spain alſo, where he granted to the Goths whatever Territories could be recovered out of the hands of the Suevi. After the departure of the Vandals into Africk, the power of this People became very terrible under the Conduct of Hermenerick their King, who dying at length of a tedious Diſeaſe, was ſucceeded by his Son Rechila, a Young man of extraordinary Courage and Activity.

Theodorick the ſecond ſucceeds.

Lib. 1. Ep. 2. ad Agricolam.

Lib. 4. Ep. 8.

Idacius.

Sidonius Carm. 7.

Iſidorus.

Who Haraſſes Gall and Spain at Pleaſure.

11. Treading his Father's ſteps, he conceived the like hopes of bringing whole Spain to his obedience. Andebolus, who was ſent by the Emperour to ſecure his Intereſt in the Countrey, he overthrew and killed at the River Singilis. Having by this Victory got much Riches, he fell upon and ſubdued all Bætica, having defeated the Silingi, and got the City Hiſpalis or Sevil, which had at this time been much diſtreſſed, and weakened by the Wars. Thence turned he his Victorious Arms upon Luſitania where he took the City Emerita and deſtroyed quite the ſmall remainders of the Alans, a great Advantage being given to the Increaſe of his Power by the departure of Sebaſtian the moſt valiant Roman General; who going into Africk, was there ſlain by the Vandals. Rochila that he might take off the Emperour and keep him quiet till ſuch time as he had diſpatched his other buſineſs, put into his hands Carpentania and the Province of Carthage or Carthagena, which he had lately Conquered, according to Agreement; then not long after was taken off in the middle of his Carriere, dying at Emerita a Pagan, as we have Marries his Daughter to Recciarius King of the Suevi.

it from St. Iſidore, after he had Reigned about eight Years. His Son Recciarius ſucceeded him, the firſt Chriſtian King of this Nation, who having obtained in Marriage the Daughter of Theodored, or Theodorick King of the Goths was thereby much elevated in his Hopes and Expectations. Some have delivered it for a Truth, that he was preſent at the Battel fought with Attila, following therein the Example of his Father-in-Law. It's certain that he fell upon the Vaſcons, who lived under the Roman Obedience in that part of Spain, where now Navarre is ſituated, and afterward going to viſit Theodored procured from him ſuch aſſiſtence, that invading the Tarraconenſian Province ſubject to the Romans, he took the City Cæſar Auguſta; he haraſſed the Province of Carthage, which his Father had reſigned to the Emperour, and afterward returned home being Maſter of Bætica, Luſitania and Galæcia, and aſpiring to the Dominion of the other parts of Spain.

12. But as the Alliance of Theodorick, gave him opportunity and advantage to raiſe ſuch Hopes of Dominion, and Sovereignty to himſelf, ſo by a Change of Fortune came they to be blaſted and overturned by Theodorick his means, not the Father but the Son, one who would not account himſelf obliged to ſtand to the ſame Terms of the Alliance. Avitus, as we ſaid, had for the Aſſiſtence afforded him in obtaining the Imperial Dignity, paſſed over to him, whatſoever of Spain could be recovered from the Suevi. He reſolved no link of Marriage or Alliance ſhould divert his Inclinations to inlarge his Dominion; but ſome ſpecious pretext muſt be found for making a War. Conſidering the Temper of Recciarius, he takes this Courſe. "He admoniſhes him by a ſolemn Embaſſy, not to tranſcend the "bounds of Modeſty, not by injuring and oppreſſing his Neighbours, to provoke "the Indignation and Hatred of other Nations. He tells him, that Kingdoms "and Empires are beſt founded upon Equity and Juſtice, that by Ambition and "Cruelty they fall and dwindle to nothing, and in Concluſion, that if he did not "deſiſt from offering violence to the Subjects of the Roman Empire, he muſt not "be wanting to that Duty which he ought it, being ſo exceedingly obliged by "thoſe great and many Favours he had received from thoſe which now ſate at the "Helm thereof.

13. The Device took according to his Wiſhes, for Recciarius received the Meſſage with great Stomach and ſcorn, returning for Anſwer, "that ſhortly he would be at "Tolouſe and make Tryal whether the Nation of the Goths, or that of the Suevi was "more valiant, and decide the whole matter by dint of Sword. Theodorick hearing this reſolved to prevent him, and joyning to his own Forces the Auxiliaries of the Burgundians and Franks paſſed the Pyrenæans. He marched on to the River Vrbicus, which flows by the City Hiberia and Aſturica, twelve miles from which in the Borders of Gallicia, he gave Battel to Recciarius, whom after a vaſt ſlaughter made of his Men, he compelled to run for his Life, and not daring to truſt to any place in Spain, to take Ship for Africk. The winds were ſo contrary, and his approaching Fate ſo preſſing, that he was driven into the Port of Cale, where the River Durius falls into the Ocean (called by Writers the City Portugal, or Portugal) and there being taken, was put to Death by Command of Theodorick. The Conquerour after this Victory took the City Bracara ſuppoſed by ſome to have been the Royal Seat of the Suevi: He ſubdued all Gallicia, and extending his Victorious Arms into Luſitania departed back into Gall, leaving one Acliulph Governour of his new Conqueſts in Gallicia, who being no Goth (as Jornandes is concerned to tell us) but deſcended of the Bloud of the Warni, and ſo neither regarding Faith, nor Liberty, preſently began to uſurp and ſet up for himſelf, drawing the Suevi into the Conſpiracy. Theodorick was now ſufficiently buſied in Gall, where falling out with Majorianus the Succeſſour of his Friend Avitus, he waſted the Roman Territories as far as the Rhoſne, and taking the City of Lyons plundred and much defaced it with Fire. But he ſent two Captains Nepotianus and Nericus into Gallicia, againſt the Uſurper, having ordered Ceurila into the Province of Bætica.

Ric-Are, Honore dives.

He beats Recciarius out of Spain.

Ex Jornand. & Iſidoro qui tamen fugæ Maritimæ non meminit. Ad locum Portalem capitur, ad quæ verba in margine apponit Grotius: Portum Cale. Hinc nomen toti Regno poſtea attributum. Sed de hoc alii aliter, derivant enim Portugalliæ nomen à Portu Galaciæ.

Subdues Gallicia.

The Governour whereof revolts.

14. To Ceurila, who on a ſudden, and when they leaſt imagined ſuch a thing fell upon them, the Inhabitants of Bætica preſently ſent Meſſengers giving up themſelves to the Dominion and Authority of the Goths. They deny that they had conſented to the Practices of the reſt of the Suevi, that they had conſpired againſt the Romans; they offer to give Hoſtages and aſſiſt with Proviſions the Gothick Army. So was Bætica reduced without any Effuſion of Bloud, while in Gallicia there was much oppoſition: But at length Acliulph was defeated in Battel, and being taken was put to Death. The Suevi thought now it was high time to ask pardon, which they procured by the Interceſſion of certain Religious Perſons, Agi-hulph, Sibi Auxiliator.

But at length is ſubdued by Theodorick the third.

and not onely that but which was ſomething ſtrange, Licence and Authority to make choice of a King or Regulus to govern the remainders of their Nation. Coming to the Election they could not agree amongſt themſelves. Some choſe Franta, for their Prince, but another Faction would have Maſdra or Maldra. But within two years or thereabout Maſdra was ſlain by his own People, and had for Succeſſour Remiſmund (ſome call him Rechimund) his Son, who entring into League with Franta (yet ſome ſay Franta died before Maſdra) with joynt Forces invaded Luſitania now again, it's uncertain how, reduced to the obedience of the Romans. Franta dying not long after, Frumarius was choſen in his Room, betwixt whom and Remiſmund fell out great Contentions about the Sovereignty. But Frumarius dying, he then with eaſe obtained the Monarchy, and with great Forces invading Luſitania, took Conimbrica by Treachery, and had Oliſipo (Liſbon) delivered up into his Hands.

Vide Joan. Vaſeum Hiſp. Chron. ad Ann. 458, 460.

15. He now contemned the Power of the Romans in Spain, but that of the Goths he dreaded from late experience. He ſent to Theodorick, deſiring to enter into a ſtrict Alliance with him, profeſſing all Friendſhip and obſervance, as a tye and Link of which he deſired his Daughter in Marriage. Theodorick ſhewed no Averſeneſs to a Complyance, but ſent him his Daughter under Conduct of Salunus one of the chief of his Nobility, who at his return found the Affairs of the Goths, in a quite different poſture from what they were at his departure: Theodorick having taken advantage at the Stirs and Diſturbances, which were ever and anon ariſing amongſt the Romans, whoſe Power was now almoſt dwindled to nothing in the Weſt, reduced Narbon under his obedience, having by great Promiſes prevailed with Ravennius the Governour to yield it up. But as his matters proſpered in this manner, his Dominions being inlarged in Gall, and the greateſt Potentates in Spain, Courting him, Juſtice though it came ſomething late, yet paid him home at laſt, for the violence and Treachery he had uſed toward his Brother, being murthered in like manner by his other Brother Euricus after he had Reigned thirteen Years. Eurick eaſily made himſelf Maſter of the Kingdom, who conſidering that Remiſmund King of the Suevi, might be induced by his Wife, and the flatteries of his proſperous Fortune, to attempt a revenge of his Father-in-Laws Death, thought it beſt to be before-hand with him. Being Ambitious alſo and Haughty, he burnt with deſire of expelling the Suevi out of Luſitania, and by a clear removal of the Romans, to become Maſter of all Spain.

Theodorick the third Marries his Daughter to Remiſmund King of the Suevi.

Takes Narbon from the Romans.

He is murthered by Euricus his Brother who ſucceeds.

In ejus nomine variant Scriptores Jornandi & Iſidoro Euricus, Sigiberto & aliis Eoricus, Sidonio & Gregorio Turonenſi Euarix. Ewarijck, Legibus pollens.

16. Spain was at this time cantoniſed under three ſeveral Nations. Gallicia with part of Luſitania obeyed the Suevi. Bætica and the Catalauni were ſubject already to the Goths; and the Carthaginian Tract with the Carpetani, and almoſt all the reſt of Spain continued ſtill in obedience to the Romans. Eurick having firſt made an Alliance with Leo the Emperour, who Reigned in the Eaſt, with a great Power of his Goths invaded the farther Spain, where he over-ran Luſitania without any conſiderable oppoſition, by his Lieutenants took Pompelona and Cæſarauguſta, then in the hands of the Romans, and in his retreat after a long Siege ſubdued the City Tarracon, which he levelled with the Ground. So were the Romans driven quite out of Spain, and their Empire there utterly overthrown and removed after well nigh ſeven hundred years Continuance, all this Countrey now remaining to the Goths, except Gallicia which as yet acknowledged the Suevi for Lords. Eurick his Appetite was the more Whetted by this Succeſs, and having done ſo much in Spain, was unquiet to think that his Neighbours in Gall ſhould not at all feel and acknowledge the effects of his Valour, but the facility of the Enterprize added to his Impatience, the Weſtern parts of the Roman Empire being now all full of Confuſion, while each barbarous Nation caught what it could, and being intent upon what it had fixed its Eyes, neglected what lay at a farther diſtance. The Roman power now expiring, Arvandus and Seronatus, who commanded the Forces in Gall, underſtanding his ſtrength, to curry Favour with him, invited him to ſeize on the adjoyning Provinces, while he might ſo eaſily accompliſh what he ſhould but undertake. The Treaſon of theſe two Miniſters was diſcovered and puniſhed; that of Seronatus by Death, and that of Arvandus by exile, as it had deſerved; but a greater Inſtrument was now alſo at work, which moved with far more Intereſt and Succeſs.

Spain under a threefold Goverment.

Eurick King of the Goths drives the Romans quite out of Spain.

Qui aliis Arvandus Caſſiodoro eſt Ardaburius Paulo Diacono. Et Sigeberto Servandus.

Rem fuſe narrat Sidonius, l. 1. ep. 7.

17. This was Genſerick the Vandal King in Africk, who, that he might keep what he had got in that Countrey indeavoured to make work enough for the Romans on this ſide of the Sea. He propounded great matters, not onely to Eurick and his Weſtern Goths, but to the Oſtrogoths alſo, the Captain whereof Vindemir having had ill ſucceſs in Italy came into Gall, and there joyned with Eurick, who was now waſting the Countrey far and wide with Fire and Sword. Epiphanius the Biſhop of Pavia, in vain requeſting him to hold his hand. The Cadurci, Lemovices and Gabalitani were forced to ſubmit unto the Goths, and notwithſtanding the aid which Riothimus the Regulus of the Aremorican Britains brought to the Romans at the Solicitation of Athemius their Emperour, yet he ſtill proceeded in his Conqueſts. Arvernum (now Clarmont, not far from that Hill on which ſtood Gergonia) was delivered up after a tedious and fruitleſs Siege, the chief City of Aquitain, which had been the Rampart and Fence againſt his Fury: He had before Conquered the beſt part of Gallia Narbonenſis, having made himſelf Maſter of Arles and Marſeilles, the two moſt noble Cities, and now by Virtue of the Agreement made betwixt him and Nepos, all that lay betwixt the two Rivers, Rhodanus and Ligeris he was to enjoy, Writers obſerving that with this River he bounded Aquitain. Over the Arverni he made one Victorius Governour by Gregory Turonenſis called a Duke, and by Sidonius mentioned with the Title of Count. His principal Councellour and Miniſter of State was Leo born in the Province of Narbon, a Man very learned amongſt Barbarians, and celebrated by Sidonius for his Eloquence, and his excellent Skill both in Poetry and the Civil Law. As for Eurick, he died when he had Reigned ſeventeen Years, being the firſt King who gave written Laws to the Goths, (ſo as his Name may ſeem given to him in way of Prophecy) who were formerly governed by Cuſtome onely. In his Reign the Theodoſian Roman Code was diminiſhed in Reputation, and the Laws called Leges Theodoricianæ, were advanced and obtruded upon the Provincials, Seronatus the Roman Governour conniving at it, or rather furthering the deſign, as Sidonius complains of him. Theſe Gothick Laws were called Theodoricianæ from the Theodoricks, Kings of that Nation, not that they were Authours of them, for Eurick publiſhed them, as Sidonius knew well enough, but by a Paronomaſia he terms them Theodoricianæ; becauſe the other were called Theodoſianæ. Being now firſt publiſhed by Eurick, they were ſome Years after inlarged and amended by Lennegild, as we ſhall farther hint in due time and place.

Carm. 23. Epiſt. l. 8. ep. 3. & lib. 9. ep. 13.

King Eurick dies.

Iſidorus, Sidonius, lib. 8. ep. 3.

Leges Theodoſianas calcans, Theodoricianaſque proponens. Sidonius, lib. 2. ep. 1.

SECT. II.

From the Death of Eurick to that of Roderick, and the Ruine of the Kingdom of the Goths in Spain and Gall.

The ſpace of two hundred and forty years.

1. EVrick being dead, Alarick his Son ſucceeded by the univerſal Conſent of the People, about the time that Theodorick the Oſtrogoth had made himſelf Maſter of Italy. This Prince having obtained the Dominion of that Countrey, was not wanting to himſelf by fit means and methods to ſecure his Intereſt. Conſidering that the Franks, Burgundians, and his Kinſmen the Viſigoths were all powerfull Nations, who now had cantoniſed Gall amongſt them, he endeavoured by Alliances and Affinity to unite their minds, and prevent thoſe Troubles, which he knew the fierceneſs of their Spirits, as yet half Barbarous, might elſe raiſe in the Weſtern parts. Therefore did he marry the Daughter of Clodonæus King of the Franks, who was now made a Chriſtian, and of two Daughters which he himſelf had by a Concubine, the one he gave in Marriage to Alarick, and the other to Gundibald the Burgundian. But theſe ties were too weak, to bound and reſtrain the Appetite of the Franks, whoſe King impatient of Reſt, gladly caught hold of the advantage which the difference of Religion afforded. The Provincials, or the People which were ſubject to the Goths, being of the Orthodox party, were indeed much irritated by the Arian Zeal of their Kings, Eurick eſpecially, which Tranſported him ſo far, as to raiſe a very great Perſecution. Pagans they deſired to ſubmit to, rather than Hereticks, knowing that that Idolatry and Superſtition were now become out of Faſhion, the Deriſion of the World, and therefore there could Alarick King of the Goths.

Al-riich, Omnibus rebus pollens, Rich in all.

could no inconvenience ariſe from thence, which in any Probability could be laſting. The fury of Eurick his Perſecution drove many, eſpecially Religious Perſons from their Habitations, who flying for refuge into thoſe parts of Gall, that were ſubject to the Franks, carried the heat of Indignation along with them, which kindled the Deſires of that People, and cauſed the Ambition of Clodonæus to break out at length into a mighty flame; Alaricus though otherwiſe an accompliſht Prince, ſought not how to extinguiſh the Flame by withdrawing the matter that gave the firſt occaſion, as he might have done, but ſuffered the great diſcontents about Religion to continue, either acted by an erronious Conſcience, or being confident of his own ſtrength, and glad to meet any occaſion of Quarrelling with Clodonæus in the half way.

2. The difference was inlarged by another accident: Syagrius the Count, the Son of Ægidius, whom Clodonæus had defeated in Battel fled to Alarick, and was kindly entertained by him. Clodonæus thereat ſtormed exceedingly, and procured him to be delivered up into his hands, which ſeemed to reſtore them to a good underſtanding, and perfectly to make up the breach. But the Religious Zeal of Clodonæus, or rather his Envy and Ambition, quickly diſcovered that the Caſe of Syagrius ſerved him but onely for a pretence and Colour to his deſign. Not able to endure, that theſe Arians ſhould hold any part of Gall, he perſwaded his men to undertake the War, to reduce their Territories under their own Power. To make his enterpriſe plauſible at his ſetting forth, he Commanded by an Edict, that no violence ſhould be offered to Sacred, whether Perſons or Places, which he ſignified to the Biſhops then aſſembled in a Synod at Orleance; as appears by the Epiſtle it ſelf, prefixed before the Council. In his paſſage he ſpared the Territories of Tours for the ſake of St. Martin, whom conſulting as the manner then was concerning his expedition, being ſatisfied that the iſſue would be good, he proceeded on his way as far as the River Vigenna. Here the River overflowing by reaſon of abundance of Rain, he knew not what Courſe to take, where by an Hart which took the Water, and after her arrival at the other Bank, is ſaid to have diſappeared, he was directed to a Ford, and ſo got ſafe over with his Army. Thence marched he ſtreight to Poictiers where Alarick now reſided, who appointed to give him Battel in the Plains called Campi Vogladenſes, lying from Poictiers about ten miles. There wanted no Animoſity nor Valour on either ſide. Alarick performed all the parts both of a prudent General, and a Courageous Souldier, but had the fortune to be diſmounted by Clodonæus, who then alighted and ſlew him, as he endeavoured to riſe from the Ground. The Goths utterly diſcouraged by the Death of their King, were moſt of them cut in pieces: Engoleſme which was held by a Garriſon of Goths, quickly yielded to the Conquerour. Such of them as had not been at the Battel, met together at the Borders of Bourdeaux, to prevent the Ruine of their Dominions, but giving there Battel to the Franks, received ſo great a defeat, that from them and their Religion, the place received the Name of the Arian Field.

Ait ſuis valde moleſtè fero, quod hi Ariani partem teneant Galliarum, eamus cum Dei adjutorio & ſuperatis redigamus terram in ditionem noſtram, Greg. Turonenſ, c. 2. c. 30. Aimoinus, l. 1. c. 20.

Is kill'd by Clodonæus the French King.

3. Clodonæus purſuing his good Fortune took in Bourdeaux, after which the Veſates, Cadurci, Rutheni and Arverni, yielded themſelves to his Son Theodorick. In the beginning of Spring he beſieged Tolouſe, which he took, and therein the Treaſures of the Gothick Kings, which done, he removed to Engoleſme, and having reduced the other Towns, and put ſufficient Garriſons therein, returned to Tours to perform his Devotions at the Tomb of St. Martin. So do the Hiſtorians of the Franks, and generally all Latine Writers relate the Story. Procopius makes the Caſe to be a little different, writing, that the Franks whom he calls Germans, invading the Territories of the Goths, took up their Station about Carcaſſon. Alarick expecting ſuccours from Theodorick his Father-in-Law kept himſelf at a diſtance, till his Men ready to Mutiny upbraided him with Lazineſs: Whereupon he gave Battel to the Franks, and therein periſhed with moſt of his followers. The Franks elevated with their good Succeſs beſieged the ſtrong City of Carcaſſon, where they heard the Spoils of the Temple of Jeruſalem lay, which Alarick the elder had tranſported from Rome into Gall. But Theodorick drawing toward the Siege with great Forces, they broke up their Camp, and departing ſeized on that part of Gall, which reacheth from the River Rhoſne to the Ocean. Then Theodorick deſpairing to regain that which they had got into their hands, ſatisfied himſelf with keeping that part of Gallia Narbonenſis, which ſtill remained to the Goths. But ſuch was the end of Alarick, who did not end his Life by the Halter before the Gates of Tolouſe, as one ridiculouſly has left written; for all ancient Authours agree, that he died in Battel, and Gregory Turonenſis with others, by the hand of Clodonæus particularly. He Reigned three and twenty years, and in his laſt but one, perceiving that the new Gothick Laws

Gregor. Turon. l. 2. c. 37. Aimoinus, l. 1. c. 22. Ado Viennenſis Flodoardus, Sigebertus, Abbas Urſpergenſis, Otho Friſingenſis, alii.

Petrus Valliſſernenſis Hiſt. Albig. cap. 1.

Laws ſuited not the Humour of the Provincials, who had been accuſtomed to the Roman, cauſed the Code of Theodoſius to be abreviated by ſome prudent and learned Men, and then to be publiſhed by Aimoinus his Chancellour in a full Aſſembly of the Biſhops and Nobility at Aduris a City of Novempopulania.

4. Alarick left a Son of five years old, begotten on his Wife that died a little before him, called Amalarick, and another named Geſaleich which he had by a Concubine. The Nobility deſpiſing Amalarick, by reaſon of his Age, made Geſaleich King. This could not but be highly diſpleaſing to Theodorick the Oſtrogoth, who to vindicate the cauſe of his Nephew, ſent eighty thouſand ſtout Men into Gall under the Conduct of Ilba, the Count of the Gepidæ, who had orders alſo to repreſs the Inſolence of the Franks. Geſaleich hearing of ſo great an Army, and having lately loſt Narbon, which Gundibald the King of the Burgundians intent upon Booty at this time of Extremity had taken from him, fled Cowardly into Spain to Barcelona, where he could dare to be Cruel to thoſe that were under his Power, though he durſt not look an Enemy in the Face; for with his own hands he murthered Goerick in the Court. Ilba marched ſtreight for Gall, where he gave Battel to the Franks, and by aſſiſtence of the Viſigoths, killed twenty thouſand of them, whereby Provence fell as a reward to the Oſtrogoths, and to the Viſigoths Aquitain was recovered. He took in Narbon, and was now ready to march into Spain, when Geſaleich hearing the News, and deſpairing of the Fidelity of his Souldiers, whom he had diſobliged by his Cruelty, paſſed over the Straits into Africk to Thraſimund, the Vandal King, who kindly entertained him, though he had married the Siſter of Theodorick, either pitying the Man's diſtreſſed condition, or thinking it ſeaſonable to give a Check to the Power of the Oſtrogoth, which was now grown ſo high as to threaten all the Neighbour Nations: He aſſiſted him with Money, wherewith repaſſing into Gall after a Years hiding himſelf, he hired Souldiers and re-entred Spain, where he was overthrown in Battel by Ilba twelve miles from Barcelona. Eſcaping himſelf he fled back into Gall, and there died of Grief at ſome place ſituate upon the River Druentius, in the fourth Year after he had been declared King.

Geſaleich ſucceeds.

Hunc alii Gæſalaricum, alii Geſeleycum, alii Geſaleicum, Procopius Gaſelicum appellat. Amalriick, In cœlo pollens. Geſellick, Socialis.

But flying his Kingdom,

Dyes with Grief.

5. So he died, but who ſucceeded him is not fully certain: Writers differing in their Opinions. Moſt hold that Theodorick the Oſtrogoth was now King of the Viſigoths in Spain, into which Countrey ſome ſay, that he paſſed. Indeed the Synods which at this time were held in Spain, have his Name before them, and tell us of the very Years of his Reign. But others think, rather that Amalarick was King, and that his Grandfather governed onely as his Guardian, who having all the Power in his hands, thence he was alſo preſumed to have the Title. To ſpeak indifferently, this is more probable of the two; and as for the expedition of Theodorick into Spain, we can look at it no otherwiſe than as a mere Fable, for who can be ſo prejudiced, as to imagine that ſo remarkable a thing ſhould be paſſed over in ſilence by Caſſiodorus and other eminent Writers, who have tranſmitted the particular Acts of this King to Poſterity? This is an Invention of Spaniſh Authours, ſome of whom tell you other fine tales hereon depending; as that Theodorick at Toledo married a Wife of the ancient Spaniſh Race, by the intreaties whereof being overcome, he reſtored to the ancient Spaniards their Liberty; and that of this Marriage was born Severianus, the Father of Leander and Iſidore, a Story as unconſiſtent with the Courſe of time as repugnant to truth it ſelf. It's more certain, that Theudas or Theudius Armour-bearer formerly to Theodorick, was by him made Governour of Spain, and Protectour of Amalarick in his Nonage; who when he came to the Government himſelf, it ſeems made uſe of ſuch a Deputy, one Stephen being ſaid to be Prefect or Governour of Spain, and in the third year of his Command, to have been diſcarded in a Council. Amalarick married Clotilde or Crotilde, the Daughter of Clodonæus King of the Franks, and by this Alliance a firm Peace ſeemed to be made, which he himſelf through his Fury and Indiſcretion cauſed to be broken.

Amalarick King.

Lucus Tudenſis.

Annotationes libri Alcobacienſis apud Vaſæum ad A. D. 530.

Who Marries a Daughter of Clodonæus the French King.

6. His Wife being a Catholick, and he himſelf of the Arian perſwaſion, he could not at all bear with her Faith, but treated her with all Indignities imaginable. As ſhe went to Church, he cauſed filth to be caſt upon her, and at length ſo Cruelly beat her, that the Bloud guſhed out in abundance, wherewith ſhe ſtained an Handkerchief and ſent it to her Brother Childebert, deſiring ſhe might by ſome means be delivered from the miſery ſhe underwent. Childebert being naturally full of Activity and Courage, made no ſmall haſte to her deliverance; which her Husband underſtanding prepared no Arms and Souldiers for reſiſtence, but Ships for his Tranſportation, Gregor. Turonenſ. lib. 3. c. 9.

But uſing her ill,

He is killed by the Franks.

ſportation, and was ready to go aboard, when he remembred he had left many pretious Stones in his Cloſet of ſuch value with him, that he could as eaſily part with his Life as looſe them. Returning into the Town to fetch them, before he could get back, the Army of the Franks was at the Gates, by which forced to return, he would have taken Sanctuary in a Church of the Orthodox Chriſtians, but in his way one of Childebert his Souldiers, killed him with a Lance: He Reigned five years by himſelf, twenty in all if his Reign be computed from the Death of Geſaleich. His Wife Clotilde died before ſhe reached Paris, and there ſhe was buried near to the Monument of her Father.

Theudis choſen King.

Is invaded by the Franks.

Procopius, alibi Theodim, alibi Theudam appellat. Latini Scriptores alii Theudium. Teudhais Populis imperans Theudiſch, Popularis.

7. Amalarick dying without iſſue, the Royal Race of the Viſigoths failed. Being then elſewhere to provide themſelves, the choice fell upon Theudis, he that had been Guardian to Amalarick, though an Oſtrogoth by deſcent, for his great Skill and Dexterity in Government. From Procopius it ſhould ſeem that he Uſurped, while Theodorick King of Italy was yet alive, and that this King to provide for the Affairs of Amalarick his Nephew, indeavoured by all means to get out of Spain; but to no purpoſe. For during his Government he had provided himſelf ſufficiently, both of Wealth and Intereſt; and that eſpecially, by a Marriage with one of the Nobleſt and Richeſt Ladies of the Spaniſh Nation. But the Kings of the Franks thought themſelves not yet ſatisfied, for the Injury offered to their Siſter. The year following, Childebert and Clotair invade Spain, and waſting all the Tarraconian Province, lay Siege to the City of Cæſar Auguſta, which the Devotion of the Inhabitants merely preſerved from Ruine, for therewith Childebert was affected, that he is ſaid thereupon to have raiſed his Siege. But in their retreat they were badly rewarded for their kindneſs, being in the Straits of the Mountains ſet upon by Theudiſlus, who Commanded a party of Goths for Theudis their King, a Prince ſo ſlenderly provided, that he durſt not ingage on even Terms. They loſt many of their Men, and were forc'd with Gold to purchaſe the ſafety of the reſt. This War was followed by a great Plague, which for two years ſo raged, that in Spain an innumerable multitude of poor Mortals periſhed.

8. Theudis, either to redeem his Credit, which ſeemed much impaired with the late Invaſion, or to aſſiſt the Vandals in Africk, who ſeemed now to go down the wind, paſſed over the Straits, and there laid Siege to Septa, a City facing Spain as ſtanding over againſt it upon the Water. His Siege he long continued, and was in good hope of carrying the Place, till refuſing to uſe any Acts of Hoſtility on a Lords Day, the beſieged took their opportunity, and making a Sally with ſuch execution, that they killed all that then were in the Camp; Theudis himſelf with a ſmall part of the Army, by benefit of his Ships eſcaped: This happened at ſuch time, as Beliſarius warred in Africk againſt Gelimer, who though as yet not reduced to great ſtraits, ſent ſhortly after to Theudis to deſire Aſſiſtence. By reaſon of contrary Winds, or ſome other Accident; the Ambaſſadours ſailed very ſlowly, and made little Progreſs in their Voyage, ſo that e'er they could have Audience ſome other Ships were arrived, and brought News of the taking of Carthage, and the Deſtruction of the Vandal Kingdom there. When they came to make the demands, Theudis asked in what Condition their Maſters Affairs now ſtood, to whom they replyed, that they were in a very good poſture. Whereupon he told them, that they ſhould return into Africk, and there they ſhould have a pertinent Anſwer. Being entertained by the King at a Feaſt, where all both eat and drank plentifully, they imputed the ſtrangeneſs of his Anſwer to the exceſs of Wine, and the next Morning demanded another Audience, which granted, they heard but the ſame Words repeated, and thereupon ſuſpecting the matter, found their Suſpicion not to have been ill founded at their return. Not long after, Theudis after he had Reigned ſeventeen Years and about four Months, was ſlain by one that Counterfeited madneſs for that purpoſe. Before he expired, he Commanded the Murtherer ſhould not be puniſhed, calling to mind that he himſelf had killed his Captain, to whom he had when a young Man ſworn Fidelity.

Theudis murthered.

Theudiſelus.

Theudiſelus ſive Theodiſelus Jornandi, Thiodigis, gloſſa.

Iſidorus.

9. He being dead, Theudiſelus his General was choſen King of the Viſigoths, a Man that had got much Honour in the War againſt the Franks, and of good Eſteem otherwiſe, as being the Nephew of Totilas, King of the Oſtrogoths in Italy by his Siſter. His good beginnings were within a little time quite blemiſhed by his Prodigious Luſt which hurried him into Cruel and Treacherous Acts, procuring for feigned Crimes and otherwiſe, ſeveral of the Nobility to be made away, that with Freedom he might enjoy their Wives. This cauſed thoſe that apprehended themſelves in danger, and had otherwiſe reaſon to be concerned, to enter into a Con-

Who is murthered.

In his place Agila elected.

A-geld, liber, Immunis, non ſolvens. Geld ſive gelt, nummus.

Aten-gild, commeatus tribuens.

But is ſlain by Athanagild, who ſucceeds him.

And dyes.

ſpiracy for taking away his Life, which was done at Hiſpalis or Sevil, in the midſt of his Cups and Jollity, after he had Reigned a year or ſeven months, though others extend it beyond a year and an half continuance. Into his place was elected Agila, who all his whole Reign contended with adverſe Fortune. At his firſt beginning the Inhabitants of Corduba denied obedience, which obliged him to lay Siege to their City, but they iſſued out upon him, and quite defeated him, killing his Son upon the place. As the merits of Men are meaſured merely by Succeſs, he began preſently to be deſpiſed, which incouraged one Athanagild to rebell, who to ſtrengthen himſelf ſent to Juſtinian the Emperour, deſiring aid for to accompliſh his revolt, and promiſing to reduce a good part of Spain to the obedience of the Roman Empire. Liberius a Patritian was accordingly ordered to march out of Spain, who about Sevil gave Battel to Agila, where the King being overthrown fled to Emerita and there was ſlain by the Nobility, after he had Reigned ſome ſay five Years and ſix Months, others five and three Months, and Sigebert with leſs Probability nine Years. Athanagild ſucceeded in the Kingdom, but had work enough to find him doing all his Life, made by the Army of Juſtinian, which he had called in to his aſſiſtence. For now having obtained what he deſigned, he reſolved to forget his Promiſe, and indeed he muſt either break it, or looſe that which was the end he propoſed; the Gothick Nobility being highly concerned, that the Romans had once again got footing in Spain, of which a very conſiderable part by Virtue of the League with him, and by force of Arms they had recovered, their Dominions being terminated by both the Seas. He had by his Wife Galſuinda two Daughters, Galſuinda married to Chilperick King of Soiſſons, and Brunichild the famed Wife of Sigebert his Brother, King of the Mediomatrices or Auſtraſia, of which we hear enough in another place. He died at length at Toledo, after he had Reigned ſome ſay fourteen, others fifteen Years with ſix Months. In the Kingdom of Portugal, ſixteen miles from the City Guimarane, (by the Ancients called Idania) is a Village yet extant, that bears his Name, poſſibly built in his time, where are to be ſeen Ruines of buildings, which perfectly ſhew they were of Gothick work.

Linva King.

Liwa, Leo.

Leunigild his Partner.

Lewi-gild, Leoni Par.

Who drives the Romans out of Spain.

Ubi ſit iſta Sabaria plane neſcimus. fatetur Mariana; an Sabaudiam & Sabaudos, legendum ſit? Ita intelligere locum videtur Jacobus Valera, Johannes Abbas.*

Linva dyes.

10. After the death of Athanagild, followed an Interregnum for ſix Months, though in Lucas Tudenſis, we find ſeven Years and as many Months, which place is doubtleſs corrupted. The ſtate of the Kingdom could very ill bear the want of a Governour for ſo many days, but ſo long the Factions of the Nobility continued. At length they agreed to promote Linva (ſo he is called in ancient Coins) who then at Narbon Commanded thoſe parts of Gall, which ſtill remained ſubject to the Weſtern Goths. Having been accuſtomed to theſe parts for ſeven Years, he had no Inclination to move into Spain, and therefore in the ſecond Year of his Reign he made Leunigild his Brother Partner with him in the Kingdom, committing to his Care and Government the other Provinces that were ſubject to the Goths. This Leunigild by Theodoſia his former Wife, the Daughter of Severianus Governour of the Carthaginian Province, had two Sons, Ermenigild and Reccared, but ſhe being dead about the time that his Brother was made King, he had married Goſuinda the Wife of Athanagild his Predeceſſour. Being a man of great Courage and Conduct, and ſeeing what danger lay from the Romans, who had got ſo much of the Countrey into their Power, he could not forbear but preſently led againſt them; and in the Region of the Baſtetani gave them Battel, with ſuch Succeſs that he beat them out of this whole Countrey: The Territories of Malaca he waſted with Fire and Sword, had Aſſidonia a Town ſtanding upon the Straits, betrayed to him by Framidanius the Governour, reduced Corduba to obedience, which ever after the defeat given to Agila, had refuſed to ſubmit, with ſeveral other Towns, and all the Tract of * Sabaria. While he thus employed himſelf in Spain, his Brother Linva or Linba as others call him, died in Gall after he had Reigned five Years, or as others but three, of this Opinion being Iſidore.

Leunigild makes War upon Cantabria.

Then Aquitain.

Biclarenſis apud Marianam de rebus Hiſp. lib. 5. c. 11.

11. Leunigild having ſetled the Affairs of Bætica, and driven the Romans out of all the Province, turned the War upon Cantabria, where he took the City Amaia, (by others called Aregia and Varegia) having waſted all the Countrey to the Gates, and killed many that denied Submiſſion. From Cantabria he moved into Aquitain, where he forced Aſpidius to ſubmit, and put himſelf his Wife and Children into his hands, who had held the City Agen againſt him. We are told by a certain Authour, that this Aſpidius was a Senior in this Countrey, uſing this word as a Note of Dominion and Principality. A Senate was ſo called from Senes, or Seniores; for that ſuch Conſult and govern is moſt proper and wholeſome for a State. Therefore in

Sect. 2.

in ſucceeding times, as well in the Monuments of Spain, as in the Acts of ſuch Councils as were held about the time of Charles the Great in Gall, Lords and Princes are termed Seniores, which cuſtome being derived into the Baſtard Latine Tongues of Spain, Gall and Italy, thence the Titles of Sennor, Signior and Signeur in thoſe Modern Languages received their Original. The ſame year that Linva died, Miro or Ariamyrus ſucceeded his Father Theodomir in his Reign over the Suevi, who died two years before. We have heard nothing of a long time of theſe Kings ſince Remiſmund, of whoſe Succeſſours either as to their Names or Actions we know little or nothing, thoſe Monuments which ſhould have tranſmitted them to us having periſhed.

In Chronic. ad Æram 402.

Joannes Abbas.
Lucas Tudenſis.

12. But Iſidore puts us off with this ſcantling account, after he had told us ſome ſmall matters concerning Remiſmund, and how the Hereſie of the Arians was propagated amongſt the Suevi by one Ajax, that many Kings of the Suevi afterwards remaining in the profeſſion of that Hereſie, at length Theodomir came to be King, who by the aſſiſtence of Martin a famous Biſhop, reſtored the Catholick Religion. After Theodomir reigned Miro, who reigned thirteen years, and in his ſecond made War, as the Copy now hath it, upon the Roman Roccones. Another Authour tells us it was againſt the Aragones, and a third calls them Vaſcones, with more reaſon the ſame with thoſe that now inhabit part of Navarre. Leunigild being returned out of Aquitain into Spain, began every day more and more to grudge and diſdain, that the Suevi or any others beſides himſelf ſhould have any thing of that Countrey. He could not forbear attempting ſomething upon their Borders, which Miro ſenſible of, and knowing his own ſtrength, took the beſt courſe to ſend a ſubmiſſive Meſſage, but he could not prevail for any thing more than a Truce. Then turned he his Arms upon the Roman Forces, which Juſtin the Emperour had ſent to protect the Limits of Spain. Their cheif reſidence was upon the Mountains called Oroſpedæ, which riſing at the roots of the Hill Cannus, run through Molina Coucha to Segura, and the Borders of Granado as far as the Straits of Gibraltar. Truſting to the Steepneſs and Cragginеſs of the place, they refuſed to ſubmit, but he reduced all the Forts and Caſtles, and the whole Province under his Dominion, whereby it came to paſs that the Romans were in a manner driven out of Spain, little now being left them but a ſmall tract of Ground upon the Mediterranean Sea.

Leunigild makes Ermenigild and Reccarde Partners with him in the Kingdom.

Erman-gild militibus tribuens. Reke-reden, ultor cum ratione, To wicked read his ear, i. e. To Evil Council. Reede etiam Saxonice Doctrina. Ita Recaredum interpretatur Grotius, ego autem potius hoc modo. Riſch-reden vel Riſch-rede, pollens Conſilio. Vocatur enim Ricared adeo bene ac Reccarede.

Ermenigild converted to the Faith.

13. His matters being in ſo hopefull a poſture, in reference to Foreign Potentates, he was the more concerned to think how they ſtood at Home in relation to his own Family, for whether it or ſome that never had taken any care and pains, ſhould reap the fruit of his Labours was utterly uncertain, Kings being wont to be choſen by the ſuffrages of the Nobility, and no way of Succeſſion at all Eſtabliſhed. To prevent this, he declares his two Sons Ermenigild and Reccarde his Partners in the Kingdom, the former being to reign at Sevil, as ſome, or as others ſay at Emerita, and the latter at the confluence of the two Rivers Tagus and Guadiela near Paterniana or Paſtrana, Leunigild building a City which after him he called Reccopolis (vulgarly Ripol,) as ſome imagine, in Celtiberia. He himſelf placed the Seat of his Kingdom at Toledo, whereupon it began to be called the Royal City, and to be the Seat of the Kingdom, as formerly had been Hiſpalis or Sevil. Ermenigild Married Ingundis the Daughter of Sigebert King of the Mediomatrices by Brunichild, a device as 'twas thought very proper for ſtrengthning his Intereſts, for ſhe being the Grand-daughter of Athanagild and Goſuinda hereby the Bloud and power of both theſe Royal Families were conjoyned. The Maid being brought to her Grandmother, ſhe ſoothed her up with extraordinary flatteries, to win her to imbrace Arianiſm; but when this would not doe, treated her with as great indignities, not onely with words, but blows, and once tumbled her down into a Fiſh-pond, to the great danger of her life; which notwithſtanding ſhe not onely kept her Religion, but is thought to have brought Ermenigild, now her Husband, to the imbracement of the truth, to which the long diſtance of King Leunigild gave a good opportunity, who had now taken a Journey to the Carpentani in the hithermoſt Spain; at what time Ringundis the daughter of Chilperick and Fredegund was coming to be married, according to Covenant, to Reccarde the other Son. But having reach't Toloufe, ſhe heard of her Father's death, procured, as was thought, by Laudrey, and ſo returned again to her own Countrey; which known, Reccarde married one Bada, the Genealogy of which Woman cannot be drawn by any mortal hand.

Is perſecuted by his Father with War.

14. But the Grandmother ſo plied Leunigild with Solicitations and Arguments drawn from Piety and Religion, that he muſt needs chaſtiſe his Son with War, if otherwiſe he could not reduce him. “ He ſends a Menacing Letter, accuſing him “ of ingratitude and diſobedience, arguing him of folly for renouncing ſuch a Faith “ as the Goths had hitherto profeſſed with great proſperity and ſucceſs; and tells “ him, that if now he did not comply, he muſt expect no paternal compaſſion for “ the time to come. The Son returns a modeſt, but reſolute Anſwer, “ That “ there was one higher than him, whom he muſt needs obey, if their Commands “ were contrary, and praying him to doe nothing whereof he might have occaſion to repent him all his life, and which would bring a perpetual Infamy upon “ their family. But the Father not remaining ſatisfied with his Son's anſwer, they both provide for War. The Son gets the Romans on his ſide, but they preſently again for money renounce the Alliance made with him, and promiſe their aſſiſtence to the Father. They ſpent three years in ſeeking Friends and making Alliances, till at length Leunigild in an Hoſtile manner invades Bætica, and lays Siege to Hiſpalis, for ſtarving of which he conſulted how he might divert the Courſe of the River Bætis upon which it ſtands, and fortified a place four miles off, where the Walls of the Ancient City Italica formerly ſtood, where now is to be ſeen a Monaſtery of St. Iſidore, the Moors, it's probable, after the times of the Goths having deſtroyed the City. Miro, King of the Suevi, though of the contrary perſuaſion as to Religion, joyned with Leunigild, and was (as a puniſhment for ſo great a crime as ſome believed) taken away by Death in the time of the Siege. Eburick, or Eborick his Son, ſucceeded him in the Kingdom of Gallicia, whom not long after Audeca, a wealthy man, deprived of his Kingdom, and thruſt into a Monaſtery, having married Siſegatia, the Relique of Miro. But ſee the juſtice that attended the Uſurper. Leunigild within a year or two diſdaining that the Son of his Friend and Ally ſhould be ſo ſpoiled of his Inheritance, invaded Gallicia, took Audeca alive, and cauſing him to be ſhaven, put him alſo into a Monaſtery, and made him receive Orders. He ſeized on all the treaſure, and reduced Gallicia into the form of a Province; the Kingdom of the Suevi being thus overturned after it had continued one hundred and ſeventy four (ſome ſay ſeventy ſeven) years.

Johannes Abbas.

Turonenſis autem ſcribit dum in Patria defunctum, fœdere pacto cum Leunigildo.

The Kingdom of the Suevi overturned.

15. But to return to Hiſpalis, the drawing of the River away from it brought it into extreme neceſſity, which Hermengild not able any longer to ſtruggle with, ſecretly ſtole away to the Romans, not knowing they had dealt ſo perfidiouſly with him already as to join with his Father. Leunigild quickly got the Town into his poſſeſſion, and not long after his Son into his hands. Some think he was betrayed by the Inhabitants of Corduba, whither he had retired upon notice how matters ſtood betwixt his Father and the Romans. Others ſay it was at a place called Oſſetum, which being ſtrong, he ſeized with three hundred ſtout men, hoping to make ſome oppoſition, but the Town was taken, and he fled into a Church for Sanctuary, whence being by the kind words of his Father drawn out, he was afterward put to death, one Sisbert being Executioner, when he refuſed to receive the Communion at the hands of an Arian Biſhop. But Authours differ about the place of his death, ſome affirming he was made away by Sisbert at Tarracon, and that before that he had been baniſhed to Valentia. Others, that he was Martyred at Sevil, where they ſhewed a Tower near to the Gate of Cordova, wherein they ſay he was kept Priſoner, horrible for ſtraitneſs and darkneſs, and they honour him as a great Saint, celebrating his Feſtival on the thirteenth of April, by virtue of a Bull of Sixtus Quintus. Ingundis his Wife full of tears and ſorrow, with her young Son, fled into Africk; the Roman Captains, to whoſe Cuſtody ſhe was committed, purpoſing to convey her to Mauricius the Emperour as ſome notable booty taken in War.

Ermingild ſlain.

Joannes Abbas, Gregor. Turonenſ. lib. 8. c. 28. Baclarenſis Gregorius Dialog. lib. 3. c. 31.

16. Childebert her Brother, and Guntran her Uncle, Kings of the Franks, were ready to plead her Cauſe by dint of Sword, when Reccarede the younger Son of Leunigild diverted them from Spain by making an Inroad into their Territories in Gall, where he took a ſtrong Caſtle called Ugernum in thoſe belonging to Arles, and waſted the Countrey in a dreadfull manner. This brought both Parties to liſten after an Accommodation, when other things happened which incenſed the Franks to an higher degree of Indignation. Some of their Ships as they were Trading to Gallicia, were intercepted by thoſe of the Goths, and as well the Men as the Veſſels and Goods belonging to them were made prize. This made the two Kings give deaf Ears to what was pleaded by Leunigild his Ambaſſadours; and Mariana tells us he has an Authour which affirms that Reccarede, now again from Narbon, made an Incurſion into the French Dominions, waſting many fruitfull and pleaſant places of Gall.

Gall. It's certain that Childebert was ſo moved as to enter into a League and Alliance with Mauricius the Emperour, whoſe friendſhip he had formerly deſpiſed for driving the Lombards and Goths out of Italy and Spain. And being, it ſeems, obliged firſt to begin with Italy, he ſent thither a conſiderable Army, which was defeated with ſo much loſs, that Childebert was much cooled in his deſign of making the ſame Attempts upon the Goths, eſpecially when he heard that ſhe, for whoſe ſake he had imbraced the quarrel, was dead, either in Africk or Sicily, and perceived that the Emperour would lend his Name and Reputation, but not his helping hand to any enterprize conſiderable. Her Son, we are told, was carried to Conſtantinople, where what became of him, is utterly unknown, but probably he had the happineſs not to ſtay long behind his Mother. Much about the ſame time died alſo Leunigild in the eighteenth year after he had began to reign with his Brother. He had the happineſs before his death to reduce and take Priſoner Malarick or Amalarick, who had the confidence to Uſurp in Gallicia, and ſet up again the Kingdom of the Suevi. He was cruel in his diſpoſition, having, beſides his Son, put ſeveral other Noble men to death. He firſt of all thoſe Gothick Kings filled his Treaſury with the Goods of the Church, and the Eſtates of private men as well as Enemies. He firſt uſed a Throne and Royal Robes, whereas thoſe before him ſate and were habited like the Nobility. The Laws made by Eurick, he mended, taking away and adding as to him ſeemed moſt convenient.

Leunigild dies.

Iſidorus Lucas Tudenſis.

17. Reccardus, or Ricared, ſucceeding his Father, ſet himſelf to reform Religion, aboliſhing Arianiſm, and eſtabliſhing the Catholick Faith, and that with as little noiſe and trouble as could be expected in a matter of ſuch concernment. For eſtabliſhing a firm and laſting Peace to his Dominions, he deſired to be friends with the Kings of the Franks, and as a more powerfull way to effect it, his Wiſe Bada being dead, he deſired in Marriage Clodoſinda, the other Siſter of Childebert, King of Auſtraſia, utterly denying that he was of Council with his Father, or had any hand in the misfortunes of his Brother, his Wife and Son. The thing could not preſently be accompliſhed; for Guntran the Uncle had not yet digeſted the affront offered to his Family, but would by Arms be revenged, ſending Deſiderius with conſiderable Forces to waſte the Territories of the Gothick Gall, where the Goths at firſt had the worſt, and ſhut up themſelves within the City Carcaſſon, but afterward took their opportunity, and made ſuch a ſally upon the triumphing and ſecure beſiegers, that they ſlew their Captain, and killing moſt of them, the reſt ſecured themſelves by ſhamefull flight. This Defeat did but more exaſperate the ſpirit of Guntran, who to recover his credit, the year following ſent no fewer than ſixty thouſand men under Command of Boſo into the Gothick Borders. News being brought into Spain that ſuch a ſtorm was approaching, Claudius the Governour of Luſitania deſcended of Roman Bloud, was ſent away to protect the Borders, who finding the Franks near Carcaſſon, the happy place of their late defeat, reſolved there again to fall upon them, and with the like ſucceſs. For he defeated them in Battel, killed many in the fight, and not a few in the purſuit, took their Camp with all their Baggage, and obtained ſuch a victory, that if Iſidore be not partial, a more eminent one never had happened in Spain, the glory whereof was increaſed by the ſmallneſs of the number of thoſe that fell on the Gothick ſide. For you muſt know this defeat of threeſcore thouſand Franks was effected by the Valour of three hundred Goths, ſo powerfull was the Tongue, ſharp the Sword, and prevalent the Example of Claudius their Captain.

The French worſted in two Expeditions againſt the Goths.

18. Ricared having the good fortune to be Victour both in the field againſt his publick Enemies, and at home againſt ſuch Conſpiratours, as out of hatred to his Religion had contrived his deſtruction, obtained ſo much repute in the World, that at length his ſuit was admitted, and Antharis the Lombard being put off, to whom ſhe had been as good as promiſed, Clodoſinda was ſent to him, and a ſtrict Alliance and League was made betwixt the Nations. What time the Marriage was Conſummated, Authours do not agree amongſt themſelves; but evident enough it is, that toward the latter end of his Reign the League was made betwixt the Franks and him. This farther added to his Glory, That the Romans which ſtill remained in Spain, were by his endeavours reduced to an inconſiderable Number and Power. By the ſame good fortune he reduced the Vaſcons to obedience, when they had entertained Councils of dangerous conſequence. He was a Man of great goodneſs as well as felicity, being ſingularly good natur'd, and very pious, to which being added excellent wit, and great endowments both of body and mind; he left a great miſs of him behind him, dying at Toledo after he had reigned fifteen years, one month

A League and Alliance ſtruck up 'twixt theſe two Nations.

Ricared dies.

month and ten days. He had two Wifes, as we have ſeen, viz. Bada, Daughter, as they ſay, to Arthur our famed King of Britain, and the French Lady lately mentioned; and he left three Sons, but by what Mother or Mothers, cannot be determin'd. The eldeſt was Linva (Luiba or Loiba) whom ſome will have the Son of Bada, but Iſidore writes that he was begotten of an Ignoble Mother, ſo that ſome conjecture he was baſe born. And as for the other two, viz. Suinthila and Geila, their Original as to the Mother's ſide is rather more obſcure.

Ignobili quidem matre progenitus, ſed virtutum indole inſignitus. In Chronic. ad Æram 639.

Swint-las, Potentia exutus. Geld-wilar, Pecuniam expectans potiùs cupiens.

Linva the Second ſucceeds.

19. Linva his eldeſt Son ſucceeded him, and being very young (not twenty years old, ſome ſay hardly fifteen) was ſo obnoxious to the plots and devices of bad men, his Father's great Merits could not protect him, although he gave to all men very good hopes that he would not tread but in his ſteps. He was circumvented and ſlain by the treachery of one Witterick, accuſtomed to ſuch Villanies, when he had ſcarcely reigned two years. Being a goodly perſon, and taken away in the flour of his youth, he was exceedingly lamented by his Subjects. In Spain there were not long ſince extant ſome Golden Coins ſtamped with his Image, and words which argued his eminent piety; in which Coins, leſt he be thought the ſame with Linva the Firſt, his great Uncle, he has on his Head a Royal Crown, a thing not uſed by any of thoſe Gothick Kings till the time of Leunegild, as we before hinted. Witterick having ſeized on the Kingdom, held it for the ſpace of ſix years and ten months, or thereabout, being a Souldier good enough, which he teſtified by the Wars he managed with the Romans, though the ſucceſs he had againſt them was not anſwerable to that great Ambition he had to drive them quite out of Spain. He was moreover ingaged againſt Theodorick King of Burgundy, to whom having married Hermenberga his Daughter, ſhe was diſgracefully ſent back to him, for what reaſon, and upon what account, we conſider in the Hiſtory of that Kingdom. Whatever the Cauſe of the Separation was, it could not, in his opinion, take off the injuſtice of the Fact, and the affront was ſo intolerable, as nothing could expiate it but the Ruine of him that had given the offence. And he ſo plied his buſineſs, that he made a very promiſing League and Alliance betwixt himſelf Agilulf King of the Lombards, Clotair the inveterate Enemy of Theodorick and Theodebert the King of Auſtraſia his Brother, for the Conquering of the Kingdom of Burgundy. But Theodorick had at this time the good fortune to draw off his Brother, and thereby it came to paſs that this terrible Conjunction and Confederacy dwindled by degrees to nothing. This brought the Uſurper into ſuch diſgrace with his People, that calling to mind his ill title, and the means he had uſed to advance himſelf, the Multitude ruſhed into his Court, and ſlew him as he ſate at meat, having performed nothing ſutable to his pretences, nothing memorable, but that his Captains took Seguntia from the Romans.

But is ſlain by the treachery of Witterick.

Aliis Vintericus, Beitericus, Detericus, Vietericus & Tiutericus.

Who ſeizes on the Kingdom.

Wicht Riſch, Pondere dives.

Upon whoſe death Gundemar is elected King.

20. He being ſlain, one Gundemar obtained to be King, whether as a reward of what he had performed againſt Witterick, or by the ſuffrages of the Nobility, is uncertain; ſome do very probably conjecture, that it was not without the aſſiſtence of the Franks; for they owed malice to Witterick, and it appears that Gundemar paid them an Annual Tribute from ſome ancient Records which were extant but in the days of Mariana. We find farther, that the Ambaſſadours of Gundemar, though ſacred by the Law of Nations, yet were violated or abuſed by them; and although juſt occaſion of War was thence afforded, yet he ſent others who neither could get any Audience of the Kings. Herewith Bulgaranus the Count, who governed the Gothick Gall as Lieutenant to Gundemar, found himſelf ſo concerned as to ſtop the Ambaſſadours of Theodorick, and deny them acceſs into Spain, and was ſeeming to be now coming on, to be before-hand with the Franks, he took by ſtorm two Towns in Gallia Narbonenſis, which by virtue of an Agreement made by Ricared, were aſſigned to the uſe and ſervice of Brunichild the Queen, who dying not long after, they never were re-demanded of the Goths. Gundemar in the mean time reduced the Vaſcons which had rebelled in Spain, and had good ſucceſs againſt the Captains and Forces which were ſet to protect the limits of the Roman Empire in that Countrey. This having done, he fell ſick and died at Toledo, having reigned no more than one year, ten months and thirteen days, leaving no iſſue behind him by his Wife Hilduara, at leaſt that is known to us. He was an Excellent Prince and much bewailed, Fortune having but ſhewn him and his Vertues to the World, and then as envying his People ſo great an happineſs, having again ſuddenly withdrawn him from their ſight.

Argumento Vectigalis annui quod Francis à Gundemare ſolvi conſueviſſe ſatis conſtat ex Bulgarani Comitis Galliam Gothicam pro Rege ea ætate gubernantis literis, quæ ad hanc diem Compluti & Oveti inter veteres ſchedas libriſque ſervantur, lib. 6. c. 2.

Who reduces the Vaſcons to Obedience,

And dyes.

21. The

Sect. 2.

Suſſe Butte, dulcis cupa, labrum.

Siſebatus choſen in his place.

Reduces the Aſtures and Ruccones to obedience.

Weakens the Roman Power in Spain.

And dyes.

21. The grief that all good men conceived for the loſs of him was mitigated by the good hopes of the Vertues of his Succeſſour, one Siſebatus upon that account choſen by the Suffrages of the Nobility. And their expectations he both confirmed and increaſed by the Courſe of his Actions. The Aſtures and Ruccones who had rebelled, truſting to the places they inhabited, which were very difficult of Acceſs, he ſpeedily reduced to Obedience. The Remainders of the Roman Power being now driven up to the Straits of Gibraltar, and the Shore of the Ocean he proſecuted and leſſened, giving them two notable defeats, and taking not a few Towns from them in Bætica and Luſitania, part of which Province they ſtill held, but were now reduced to ſuch a low condition, that they were ready to pack up and to depart. The Glory of his Arms he increaſed by the Fame of his Clemency and good Nature; for ſuch Priſoners as he took, he would often diſmiſs without Ranſome, and pay the price of the Redemption of Souldiers out of his own Treaſury. While he behaved himſelf in this manner, and diſcharged all Offices of a good and pious Prince, he was taken away by Death, after he had reigned eight years, ſix months and ſixteen days; but how he came to his end, is utterly uncertain, ſome reported that he died of an Hypercatharſis, or too violent a purgation by Phyſick he took, others ſaid that he was poiſoned by his Phyſicians, as happens uſually in the death of Princes, eſpecially if their departure be ſudden, or if they be loved and admired by the People.

22. There are two Laws of this Siſebate mentioned in the twelfth Council of Toledo. “One prohibiting his Succeſſours under an heavy Curſe to ſuffer a Chriſtian to be a Slave to a Jew, or to ſerve him. The other depriving him of all Enſigns of Honour, who in time of War ſhould either refuſe to go out in Perſon, or forſake his Colours, which as too ſevere, was mitigated by Flavius Eringius. To this ſame Siſebate is alſo aſcribed the beginning of Naval preparations, whereas the Goths had heretofore been ſtrangers to the Sea; but now the Roman Power in Spain, being even quite extinguiſhed, there was means and opportunity enough to apply themſelves to Sea matters. Siſebatus being dead, Reccared his Son ſucceeded, an Infant, who bearing the Title of King but for three months, after which time he died, or was depoſed, thereupon it came to paſs that by ſeveral Authours he is not put in the Catalogue of Kings. Both Father and Son being removed, one Suinthila who had Commanded the Army of Siſebate, and by Arms obtained great eſteem, was choſen King by the Nobility. Some write that he was the Son of Recaned the Firſt, and married Theodora the Daughter of Siſebate. He was a man of great Courage, and indefatigable Induſtry; very prudent in Conſultation, and of a mind ſo propenſe to all Acts of Munificence, that he was ordinarily called the Father of the Poor. In his time the Vaſcons forgetting the ſmart of that chaſtiſement he had formerly when a Subject inflicted on them, again rebelled, and with Fire and Sword invaded the Tarraconian Province, but he marching againſt them, they were by his very preſence affrighted into good manners, and ſubmitting themſelves as a puniſhment or expiation of their offence, he cauſed them to build a * City called Oligitus, or Oligitis, as a Rod for their own back, to be a curb and a check to their Rebellious humour for the time to come.

Vide Joann. Vaſæi Chronic. ad Ann. 621.

Reccared his Son ſucceeds.

Hunc Iſidorus Pacenſis ait tres tantum menſes regnaſſe. Rodericus Toletanus ſeptem, quem ſequitur Alſonſus.

Who being made away, Suinthila is choſen King.

A. S. Iſidoro & Luca Tudenſi in Catalogo Regni non ponitur.

Who chaſtiſes the rebellious Vaſcons.

Hanc civitatem alii in Navarra dicunt eſſe eam quæ vulgo dicitur Olit, alii in Caſtella veteri, quæ vernaculo nomine Valladolit nuncupatur. Sub judice lis eſt.*

Is ſole Monarch of all Spain.

He makes Rechimir his Son his Partner in the Kingdom.

23. Suinthila had farther the good fortune to make himſelf Monarch of all Spain, a thing which had not happened to any of the Gothick Kings. For now was the time of Dominion of the Romans in this Countrey expired, one of the Patritians or Governours being drawn off to the King's party, and the other overcome by force, after they had for ſeventy years held part of Luſitania and Bætica with various fortune; and a wonder it is they ſhould ſo long hold out and keep their poſſeſſion of thoſe parts lying upon both the Seas ſo long as they did; but as ſome very well conjecture, that which maintained their Power, was the ſupply they conſtantly had out of Africk, for which they lay ſo convenient; which when it came to be ſubdued by the Saracens, the Intercourſe ceaſed, and conſequently for want of maintenance their ſtrength and intereſt quickly fell into irreparable decay. Theſe things were atchieved by Suinthila within five years compaſs of his Reign, whereby having ſo well provided for his Kingdom, he thought he might now make proviſion alſo for his family. The Kingdom, as we have ſeen, was Elective, or in the diſpoſal of the Nobility; but he to eſtabliſh it in his own Houſe, made Rechimir his Son his Fellow or Copartner in the Title and Government. This was plainly an alteration of the Political frame, which the Goths would not endure, but were ſo alienated in their minds and affections from him, that falling into moſt grievous diſorders, they drew confuſion upon themſelves, and forced him to quit the Title.

24. As

For which he is depoſed.

24. As there never wants ſome, who make their Markets out of publick Calamities, and raiſe themſelves out of the Ruines of others, there was one Siſenand a very good Souldier, who took the opportunity to ſet up for himſelf. His Ambition carried him into France, where by reviling Suinthila, and urging the eaſineſs of the Enterprize, he obtained Forces of Dagobert for outing him of his Power, under the Command of Abundantius and Venerandus. Theſe Forces appearing before Cæſar Auguſta, the Nobility forſook Suinthila and his Son and received Siſenand for their Prince, which Renunciation was afterward confirmed by the Fathers of the fourth Council of Toledo, adding thereto an Excommunication and Deprivation of all his Eſtate, other than what it ſhould pleaſe his Succeſſour, their moſt Pious Prince as they call him out of his Piety to beſtow upon him and his. What ground there was for this heavy cenſure cannot be underſtood, for that he was a very good Prince at leaſt at his beginning, we muſt believe from Iſidore. Indeed there are that lay Vice to his Charge, and it is not a thing ſtrange to the Nature of man, to be puffed up and enervated by Proſperity. After his Succeſs againſt the publick Enemies, ſome ſay, he gave up himſelf to be governed by Theodora his Wife, and Agilan his Brother, which procured him the Indignation and Hatred of his Subjects. The Fathers in Council aſſembled may a little be ſuſpected of Partiality, not to ſay injuſtice, for cutting off from the Communion of their Body, a Prince who could not offend in ſeeking to maintain that power, to which he had been legally Elected. But hence ſeems the miſchief to have proceeded: He indeavoured to ſettle it upon his own Family by the aſſociating of his Son, without the Authority of the uſual Election interpoſed. Iſidore here makes a ſtop of his Hiſtory, as unwilling to relate the diſgrace and Miſeries of a King formerly very famous, and whom he had commended to Poſterity for his Vertues, being alſo his Kinſman. He Reigned ten Years: His Son Rechimir dying much about the ſame time, or rather being depoſed with him, is not reckoned amongſt the Kings (as neither Henry the Son of our Henry the ſecond, becauſe he died before his Father) but is confounded with him, as ſome of the Spaniſh Writers have obſerved.

Rodericus Toletanus. Michael Ritius.

And Siſenand obtains the Kingdom.

25. Siſenand having obtained his Deſires as to the Succeſſion, was ſolicitous to keep what he had got how juſtly or unjuſtly ſoever, as knowing that ſome other might write againſt him after the Copy, which he himſelf had ſet. Sufficiently aſſured, that no pretence is ſo plauſible and effectual as that of Religion, in the third Year of his Reign he ſummons the Biſhops to meet in Council, making ſhew of Zeal for having the Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline reſtored, which through the iniquity of the times had much gone to decay, but intending to procure the Acts of Suinthila to be condemned by the Fathers, and conſequently bring thoſe of his party to acquieſce in the Alteration lately made. Accordingly his Poſture, Habit and Geſtures were fitted, in mean Clothes, preſenting himſelf to the Synod, where kneeling on his Knees with Tears which he had at Command, he deſired their Prayers to Almighty God in his behalf. Here now amongſt other things of Eccleſiaſtical Concernment, it was decreed, that none ſhould be King, but he that was admitted by the free choice of the Nobility and Prelates, and Suinthila, as we hinted, his Wife, Sons and Brother were curſed after the Chriſtian manner, for what they had impiouſly and Cruelly committed in the abuſe of the Royal power. Another thing is ſaid to have been done in this Synod, reſpecting the Civil as well as the Eccleſiaſtical ſtate of the Kingdom, and that was the publiſhing of that Volume of Gothick Laws, which hath been wont to be called Forum Judicum. Many learned Men and very good Antiquaries have been of this opinion. But others chuſe rather to aſcribe the thing to Egica, one of the leaſt of the Gothick Kings; foraſmuch as many are therein extant, which have the Names of following Princes. As for Siſenand there is nothing now that is memorable of him; but that there's a difference about the length of his Reign, ſome counting it to have conſiſted of three Years, eleven Months and ſixteen days; but others extend it to the ſpace of five Years and more.

Dyes.

Chintila Elected in his ſtead.

26. Into his Place according to the method preſcribed by the Council, was one Chintila elected, who thought it a very wiſe Courſe to follow his example, of ſummoning the Fathers together by their Reputation to gain farther ſtrength unto his Title. The ſtate of the Church being of Courſe in the firſt place provided for, the laſt in Execution, but the firſt and principal in his Intention and Deſign was accompliſhed as much as in them lay, the ſafety and Proſperity of his Perſon and Government. His election is confirmed, and Care is taken of his Sons, that after his Death they be no way injured nor moleſted. The Curſe is renewed upon him, who ſhould arrive at the Sovereign power, by any other means than that of Election, which is alſo reſtrained to the ancient Nobility of the Goths: And it is made utterly unlawfull to attempt it, during the Life of the preſent King, as that which would open a Door to all ſorts of Tumults, Seditions and Treaſons. This Synod being held in the firſt Year of his Reign, conſiſted but of two and twenty Biſhops, in ſuch great haſte he was to have his matters ſetled, and therefore in that following, he aſſembled another Council conſiſting of above fifty, called the ſixth Council of Toledo, wherein the Decrees of the former Synod were confirmed. And by this Political courſe he attained his end, the People being kept in order by this ſhew and pretence of Religion. For nothing elſe is he memorable. He died after he had Reigned three Years eight Months and nine days.

Dies.

Then is Tulga choſen King.

His Character,

And Death.

Alii Tulcam & Tulganem appellant.

27. His empty place was ſoon filled by one Tulga, who was no whit unworthy of the place, nor of the Suffrages of thoſe that elected him. He was a Man young in years, but old in prudence, Valour, and in all well grounded Principles of Vertue and Honour, furniſhed with all Abilities requiſite to ſo high a Calling, which no way puffed him up, nor made him forget ſuch as miſery and want had plunged to the loweſt condition of Mortals, whom by his extraordinary Clemency and Munificence he raiſed and refreſhed, eſteeming his Royal Treaſures to be in this way beſt employed. He was extraordinary belov'd by the People, and their love being ſo great, the greater was their ſorrow that they could not any longer enjoy him, for he continued with them but two years and four months, dying then of ſickneſs at Toledo. So write and conſent the Spaniſh Writers generally, onely Sigebert the Abbat hath publiſhed another Doctrine, as that he was a young man of a light and frivolous diſpoſition, and by his Licentious Courſe of Life, ſo provoked his Subjects that they depoſed and forced him to take Orders; but a certain Biſhop who lived in thoſe very times, who both heard and ſaw, and accordingly made Relation as we have no reaſon otherwiſe to judge, is in this matter of Report to be preferred before a ſtranger, who either out of prejudice againſt the Nation, (ſo the Spaniards imagine) feigned this ſtory, or received it from other hands, which e'er it could reach the true Hiſtory through the diſtance of place was quite altered, as in other Caſes is too uſual.

Chindaſuinthus Uſurps.

Summons the ſeventh Council at Toledo.

Makes his Son Partner with him in the Kingdom.

Dyes.

De tempore Iſidorus Pacenſis, Lucas Tudenſis, alii differunt Antiqui, uti ex Recentioribus Joan. Vaſæus & Mariana.

28. The Commonwealth upon his Deceaſe, being toſſed by the Waves of Tumult and Ambition, and ready to periſh, one Flavius Chindaſuinthus by force of Arms made himſelf Maſter of the Helm, for it's ſafety and Preſervation as it happened. Having illegally and Tyranically invaded the Kingdom, he governed it in a quite different manner, as one that deſired to aboliſh the Memory of his coming in, by a conſtant Tenour of Juſtice and Moderation. He knew ſufficiently how much the Countenance of a Synod would contribute to the Settlement of his Intereſt, and reſolved as ſoon as things were ripe, as ſpeedily as the Temper of the Nation would bear it, to call together ſuch an aſſembly. But he durſt not attempt it at firſt, he could not truſt the Biſhops, whom he knew much averſe to what he had practiſed about the Kingdom, till by his Acts of kindneſs and good Government, he had taken off the edge of their prejudice, and had at leaſt laid the Foundations of their good Opinion towards him. Having done this, in the ſixth Year of his Reign, ſome ſay the fifth, he ſummoned the ſeventh Council to Toledo. He ſo effectually did his buſineſs by this and other Expedients, that what had proved fatal not long ſince to one of his Predeceſſours, he durſt Attempt with all Confidence and Alacrity. After he had governed alone for the ſpace of ſix Years eight Months and twenty Days, as ſome compute, he declared Flavius Receſuinthus his Son his Aſſociate in the Kingdom. After this he lived three Years four Months and eleven Days, which time is reckoned to his Sons Reign, (by reaſon that he governed all in the extreme Age or Dotage of his Father) and died at Toledo, ſome ſay of a natural Diſeaſe, others by Poiſon. His Body together with that of his Wife Richerga was buried in the Monaſtery of St. Romain, upon the River Durius betwixt Taurus and Tordeſylla.

Receſuinthus ſucceeds in the Kingdom.

29. Receſuinthus obtaining the Kingdom by Succeſſion, was the more concerned to take Care how to keep it in the Poſſeſſion of his Family. He uſed the ſame means his Predeceſſours had done, aſſembling the Biſhops and Nobility for the Settlement both of Church and State. For the Reader muſt take Notice, that theſe Councils, though commonly they be eſteemed merely Religious meetings, were indeed the Comitia or General aſſembly of the Nation, Lay-Perſons meeting and Voting in them as well as Eccleſiaſticks, as in the firſt which this King called together commonly known by the Name of the Eighth Council of Toledo, we reade of

Who calls the eighth Council,

And ninth at Toledo.

Subdues the Vaſcons.

And dyes.

fifteen Counts and illuſtrious Perſons, that joyned with the Biſhops and Abbats. Whereas other Princes had uſually got ſome Decrees in their own behalf for the inlarging or ſtrengthening of their Authority, he to pleaſe the People and preſerve his Title, which he was conſcious was illegal, parted with ſomething whereof his Father had ſtood poſſeſſed, a Regulation of Tributes, and Exactions being made for the eaſe of the Subject, who in times of diſturbance had been oppreſſed, and not eaſed in time of Peace, Impoſitions once laid on being very ſeldom taken off in any Government. Two years after another meeting was held, called in Books the ninth Council of Toledo, upon the like occaſion, and for the ſame reaſons as the former, as alſo in the year that followed another meeting which bears the Name of the tenth. Not onely did Recceſuinthus provide for making of new Laws, but reviſed the old ones, which had been depraved by the Injury of time, repealing many and adding more as appears from the Volume it ſelf, wherein the Laws made by this Prince, exceed in number all the Sanctions of the other Kings. All theſe matters related to Peace, but he ſhewed himſelf as fit for Military Affairs. For he repreſſed the Inſolence of the Vaſcons, who again made Incurſions into the Neighbouring Provinces and obliged them to reſt in obedience, and duty as before. He died after he had Reigned twenty three Years ſix Months and eleven Days, the time he Reigned with his Father being computed, and was buried as ſome write in his Village then called Gerticos and now Bamba.

Calendis ſeptembris ut ſcribit Rodericus Toletanus.

In Territorio Palentino.

Wamba choſen King.

But againſt his Will.

30. The Kingdom of the Goths which exceedingly flouriſhed in his time, was by his Death reduced into a very tottering Condition, the effect of its Conſtitution for being not ſetled upon any Family, but ſtill Elective as it ſeems they would have it, notwithſtanding the late precedent of Recceſuinthus, the hopes and Ambitions of the ſeveral Competitours drove all into Faction and Diſturbance. To put an end to theſe miſchiefs, the Nobility made choice of one Bamba or Wamba, a man very well accompliſhed for the place, but ſo prudent as to foreſee the danger of it. He earneſtly deſired to be ſpared, and ſo long till a certain Nobleman drew his Sword and vowed if he would not be King, he ſhould be no more a man: Yielding to the Threats rather than the Prayers and Deſires of the Nobility, he yet refuſed to be Crowned before he came at Toledo, hoping in the mean time their minds might change, or ſo to compoſe differences, that he might take the Diadem with univerſal aſſent and ſecurity. After he had taken the uſual Oath to maintain the Laws and Liberties, and was anointed by Quiricus the Biſhop of the place, a Vapour is reported to have riſen from his Head, and a Bee to have flown up aloft, which paſſage might have more ſeemed fabulous, if Julian the Biſhop of Toledo had not affirmed it in the Book he wrote of the War of Narbon. He was born in that part of Luſitania, which to the ancients was known by the Name of Igeditavia, where there's yet a Town extant and called Idavia, and a piece of Ground wherein is to be ſeen a Fountain incloſed with ſquare ſtone, which bears alſo the Name of Wamba; the Inhabitants believing, that the Ground was formerly in the Poſſeſſion of this King. Some reported, that he was an Husband-man, and by extraordinary Deſignment and Revelation was drawn rather than led to be King, but this ſeems no other than a Fable, none of the ancient Writers making mention of any ſuch matter, which being ſo remarkable, they would not have paſſed over in ſilence.

The Vaſcons renew their Hoſtilities.

A Conſpiracy in the Gothick Gall againſt him.

31. No ſooner was Wamba fixed in his Seat, but News was brought him which ſhewed his apprehenſions of trouble and danger not to have been vain or frivolous. The Vaſcons incouraged by the differences raiſed about the Succeſſion renewed their Hoſtilities, which cauſed him to raiſe an Army with all ſpeed, and ſuppreſs the miſchief e'er it too far proceeded. As he employed himſelf herein on the Borders of Cantabria, a matter of more dangerous Conſequence was brought to his Ear, that a great Conſpiracy was made againſt him in the Gothick Gall, by ſuch as envied him the Royalty. The Head of this Conſpiracy was Hilderick the Count of Nemanſus, who preſuming upon the great diſtance of place, and his great power in theſe parts, drew in Gumild the Biſhop of Magalona and Remigius, an Abbat, both his Neighbours. Aregius the Biſhop of Nemanſus refuſing to joyn with them, was removed and baniſhed into Gall, and Remigius put into his place. They turn now all things into Confuſion: The Jews who had been baniſhed they recall, conceiving they would not a little ſtrengthen their Intereſt. Wamba as ſoon as he could conveniently ſent one Paul againſt them, a Grecian as they ſay, both as to Birth and Fidelity, though a man of good Conduct, both in matters relating to Peace and War. He inſtead of extinguiſhing added Fuel to the Flame, entring ſpeedily into Confederacy with the Rebellious Goths, and drawing to his party Ranoſindus the Tarraconian Duke and Hildigiſus called alſo Gardingus, a word denoting Magiſtracy and Power. By their Council and Aſſiſtence Barcelona, Gerunda and Auſa are ſeized in the entrance into Spain; and now they are for Gall, where they doubt not to be too ſtrong for the King's Friends.

32. Being come to the City of Narbon, Paul calls both the Citizens and the Souldiers together, to whom he accuſes Agebandus the Biſhop of the place, for having cauſed the Gates to be ſhut againſt him and his followers, as indeed at firſt he did, till ſatisfied more of his own Inability to contend with them, than of the righteouſneſs and Juſtice of their Cauſe, he commanded that they ſhould be admitted. He indeavoured to prove it Lawfull, to renounce obedience unto Wamba; who he affirmed was not legally choſen, but onely by the raſh adventure of a few Perſons, and at length came to the point, that they ſhould make choice of another, whom being legally Elected, they might as legally and Chearfully obey, and follow, to ſuppreſs the Faction of the Uſurper Wamba. Hereat Ranoſindus not by chance, nor on a ſudden, doubtleſs with a loud Voice and much Earneſtneſs affirmed, that a more worthy Perſon than Paul himſelf could not be found, which was received and approved by divers that were there ſet on purpoſe; the confuſed multitude embraced it, and the Wiſer ſort in ſuch Confuſion and Danger thought it beſt for them to be ſilent. Then was Paul pronounced King, and the Crown ſet on his Head, which formerly Reccared had dedicated to Fælix the Martyr, for the Rabble that promoted him, ſpared nothing, either ſacred or prophane. Hilderick the firſt Authour of the revolt was eaſily drawn in to own him, though he could have wiſhed himſelf the Man; and ſo all the Cities of the Gothick Gall readily ſubmitted, as alſo did no ſmall part of the Tarraconian Spain, drawn by the Authority of Ranoſindus. Paul now thinking himſelf ſecure, and ſwelling with the Pride of his high preferment, wrote Letters to Wamba full of opprobrious Language; and from them and the great Faction which now prevailed, ſome very rationally think, that the Fable proceeded of his being an Husbandman, and taken from the Plow-tail to wear a Crown, whereas he was of the prime Nobility of the Goths, and of higheſt place and Eſteem with the former Kings.

Paul Uſurps.

33. Wamba upon notice of the Treaſon of Paul, called the Nobility together to conſult what was to be done. Some were for marching preſently againſt the Rebels, to prevent the farther ſtrengthening of themſelves, urging that Expedition in War doeth the greateſt wonders. Others were for deferring the Expedition, till he could gather more ſtrength by ſetling his Affairs, and increaſing his Army, the weakneſs whereof was evidently ſeen in this, that as yet the Vaſcons were not fully reduced to obedience. He made choice of the former Courſe as the ſafer, both in reſpect of the Enemy, who if let alone might grow too formidable, and the minds of his own Men who being now full of Anger and Deſire of revenge, he thought it not fit to let them cool; but incenſe them farther as he did, by laying before them as well the Horridneſs of the Rebellion it ſelf, as the Miſeries which their Friends underwent, that lived within the reach of the Uſurper. By his words the Souldiers were ſo confirmed and animated to fight, that within ſeven days they quite ſubdued the Vaſcons, a fierce and warlike Nation, as a good beginning and Omen of future Victory. As ſuch receiving it, with incredible Alacrity and ſpeed they marched through Calagunis and Oſca, into the Borders of Catalaunia, where they were divided into three parts; whereof one had Orders to make for Caſtrolibya, the Metropolis of the Ceretani, another was ſent againſt the Anſetani, and a third was Commanded to waſte the Countrey lying by the Sea, the King himſelf marching after with a ſtrong party, and executing Diſcipline ſeverely againſt ſuch as raviſhed Virgins, and made Depredations contrary to Command.

Wamba ſubdues the Vaſcons.

Then marches againſt the Uſurper.

34. Coming to Barcelona, he took it with much eaſe, and reſerved the Authours of the Revolt to puniſhment. Gerunda was delivered up by Amator the Biſhop, who had received Letters from Paul, bragging that he would ſpeedily be with him, and adviſing him to receive and own him as King, who ſhould firſt be there; which having read, Wamba not improperly ſaid, He has Propheſied concerning us and our coming. Thence after two days, they entred and paſſed the Straits of the Pyrenæans without any Lett or Moleſtation, having taken by ſtorm Cancoliberis, Vulturaria and Caſtrumlibya, the plunder of which was given to the Souldiers, beſides Clauſara a Town, as the Name declares, ſituate in the very Strait it ſelf, wherein were taken Ranoſindus, Ildigiſus and others of the chief Conſpiratours. From Sordonia Wittimir fled, leaving it to the Conquerour, to bring News to Paul, who was all this while making Preparations at Narbon, and firſt thought to meet Wamba and give him Battel, but afterwards changing his Opinion, left that City to the Care of Wittimir, and betook himſelf to Nemanſus there to receive the Succours he expected from the Galls and Germans. The King being deſcended into the plain, ſtaid two days to Rendeſvouz his men, who were to come ſeveral ways over the Mountains. Then did he diſpatch away four of his beſt Captains to reduce Narbon with Competent Forces, furniſhing out moreover a Navy to block it up by Sea. The Land Army got firſt thither, and having in vain ſolicited the Inhabitants to return to obedience, took it by plain Force, and therein Wittimir who to their Summons had returned nothing but reviling words. The taking of this Town quite ruined the Faction, the People now beginning to reflect upon Paul and his Title, and to talk of the mild and peaceable Temper of Wamba. In the ſame Courſe of Victory were alſo taken by force Magalona, Agatha and Biterris, and therein ſeveral of the principal Conſpiratours.

Takes ſeveral Towns, and ſome of the Conſpiratours.

35. Paul ſtill kept himſelf within Nemanſus, a City in thoſe times much flouriſhing with multitudes of Inhabitants, ſtately Buildings, and the ſtrength of the Walls, as conſiderable as any other in Gallia Norbonenſis; having many Monuments in it of the Roman Empire, and amongſt the reſt a ſpacious Theatre, which adjoyning to the Wall ſerved very well in the room of a Caſtle. Four Captains were ſent before by Wamba, who being elevated with the late Succeſs and good Souldiers, though not much skilled in what concerned Sieges, impatient of delay fell upon the Town as ſoon as they ſaw it, with the Force of thirty thouſand Men, they brought along with them. No Courage, no Animoſity ſutable to their ſeveral Concernments was wanting to either party, Night onely parting them for the preſent. But the beſiegers retiring, thoſe within thought themſelves Victours, and one of them in the heat of the fight inſulting over the Kings Souldiers boaſted, that ſhortly would arrive to their Relief, ſuch multitudes of Germans and Franks, as would drive them up like Deer and cut their Throats. A ſmall matter oftentimes in War adminiſters occaſion to ſome extraordinary Occurrence. The News hereof was ſent to Wamba with Deſire of ſpeedy ſupplies, foraſmuch as all hope of Victory was placed in expedition. He diſpatches away ten thouſand Men more, under the Command of Wandemir, who marching all Night reached the place the next day, before the Aſſault was renewed. At the ſight of them Paul was quite out of heart, yet made a Speech to his men full of Words, ſignifying Confidence and reſolution; and the ſtorm was renewed with great fury, which pertinaciouſly continued till the day was far ſpent, and the beſieged were quite tired out. Then did the beſiegers ſcale the Walls, ſet fire to the Gates, and batter the Walls. At the entry, the Citizens and Franks imagining, that the Town was betrayed by ſuch Spaniards as Paul had brought along with him, to gain pardon from the King, fell upon and killed many of them. Being therefore beaten down and ſlain before by the King's Souldiers, and behind by their late Friends within; this promiſcuous ſlaughter afforded a miſerable Spectacle, nothing being to be ſeen but Bodies weltring in their Bloud, to be heard, but the Groans of dying Men, the ſhrieks of Women, and the miſerable crying of Children in all places.

At laſt Nemanſus, wherein the Uſurper was.

36. Paul who had been the Cauſe and Authour of ſo great a Calamity, putting off his Robe retired with a ſelect Company to the Theatre, where truſting to the ſtrength of the place, he reſolved to obtain honourable Terms, or to dye Courageouſly upon the ſpot. It's obſerved of him, that he put off the Royal Enſigns the very day of the Year, namely the firſt of September, whereon Wamba at the inſtance of the Nobility had put them on. Part of the City being taken, the Officers would not proceed till the King came, that he might have the Honour of the Conqueſt. The Townſmen thought fit to ſend out Arbegundas their Biſhop to mediate for their pardon, who meeting him four miles off from the City, on his bended Knees with Tears and Lamentations, indeavoured to mitigate his Anger, which in great meaſure he effected. For Wamba triumphantly entring the City, which now yielded wholly to him, Paul himſelf and above twenty other Officers, notwithſtanding his former reſolution ſubmitted to his Mercy. He pardoned the multitude, and took three days time to conſider how to puniſh Paul, and his chief Adherents, in the mean time taking Care for the cleanſing of the City, and the repairing of the Fortifications on that ſide, that lay toward the Franks, who were reported to be on their way, with a deſign to have raiſed the Siege. Some of that Nation and of the Saxons, who had either remained there as Hoſtages, or had been drawn in to ſide with the Rebels at the beginning, he ſent away not empty handed. The three days being paſt, he mounts a Throne more elevated than uſual, and the Priſoners are brought before him. He firſt trod upon all their Necks, and then demands of Paul, whether by any Injury he had been provoked to contrive this wicked deſign againſt his King and Countrey. He denied he was at all injured, on the contrary affirmed he had received much kindneſs from the King. Then was his oath of Allegiance to Wamba recited, and the oath which he exacted from the People at his Uſurpation. Then was pronounced the Sentence againſt Rebels, according to the Laws of the Councils, viz. "Ignominious "Death, with the Confiſcation of all their Eſtates, with this Promiſe, that in Caſe "the King had pardoned them their Lives, yet they ſhould at leaſt be deprived of "their ſight. Yet did the King out of his innate Clemency and deſire to win the affection of the People, inflict no other Puniſhment upon them, than to cauſe their Hair to be cut off, which in thoſe times was taken for the chief Mark and token of Nobility.

The Uſurper's Tryal.

37. All this while Chilperick King of the Franks, was reported to be at hand with a conſiderable Army. He thought fit therefore, to ſtay and expect him for ſome time; but having ſtaid four days to no purpoſe, he concluded he had done enough, both for the reaping the Fruit of the late Victory, and his own Reputation, and leſt by provoking the Franks he ſhould ſeem firſt himſelf to have broken the League, he reſolved to prepare for his removal out of Gall. But while this was in hand, News was brought him, that one Lupus a Captain of the Franks waſted the Countrey about Biterris, which obliged him to move towards him with his Army, although it did not much retard his Journey. For the Rovers hearing of his coming in a confuſed manner fled to the Mountains, leaving their plunder behind them, ſo that the Gothick Army had nothing to doe, but to kill and take pillage, wherewith inriched, it marched back to Narbon without having received any wound. Hence part of it was ſent to re-inforce the ſeveral Garriſons of the Countrey, and the reſt of it being commended much for Valour in a Military Oration, was disbanded at Canaba, a Town belonging to Narbon. The King returned into Spain, and in great Triumph entred Toledo, the ſixth month after he had thence departed, with mighty Honour for his late Atchievements. The Rebels went before upon Camels, with their Heads and Beards ſhaven, in ragged Clothes: Paul in greater deriſion wearing a Crown of black Leather. The King's Souldiers followed after very well clad, and carrying Joy and Triumph in their Countenances, the King himſelf bringing up the Rere, and by his reverend gray Hairs, and the Reputation of his late Actions increaſing the Majeſty of his Royal Office. The whole City ran out of the Gates to meet him, and aſtoniſhed at the Spectacle followed him with their lucky Acclamation; and the Solemnity ended by conducting the Criminals to perpetual Priſon.

Wamba returns Victoriouſly to Toledo, with his ſpoils and Captives, who are condemned to perpetual Impriſonment.

He fortifies the Town.

38. Wamba being now at reſt and ſecure as to Foreign matters, applied himſelf to the inriching and adorning his Kingdom, that it might reap the Fruits of that Peace which at preſent it enjoyed. His Royal ſeat of Toledo he inlarged and compaſſed, With a perpetual Wall, as one terms it, reaching from the Suburbs of St. Iſidore to both the Bridges. For this City is more than three parts of it waſhed by the River, which betwixt exceeding high Banks runs headlong amongſt the Rocks and Stones. The other part of it has a moſt difficult acceſs from the Plain, being before the time whereof we write, Fenced with a narrower Wall, the remains of which were to be ſeen in the time of Mariana. Now by the diligence of Wamba, were the Suburbs taken in, and to make it more ſure, a lower Wall was added to the former, Marbles which were taken out of the Roman buildings, being to be ſeen in it, wherein are ingraven Images repreſenting Wheels or Roſes, thought by the Vulgar to have been Wamba his Arms, but erroniouſly, foraſmuch as they are placed in no Order at all, but confuſedly as they happened to be brought to hand. But in a certain Tower he cauſed ſome * Verſes to be ingraved, as a Teſtimony of his publick Spirit, and as his Monument to poſterity, and on the tops of Towers erected ſtatues to ſome of the Saints, of white Marble, to which as Tutelaries or Patrons, by other † Verſes, he recommended the City, which Verſes being obliterated, and the ſtatues decayed and fallen down by the force of that, which brings to a Period all ſublunary things, Philip the ſecond King of Spain, in the laſt Age commanded to be repaired.

* Erexit fautore Deo Rex inclytus urbem
Wamba, ſuæ celebrem protendens gentis Honorem.

† Vos Domini Sancti, quorum hic præſentia fulget,
Hanc urbem & Plebem ſolito ſervate favore.

39. Wamba his delight in things of this Nature, was at laſt interrupted by a report of a mighty Fleet of Saracens, coming out of Africk: For this People having in a manner Conquered all that Countrey, with no fewer than two Defeats the Saracens.

Is poiſoned by Eringius.

Turns Monk.

hundred and ſeventy Ships infeſted the oppoſite Coaſts of Spain, againſt which Wamba making as early oppoſition as he might, rigged up his own Fleet, and manned it out with ſo reſolute Souldiers and Seamen, that they quite defeated the Saracens, and either took or burnt all their Ships. Some, and not without reaſon, ſuſpect, that by the ambitious practices of Count Ernigius this Fleet was brought againſt Spain, to make way for his promotion, by the deſtruction of Wamba. In the Reign of Cindaſuinthus one Ardanaſtus being baniſhed by the Emperour his Maſter, came out of Greece into Spain, and committed himſelf into the hands of the King, who kindly entertained him, and gave him to Wife his own Kinſwoman. Of this Marriage was born Ernigius (or Eringius as ſome call him) who being brought up at Court, could not content himſelf with the Title of Count, but aſpired after the Regal Diadem; of compaſſing which, he was not without advantages, being in great favour with the Nobility, which he both got and preſerved by his affable carriage and humour, well accommodated to the temper and diſpoſition of the times. Yet knowing he could not accompliſh his deſires ſo long as Wamba lived, nor yet after his death, if the Nobility ſhould be allowed a free choice, becauſe Theodefred, the Brother of Reccesuintha was ſtill living, who had at the laſt Aſſembly been onely omitted for his tender Age, he reſolved in ſome extraordinary manner to attempt it. The buſineſs of the Saracenian Navy having miſcarried, he procured poiſon to be given to the King, who falling thereby into great torments and danger, when he now ſeemed ready to give up the ghoſt, had his Hair cut off, and put on the habit of a Monk by the perſuaſion of Ernigius, who when his head was light and intoxicated by the force of the poiſon, eaſily * procured him to nominate him his Succeſſour, which was done by a Writing ſealed with the King's Seal. Ernigius perſuaded him to take the Habit, hoping by that means to unking him, though he ſhould recover. And he was not miſtaken in his Apprehenſions, for Wamba the next day coming to himſelf, yet reſolved to accept of the Religious kind of life, either through his greatneſs of mind or deſpairing to reſettle himſelf; Ernigius having in this time, in a manner, ſeized on the Sovereignty. Therefore did he betake himſelf to a Monaſtery in a Village called Pampliga, where he moſt devoutly ſpent the remaining part of his life, viz. ſeven years and three months, or as others ſay above. He reigned eight years, one month and fourteen days.

Ernigius obtains the Kingdom.

He calls the twelfth,

And thirteenth Council of Toledo.

Cap. 5.

40. Flavius Ernigius thus by indirect means obtained the Kingdom of the Goths, and knowing that things ill got ſeldom proſper, ſet himſelf with the greater care and induſtry to the preſervation of it. He remembred that in ſuch caſes as his, and at a dead lift Religious Pretences had done wonders, and therefore he will be as zealous as any of his Predeceſſours, the Cauſe of Religion and Privileges of the Church are now much in his mouth, as moſt dear unto him, for which purpoſe he muſt alſo call the Fathers together. The Fathers loved to meet one another often, and being eaſily made to believe that Wamba reſigned his Crown to Ernigius, confirmed out of gratitude and prudence the poſſeſſion of it to him, for they wiſely concluded that it was good ſleeping in a whole skin; and why ſhould not they ſubmit to Providence, and own him that was in poſſeſſion? To this they were more induced, or as we may ſay, hired by a privilege granted by this Uſurper from the Crown, that whereas heretofore it belonged to the King alone to make Biſhops, he granted it to the Archbiſhop of Toledo. Scarcely were two years paſſed and gone when he calls them together the ſecond time to make farther proviſion for his good Government. In this Meeting of Eccleſiaſticks and Seculars, which is called the Thirteenth Council of Toledo, an Act of Oblivion paſſeth for ſuch as had taken part with Paul the Uſurper, and becauſe little money was ſtirring, and too heavy burthens lay on the People, certain Impoſitions are taken away, and the Arrears forgiven. For now (as in all ſuch caſes of Uſurpation, Uſurpers ever making beſt Laws) not the King, but Ernigius was concerned, the Controverſie was not whether the Privileges of the Crown be maintained, but whether the Houſe and Family of him that wore it was to be preſerved. Whereas men of mean Parentage, had by indirect practices crept into places of Dignity and Honour, and the Bloud of the ancient Nobility of the Goths was even quite imbaſed by promiſcuous and unequal Marriages, care is taken for prevention hereof for the time to come. To theſe was another Law added in favour of Linbigotona the Queen and her Children, to protect their Perſons and their Eſtates; that they might not feel the effects of that Popular Scorn and Indignation which they had too good ground to fear might fall upon them after his death.

41. All

---

* Ita quidem conciliandi ſunt omnes Rerum Hiſpanicarum Scriptores cum Actis Concilii Toletani duodecimi in cujus capite primo confirmatur Electio Regis Ernigii & univerſa Synodus teſtatur ſibi & ſcriptis & teſtimoniis conſtare Ernigium à Wambane (ita enim appellat) electum Regem antequam ſe monaſticæ vitæ Conſecraret & Conſecrationem ipſius ab eodem Rege Juliano Præſuli ſtudioſe Commendatam.

In Mugnoni valle ſitum? an prope Burgenſem civitatem?

And fourteenth Council of Toledo.

And as much as in him lay provides for his family.

And dyes.

41. All this Proviſion yet did not ſatisfie the mind of Ernigius, but the following year he muſt Summon another Aſſembly, which is called the Fourteenth Council of Toledo, a good occaſion being preſented of confirming the Acts of the Sixth General Council held at Conſtantinople. Beſides the trade of Councils whereby he knew that he obliged the Eccleſiaſticks (the beſt part of the State) more than by any courſe he could take, he reſolved to provide farther for his Family by an Alliance with the Family of Wamba, Marrying his Daughter Cixilo to Egica, the Kinſman of the injured and deceaſed King. He took an Oath of him, that in caſe of his death he ſhould by all means poſſible procure the quiet and ſafety of the Queen his Mother-in-law and her Children, not ſuffering any one to invade the Rights or Eſtates of the Orphans. His Family being ſetled, as well as in prudence he could deviſe, he ſet himſelf to the amendment of the Laws, repealing ſeveral made by Wamba as too ſevere, eſpecially that concerning the Raiſing of Souldiers. And ſo at length he died of Sickneſs at Toledo on the thirteenth day of November, being Friday, A. D. 687. after he had reigned ſeven years and five and twenty days, notwithſtanding all his endeavours bearing the Title of Famous, rather than Honeſt (or of Good Report) to poſterity, although the Commendation of Clemency and Liberality much practiſed by him are wont to cover very great faults. In his days Spain was ſorely vexed with Famine, which gave him a very fit occaſion to be Popular for his liberality. The Walls and Bridge of Emerita were Magnificently repaired.

Egica ſucceeds.

Who Summons the fifteenth Council of Toledo.

42. The day preceding his Death he declared Egica his Succeſſour, abſolving the Nobility from the Oaths they had taken in his own behalf. Egica being anointed and confirmed in his ſeat, could not perſuade himſelf that his Predeceſſour and Father-in-law had by his late Acts of kindneſs to him in particular made amends for the grand injury offered to his Family; but thinking it moſt juſt and auſpicious to begin with revenging its Cauſe, put away Cixilo his Wife, though he had a Son already by her named Witiza. Some have believed that Wamba, being yet living, perſuaded him to doe the thing, having ſome ſparks of Malice and Revenge yet covered under his Religious Zeal. Some of the Nobility alſo, by the means of whom Wamba had been ſo handled at his Impriſonment, were puniſhed as they had deſerved. Except this leachery of Revenge be accounted a ſtain in his Eſchutcheon, Egica may paſs for one of the beſt, wiſeſt and moſt moderate Princes, being a Perſon very well accompliſhed both for the Arts of Peace and War. He was not wanting to himſelf in that ſecret of his Predeceſſours of Cajolling the Churchmen, but Summoned the Fifteenth Council of Toledo. Here he propounded a great Caſe of Conſcience, and prayed he might be effectually reſolved. He had taken an Oath to protect the Wife and Children of Ernigius in their Lives and Fortunes; but ſo the caſe ſtood, that much of their Eſtates had been unjuſtly got; whether then might he not diſpence with his Oath in relieving ſuch as had been unjuſtly oppreſſed? To this it was gravely anſwered, That the ties of his Oath ought not to be ſo ſacred as to hinder the execution of Juſtice; he being doubtleſs left Judge to determine matters of Fact and Right in things reſpecting Perſons he ſo greatly hated.

The Archbiſhop whereof conſpires againſt him.

Ex Luca Tudenſi ſolo.

But in the ſixteenth Council ſummoned by Egica, he is puniſhed accordingly.

43. Againſt him conſpired Sisbert, the Archbiſhop of Toledo, a man of an haughty and aſpiring humour, nothing befitting the Place or Dignity which he bore in the Church. To his Ambition was not wanting the neceſſary Concomitants, viz. Diligence and Courage, which he employed to ſuch purpoſe, that the Kingdom being by reaſon of the difference about Succeſſion full of diſcontents and factions, he drew into the Conſpiracy both a great Number of the Nobility and others. He drew to his Aſſiſtence the Franks alſo, with whom the Loyal Goths fought three Battels, and every time came off with loſs, though by the injury of time we are deprived of the Account of the Number of the ſlain, and the particular Accidents on both ſides. This we know, that the External difficulties Egica removed, by applying an effectual remedy to the inward diſtempers. Sisbert had not cajolled his Brethren the Biſhops, either out of his pride diſdaining to ſtoop to his Inferiours, or becauſe they emulated and ſcorned his towring Imaginations. The King therefore calls them together the ſecond time to that Aſſembly which bears the Name of the Sixteenth Council of Toledo, by the Decree of which Sisbert is depoſed, baniſhed his Countrey, deprived of all his Eſtate, and ſo excommunicated as not to be Abſolved, except in articulo mortis, according to the Proviſion of the Ancient Canons. For greater ſecurity of the King and his Succeſſours, it is farther ordained, "That what Religious Perſons ſoever, of any Religion, Order or Degree, ſhould be guilty of ſuch a crime, ſhould be ſubject to the ſame penalties.

In this Synod the Gothick Laws were more diligently reviſed than formerly, and Prayers were ordered to be made every day in all Churches for the King's Perſon and Iſſue, which we may perhaps exempliſie in a more proper place.

He calls the ſeventeenth Council of Toledo.

44. The year following was held at Toledo the ſeventeenth Council, wherein the Jews being ſaid to have conſpired with their Brethren of Africk for the deſtruction of the Kingdom of the Goths, were condemned to perpetual ſlavery, and their Children, when ſeven years old, ordered to be taken from them, and brought up in the Chriſtian Religion. Proviſion was made for Cixilo, though put from her Husband, as indeed care had formerly been taken for all Queen-Mothers, that after the death of their Husbands they might enter into a Monaſtery. Egica having reigned ten years by himſelf, took his and her Son Witiza to be his Partner in the Kingdom; but leſt a continual ſociety ſhould beget unkindneſs and differences betwixt them, ſent him to govern the Kingdom of the Suevi in Gallicia. In Spain were extant not long ſince Coins ſtamped with both their Names, and in that Countrey in a pleaſant Valley near to the City Tuda, abounding with Oranges and Limons, was lately to be ſeen the Ruins of his Houſe of Pleaſure, that City being appointed the ſeat of his Kingdom by his Father. To this place was Baniſhed Faſila, the Duke of Cantabria, the Son of Cindaſuinth, for fear of Commotions upon his Account. Witiza was no ſooner come, but he fell into a liking of his Wife, as ſhe alſo did of him, and amid their impure imbraces it's reſolved that Faſila dye, which he did by a blow on the Head given him by Witiza, near the River Vrbicus, in a Town called then Duodecim Manus, now Palatium. This Faſila was Father to Pelagius, the Reſtorer of Spain, as we ſhall ſee anon.

And makes his Son Witiza Partner in the Kingdom.

Lucas Tudenſis. Rodericus Toletanus.

Egica dying, Witiza his Son ſucceeds.

45. Five years after his being made King of Gallicia, Witiza ſucceeded his deceaſed Father in the entire Kingdom of Spain and the Gothick Gall. At the beginning of his Reign he notably covered his vitious inclinations, and diſſembled that Humour which in time came to rage in him. He recalled ſuch as had been baniſhed, and reſtored them to their former Intereſts: He commanded the Records of Offences committed in turbulent times to be burnt, that no memory might remain of them, that no Infamy or other puniſhment might follow them. But by his following Actions he endeavoured to render all Acts of Sobriety and Clemency ridiculous, fully giving himſelf up to the Power and Sovereignty of thoſe temptations, which accompany a youthfull Age, backed with Supreme power and affluence of all things. He delivered up himſelf, as all ſuch doe in this caſe, into the hands of Paraſites, by whom being incouraged, nay thruſt forward into all ſorts of Luſts, he left nothing of extravagancy unpractiſed, and openly ſhewed that a fear of his Father, and not dictates of his own Conſcience had kept him from running hitherto into all exceſs of Riot. He took many Wives, and more Concubines; and to propagate the miſchief, made a Law, "That it ſhould not onely be "lawfull for the Common people and Nobility to doe the like, but for Church-"men alſo; which liberty, ſuiting with the corrupt inclinations of man's nature, was taken by many. As in his Father's time he had begun to root out the Race and Poſterity of Chindaſuinthus, ſo now he thought he had much more reaſon to accompliſh it, becauſe that thoſe who could not like his courſes, caſt their eyes upon thoſe Princes as the onely ſurviving hope of the Gothick Nation.

His character.

He allows Polygamy.

46. Faſila or Favila he ſlew, as was lately mentioned. There was another Brother of Chindaſuinth yet living, the Brother of King Receſuinth, viz. Theodefred the Duke of Corduba, where he lived a retired life, in a Palace there built by himſelf, on purpoſe to ſhun the Envy and Jealouſie of the Court. This Theodefred he procured to be deprived of his ſight, and would ſo have treated his Son Ruderick, as alſo his Nephew Pelagius, the Son of Favila, but that they happily eſcaped the Tyrant's hands. Knowing the People to be much incenſed by his lewd practices, to render their Anger and Indignation vain, he reſolved to diſarm them, and therefore under a pretence of Peace cauſed the Walls of all the Cities of Spain to be raced except thoſe of Toledo, Leon and Aſtorga, which he either thought he might truſt, or rather feared to provoke them. Roderick the Archbiſhop of Toledo adds, that he took from his Subjects the uſe of Arms, that they might be in no capacity to reſiſt him, but another aſcribes this Practice to Roderick his Succeſſour. To theſe crimes he added the Reſtitution of the Jews, who had been ſo ſolemnly baniſhed, giving them greater Privileges than ever, and violated thoſe of the Church, thruſting Sindered Archbiſhop of Toledo out of his Chair, and putting in by force Oppas, whom moſt make his Brother, and ſome his Son. To his life ſuch an end happened as was moſt juſt and agreeable, though as to the manner of it, Authours do not Diſarms moſt of his Subjects.

Lucas Tudenſis.

Olpam alii appellant.

Rodericus Toletanus.

not agree. Some tell the Story how Roderick, the Son of Theodefred, flying from that miſchief which had overtaken his Father, went to the Romans, and from them obtained forces for the ſuppreſſion of the Tyrant. Whom having defeated and taken in battel, he uſed in the ſame manner his Father had been ſerved, putting out his Eyes, and confining him to Corduba. And there have not been wanting who aſcribe this Act of Revenge to Coſta, the Brother of Roderick, whom they affirm to have reigned five years, whereas neither the Account of time ſuffers any ſuch thing, neither have Iſidorus Pacenſis, Lucas Tudenſis, Rodericus Toletanus, or King Alfonſus the Tenth, the beſt Writers of the Spaniſh Hiſtory, placed Coſta in the Catalogue of Gothick Kings, nay ſo much as made any mention of him. Thoſe Writers who for Number and Diligence exceed others, affirm that Witiza died of Sickneſs at Toledo in the tenth year of his Reign, leaving two Sons, Eba and Siſebate, the Title of whom while moſt maintained, and others oppoſed, it involv'd the State in great Calamities.

Dies.

47. Yet had theſe Calamities an higher riſe than from the Titles of theſe Ambitious Princes. The fate of the Gothick Monarchy now preſſed heavy upon it, and this fate was inforced by that which cauſeth and precedeth the Ruine of all States and Empires. When Kingdoms once come to an height by the force of Arms and prudent Conduct, eaſe and wealth beget ſloth and luxury, which at length wholly enervate the minds of Princes and People, and procure the overthrow of that Dominion which their Anceſtours with ſo great expence of bloud and treaſure had raiſed. Such was the condition of the Goths of Spain at this time. Their minds and bodies were both enervated and out of order; for all their time they ſpent in drinking, eating or whoring, the Prince had no care of the State, the Nobility thought they might juſtly follow his example, and the Common ſort could not but write after ſuch Copies. Hence lay they expoſed to all ſorts of Seditions, like drunken men, fit to quarrel with one another, but not able to grapple with any bye-ſtander or looker-on; ſo that that Empire and Dominion which had been obtained by their Forefathers, who had made all Countries where they came to tremble before them, now became the bait of Foreigners, and an eaſie prey to thoſe that would but adventure for them. Yet Roderick, who by the Suffrages of the Nobility, as many believe, had aſcended the Throne, gave not any great occaſion at firſt to cauſe the moſt conſiderate ſort of men to deſpair upon his account; for he was endowed with many notable qualities both of mind and body. He was a man fit for buſineſs. Of an able head to contrive, and a reſolute heart to execute, aſpiring after the greateſt things, and excelling in Acts of Magnificence and Liberality: He had a body fit for ſuch a ſoul, moſt able to incounter all difficulties attending labour, hunger and thirſt, heat and cold in their extremity. But theſe Vertues were equalled by as great Vices, which appeared upon his preferment to the Crown. He never forgot any Injury, was moſt Intemperate in his uſe of Women, and as if the Crown had infected his head with the diſeaſe of his Predeceſſour, became ſo indiſcreet in the management of publick buſineſs, that he reſembled Witiza more than his Father, or any other of his Anceſtours.

Roderick choſen King.

His character.

48. Having, as he thought, ſetled his Affairs, he applied his mind to the inlarging and beautifying of the Palace in which his Father had lived near to Corduba. On his Couſin Pelagius he had pity, as involved formerly with him in the ſame calamity, and recalling him from Baniſhment, made him Captain of his Guard, an office at this time of greateſt Dignity and Honour next the King. But the hatred he had of a long time conceived againſt Witiza, he could not now conceal nor forbear to turn it upon his Sons, but put all the affronts and diſgraces he could poſſibly upon them, which not able to bear, and ſuſpecting they would at length end in extremity, they thought it ſafeſt for them to quit Spain, and paſſed over into that part of Africa Tingitana, which then was ſubject to the Goths, commanded by Regnila the Count, the Deputy, as is believed of Count Julian. This Julian married the Siſter of Witiza; and after the death of Favila and the flight of his Son Pelagius, who had executed the place, was made by him Protoſpatarius or Captain of the Guard. Now he was Governour or Lieutenant of that part of Spain which lies next to the Herculean Straits, from which there is ſhorteſt paſſage into Africk, and was poſſeſſed of many Towns thereabout, ſo that for Wealth and Power he gave place to no Gothick Subject, and became formidable even to the King himſelf. The Sons of Witiza being ſo greatly provoked in their paſſage, began to entertain ſecret intelligence with him and others, for changing the face of Affairs, and outing Roderick of his Government, Oppa the Archbiſhop their Uncle being conſcious, who by his birth and his preſent great Wealth and Authority could doe much; and their party was increaſed by many of the Nobility and others, who either deſired to be revenged for former injuries, or gaped after Innovation upon the Hope of future profits and advantages.

He is ſevere towards the Sons of Witiza, who with others conſpire againſt him.

49. Roderick lying under theſe diſadvantages, and threatned by the danger of ſuch an Alliance and Conjunction, though he could not be ſo ſottiſh as to be utterly ignorant of his Eſtate, yet neglected them when he might have ſuppreſſed the danger in the beginning. But he was ſo far from healing the wound by any proper and effectual applications that he widened, and by a fatal Act of luſt and violence made it deadly and incurable, provoking his Enemies to put in practice that horrid piece of revenge which hitherto in their minds they had but deviſed. It was the cuſtome of Spain in thoſe times that the Children of Noblemen were brought up at Court. Their Sons waited on the King at home, and followed him in his Wars, by which means were bred many eminent Captains. Their Daughters in like manner ſerved the Queen, learnt to Sing and Dance, till being fit for Marriage, they were beſtowed according to the quality and diſcretion of their Parents. Amongſt theſe Maids was Cava, the Daughter of Count Julian, a Virgin of extraordinary Beauty, who, upon a time as ſhe was playing with her equals, chancing to uncover her Body farther than uſual, the King then looking out of a Window, deſperately fell in Love with her. Nothing elſe doth he now meditate, on nothing elſe he looks, and each look doth not allay, but increaſe his grief, ſending freſh darts of luſt and fury unto his heart. At length he gets an opportunity, and enjoys her by force, when neither intreaties nor commands, promiſes nor threats could procure a compliance.

Roderick raviſhes the daughter of Count Julian.

50. The Maid boiling with the Rage of hatred and revenge, as much as ever he did with that of brutiſh luſt, writes to her Father, who was then ſent upon ſome extraordinary Errand into Africk, in modeſt expreſſions telling him what had happened, and by as pathetick as ſhe could, exciting him to revenge. This was no hard matter to doe, conſidering how he and his Relations ſtood formerly affected. He returns ſpeedily into Spain, and being an extraordinary Artiſt in Diſſimulation, gets him to Court, where he betrays not the leaſt ſign of ſorrow or regret, but gives his Attendance with as much diligence, and as ſmooth a countenance as ever; and is admitted to all ſecret Councils as formerly, ſomething out of reſpect to his own Merits, but much more out of Love unto his own fair Daughter. He takes his time, and inſinuates to the King, that foraſmuch as Spain was now in perfect peace, and the Franks and Moors did often moleſt the Countries bordering upon them, he would ſend all his Horſes and Arms into Gall and Africk, where they might doe ſervice againſt the Foreign Enemy, rather than lye idle and ruſting at home. Having perſuaded Roderick to doe it, and ſee the thing performed, he then pretends that his Wife left by him in Africk was there ſick, and that nothing but the ſight of her Daughter, whom ſhe dearly loved, could recover her. With much adoe he obtained leave for her to croſs the Sea, and they took Ship at Malaca, where there is an Haven bearing the name of Cava, which Tradition will have to have been ſo called from this Lady. In the mean time Roderick, as ſome have written, by his Covetouſneſs and Curioſity makes preparations for the meeting and haſtening of his intended ruine, by opening a certain Palace in Toledo, which was made up faſt with the ſtrongeſt Locks and Irons that could be deviſed, becauſe at the opening thereof the Deſtruction of Spain was portended to follow. He could not be brought from believing that vaſt Treaſures by the provident care of the former Kings were there depoſited, and his curioſity to ſee could not be overcome by the prayers and intreaties of all ſorts and conditions of men, who out of a Religious reſpect abhorred the thought of opening the Palace. But no treaſure was found therein, onely a Cheſt with a Cloth, whereon were painted the ſtrange and uncouth faces and habits of men, with an Inſcription, whereby was ſignified, that Spain ſhould be ſhortly after conquered by thoſe to whom ſuch viſages and garments then belonged. Both the habits and faces ſeemed to be thoſe of Moors, whereupon the King and Nobles were fully perſuaded, that the miſchief threatned was to come from Africk, and he too late repented of his unlucky curioſity. Some much contend for the verity of this Story, others contemn it. A third, ſome ſay the wiſeſt ſort ſhew an indifferency both as to the one and the other part.

Who ſtudying revenge.

51. Julian having conferred with his fellow Conſpiratours in his way, croſſes the Straits into Africk, and betakes himſelf to Muza, who being a man of prompt boldneſs, and very ſagacious, governed Africk at this time as the Lieutenant of Ulit, the Conſpires with the Moors for the Invaſion of Spain.

the Miramamolin or chief Prince of the whole Nation of the Saracens. He tells him a long Story of the unſufferable Tyranny of Roderick, inſtances in the Sons of Witiza, who were in a deſtitute condition through his ill uſage, forced out of their Native Countrey. He lays open to him the whole State of Spain, with the eaſineſs of obtaining it, by which a way would be opened for the Conqueſt of all Europe, to which it ſtood hitherto as a firm Rampart; in concluſion, he offers if he might have, though a ſmall yet a ſpeedy aſſiſtence to bring this about, having very many of the Nobility at his Beck, and being Governour on both ſides the Straits over which the Forces muſt be conveyed. The Barbarian was not diſpleaſed to hear of Conquering Spain, he onely doubted of the means to compaſs it, having the fidelity of a Chriſtian in ſuſpicion. Communicating the Deſign with the Miramamolin, he thought it not amiſs to try Julian firſt with an inconſiderable Force, and either ſupply him with more, or reſt there as he ſhould ſee occaſion, the rather becauſe he had work enough for his men in that large Province. He ſent him an hundred Horſe and four hundred Foot, which waſting and plundering the borders of the Continent and the Iſlands, when he ſaw that the thing ſucceeded according to his wiſh, at the farther Inſtance of Julian, and under Conduct of one Tariff, ſirnamed Abenzarea, who had but one eye, he Shipped away twelve thouſand more in Veſſels belonging to Merchants, the better to prevent diſcovery.

Marianæ Miramamolin. Joh. Vaſæo Miramolin, Roderico Toletano Amiramomen. Interpretatur Credentium Princeps. In hiſtoriis Arabum nunc Calipha dicitur, quod Romana Interpretatione ſucceſſor eſt.

Which is undertaken to the ruine of the Countrey.

52. With theſe the ſaid Tariff or Tarac, the Son of Atodalla, ſeized on the Hill Calpe; and hence the City Heraclea ſtanding upon it, received the Name of Gebaltariff (now Gebraltrar) from Tariff and Gebal, which in the Arabian Tongue ſignifieth an Hill; and a Neighbouring Town came to be known by that of Tariffa, whereas it was in ancient times called * Tarteſſus. Roderick underſtanding the Moors were come over, thought ſeaſonably to ſuppreſs them by ſending away † Sanctius with an Army. But ſuch an Army it was, as from it one might ominouſly preſage what would be the Iſſue of the quarrel. It conſiſted of the Refuſe and Dregs of the People ſuddenly hudled together, having neither bodies nor minds fit for ſuch a buſineſs, impatient of heat, duſt and bad weather, not at all diſciplin'd, wretched Souldiers, and fully as wretched Arms and Horſes. This raſcally Company coming to face the enemy, in all skirmiſhes came off ſtill with the worſt, and in a total ingagement was at length quite baffled and defeated, having loſt their leader. The Barbarians elevated by the ſucceſs, quickly waſted Bætica and Luſitania, taking many Towns, and amongſt the reſt Hiſpalis or Sevil, which by the wiſe foreſight of King Witiza had been deprived of its Walls and Fortifications. Having done ſo great things, Tariff and Julian return into Africk, where they require of Muza a greater ſupply of men, that they might give battel, and in one fight decide the Controverſie with Roderick. Leaving Count Regnila as an Hoſtage, they obtain far greater ſupplies than they had got before, while Roderick in the mean time inflamed with the injury and diſgrace, prepares warmly to receive them. He Summons in all able to bear Arms, under heavy penalties, the fear of which drew together more than an hundred thouſand men, with which multitude meanly armed, and as ill provided of courage and skill, he marched into Bætica, and finding the Enemy at a place called Cæſarianum, he ſate down on the Plain by the River Lethes.

* Quam alii Carteiam alii Mellariam priùs dictam contendunt. Vaſæus.

† Aliis Enecus, Eneco & Inachus.

53. Seven days they ſpent in Skirmiſhes, whether to try the Manhood and Reſolution of their Souldiers, e'er they would venture for the main chance, or becauſe each ſide watched for ſome fit advantage. The Goths, though neceſſity put ſome vigour into them, being to fight for their lives and liberties, yet were again dejected by ſad thoughts preſaging the ruine and overthrow of their Kingdom. On the eighth day, which happened to be the Lord's day, the ninth of the Arabian month Xavel, the eleventh of November being the Feaſt of St. Martin, in the year of our Lord ſeven hundred and fourteen, they came to a total Engagement. The King ſeated in an Ivory Chariot, and cloathed with a Robe of Cloth of Gold, as the cuſtome of the Goths was, before they came to join battel, made an Oration to his Souldiers, wherein he uſed arguments taken from Religion, and the ancient Valour of their Anceſtours to make them valiant. Tariff was not wanting on the other ſide by thoſe drawn from Neceſſity (the Enemy being before them, and the Sea at their backs) and the deſpicable condition of their oppoſers to quicken the appetites of his men after wealth and honour. The Goths with Trumpets, the Moors with Brazen (or Kettle) Drums begin the fight, which laſts long, and continues dubious all the while. At laſt when he ſees it convenient, Oppa revolts according to agreement, and carries all his men over to the Enemy, at which ſight the Goths were ſo amazed,

A. D. 714.

Sect. 2.

And the overthrow of the Goths with the ruine of the King and Kingdom.

that though they now ſeemed to have drawn fortune to their party, they caſt away both their courage and weapons, and being ſlaughtered on all ſides, ran away as faſt as they could. The King having diſcharged the office both of an able Commander, and a valiant Souldier, when he ſaw all deſperate, removed himſelf out of his Chariot, and mounting an Horſe called Orelia, got out of the danger, as ſome ſay, though his Robe, Crown, and Shooes adorned with Gems being found by the River Lethes, others conclude more probably, that he was either drowned or killed in the battel, none knowing ever what became of him. Yet in a City of Portugal, called Viſeum, was long after found a Stone with this Inſcription: Here lies Roderick the laſt King of the Goths. Curſed be the Impious fury of Julian becauſe pertinacious, and his Indignation becauſe extravagant. He was mad with fury, fierce with rage, forgot his Allegiance, was unmindfull of Religion, a Contemner of Divinity, Cruel againſt himſelf, a Martherer of his Lord, an Enemy of his own Domeſticks, a Deſtroyer of his own Countrey, Guilty in reference to all. Let his Memory wax bitter in every man's mouth, and may his Name rot for ever.

Hic jacet Rodericus, ultimus Rex Gothorum, maledictus furor impius Juliani, quia pertinax, &c. Vide Joh. Vaſæum ad A. D. 714.

54. And well he deſerved ſuch a Curſe, who to his own particular revenge could once have ſuch a thought as to ſacrifice the entire intereſt of his Countrey. By this one battel were ſuch a multitude of Goths deſtroyed, that Authours are at a loſs, and can give in no certain account of their Number. It's certain that this one battel ſtripped Spain of all its Ornaments; that here the Name of the Goths was extinct, their Glory in War, the Renown they had got in former Ages quite defaced, and more than this, all hope for the future quite cut off, and that Dominion of theirs ſubverted, which had now ſtood for above three hundred years together. Unſpeakable are the miſeries which befell the poor Provincials, more miſerable than other Conquered People in this reſpect, that their new Maſters were Moors, whoſe Souls, by reaſon of their Mahometan blaſphemies, were as ugly and frightfull to them as were their Bodies. But the Moors, though with the loſs of no fewer than ſixteen thouſand Men, are Conquerours, and now they are ſo prudent as to enforce the proſecution and improvement of their victory; ſuch of the Goths as eſcaped from the battel, betook themſelves to Aſtiga, a City not far diſtant, ſtrong in its Walls, and the number of its Inhabitants. The Citizens full of ſorrow and deſperation, in a confuſed manner iſſue forth with them, reſolving to give the Infidels battel, and if poſſible (who could know but it might be ſo?) redeem the liberty of their whole Nation. But the ſucceſs did not anſwer their zeal; they were defeated as before, and thoſe that eſcaped, diſperſed themſelves into ſuch places as they could moſt conveniently reach, not ſtaying to ſee the deſtruction of their City, which followed its falling into the Enemies hand. Now by the advice of Julian were the Forces of the Moors divided into two Parties, whereof one was committed to the Conduct of Magnedus a Duke, a Renegado that had abjured the Chriſtian Religion, and the other to Tariff, the Captain that firſt brought them over. Magnedus marched to Corduba, and eaſily took it, the Inhabitants being fled to Toledo, for a Shepherd conducted his men to a part of the Wall ſtanding near the Bridge, which was not hard to be paſſed over in the ſilence of the night, when they had once killed the Sentinels. The Governour fortified himſelf in the Church of St. George, and held it out three months; after which flying away, he fell into the hands of the Moors, but his men fought it out to the laſt, refuſing to yield.

55. Tariff in the mean time waſtes all the reſt of Bætica with Fire and Sword. Menteſa he took by ſtorm, and levelled it with the ground. Into Malaca, Eliberis and Granata he put Garriſons. The Governour of Murcia (then called Oreola) was worſted by the Moors, but being a very expert Souldier, put all the Women in the Town into Man's Apparel, and placed them on the Walls in ſuch Numbers, that the Enemy thinking him yet very ſtrong, gave him very honourable Conditions. The Jews now being confuſed amongſt the Moors, had Corduba and Granata aſſigned them to inhabit, the Chriſtian Inhabitants being driven into other places. Toledo, a City placed in the middle of Spain, and by ſituation impregnable, the ſeat of the Gothick Kingdom was after a Siege of ſeveral months taken, but the manner is not agreed on. Some ſay it was betrayed by the Jews, others that it was yielded up on very good conditions, as that ſuch as would continue there might live after their own Religion and Laws, and ſuch as would not, might take what they had along with them. The reſt of the Cities, few excepted, ſpeedily underwent the like fate with theſe already mentioned, which done, the Conquerours placed Garriſons where they thought convenient, for bridling the Natives, faſtning the new yoke to their Necks, which will they nill they, they muſt now endure. Tariff having done his work, brings his victorious Army, gluttted with bloud, and even ſatiated and burthened with wealth, back to Toledo, there to pauſe a little, and conſider whether they were not in a dream all this while, for they could ſcarcely believe that condition to be ſubſtantial and real at which they had arrived. Thus was Spain in a manner ſubdued about a year after the Arrival of the Moors, and at the ſame time we find that Narbon in the Gothick Gall was reduced alſo by that People.

SECT. III.

The Dominion of the Saracens, Arabians or Moors in Spain, Contemporary with the Conſtantinopolitan Roman Empire.

From the Conqueſt of Spain by Tariff the Captain of Ulit Miramamolin, to the Reign of Abdeirakman the Second.

The ſpace of One hundred and ſeven Years.

Spain in confuſion.

1. THE Conqueſt of Spain was ſo ſudden and ſurprizing, that thoſe whom the Arms of the victorious Saracens had not as yet reached, were as men out of their wits, and ſo beſotted with fear, that they knew not how to conſult for the good of their Countrey being diſperſed abroad, and no one body uniting ſo as to make any conſiderable oppoſition. Particular Towns concerned onely for their own ſafety, choſe them Governours, for quicker diſpatch and more effectual execution committing all things concerning both Peace and War into their hands. Theſe Governours being thus abſolute within themſelves, and acknowledging no Superiour abroad, are upon this account termed Kings by ſome Hiſtorians.

Muza with a ſtrong Army enters Spain.

2. The News of the Conqueſt flying over into Africk was very welcome, but yet not received with ſuch joy by the Governour as the greatneſs of the Enterprize, and the conſequence of the thing might ſeem to have required. Muza was glad that ſo Noble a Province was ſubdued, eſpecially with ſo little charge and trouble, and that the Empire of the Moors was now propagated into Europe, an happineſs they had had much more cauſe to wiſh, than to expect or hope for. He lik'd well of the thing, but diſliked the man. It vexed him above meaſure that Tariff ſhould be the inſtrument, that he himſelf ſhould not have had the fortune to carry away the honour and profit of ſuch an undertaking. Diſturbed by the Paſſions of Covetouſneſs, Ambition and Envy, he paſſes over into Spain with a freſh Army of Moors, conſiſting, ſay ſome, of twelve thouſand. Being arrived, he conſulted how to carry on the War. Some were for joining with Tariff, and finiſhing with his victorious Forces the remainder, but the fugitive Chriſtians cloſed with Muza, and perſuaded him with his own ſtrength to ſet upon the work. Count Julian now it ſeems being little in favour with Tariff, the reward at laſt of all Traitours and Betraiers of their Countrey being to be ſcorned and vilified as execrable Creatures by ſuch as ſet them firſt on work. On Adonia he firſt made trial of his men, who took it by ſtorm after great loſs and labour. From thence they removed to Carmona, once the ſtrongeſt Town of all Bætica, where toiling a long time to no purpoſe, Julian the Count, who was already too much engaged not to proceed, counterfeited himſelf a Fugitive; and being received into the Town, upon that account betrayed it to the Barbarian. This is the account that Roderick the Archbiſhop gives of this Siege. Raſis the Arabian will have theſe things to have happened after that Muza and Tariff met together at Toledo; and whereas the other writes that Julian did his buſineſs by counterfeiting a flight of his Souldiers, he ſaith it was done by men in the ſhew and habits of Merchants.

Takes Adonia.

And Carmona.

3. Hiſpalis

Subdues Hiſpalis or Sevil. And Pax Julia.

3. Hiſpalis or Sevil, though the poor diſtreſſed Goths had betaken themſelves thither for ſhelter, yet upon the approach of the Army was deſerted by its Citizens, and ſo eaſily became a prey to the Infidels, the Jews being admitted to live in equal right with the Mahometans. The ſame was the Fate of Pax Julia, ſeated in the Confines of Luſitania, to which the diſtreſſed Inhabitants of Hiſpalis had fled, but whether it was taken by force, or delivered up upon Articles we know not, onely this is certain, that after the reduction of it, a great multitude of Chriſtians there long continued. The next Town they fell upon was Emerita a Roman Colony, and carrying as venerable an aſpect as any other of Luſitania, however batter'd and defac'd by the fury of the late Wars. Many of the Townſmen fell with Roderick in the fatal Battel; and yet had the reſt that Courage and Reſolution as now to go out to meet Muza, and encounter him, which having done with ſuch Succeſs as might juſtly be exſpected, they retired into their City. Muza viewing the place was much taken with its Situation, and perceived at length, that a ſtony Quarry which was by the Walls, would give convenient ſhelter to an Ambuſh, which there accordingly he placed, and with ſuch Succeſs, that the Citizens making a Sally were many of them cut in pieces, and the reſt caſting themſelves into the form of a Wedge, hardly eſcaped within the Fortifications. Muza not being able to compaſs the Town by this Strategeme applied his mind to all Courſes, by which it could be forced, ſparing no Labour nor coſt, for getting of battering Rams, and all ſorts of Engines uſefull upon ſuch occaſions. The Defendants by their indefatigable pains and induſtry elude their deſigns, being preſent at all places, and watching with all diligence to obviate the Strategems and Practices of the Enemy.

Lays ſiege to Emerita.

4. But they were men, and being as lyable as others to the Inconveniences which attend ſuch hard Services, they were reduced to ſuch a ſmall number, that they thought themſelves upon good terms obliged to yield. But the terms they demanded were ſuch as Muza would not give, who being now extreme old, the Deputies upon their return into the Town, affirmed, that all their hope was placed in the decrepit Age of the General, who could not in probability live many days longer. Muza hearing this, dies his Beard and Hair of another colour, whereat the Deputies at their return were aſtoniſhed, as being no leſs than a Miracle, and perſuaded their fellow Citizens to give place to him, who gave Laws to Nature it ſelf. They covenanted therefore, that of ſuch of their fellows as had been ſlain in Battel, or died during the Siege, the Eſtates ſhould be in the power of the Conquerour. That his ſhould be the Revenues of the Churches, and the ſacred Utenſils of Gold or Silver. That ſuch as would ſtay might keep what was theirs, and thoſe that would go away might have leave to go whither beſt pleaſed themſelves. About this ſame time it happened, that the Inhabitants of Pax Julia, and Ilipula being in a deſperate Condition, reſolved upon as deſperate a Courſe, for perceiving Hiſpalis to be but meanly provided of men, they ſet upon the Town, and forcing out the Mooriſh Garriſon, or killing thoſe that reſiſted, quite maſtered the place. But their Conqueſt was not of long continuance. Abdalaſis the Son of Muza was come into Spain; and blaming his Father for ſo ſlow a proſecution of the War, procured leave, and a ſufficient power of men to try his Fortune. Into the Borders of Valentia firſt he peirced, and fighting proſperouſly againſt the People, had Valentia it ſelf, Dianium, Alicantium, Orilinela and Octa delivered up unto him on theſe Conditions, that he ſhould abſtain from offering any injury to Churches, that Liberty of Conſcience ſhould be allowed all Chriſtians, and that each man ſhould enjoy his own, paying to the Conquerour a moderate Tribute. By this ſucceſs he was incouraged to go againſt Hiſpalis, which he reduced, putting all thoſe to the Sword that had been Authours of the revolt; and thence paſſed he to Ilipula, where he ſlew a great number of men, and for a Terrour to others, as it ſeems, levelled the City with the ground, for from a great and powerfull City, it's now become a little Village by the Name of Pennafloris, betwixt Cordova and Sevil. Raſis the Arabian wrote, that the Garriſon at Emerita was cut in pieces, and that the Inhabitants of Hiſpalis conſpired with thoſe of Pax Julia and Ilipula.

Abdalaſis the Son of Muza ſubdues Valentia and the places adjoyning.

The Garriſon of Emerita cut in pieces.

Thence they march to Toledo.

5. From Emerita the great General Muza, marched to Toledo, and Tariff went to meet him as far as beyond Ebora, in the Countrey of the Carpentani. At the River Tietares they met with great ſhew of Contentment on both ſides, though with minds as malitious and averſe as can be imagined; Muza was even mad with Envy, and Tariff exceſſive Melancholy with fear of looſing his preſent Intereſt.

Afterwards to Cæſar Auguſta reducing all Spain.

Muza and Tariff return to Vlit the Miramamolin.

Aliis Abdulaziz Rhaſi Abelaaziz.

Muza laid heavily to his Charge that he had not obeyed his Rules and Orders in managing the War, wherein though hitherto he had proſpered, it was not to be aſcribed to his Skill or Dexterity in Military matters, but to the mere fawning and temerity of Fortune: when they came to Toledo, the covetous old man compelled him to give a ſtrict Account, both of what he had ſpent in the War, and what the Booty thereof amounted to, which he bore with Patience, and by all means endeavoured to pleaſe and gain his good opinion. However they differed betwixt themſelves, they agreed with joynt to Forces march againſt Cæſar Auguſta, which without much difficulty they took. They had the ſame Fortune in their attempts upon other Towns of Celtiberia and the Carpentani, moſt of which they brought under Subjection, without one bloudy Noſe. And ſo now all Spain ſeemed to be Conquered, three years not yet having paſſed from the firſt coming over of the Moors, a thing to be compared with a Miracle, and merely to be reſolved into extraordinary Providence. For the inner parts of the Countrey they could not without great difficulty come at; and it is notoriouſly known that thick Woods, high and inacceſſible Mountains and Cliffs, Fence and protect the moſt parts of Spain. Vlit the Miramamolin was raviſhed at the report of the Succeſs which he had much ſuſpected, by reaſon of the Diſcord of the Captains. Now he ſent for them both over, and Muza having made his Son Abdalaſis Governour in his ſtead, over they went laden with that Wealth which the Nation of the Goths, had been ſo long a time in gathering.

Abdalaſis Governour.

Reſides at Sevil.

Proceeds farther to invade Gall.

6. Abdalaſis prudently diſcharged the Employment, wherewith his Father had intruſted him. Out of Africk now flocked multitudes of their own accord, beſides many that were ſent for by the Conquerours, to plant thoſe places which the War had rendred deſtitute of Inhabitants. To them he aſſigned Grounds and Towns, according as their Qualities and Families required; and made choice of Sevil for the Seat of the Mooriſh Empire in Spain, for the Conveniency of its ſituation, and the ſtrength of the Caſtle. Living now at eaſe, and being in the flower of his Age he began to caſt an Eye upon Egilona the Widow of Roderick, a Lady of extraordinary beauty, and ſhe perceiving his Paſſion made uſe of it, not to the gratifying of his Appetite, but to the advantage of her ſelf and her Friends, and of her Religion. But he might well now live at his eaſe, all Spain being at his Devotion; onely Cantabria and that part of the Pyrenæans, which bordered upon the Vaſcons and Arragon, with the greateſt part of Gallicia the Chriſtians held, and there had a ſhew of Government, rather for that the Moors neglected them, becauſe of the Barrenneſs and Ruggedneſs of the places, than that the Goths had any Courage or Power to defend them. The Barbarians, as we before hinted, when two years were not fully paſt from their firſt Invaſion of Spain, not content with the Conqueſt and Dominion of that Countrey, in great multitudes flocked over into Gall, with reſolution to unite thoſe parts which hitherto had obeyed the Goths, with the other Territories they had taken from them, and with hope from thence to paſs into the other Provinces, which at preſent called the Franks their Maſters. They had the ſame reaſon to expect Succeſs there, as they had lately in Spain; for there the Government, if not the Governours were quite out of Order. The Kings minded no buſineſs at all, being given wholly up to ſloth and Pleaſures. The Majors of the Palace did all that was done, and ſeemed now to have caſt in their Heads, how to compaſs the Title as well as they had already the Power.

The Goths reflect on their Condition.

7. What ſucceſs they had againſt the Franks, we ſhew in the Hiſtory of that Nation; at preſent it's proper for us to obſerve, that their being employed in that Gallick War, gave occaſion to thoſe Goths that were left alive, and had betaken themſelves to the Mountainous Countries to think of the Redemption of their Liberty. We may eaſily imagine how Irkſome was to them their preſent ſtate, with what trouble they called to mind their late Injoyments, and compared them with their preſent Conveniences. Eaſe and ſecurity made them looſe their Countrey; now a Senſe of miſery, and of the lubricity of humane Affairs, put them into ſuch a true eſtimate of things, that by preſent Care and Activity they ſeemed to burn with Deſire of taking revenge upon themſelves; all ſeemed inſpired with new thoughts and Capacities for ſome great Atchievements, they onely wanted a Captain to incourage and lead them on. The War had conſumed in a manner all that were eminent, both for Valour and Conduct; onely Pelagius the Son of Favila, of whom we have formerly ſpoken, remained, a Perſon of Royal Extract, and of ſuch Magnanimity and Courage, that he was not at all dejected with his adverſe Fortune. It luckily happened at this time, that out of Cantabria, whither he had retired upon the late Revolution, he came in Aſturia, it's uncertain upon what occaſion, whether ſent for, or of his own accord to wait for a convenient opportunity, of doing ſomething worthy of himſelf, and the Race of which he was deſcended: Here as he continued all their Eyes were upon him, and as it happens to a multitude all are ready to Talk, but to be up and be doing they are ſlow enough. They ſtill ſtay, and would find ſome fit and convenient occaſion. But while they attend a loitering Conveniency, a certain Accident fell out, which put them upon a kind of neceſſity of Action.

8. Pelagius had a Siſter more than ordinarily handſome, and of ſuch Deportment as was very Charming; with her Numuſa (or Numatius) a Chriſtian by profeſſion, but Confederate with the Moors, and for that reaſon made by them Governour of the Countrey about Gegio, fell in Love, but in reſpect of the meanneſs of his Birth and his Humour, which was diſpleaſing to Pelagius, he was in no hope of obtaining her for his Wife as he deſired. He takes therefore occaſion to ſend her Brother out of the way on a meſſage to Tariff, or ſome ſay Muza, who was not yet returned into Africk. He being gone, he married and enjoyed her, which gave not ſo great content to him, but it as much tormented Pelagius, who yet reſolved to play the part of a Wiſe man, and conceal his Indignation, till he could find ſome opportunity effectually to ſhew it. At length he conveys away his Siſter on a ſudden, and carries her to the Borders of the Aſtures, where he knew the People to be of a moſt propenſe Inclination to him and his Family. Numuſa preſently took the Alarm, and being the more concerned, becauſe of the loſs of his Wife, gives ſpeedy notice of it to Tariff, who diſpatches away ſome Souldiers from Corduba, to ſuppreſs the Deſigns and indeavours of Pelagius, before they ſhould come to any Maturity. And very near they were to ſuppreſſing them, by ſurprizing his Perſon altogether as yet unprovided; ſo great expedition they made. He had onely ſo much timely notice as to make his Eſcape, but they followed him ſo cloſe, that he was glad to take the River Pionia, over which his Horſe having carried him ſafe to Land, the Purſuers thought him not ſo great a prize, as to purchaſe with ſo manifeſt a danger of their Lives, and ſo he got ſafe to the Valley of Canica, which at this day bears the Name of Cangas. Here he found in little time a great number which gave their Names for the recovery of their Liberty, of which they deſpaired not by the means of ſuch a General. He adviſed them that they would Act ſtrenuouſly and betimes, e'er the Dominion of the Saracens ſhould by continuance be confirmed, it being as yet tottering by reaſon of the newneſs of it. For their Comfort the Garriſons they had put into the Cities were but very ſlender, all the lately conquered People, where e'er they ſhould come were their Friends; and the Forces of the Enemy were diſperſed, moſt of them being gone over the Mountains into Gall. He put them in mind of the Valour and Glory of their Anceſtours, and that Death it ſelf was by much to be preferred before the Calamities, which they and theirs now underwent.

Under the Conduct of Palagius they unite in Order to the recovery of their former State.

9. Though their apprehenſions of danger were great, his words did much erect their minds, and he prevailed with them to enter into a Military oath, to undertake and proſecute the War againſt the Moors. By the univerſal Conſent and Suffrages, both of Nobility and People, he was choſen Captain General, and King of Spain, in the ſeven hundred and ſixteenth year of our Lord, to which ſome add two years more or thereabout; ſo great a matter it is to take hold of opportunity, and not to be wanting to ones ſelf. When all things ſeemed now to be deſperate and beyond humane poſſibility, to repair the deſolate Eſtate of the late Conquered Goths, the Foundation of a laſting Kingdom is laid, by which the Moors are in time though long before, again outed of their Poſſeſſion. Pelagius knowing that from the firſt beginnings and Attempts, men ordinarily take their Grounds for fear or hope, ſpared no pains to preſerve the Majeſty of that Title, which he had received. He made many Inroads into the Countrey of the Moors, plundering and killing them, as he could conveniently. On the contrary he fortified all the Towns belonging to his new Dominions, relieved ſuch as were in diſtreſs, and every way to his power provided for the Eaſe and Convenience of all his Subjects, ſparing no pains; for he had a Body fitted for Labour, his Countenance being martial, rather than beautifull, and all his Limbs every way proportionable. By this time the News of his Motions had arrived at the Ears of Alchama a notable Captain of the Moors, who came over at firſt with Tariff, and during the War gave many proofs of his Courage and Dexterity in Martial matters. He haſtes to ſuppreſs him, e'er he ſhould complete his numbers, with a very good Army, conſiſting of both Moors and Chriſtians; Oppas the Biſhop of Toledo coming along with him, who all the

And chuſe Pelagius for King.

Who is encountred by Alchama a Captain of the Moors.

Sect. 3.

the way indeavoured by fair words to preſerve the Provincials in their Duty and Allegiance toward the Infidels.

10. The noiſe of Alchama his coming grievouſly diſordered Pelagius his Army, the Goths having again loſt that Chearfulneſs and Alacrity, which their own Meditations, and the words of their King ſeemed lately to have wrought in them, and behaving themſelves no otherwiſe than Slaves, afraid to look their Lords and Maſters in the Face. He perceiving their Temper, thought it not fit to expoſe ſuch a Company of men naked in Body, and as unprovided of Courage to certain Ruine, by a formal Ingagement, but choſe out a thouſand ſtout Souldiers from amongſt them, wherewith he poſſeſſed himſelf of a ſpacious Cave in the Mountain Auſena (at this day called the Cave of St. Mary of Conadonga) which he furniſhed with all things neceſſary for a Siege, in Caſe he ſhould be diſcovered, intending thence to make Sallies, and doe what miſchief he could by ſudden and unexpected Aſſaults. But he was quickly diſcovered and purſued to the place of his Retirement, where Oppas was firſt ordered to ſet upon him with an Oration, for they thought it better to reduce them by fair words, than ingage a deſperate ſort of People in the Straits.

And forced to a retiring place.

Where Oppas Biſhop of Toledo ſets upon him with an Oration.

“ He ſought to perſuade him to yield, by reaſons drawn from the preſent potent “ Fate of the Goths, which however it had formerly raiſed them to a great height, “ was now ingaged to tumble them down as low; and if when all was well with “ them, and the whole ſtrength of the Kingdom was entire, they could not then make “ good their Party, how ſhould he think to doe it at ſuch a miſerable Ebb of For“ tune. He ſpake Contemptibly of their number, and affirmed the Enemy to be “ ſixty thouſand ſtrong. Told him, that Almighty God for the ſins of their Na“ tion blinded their minds, not yet ſatisfied with the Effuſion of Bloud, which
“ the late paſt Actions, and now this raſh adventure of theirs ſufficiently declared.
“ And he ended with an Exhortation to quit this their ſtubborn reſolution, and “ prefer Death to Life, or Slavery before Liberty, and the confluence of Honours, “ Riches, and all other good things, which in the Name of his new Maſters he “ promiſed them, if ſo be they would lay down their Arms, quit theſe Moun“ tainous places of refuge, and ſubmit to the Conquerours, which doing, they “ ſhould therein follow the Judgment, Example and Deſire of all Spain.

Palagius his Anſwer.

11. “ Palagius anſwered him as he deſerved, that the diſpleaſure and Vengeance
“ of the Almighty was to be feared by him, his Brother Witiza, and his Children, “ although at preſent their matters ſeemed to proſper according to their Wiſhes.
“ That by their wickedneſs the Divine Majeſty was provoked, all things ſacred “ through the whole Province contaminated, and the Laws Sacroſanct for their “ Antiquity broken and reſcinded. That from theſe beginnings of Vilany, they “ came at laſt to that fury and unheard-of Madneſs, as to draw the Moors a fierce
“ and cruel Nation into Spain, whence their Nation had received ſo many overthrows
“ and ſuch Effuſion of Chriſtian Bloud had followed; for which Vilanies if Almighty “ God take care of humane Affairs, you muſt be grievouſly puniſhed, both alive
“ and dead, eſpecially thou thy ſelf, who forgetting the place thou beareſt, haſt
“ been the moſt principal Authour of all theſe miſchiefs, and now by an impudent “ Speech, dareſt adviſe us to receive the Yoke upon our Shoulders more grievous “ than any Calamity, viz. to undergo again thoſe Calamities and Hardſhips, of “ which we have had ſo late experience. Theſe are the wonderfull rewards, theſe
“ the Honours to which even now thou invited'ſt our Souldiers. Know, Oppas, we “ neither think, that Almighty God hath turned his Ear from, nor is his mind “ averſe, to us, ſo as to truſt to thy Promiſes; but we hope he will turn the ſharp-“ neſs of Puniſhment into Mercy, as he is continually wont. But in Caſe we are “ not yet ſufficiently puniſhed, and he will not deliver us, who pray unto him
“ and are deſtitute of defence, we are reſolved to change theſe Calamities for “ Death, and a moſt grievous ſlavery (ſo we hope) for endleſs Felicity.

12. When fair words cannot perſuade them to yield, rough Deeds and Blows muſt beat them out of the Hole, wherein ſo much, though with ſo little cauſe, they now confided. Such were the thoughts and reſolution of Alchama, who Commanded all ſorts of Batteries to be made againſt the mouth of the Cave, but God Almighty whom Oppas had injured, by making his Providence as it were ſerve his ends of Revenge and Malice, ſo wrought, it's ſaid, for the beſieged, that the Stones and Darts ſhot againſt them, recoiled upon the heads of the Shooters, and being firſt preſerved in a miraculous manner, in as miraculous a way, they afterward quite defeated their Enemies, of whom very few eſcaped alive, twenty thouſand being killed in the fight and purſuit, and the reſt drowned in the River Dena, into which Alchuma and his Forces deſtroyed.

Numuſa knocked on the head.

Muza dyes with Grief.

Abdalaſis murthered.

part of the Mountain Auſena fell, on which they ſtood. Alchama was ſlain in the Battel, and Oppas was taken Priſoner, and put to ſuch a Death, doubtleſs, as he had deſerved, for henceforth we hear nothing of him. Numuſa confounded at the report of ſo unexpected a defeat fled from Gegio, the Inhabitants he knew to bear him no Good Will, and coming to a Village called Olalie, was there knocked on the Head by the People. About the ſame time, Muza in way of Retaliation was accuſed to the Miramamolin, and being conſtrained to give an Account of all the Money ſpent and received in the Spaniſh War, was made to pay back great Sums he had hoarded up, and died of Grief. Abdalaſis his Son having governed Spain three years, incurred the heavy diſpleaſure of his Countreymen, for the many Rapes he had committed upon the Wives and Daughters of the Nobility, and was ſlain in the entry of one of their Moſques, it's thought by the means and procurement of Egilona his Wife inraged at his new Loves ſo far as to perſuade him to take the Enſigns of Royalty, and puſh him on to thoſe Courſes, ſhe certainly knew would procure his Ruine. But the Authour of the murther was Arub his Kinſman, who governed Spain, for one Month, and, as Roderick the Archbiſhop writes, built Calatainba, a Town of good note in Celtiberia.

Vlit dies, Zuleiman ſucceeds as Miramamolin.

The Seat Royal removed from Sevil to Corduba by Alahor the Governour of Spain.

The Death and Deſtruction of Julian and his Family.

Alii Vlit adhuc ſuperſtite miſſum dicunt.

Hoc quidam Muza quoque adſcribunt.

13. Not long before this died Vlit the Miramamolin, or chief Prince of the Saracens, and was ſucceeded by Zuleiman his Brother, who ſent one Alahor into Spain to ſucceed Abdalaſis. This Alahor was a man exceeding cruel, both to Moors and Chriſtians. The Citizens of Corduba he outed of almoſt all their Eſtates, and made Inquiſition after ſuch as he ſaid had defiled themſelves with the ſpoils of a Conquered Nation. From Sevil he tranſlated the Royal ſeat of the Moors to Corduba. The Sons of Julian and Witiza he ſuſpected (or pretended ſo) of having betrayed the Army at the late defeat received in Aſturia, and having firſt ſpoiled them of their Eſtates, when they had nothing left them to live on, put them to death, and ſo completed the revenge of that execrable Treaſon of betraying Spain into the hands of theſe wicked Infidels. For Julian had received his reward before this time, as is moſt probable, becauſe he is now no where mentioned, although the manner of his death is not certainly known. But a report hath gone without any conſiderable Authour, that his Wife was by the Barbarians ſtoned to death, that his Son was caſt headlong from a Tower near to Oſca, on the Coaſt of Africk, and that he himſelf was committed to perpetual Priſon, in a Tower of Loarres near to the ſame place by Command of the Moors, where without the Church of the Caſtle is ſhewn his Tomb made of ſtone. Roderick the Archbiſhop, and Lucas Tudenſis write that he was ſlain, and all his Wealth confiſcated. And indeed when men conſider of ſo great and dreadfull Vilanies as he committed (and he committed ſuch in betraying Spain, as the Conſequence thereof cannot for the weight of it be conſider'd ſufficiently) they are apt to conclude, without this reflexion, that God's Judgments and ways are Inſcrutable, nay they are unwilling to think, that the Anthours came to any peaceable or timely ends.

Pelagius grows ſtrong in Aſturia, and other places in Spain.

14. But to return, and viſit Pelagius; we find his Intereſt exceedingly ſtrengthened by the late defeat given to the Moors. For his Authority and Government was not onely confirmed in Aſturia, but multitudes now flocking in to him, who before ſtood aloof off, expecting the event, with conſiderable Forces he deſcended into the Plain, where he plundred and burnt all Towns belonging to the Moors, the Perſons of whom he never ſpared as they came in his way, and took by Force the City Legio (afterward Leon) ſtanding at the bottom of thoſe Mountains, which part Gallicia from the Aſtures. Some are of opinion, that at this time he took the Title of King of Leon. But others deny it with greater reaſon and Teſtimony of Antiquity, which confirms this truth to us, that Pelagius and his Succeſſours were Kings of Onetum onely. The Sepulchres of the Kings yet extant at Onetum, and other places in Aſturia before the time of Hordonius the Second, who firſt called himſelf King of Leon favour this Aſſertion. That opinion is more worthy of Credit, which will have Pelagius now after the taking of Legio or Leon, to have changed the former Badges or Arms of the Gothick Kings, For a Lyon Rampant Gules in a Field argent (as we foreſooth muſt blazon, becauſe our Maſters the French doe ſo) which ſtill continues to be the Coat Armour of that Kingdom, and foraſmuch as the City, and that Ammal are both in the Spaniſh Tongue expreſſed by one Name of Leon, the underſtanding of Arms but Ignorance in matters of Antiquity, have given occaſion to groſs miſtakes. Within a while after the Conqueſt Legio, beſides Aſturia, Manſilia, Tineus and other Towns in Gallicia and Aſturia, were taken from the Moors; Pelagius made himſelf Maſter alſo of Gegio a City very ſtrong both by Art and Nature. Thence ſome ſuſpect that he and his Succeſſours might be called Kings of Gegio, and ſo might come the miſtake of Legio, it being very eaſie to fall into ſuch an errour in ignorant times; the Alteration being but of one letter.

Zuleiman dying Homar and Izit ſucceed.

Homar dyes, Izit ſole Monarch ſends Adham to govern Spain.

Who is ſlain at Tolouſe.

Abderrahman choſen in his place.

Alii Izid.

15. Much about this time died Zuleiman the Miramamolin of the Saracens, having adopted two his Nephews by his Brother Ulit, viz. Homar aud Izit. Theſe two were to enjoy the vaſt Empire of theſe Arabians in Aſia, Africk and Spain by equal Right, a thing new and of dangerous Conſequence: But it happened well for them, that all danger of Envy and Emulation was prevented by the death of Homar, who within a ſhort time followed his Uncle. Izit being Monarch, ſent one to govern Spain, who has as many Names almoſt as Spain had Provinces. Some call him Adham the Son of Melic, and others Abrahem and Azam, and the Chronicle of King Alphonſus mentions him by the Name of Zama or Zamam. This Moor whatſoever was his Name, was a man of great underſtanding in all things, relating to Peace and War, and being as covetous as any of the reſt, laid greater burthens than ever upon the conquered Cities; nay, if Raſes his own Countreyman told true, from the Moors themſelves he exacted the fifth part of all their Goods, under pretence of relieving the poor, but indeed that he might bring them ſo low, that they might not be able to riſe, or doe any thing effectual againſt him. Being furniſhed with Treaſure, he paſſed the Pyrenæan Hills, and having re-inforced Narbon with a ſtrong Garriſon, laid Siege to Tolouſe to his Ruine as it proved. For Eudo the Duke of Aquitain coming upon him, raiſed the Siege, and killed him with moſt of his men after he had governed about two years. Thoſe that ſurvived made choice of one Abderrahman to command them, till ſuch time as a new Governour ſhould be ordered them out of Africk, which was done as ſoon as the News of the defeat and Death of the former arrived. Now this new Officer ſome call Aza and Adha, and the Chronicle of King Alphonſus makes Zama the ſame with him; ſo that ſome account theſe men the ſame, although one died at Dertoſa, and other was ſlain in Battel, as it's ſaid, and ſome make them ſeveral, though both they write were ſent by Izit the Miramamolin. There is ſo great Confuſion of Names in Authours, relating theſe Mooriſh matters, that as John Vaſæus a very diligent and judicious Writer obſerves, very difficultly can any thing certain be diſcovered. One grand reaſon he thinks is, that at the ſame time there were many Mooriſh Governours in Spain, over which yet one had the Command and over-ſight, who had his Seat at Corduba, as far as can be gathered from ancient Monuments.

Izit dying, Iſcam his Brother ſucceeds.

A. D. 724. Imperii Arabum, 107.

Abdiramam Galli Scriptores appellant.

16. What we have written concerning him that was killed at the Siege of Tolouſe, is reported of this new Governour, whom they will have by a Conſpiracy of his own men killed at Dertoſa. He oppreſſed with new and unheard-of Taxes, both Moors and Chriſtians. Cauſed a Bridge to be made at Corduba, and having made War upon that part of Spain, lying near the Mountain Caunus, took by force and raced Turiaſo, and was afterward killed after he had ruled Spain two years and ſix months. He left for his Succeſſours, as Roderick the Archbiſhop tells us, Ambuza, Odra and Jahea, ſo that ſome think Spain was now divided into three parts, or elſe they muſt have governed but few months a-piece, but here is ſuch multiplicity and Confuſion of Names, as was ſaid, that nothing certain can be pitcht on. It's more certain, that about this time, Izit the Miramamolin dying left Iſcam his Brother his Succeſſour, on that Condition he ſhould adopt Abulit his Son for his Heir, which he performed. When Iſcam came to be Soveraign, he made Odayſa, Himen, Autuma, Alhaytan and Mahomad his Deputies in Spain, the ſeveral Governments of whom if they ſucceeded one another, muſt have been but of ſmall continuance. For in the ſeven hundred and thirty firſt year of our Lord Abderrahman was Governour, perhaps the ſame we not long ſince mentioned. This man was an excellent Souldier, but fierce of Nature, and cruel, ſevere in his place, as well to his own Nation, at this time exceeding vitious, as to the poor diſtreſſed Chriſtians. This ſeverity, or rather Tyrannical Carriage, procured him many Enemies of both ſorts, and amongſt the reſt, one Muries a Commander of the Moors, of great Intereſt and Courage, found himſelf ſo far concerned as to riſe againſt him, drawing into his Aſſiſtence the Gothick Gall, which truſted to the diſtance of place, the Corretani in Spain, and Eudo the Duke of Aquitain.

17. This Eudo ſeems to have been a man of great Wiſedom and Courage, as any of his time, onely one thing he is blamed for, not as he was a man, but a Chriſtian. To ſtrengthen his intereſt, he married his Daughter to this Muries a Mahometan, but the device proſpered as it had deſerved. For Abderrahman having notice of Muries

Gall and Aquitain invaded by the Governour of Spain.

Vide Marianam de Reb. Hiſp. lib. 7. c. 3.

his purpoſe, and how the Gothick Gall ſtood affected, haſted with a competent force to the Borders of Spain, and ſhut up his Enemy in the City Ceretania, whence not able to eſcape, nor deliver himſelf by ſtrong hand, he ended his own Life himſelf, that it might not be at the Mercy of the Conquerour, which done, the Town yielded, and his head was ſent into Africk to the Emperour of the Moors, together with his beautifull Wife now in the flower of her Age, an acceptable preſent to the Miramamolin. Abderrahman elevated with his Succeſs invaded Gall, and proceeded by the Mediterranean Sea, as far as the River Rhoſne, and laid Siege to Arles the principal City of thoſe parts. Eudo with as great a force as he could compaſs, came to raiſe the Siege, but was defeated with ſo great loſs as ſeldom we have read of, maniſeſted by thoſe great heaps of bones which long time were ſeen before that City. Then turning toward the left, he carried his Victorious Arms through a great part of Gall, and came into Aquitain to be revenged upon, or to brave Eudo his great Enemy at his own Doors.

Carrying all before him.

Is at length encountred by Charles King of the Franks.

18. Paſſing the Garonne, he came before Burdigala or Bourdeaux, which having taken, he uſed with no more Mercy than Angry Conquerours are wont to doe: Not far off he was again encountred by Eudo, as well upon the common Account of Chriſtianity as his private Quarrel, but with the ſame Succeſs as formerly. Then were over-run theſe ſeveral People the Engoliſmenſes, Petragorii, Sanctones and Pictones, and all Chriſtendom it ſelf lay at the ſtake; for who could be imagined to be of ſufficient power to oppoſe and repulſe thoſe who had ſubdued no leſs than Aſia, and Africk, and the Empire of the once formidable Goths? Many Nations trembled afar off, and ſome ſeemed already conquered by the mere fame of their Actions. But there was one Charles Sirnamed Martell in France, the Maſter of the Palace, a ſubject in Name, but Sovereign in effect, him God Almighty reſerved as a Scourge for theſe Victorious Infidels. Moved by the common danger, but ſolicitous for his own Houſe, which being next Neighbour was now almoſt on fire, he reſolved to extinguiſh this dreadfull flame, for which purpoſe he gathered an Army as ſtrong as he could, out of France, Germany and Auſtraſia, many of their own accord, giving in their Names to obviate that miſchief, by which elſe they were ſure to periſh. With theſe he marched to Tours, where he paſſed the River Loire, that having it on his back he might not be incompaſſed by the numerous forces of the Enemy.

Who defeats the Mahometans.

19. The Infidels excelled in numbers, the Chriſtians in their cauſe and Military Skill. Eudo now like a good Chriſtian forgot the Injuries he ſaid he had received from Charles, and preferring the publick Good before his private Reſpects joyned with him, and gave him great Aſſiſtence in the Battel, though as to the thing that moved him to doe it Authours differ. The French Writers tell us, that by the Invitation of Eudo himſelf, the Moors came into Gall, and that when the Infidels had invaded his Dukedom, and ſo perfidiouſly broken the League they had made with him, out of revenge he changed his mind. Herein the ancient Hiſtorians of Spain are ſilent, but the later take Eudo's part, though they will certainly affirm nothing, charitably believing that though his Principality was in Cantabria, and he held but Aquitain in way of Dower, yet becauſe he had lately fought no leſs than two Bloudy Battels againſt the Moors (to which we ſhall add that he was ingaged with Muries his Son-in-Law againſt Abderrahman) he did not invite them into Gall, nor changed his mind upon account of the Breach of any League he made with them. However it was, his coming was ſeaſonable. The Moors were no fewer than four hundred thouſand, many having brought with them their whole Families allured by the report of the Pleaſantneſs and Fertility of Gall, there to inhabit. The Armies being joyned, the Victory for a long time remained doubtfull, but at length the multitudes of the Mahometans gave way to the Valour of the Chriſtians, who got the day.

Killing their Leader amongſt the reſt.

20. Of the Infidels were ſlain no fewer than three hundred and ſeventy five thouſand, and Abderrahman amongſt the reſt, which added to the joy conceived for the victory. And well might the joy be great, conſidering the effects and fruits of it; no leſs than the preſervation of the Chriſtian Name and Intereſt, and an evident proof that this People of the Moors, how terrible ſoever they had hitherto been, might be overcome. The number of the ſlain on the Chriſtian ſide amounted to a thouſand and five hundred, a loſs greater, in reſpect that thoſe that were ſlain were of the beſt Families, and moſt valiant Perſons, in reſpect of the quality, rather than the quantity of the men. Amongſt thoſe that did worthily, none ſurpaſſed Eudo, by confeſſion of Charles Martell himſelf, and by his coming in and falling ling upon the Rere in the heat of the Fight the victory principally was obtained. But ſuch was the ſucceſs of the Chriſtians againſt the Mahometans, in the ſeven hundred and thirty fourth year of our Lord, and the one and twentieth after the loſs of Spain. Into the Office of Abderrahman was preferred one Abdelmelic who governed Spain four years, and was famous for nothing but the vertues proper to thoſe of his place, viz. Cruelty and Covetouſneſs; and herein he had the advantage of the reſt, that whereas his Predeceſſours had pilled and rifled a State that was already down, and at the loweſt ebb of fortune, he by his Rapines checked it now when it was about to revive and make ſome progreſs towards its former flouriſhing condition. He was commanded to make ſome attempt upon Gall, which as he was about to doe, he loſt many men at the Straits of the Pyrenæan Hills, and remembring the fate of his Predeceſſour, fairly retreated.

A. D. 734.

Abdelmelic Governour of Spain.

21. About the ſame time (ſome ſay the ſeven hundred thirty fifth, others the thirty ſeventh of our Lord) died Pelagius the new titular King of Spain at Canica, and was buried at a Monaſtery near at hand of his own building; where his Wife Gandicſa, by name alſo was interred. His Son Favila ſucceeded him without any oppoſition, for his Father's ſake, not his own merits. He reigned but two years, aud during thoſe moſt unlike his Father. He preferred his own pleaſure before the Publick profit, ſpending his time in a mock war againſt wild Beaſts when he ſhould have been exerciſed in a ſerious hoſtility againſt the Enemies of his Countrey, and in ſuch a ſort of battel died, not by the hand of a noble Gallant enemy, but by the teeth of a Savage wild Boar which he too hotly and raſhly purſued. He being dead without iſſue, according to the laſt will of Pelagius, Alfonſus and Ormiſinda were declared Kings with univerſal conſent and applauſe of the People. Alfonſus was the Son of Peter Duke of Calabria, ſprung from the Noble bloud of King Ricarede. He had commanded Forces during the Reigns of Egica and Witiza when young, and of late brought a ſtout band of Cantabrians, and joyning himſelf with Pelagius had done excellent ſervice againſt the Saracens, whereupon he gave him his Daughter Ormiſinda to Wife, and from this marriage have the Kings of Spain proceeded in an unqueſtionable line; Son from Father, as writes Mariana. He was a man of excellent Parts moſt fit for government, a great States-man, and an excellent Souldier, well arm'd againſt adverſity, but to be admired for his rare felicity and ſucceſs in all his undertakings, and very religious, whereupon he had the ſirname of Catholick, a Title formerly given to Ricarede his Anceſtour for his renouncing the Arian Tenets, by the Synod then held in his City of Toledo.

Pelagius dies.

Favila ſucceeds,

Then Alfonſus.

Aldefonſus Toletano, & alii.

22. About this time died Eudo the Duke of Aquitain, whoſe Dominions in Gall Charles Martell ſeized, and therein placed Garriſons to defend them. His three Sons Aznar, Hunnold and Vaifer or Gaifar, ſenſible of the injury, and as Heirs to their Father's Courage as well as his Territories, preſently take Arms. Aznar makes an Expedition in thoſe parts of Spain which border upon the Vaſcons, where he takes the City Java, with many other Towns from the Moors, and gives Original to the People and Kingdom of Aragon, which ſome derive from the River Arago, which running through theſe Countries, joins it ſelf with Ega, though others will have it framed of Taracon, whence the Taraconian Province was ſo called. Hunnold and Gaifer paſs the Rhoſne, and with great Terrour invade Gall, ſparing nothing that Fire or Sword could deſtroy, not ſucking Babes, nor ſuch as Age had placed more than half in the Grave already. The Allobroges they haraſſed moſt cruelly, and Vienna being with much adoe kept from them, they pierced into the more inward Parts of Gall. Not content with what they could doe themſelves, they join with Mauritius, the Count of Marſeilles, and all three to doe miſchief to Martell, once again call in the Moors, who were ready enough to come uncalled; the laſt knock that they got not having ſo ſmarted, but that their longing after ſo pleaſant a Countrey made them quickly forget the pain. By this time one Aucapa had ſucceeded Abdelmelic in the Government of the Mooriſh Spain, after he was accuſed of ill adminiſtration, and in Bonds conſtrained to plead his Cauſe by a certain Noble man of that Nation, and a man moſt zealous of their ſuperſtition. Aucapa, by the aſſiſtence of Mauritius, took the City Avinion, and miſerably waſted all the Countrey about it, which happened five years after the Defeat at Tours, in the firſt of the Reign of King Alfonſus. The Countrey was indeed very much waſted and diſtreſſed by the Conjunction of theſe Great ones; but by the extraordinary Valour and Conduct of Martell, all was again recovered; Avinion and Narbon both recovered, and ſcarcely any thing left either to the Moors or Goths in Gall.

The Original of the Kingdom of Aragon.

Aucapa Governour of the Mooriſh Spain.

23. In

Sect. 3.

Belgi Abe[illegible] Roderico Toletano.

23. In Africk, at this time, were as great Diſorders carried on with more tumult and pertinacious wilfulneſs. One Belgius Abembexius, a Duke of great Intereſt amongſt the Moors, raiſed a Rebellion againſt Iſcam the Miramamolin, for what reaſon we know not; but probably whatever was pretended, moved by the common motive of Ambition. Many battels were fought, wherein he being often Victour, croſſed over into Spain, which then was again governed by Abdelmelic, whom his Adverſary Aucapa upon his death-bed had ordered to be let out of priſon. Belgius not long after his Inlargement arriving in Spain, had ſent before him Abderrahman with a ſtrong band of men, who drove him into Corduba, and there taking him alive, miſerably tortured him to death to ſatiate his malitious mind. In the ſame year, which was the forty third, or the eighth Age, died Iſcam the Miramamolin, after he had reigned nineteen years, a Prince renowned for the vaſtneſs of his Empire, and his great ſucceſs, but ſo exceſſive covetous, that he omitted no way of ſcraping wealth together, excelling in riches all his Predeceſſours. For this reaſon he was ſo hated by ſeveral of the Provinces, that they refuſed to pay him obedience for the ſpace of four years, during which time, notwithſtanding all the force he uſed, he could not reduce them into order. But to ſee the extent of his Dominions, we ſhall preſent the Reader with an Account of the Provinces ſubject to him and the Mahometan ſuperſtition, as we have it from Rodericus Ximenius the Archbiſhop of Toledo, who wrote the Hiſtory of thoſe Arabians. He begins with Iconia, the Metropolis whereof was Iconium; then follow Lyſtria, whoſe Metropolis was Lyſtris; Alapia, that had a Metropolis of its own name; Chaldæa, whoſe Metropolis was once Babylon, but then deſtroyed; Aſſyria, the Metropolis being Ninive of old; Media, the Metropolis of which was Ecbatane; Hyrcania, whoſe Metropolis was Anthiolas; Perſia, its Metropolis being Suſa; Meſopotamia, the Metropolis of which was Aram or Carra; Syria the upper, with its Metropolis Damaſcus; Cœloſyria or Phœnicia with Tyre; Syria the Inferiour with Antioch; Judæa with Jeruſalem; Ægypt with Alexandria; Arabia the Greater with Baldac its Metropolis; Æthiopia with Nadaver; Africk with Carthage; Spain with Toledo. All theſe Provinces did the Sect and Sword of Mahomet ſubdue. Sometimes alſo Sicily, whoſe Metropolis was Panormus; and Calabria, whoſe ancient Metropolis was Rhegium, part of Apulia; Gallia Gothica, whoſe Metropolis was Narbon; and the Vaſcones, the Metropolis of which were Auxis and Bourdeaux. So vaſt was grown the Empire and Rule of thoſe Sons of Iſhmael, the Hiſtory of which it's a great pity, we have little farther than as it concerns Chriſtian Affairs.

Iſcam the Miramamolin dies.

His Dominions.

Roderic. Toletan. Hiſt. Arabum, cap. 12.

Alulit ſucceeds.

24. To Iſcam ſucceeded Alulit, ſirnamed the Fair, the Son of Izit, with greater applauſe than ſucceſs, as the Sequel ſhewed. In Africk he was ſorely put to it by the Arms of Belgius, and in Spain by Doran, one of the Complices of that Rebel. Againſt Doran was ſent Albulcatar, in the beginning of the Reign of Alulit, who much appeaſed the Countrey, ſending the greateſt part of the Mutineers into Africk, under pretence of ſupplying the force of that Province. But within a ſhort time the Moors roſe up againſt him, and he was ſlain by the means and procurement of one Zimael; which done, they advanced one Roba the chief Favourer and Aſſiſtant of Zimael into his place, who lived not long to enjoy his Uſurped power, being by the contrary Faction ſlain with a greater Number of his followers. About the ſame time dies Alulit the Miramamolin, or Sovereign of the Arabians in their Hundred, and twenty ſeventh year, according to Roderick the Archbiſhop, which fell into the ſeven hundred and forty fourth year of our Lord, and was ſucceeded by Ibrahem his Brother with as bad ſucceſs. For Maroan, another Arabian of the Humeian family conſpired againſt him and murthered him in his Palace, when he had reigned little more than one year. In his time Toba governed Spain, but dying within a year, all the Senate of the Palace of the Arabians (as our Authour words it) made choice of one Juzeph (or Tuceph) to ſucceed him. He was a very old man, and as it is familiar to old age, was highly covetous; but what is not familiar, was alſo infamous for luſt, whereby he obliterated the glory of his former Actions; and was ſo contemptible, that the Spaniſh Moors roſe in Rebellion againſt him. During his Reign were ſeen at Corduba three Suns, a ſight which mightily diſturbed the ignorant people, which underſtood not the Philoſophy of a thick and opace Cloud, and ſhapes of men were ſeen carrying Forks in their hands. This might portend the Invaſion of Angli, by the depredations of whom the Borders of Spain were afflicted with a dreadfull Famine, as alſo the Tumults and Wars which ſhortly after befell the Moors in Africk.

Roderico Toletano Toban. aliis Proba.

A. D. 744.

Then Ibrahem, who is murthered by Maroan the Uſurper.

Roderico Mardan.

Al. Toaba & Thoba.

Al. Juzaph. Juzeph Arabibus, quem nos Joſephum appellamus.

Roderic. Tolet. Hiſt. Arabum, cc. 27, 28.

25. For

But is ſlain by the forces of Abdalla.

Roderico Alabeci hinc Abdalla Benallabeci apud eum.

25. For Abdalla deſcended of the moſt Noble Family of the Alavecins, looking upon Maroan no otherwiſe than as an Uſurper, conſpired againſt him, which he underſtanding, with the publick treaſures fled from his Palace into Libya, there to prepare himſelf for War. Abdalla fearing nothing, by perſuaſion of the Nobility was Inagurated, and ſent his Uncle Zali with an infinite number of Arabians and Perſians againſt Maroan, who purſued him from place to place, for he had ſo ill treated the Saracens in his Government, that no where could he find any ſhelter. At length paſſing the Nile, in a place by them called Azan or Azimum, they came to an Engagement with miſſile weapons, which laſted for two days, and on the third was Maroan ſlain, with many of his followers. Now Roderick the Archbiſhop tells us, that from Mahomet, till theſe times, the Arabians on both ſides the Seas were governed by one Sovereign Prince, whom he calls their Amiramomen, and that thoſe that were deſcended from the family of Benelabec, depoſed or drove from the Sovereignty ſuch as drew their Pedigree from that of Abenhumey, and endeavoured utterly to deſtroy them. Theſe Families of Humey and Alabeci came of the two Daughters of Mahomet, whence aroſe the emulation and diſcord betwixt them. Others reported that Mahomet had but one Daughter called Fatima, which married Alyabrietalep, the Scribe or Secretary of Mahomet, who reigned the fourth in order from him four years and eight days; and it's ſaid, that from him and Fatima proceeded theſe two Potent and Contending Families.

26. But, in the mean while, Alfonſus (that we may ſee how the lately revived Kingdom of the Goths proſpers) made good uſe of the differences and confuſions amongſt the Moors, enlarging his Kingdom by Arms, which hitherto had been very narrow. He had the better opportunity to doe it, becauſe the Chriſtians which inhabited amongſt the Saracens were ſo weary of their new Lords, that eſteeming death better than that unſupportable bondage they underwent, they thought fit to venture and try whether they could both prevent the one and ſhake off the other, by betaking themſelves to him, and fighting under ſo hopefull and encouraging a General. In Gallicia, Lucas, Tuda and Aſturia were recovered; in Luſitania, Portus Cale (which ſtanding upon the mouth of the River Durius, afterward changed the Name of Luſitania into Portugal) Pax Julia, Bracara, Viſeum, Flavia, Bletiſa and Sentica, which two laſt Cities are now known by the Names of Ledeſma and Zamora. Beſides theſe he reduced Septimaneæ, Dominæ, Miranda, Segobia, Abula and Sepulneda ſtanding at the foot of the Hill Oroſpeda, and upon the bank of the River Durato, a Town ſtrong by its natural ſite, formerly called Segobriga, being a Municipium of good eſteem. Carried by the ſame courſe of victory into remote Parts, he conquered ſome Towns amongſt the Vandali. Amongſt the Vaſcons Pampolo, and in Cantabria that part which is now called Alava, although the various fortune of War in following times carried back again moſt of theſe Cities to the Moors, by reaſon of erecting of their Kingdom of Corduba, begun in thoſe times to the great damage of Chriſtianity, and afterward to its greater detriment carried on and inlarged. Thus much did Alfonſus doe for the recovery of the ancient Poſſeſſions of the Chriſtians; but ſome would have him doe more than he did, writing that by force of his Arms all Cantabria was conquered and recovered from the Moors; wherefore it may evidently appear from more ancient Monuments, that the Moors never came beyond the place commonly called the Rock with the Hole by the Cantabrians. At length he died in the ſeventy fourth year of his Age, and the nineteenth of his Reign, in the ſeven hundred and fifty ſeventh year of our Lord, and was buried where he died, viz. at Canica. By his Wife Ormiſinda he had four Sons, Froila, Bimaran, Aurelius and Uſenda; and one by a Concubine named Mauregatus. He had a Brother, Froila by name, happy and famous for nothing ſo much as that he was Father to Aurelius and Veremund.

Alfonſus recovers ſeveral places from the Moors.

Dies.

A. D. 757.

Froila ſucceeds.

27. To Alfonſus ſucceeded his Son Froila, according to his Birth-right, and the deſires of the People, a Prince whom one can hardly call either Good or Bad, ſo mixt, it's ſaid, was his Government, and his Actions different. By nature he was fierce, rigid in his manners, and by his flatterers put upon ſuch courſes as they called wholeſomely ſevere, but others could not but mark them with the name of Cruel. Amongſt his good deeds he is commended for founding the Noble City Onetum in Aſturia, the praiſe of which ſome erroniouſly aſcribe unto his Father. The liberty of Marriage brought in by Witiza, he took away, for which ſome think him worſe ſpoken of than he did deſerve. For in Military matters, though he did not equal, yet he ſeems to have imitated his Father. In the ſecond year of his Reign, Juzeph the Mooriſh Governour having invaded the borders of Gallicia with a Defeats Juzeph the Mooriſh Governour.

vaſt Army, he met and gave him battel and defeated him, fifty thouſand men periſhing in the place; no Age knew a greater victory, nor more ſeaſonable for the Intereſt of Chriſtianity. This overthrow was not more ſeaſonable for the Chriſtians, than convenient for the deſign of Abderrahman, who being of the family of Humey, and ſorely perſecuted by Abdalla, him that had lately brought the Soveraignty to the Houſe of Alabeci, and by all means endeavoured to root out the whole ſtock of the contrary faction, fled into Spain, where for the favour they bore to his Family, for the many good offices his Anceſtours had done to the Countrey, he was kindly received. Onely Juzeph oppoſed him, and gathering an Army, met him in the field, but was defeated, and fled to Toledo. Malaca, Aſſidona and Sevil had before this yielded to Abderrahman, and now he laid Siege to Bela. Juzeph privately ſtole away to Corduba, where making no long ſtay, he paſſed to Granata, and there Abderrahman got him into his hands. But uſing him, it ſeems, too mercifully, from Corduba he fled to Emerita, where getting together nigh twenty thouſand men, he made Incurſions into the Territories belonging to the Friends of Abderrahman, till by a ſtronger force he was reſtrained, and driven to Toledo, where thinking himſelf in ſecurity, he was ſlain. The Town quickly yielded to Abderrahman, who by univerſal conſent of the Moors, begun a Kingdom at Corduba, to which they all ſubjected themſelves without any dependence upon, or duty acknowledged to, any other Miramamolin or Potentate whatſoever. This New Kingdom, by the means of this Abdarrahman Abenhumeia, ſirnamed Adahil, began in the hundred and forty ſecond year of the Arabians, in the ſeven hundred fifty ninth year of our Lord.

Abderrahman begins a Mooriſh Kingdom at Corduba.

Roderico Toletano Abderramen.

A. D. 759.

28. Againſt this New Mooriſh King, Valentia, a City of the Edetani, in the Tarraconian Province, was the onely place that ſtood out, and refuſed to acknowledge his Juriſdiction. But e'er long it found reaſon to yield, and whereas ſome of his own Nation rebelled againſt him, he had the good fortune to ſuppreſs the Rebellion, and animadverted upon the principal offenders by ſeveral ſorts of exemplary puniſhments. The Barbarian elevated by ſo great felicity, made War upon the People of Gallicia, and laid Siege to Pax Julia, a place of Portugal, at this time called Beja. But he had to doe with one in thoſe places, who knew as well to keep, as he to get, viz. Froila, by whoſe victorious Arms he was repulſed, as well as all the Mutineers which poſſibly held intelligence with him. For Froila by the ſame courſe of felicity reduced to obedience the Inhabitants of Gallicia, as alſo the Rebellious Vaſcons, in which expedition he married Menina, ſome call her Momerana, the Daughter of Eudo Duke of Aquitain, and Siſter to Aznar. Thus he proceeded, and might be ranked amongſt great and good Princes, but that he blemiſhed all by cruelly murthering his Brother Bimaran, a Prince beloved by the People for the beauty both of his Body and Mind, with his own hand, though probably he might not want provocation. Indifferent perſons ſuſpect there might be Ambition in the caſe, and that thoſe whom the King's ſeverity alienated from him, might puſh on Bimaran to ſome dangerous attempt. Whatever the cauſe was, he could not waſh away with all he could doe, the crime of reputed Paricide, being ill thought and ſpoken of, both alive and dead upon this account, although to redeem his credit he adopted Veremund for his Succeſſour, the Son of his ſlain and lamented Brother. But this would not doe the work, whatever he did was either ill done or ill taken, ſo that running out of one fault and inconvenience into another, he was killed at laſt at Canica, and was buried at his Onetum. He reigned eleven years, five months and twenty days, as ſome ancient * Hiſtories relate, although † Roderick the Archbiſhop gives to his Reign no fewer than thirteen years complete.

Is beaten by Froila.

Who is murthered.

* Alcobacienſis Codex; Aliud Chronic. perantiquum & Hiſtoria Compoſtellana.

† De Reb. Hiſp. lib. 4. c. 6.

29. Froila by his Wife Menina had a Son named Alfonſus, and a Daughter called Ximena. But Aurelius who ſlew him to revenge the death of Bimeran (his Brother or Couſin, it's uncertain, for ſome make Aurelius the Son of Froila, Alfonſus his Brother) by conſent of the Nation was made King in the ſeven hundred ſixty eighth year of our Lord. He reigned ſix years and as many months, being famous for no great matters performed. He ſuppreſſed indeed the Slaves, which now truſting to the confuſion and uncertainty of the times, rebelled. But the fame of this Action, and more than this could not equal the diſhonour he got by the League which he made with the Moors, by virtue whereof he was to pay a yearly tribute of Virgins to thoſe Infidels. The terrour of Abderrahman's Name was ſo great, that it frighted them into this compliance, leſt he, a man very fierce and active, ſhould bring all his ſtrength againſt their weak and ſcarcely ſetled Kingdom. Aurelius having no children (it doth not appear he had any Wife) gave his Siſter Adoſinda in Aurelius choſen in his place.

marriage

Next Silo is made King, who takes Alfonſus the Second for his Partner.

marriage to one Silo, a man of great Nobility, with hopes to ſucceed him. His hope was not vain, for Aurelius being dead, for the ſake of his Wife he was admitted King, and reigned nine years, one month and a day. He reduced into order the mutinous People of Gallicia, but being either by reaſon of his Age or his own temper unfit for Government, by perſuaſion of his Wife he took Alfonſus the Son of Froila to be his Partner in the Kingdom, ſuch being the miſfortune of the times, that when the State, by reaſon of its weakneſs, and ſo powerfull a Neighbour, required the moſt able and moſt active Princes to govern it, weak and idle men happened to preſide and move the Helm.

Alfonſus reigns alone.

But outed by Mauregatus with the aſſiſtence of the Moors.

A. D. 788.

Abderrahman dies.

Toletano Hiſſem, Alfonſo Regi Ixeca, Raſi Iſmien, Marianæ Iſſem.

Iſſem ſeizes on the Government of the Moors.

30. After Silo's death, Alfonſus was confirmed in the Government, the People having forgot his Father's faults, which his own and excellent demeanour had in a great meaſure alſo covered. Onely Mauregatus his Uncle (and that by a Concubine) found himſelf concerned, alledging that he himſelf was nearer in bloud to the former Kings, and there wanted not ſome Male-contents, who flattered him with continual ſuggeſtions that he was injured. But finding not ſtrength enough at home, he betook himſelf to the Moors, and to get aſſiſtence from them, offer'd, that in caſe they made him King, to pay them a yearly Tribute of fifty Noble Virgins, and as many out of the Inferiour ſort. Theſe Infidels being a people above all others given to leachery, to gratifie their luſt, and out of Ambition to have a Chriſtian King, their Tributary, granted his requeſt, and by permiſſion of their King an Army was levied, which Alfonſus finding himſelf unable to reſiſt, being as yet unſetled in his place, gave way to fortune and his Competitour, and returned into Cantabria, being now twenty five years old, hoping there to find good friends, by reaſon of his Mother's kindred. Mauregatus then obtained the Throne, and was eminent for nothing but the diſhoneſty and filthineſs of his manners, wherein having ſpent five years and ſix months, he then left this world, and was buried at Pravia in the ſeven hundred and eighty eighth year of our Lord. In the ſame year died Abderrahman King of the Moors at Corduba, having reigned nine and twenty years, and adorned that City with an excellent Caſtle, rarely contrived Gardens, and ſuch a Moſque, as being now turned into a Cathedral Church for its beautifull Structure, multitude and variety of Pillars ſeems miraculous. He left eleven Sons and nine Daughters. Of the Sons, the eldeſt Zuleman he had made in his life time Governour of Toledo, and at his death appointed him his Succeſſour. But Iſſem his ſecond by his preſence at Corduba, having got the opportunity of Cajolling the People, ſet up for himſelf, and what he juſtly or unjuſtly got, in the ſame manner kept and preſerved.

To Mauregatus ſucceeds Veremundus.

Who makes Alfonſus the Third his Partner in the Kingdom.

A. D. 791.

31. Againſt Zuleman he ſo ſtoutly defended himſelf, that he forced him to ſell his Pretenſions for ſixty thouſand Aurei and to go into Africk, as did his other Brother Abdalla, with whom he alſo compounded, after he had made an Inſurrection. Having conquered all oppoſition, he lengthened out his Reign to ſeven years, ſeven months and ſeven days. To Mauregatus ſucceeded Veremundus, though upon what title is not agreed, for Authours differ about his Genealogy, ſome making him the Son of Bimaran, who was killed by his Brother Froila, and others of Froila the Brother of Alfonſus the Catholick, which ſeems moſt probable, being moſt approved by learned men, and atteſted by the Chronicle, which hath gone under the Name of Alfonſus the Catholick. He reigned three years and five months, and of his Wife Numilo (or Vſenda) begat two Sons Ramir and Garſias; but foraſmuch as he was in Orders, and a Deacon, he is ſaid afterwards to have abſtained from her company. Otherwiſe he was a modeſt and temperate man, by confeſſion of ſuch as were againſt his marriage, of a peaceable ſpirit, neither by art nor nature fit for Arms. But herein his care for the Publick appears, that being not fit himſelf for buſineſs, he choſe for his Collegue ſuch an one as to whom thoſe things were moſt proper, viz. Alfonſus his Kinſman, whom Mauregatus had baniſhed into Cantabria, ſolemnizing his Inauguration or Reſtitution on the nineteenth day of July, in the ſeven hundred ninety firſt year of our Lord. Alfonſus after this governed a long time, and was ſecond to none for his perpetual felicity, his Clemency, Munificence, his Religion and his Skill in matters relating to War.

32. The hope of this his Skill was much confirmed by the victory he obtained over the Moors, in the third year after his Reſtitution. For whereas by virtue of the agreement made by Mauregatus, ſuch a Number of Chriſtian Virgins was yearly to be delivered to them as a Tribute, he abhorring it as a moſt wicked thing, when for want of payment they made Inroads into the Countrey, he met and gave them battel at a Town called Ledes, where they received ſo total a defeat, that ſeventy thouſand men were ſlain, and his Subjects now began to lift up their heads as freed from bondage. For the Moors were hereby ſo weakned, that having work made them elſewhere, they had no opportunity or power to revenge the loſs; the Vaſcons putting them to it on one hand, and the Arms of Charles the Great, who now began to grow famous, much moleſting them on the other; ſo that by one means or other they loſt many Towns upon the Borders. This cauſed Iſſem the Miramamolin, to ſend away Abdelmolic a Captain of great Note, to reſtore his Intereſt in thoſe Quarters, who retook Gerunda and Narbon, whence he had Slaves to help to perfect the ſtructure of the Moſque at Corduba. He cauſed another Bridge to be built to the Caſtle in that City. He firſt of all the Mooriſh Kings uſed three thouſand of Renegado Chriſtians as a Guard, and had conſtantly two thouſand Eunuchs that followed his Court. He died in the ſeven hundred and ninety fifth year of our Lord, leaving Alhaca his Son his Succeſſour, who Reigned ſix and twenty years, ten months and fifteen days, being a Prince of great prudence, Juſtice and Liberality as can be imagined amongſt that People. And to him ſome aſcribe the Guard of five thouſand men, Apoſtate Chriſtians and Eunuchs, which others ſay, was firſt raiſed by his Father.

Sect. 3

Iſſem the Miramamolin dies leaving Albaca his Succeſſour.

Alhaca Toletano aliis Hilibata.

Veremund dies leaving Alfonſus the Monarch.

33. In the mean time died Veremund and was buried at Onetum, where the Monuments of him and his Wife were ſeen long after. Then did Alfonſus govern alone, and abſtaining from the imbraces of his Wife, Bertha, obtained the Sirname of the Chaſte. His former Glories were within a little while ſomething obſcured, at leaſt ſo he thought, by a Clandeſtine Marriage of his Siſter Ximena to Sandias, or Sanctius the Count of Soldania; from which Marriage proceeded Bernard, who had the Sirname of Carpenſis, and is much celebrated for his great Atchievements by the Writers of the Spaniſh Story. Alfonſus for all his Vertue could not bear ſuch an Indignity offered to his Family, but calling the Count to Leon, upon pretence of the Aſſembly of the Eſtates, he was accuſed of Treaſon, and having his Eyes put out, was condemned to perpetual Priſon, there to bewail his own Ambition, or rather the Cruelty of the King. Semena was conſtrained to go into a Monaſtery; but the Infant he well provided for, bringing him up with as much Care and Reſpect, as if he had been his own Son. In the mean time the Moors could not be quiet amongſt themſelves. Zuleman and Abdalla the Uncles of the new King grudged him his preferment, and left nothing undone to remove him from it. Some ſay, that Abdalla craved aid of Charles the Great, who ſent his Son Ludovicus to aſſiſt him, and that the Army of the Franks pierced into Spain, as far as Oſca. Others write, that both the Brothers at this time came over out of Africk, Abdalla having by connivence of the Citizens firſt ſeized upon Valentia, and then ſent for the other. Making frequent Irruptions into the Countrey, they made great waſte round about, and at laſt had the Boldneſs to give Battel to Alhaca the Miramamolin, who had the good Fortune after great Effuſion of Bloud, to get the Victory. Zuleman was ſlain in the Battel: Abdalla eſcaped to Valentia, where ſeriouſly conſidering of his Affairs, thought it beſt to be quiet, and made Peace with his Nephew on this Condition, to have ſuch an allowance as might maintain him according to his Quality. To the King he ſent his Sons, who uſed them with great Reſpect as his Couſin Germans, and to one of them he Married his Siſter. Theſe things happened in the fifth year of the Reign of Alhaca, in the hundred and eighty fourth of the Arabians.

A Rebellion amongſt the Moors.

34. Theſe diſturbances amongſt the Moors, made well for Alfonſus, who had thereby opportunity to ſtrengthen and inlarge his Kingdom. Some Writers now relate, how by the Aſſiſtence of Charles the Great he recovered Oliſipo, or Lisbon the principal Town of Luſitania out of their hands, as alſo Barcelona; and that Alfonſus ſent to Charles a very ſplendid Embaſſy, the Embaſſadours being Fruela and Baſilicus, who carried with them a rich Preſent of Horſes, Arms and Slaves, beſides a Pavilion of admirable ſize and Workmanſhip, the ſpoils of the conquered City of Lisbon. But ſuch Writers as tell theſe ſtories, are * Strangers concerned for the Honour and Reputation of Charles, the Spaniſh Hiſtorians being herein wholly ſilent. Barcelona indeed in theſe times, was by Charles the Great taken from the Moors, and twice was Lisbon freed from the Tyranny of the Moors, and each time the thing was done by an Alphonſus. But this was long time after, viz. it was firſt taken by Alphonſus the ſixth, him who alſo recovered Toledo, about the one thouſand and ninety third year of our Lord, and again by Alphonſus Henricus the firſt King of Portugal about fifty years after. That it was taken by Alphonſus the Chaſte, (for no other Alphonſus lived in the time of Charles the Great) is no where to be found in any Spaniſh Monument of Antiquity. This we find conſtantly ſtantly reported, that Charles the Great was more than once in Spain; Firſt immediately after his Father's death, ſolicited by Ibnabala the Moor, with hope of taking Spain from that People, and at this time they will have him to have made himſelf Maſter of Pompelona, which he diſmantled at his retreat after that he had ſetled Ibnabala King of Saragoſſa. In his return, as he paſſed the Straits of the Pyrenæan Mountains, he was ſet upon by the Vaſcons, and with the loſs of his Treaſures, and many men, returned with ſmall Reputation into Germany. He had Gerunda and Barcino put into his hands by the Moors, and thence came the Counts of Barcelona and the Original of the Catalonians, the Cathelauni, who lived formerly about Toloſe now coming and planting themſelves in this part of Spain. For as for their Opinion, who make Catalaunia a word compounded of Goths and Alans, and theirs who derive it from Catalo a Goverour of Aquitain, at ſuch time as Charles Martell ſeized on that Dukedom, and outed the Sons of Eudo, they ſeem improbable to Learned men.

* Jacobus Mayerus in Chronico rerum Flandricarum Platina in vita Leonis tertii.

Codex Alcobacienſis, & vetus Chronicon apud Joh. Vaſæum ad A. D. 791.

Sect. 3.

The Original of the Catalonians whence.

Quaſi Gothalania.

35. A certain French Authour hath written, that Charles after a little time having taken Narbon from the Moors returned again into Spain, and made himſelf Maſter of that which hath the Name of old Catalaunia amongſt the Ceretani, and gave the Moors Battel in that Valley, which afterward received a Name from him. Others add that he came into Spain again, to view the Body of St. James, which they ſay was now found at Compoſtella, and that the Prelate of that place, by his Order and Command was made Primate over the reſt of the Churches of Spain; Stories that have no Foundation in Antiquity. After this he went to Rome, where by means of Leo the Biſhop, he was ſaluted Auguſtus or Emperour, as we ſhew at large in its proper place; and then again returning into Germany, they thence bring him into Spain upon this occaſion. Alfonſus being now old, and tired with the tedious War, he had conſtantly with the Moors, wherein his Succeſs anſwered not his great pains and Travel, invited Charles into Spain, to whom he offered the Succeſſion in his Kingdom, as a reward, he himſelf having no Children. He, although he was alſo ſtricken in years, yet deſigning Spain to Bernard the Son of his deceaſed Son: Pipin whom he had already made King of Italy, refuſed not the terms, but with a great power of men, began his march, not doubting to carry all before him, when the Councils of both the Princes, as it's hard to conceal the purpoſes of ſuch Expeditions, were betrayed. The Nobility of Spain preſently began to exclaim, they ſhould never endure to be ſubject to the Franks, an inſolent Nation, and Cruel, for thereby they ſhould not ſhake off the yoke they underwent, but onely change for an heavier. Every one muttered theſe things in private, yet none publickly dared to reſiſt the King's intentions, till Bernard Sirnamed Carpenſis his Nephew, a man whoſe Bloud boyled in his veins, and the more by reaſon of the hope he had hitherto had of his Uncle's good Inclinations towards him, offered himſelf as Captain to all that would follow him; and then began Alfonſus to cool in his Deſires he had to Charles his coming. Marſilius the Moor King of Cæſar Auguſta, who was at Enmity with the Emperour, upon the Account of Ibnabala, whom he had driven away, was drawn to the Spaniſh ſide. Now the Tide is turned, and Charles not willing to put up ſuch an affront marcheth forward.

Thornichus apud Marianam, de Rebus Hiſp. l. 7. c. 11.

Alfonſus invites Charles the French King into Spain.

Duodecimo ab urbe Salmantica lapide, quibus locis Alba ſita eſt, Carpium Arcem adificavit, unde illi Carpenſis Cognomentum factum.

36. Here now we are at a loſs, if he be not, wanting a certain guide to Conduct us in the Relation of this adventure. The French Writers tell us, that he pierced into Spain, and returned not till he had waſted the Countrey far and wide, after a Victory obtained in a ſet Battel, which done, he was oppoſed at the Straits in his retreat. On the contrary, the Spaniſh deny that he ever reached the Inwards of the Countrey, but in the Valley of Roſcida in the Foreſt of the Vaſcons, a ſtop was put to his Expedition. The Battel of the Franks, was led by Roland the Count of Britain, Anſelme and Eginard principal men in the Court of Charles; but the place would not give them leave to open their Ranks, or march in any bredth; the Spaniards therefore, before they could get themſelves into any poſture of fighting from the higher ground killed many. In the firſt encounter Rolland was ſlain, concerning whom many Romances or fabulous Stories have been told, and written by both Nations. Charles hereat exceedingly ſtartled, is ſaid by a Speech to have reprehended and quickened his men, as forgetting their former Trade of Victory, and by his Art to have put them into as good a poſture, as the place and Inconveniency of it would ſuffer him. Then followed a moſt bloudy Conteſt, wherein a great number of the beſt and nobleſt Franks fell; being diſcouraged by a report, that the Moors were come to the Aſſiſtence of the Spaniards, and had got beyond them, and were ready to fall upon their backs. No place, now cry our Spaniſh Writers, was ever more noble or famous for an overthrow of the Franks, but they are ſo ingenuous as to tell you, that Charles did not take revenge, and wipe off the diſgrace of this defeat, becauſe he was prevented by Death, dying at Aquiſgrave not long after, Roderick the Archbiſhop writes, that Alfonſus was preſent at the Battel. The Vaſcons affirmed, that the Victory was obtained by the means of Garſias of the King Suprarbis eſpecially. On the contrary, the Writers of the French Hiſtory do not aſcribe this Victory at all to the Valour of the Spaniards, but to the Treachery of one Gatalon, ſuch diverſity of Opinions there is founded upon that of Intereſt; and while both Nations ſtrive one to get the renown, and the other to prevent diſgrace, they have ſo confounded the ſtory, that by-ſtanders can find nothing that's certain in it. And to ſpeak Impartially, not onely the Circumſtances, but the ſubſtance of the thing may juſtly be called into queſtion: As thoſe Hiſtorians that have written of it, can ſcarcely in one accident as to time and place agree, ſo thoſe who had moſt reaſon to know, write nothing at all of it. Eginhart, who was Secretary to Charles, and from whom nothing could be hid, never makes mention of the Fight, in the Hiſtory he wrote of his Life yet extant. The Spaniards might have ſome cauſe herein to ſuſpect his Partiality and Malice, but that if they turn over the Chronicle of their own King Alfonſus the Great, which not long after theſe times, he dedicated to Sebaſtian the Biſhop of Salmantica, though by reaſon of his living ſo near to thoſe days, he might have opportunity to know the truth, and it concerned him not to omit any thing that tended to the Glory of his own Nation, yet they ſhall therein find as deep a ſilence. Let the Reader therefore, either take the ſtory of this Expedition, and defeat of Charles the Great for a truth, or let him if he pleaſe joyn it as an Appendix, as near akin to the famous Adventures of Orlando Furioſo, the iſſue of the fruitfull Brain of Arioſto the Poet.

37. To return into Spain and take our leave, the reſt of his time Alfonſus paſſed with Quiet and Tranquillity, giving him ſufficient opportunity to practiſe the Arts of Peace and Religion, as he had done formerly that of War. And this was his great Commendation, that whereas other Princes too often make the publick Intereſt truckle to their private concerns, whether of Profit or Pleaſure, he meaſured every thing by the Standard of the Kingdom, Sacrificing his own particular advantages of Pomp and Revenue, to the Enrichment and Ornament of his Countrey. The diſſention and Enmity which afterward aroſe betwixt him and his Nephew Bernard, ſeems to have been the greateſt part of his infelicity. Bernard having done ſo great Services in the Field, thought he had deſerved ſo great a favour at his Uncle's hands, as the ſetting at Liberty of his blind Father, and when it would not (out of ſome deep Myſtery of ſtate doubtleſs) be granted, conceived ſo great Indignation thereat, that firſt obtaining a diſmiſſion from Service, he departed to Saldania his Father's Town, reſolving to watch for an opportunity to be revenged. And the extreme Age of the King, together with the good Inclinations of the People to him gave him opportunity enough of making Incurſions and Depredations in his Territories, without controll. This proved very unhappy for them both, for whereas Bernard if he had had but a little patience might within a little while have expected to have been in Poſſeſſion of the Kingdom it ſelf, and all other his Wiſhes with it, now was Alfonſus ſo provoked with the revolt, that in the Aſſembly of the Eſtates in his extreme Age, he procured Ramir the Son of Veremund to be choſen his Succeſſour, and Bernard to be laid aſide, who could never after make good his Pretences, but notwithſtanding all his Indeavours died without ever obtaining that Crown he had had ſo great reaſon to expect, though where, or in what condition Writers differ. As for Alfonſus, not long after he had made ſuch a choice, as neither ſuited his Judgment, nor his Relation as an Uncle, he ſhortly after died when he had lived eighty five years, and Reigned fifty two, five months and thirteen days, in the eight hundred forty fourth year of our Lord, which Account differs a little from the Copy of the Chronicle of Alfonſus the Great, who began his Reign but eighteen years after, but agrees with the Liſt of Compoſtella, and other ancient Monuments of Hiſtory.

Bernard revolts, which makes Alfonſus chuſe Ramir his Succeſſour.

Aſlonſus 3d. dies. A. D. 844.

38. The Quiet and Peace which we ſaid Alfonſus enjoyed, was very much effected by the Seditions and Troubles under which the Kingdom of the Moors laboured at the ſame time. Eaſe and plenty make a People tumultuous, and a ſtate if it have no Enemies without it, will not very long ſtand without bringing ſome fourth out of it's own Bowels. The Inhabitants of Toledo for no ſufficient cauſe muſt be quarrelling with the Government, many burthens and Grievances are pretended. Alhaca their King being a cunning and very cloſe man, and knowing Ambroſius the Governour of Oſca to be very acceptable to them, ſends him to them with Letters, wherein he caſts all the blame upon his Officers. They being more inclinable to rebell than furniſht with the Abilities of prudence and reſolution to carry them through a bold attempt, admit him int otheir Town, ſuſpecting nothing. He as cunningly Counterfeits himſelf the King's Enemy upon the account of ſeveral pretended diſobligations, and perſuades them to fortifie the City, by building a Caſtle (there where now ſtands the Church of St. Chriſtopher) and receiving a Garriſon. Theſe things being noiſed at Court, the King ſends Abderrahman his Son now twenty four years of Age to tame theſe Rebels, and he Counterfeiting the ſame Diſſatisfactions as Ambroſius had done under a ſhew of diſcontent revolts to them in the like manner, and is alſo received in. Now all things being prepared, five thouſand of the principal Townſmen are invited to a Feaſt, and when they leaſt thought it, have their throats cut, and ſo the Revolt of Toledo, as was congruous, Tragically ended. This might have been an example to their fellow Subjects; but yet ſuch as inhabited the Suburbs of Corduba were not hereby deterred from renouncing their obedience to Alhaca. To reduce them, one Abdelcarin was ſent who had got reputation by taking the City Calagunis, and waſting the Countrey round about it, he with leſs trouble reduced the Mutineers, the whole Controverſie being decided, by hanging three hundred of them, all Moors. And this was at ſuch time as the Chriſtians obtained a double victory over the Moors, who had invaded the Territories of the Chriſtians in a double body. As a conſequent of this victory, Ores the Governour of Emerita thought himſelf obliged to raiſe the ſiege of Beneventum, upon the coming of Alfonſus; and Alcama the Moor, the Governour of Pax Auguſta, was conſtrained to riſe from before Sentica which he had beſieged. Not long after, one Mahomet an eminent Citizen of Emerita for what cauſe is uncertain, yet out of fear of Abderrahman committed himſelf to the Protection of Alfonſus, and had a place aſſigned him to inhabit within the Territories of Gallicia: But eight years after he rebelled and ſeized on the Town of St. Chriſtine, yet were his deſigns fruſtrated by the timely coming of the King, and fifty thouſand were ſlain on both ſides, amongſt whom Mahomet himſelf, the Great revolter. Alhaca had the happineſs to ſee this Rebellion quieted, and then died in the twenty ſeventh year of his Reign, the two hundred and ſixth year of the Arabians; the eight hundred and twenty firſt year of our Lord. He left behind him nineteen Sons, and one and twenty Daughters, and was ſucceeded by Abderrahman his Son now above the Age of forty years.

A Maſſacre at Toledo.

Rem totam fuſius Rodericus Toletanus proſequitur in Arabum Hiſtoria & poſt illum in Chronicis Alfonſus Rex.

The Inhabitants of Corduba reduced to obedience.

A. D. 821.

Alhaca the Miramamolin dies, leaving Abderrahman the Second his Succeſſour.

39. So went the Affairs of Spain, and ſuch was the State of the Saracenian Kingdom, which containing the greateſt part of that vaſt Countrey, gives denomination to this Part of our Hiſtory. The other Kingdom began by Pelagius, and the riſe and progreſs of which we have ſeen was ſo ſmall and contemptible, in reſpect of that which was in being before the Coming of the Moors, that though it was founded by thoſe of the ſame ſtock, and its Subjects conſiſt of men of the ſame Nation with the former, yet bore not the Name of the Goths as the other had done, but that of the Aſtures, Gallicia, Legio (or Leon) or Onetum. But beſides this newly raiſed Kingdom, there was another ſtart-up at this time, of which hitherto we have taken no notice. For that of the Goths being broken in pieces as out of the Ruines of a vaſt building, ſeveral little ones were erected. Some of the poor diſtreſſed Spaniards flying as far as they could from the publick calamity, went into Aſturia, and there ſet up the Kingdom of Leon, as we have already ſhewed. Others ſeized on the tops of the Pyrenæan Hills and the places difficult of Acceſs, where the Cantabri and Vaſcons were ſeated, beſides the Lucetani, Ilergetes and Ceretani, where now are ſeen Ripagorſa, Suprarbe and Vrgelia. The fame of one John, a Religious perſon, cauſed many more to flock to thoſe parts, where being encouraged by the natural ſtrength of them, and invited to emulation by what their brethren had done in the Countrey of the Aſtures, they began to lay their heads together, how not onely to protect themſelves where they were, but to doe ſomething for caſting off the yoke of the Saracens from the neck of their Nation in general. After long and ſerious deliberation they reſolved, as Pelagius reigned in Aſturia, to have a King of their own to govern them, and made choice of one Garſias Ximenius to be the perſon, whom ſome will have deſcended of the Noble bloud of the Goths, otherwiſe nothing a-kin to the Royal family, but rather a Spaniard, as ſhould ſeem

Several petty Kingdoms.

Garſias Ximenius King of Suprarbia.

ſeem by his Name, yet doubtleſs of a moſt Noble Race, the Regulus of Ameſena and Abarſuſa. His Wife by Name Eneca was of as great Nobility.

40. At what time he began his Kingdom, Authours do not agree, though the moſt knowing place the Original of it near to the Advancement of Pelagius. But neither do they conſent about the Name or Title of this New Kingdom, ſome calling it the Kingdom of Suprarbis, others of Navarre, and others of the Vaſcons, ſo great is the obſcurity we have been forced to ſtruggle with in theſe Spaniſh matters. The Arms of this Kingdom was a plain white ſhield, without any Pictures, ſay the Learned, or Charges, that we may not be blamed by our Heralds for ſpeaking improperly. But Garſias having, it's ſaid, no greater an Army than ſix hundred men, with them did wonders. He took ſeveral Towns from the Moors, as Jaſa and Suprarbis, the chief of all Municipia or free Towns which afterward had the honour to be eſteemed the Metropolis of a Kingdom. This is agreed on on all ſides, that he did much for his time, and died after he had reigned, ſay ſome two and forty years, and was buried in a Church called St. John a Pegna, from the high Rock where it was built by John the Anchoret firſt, but was much enlarged, beautified and enriched by Garſias, and afterward became the Mauſoleum of the Kings his Succeſſours. He dying in the ſeven hundred and fifty eighth year of our Lord, was ſucceeded by his Son Garſias Enecus, who took his two Names from both thoſe of his Father and Mother. This was a Prince of great abilities, and as great felicity. By his induſtry and valour were the Vaſcons, who hitherto fluctuated betwixt the Kings of the Aſtures, the Moors and the Franks, fully ſetled in the obedience of him and his poſterity. He recovered Pompolona, the chief City of Navarre, with many other Towns and Forts, and extended his victorious Arms as far as that part of the bordering Cantabria, which bears the name of Alava. He is ſaid to have reigned forty four years, and then in the eight hundred and ſecond year of our Lord Fortunius Garſias to have ſucceeded, of whoſe actions many Romantick Stories are told by the Hiſtorians of the Vaſcons. He was at the Defeat (if a Defeat there was) of Charles the Great in the Valley of Roſcida. He reigned thirteen years, and then gave place to Sanctius Garſias his Son.

Who dying, Garſias Enecus his Son ſucceeds.

Who ſubdues the Vaſcons.

Recovers Pompolona.

Dies.

Fortunius Garſias ſucceeds.

Then Sanctius Garſias.

41. This Sanctius was a man of great Renown, did many things againſt the Saracens, out of the hands of whom he recovered the greateſt part of Navarre. He is ſaid to have reigned twenty years, and whether he left a Son or not, is uncertain. But either at or not long after his death his line failed, and then the Nobility is ſaid to have conſulted with Foreign Princes, as well as amongſt themſelves, what Conditions to put upon him who was to be elected. Leſt the next ſhould abuſe his power, they enacted ſeveral written Laws, commonly called in Latin Forum Suprarbis, tending to the keeping of the King in order, who ſhould doe nothing of moment without the conſent of twelve Noblemen to be choſen for that purpoſe; to the maintenance of their Liberties, and to this proviſion, that ſuch Lands as ſhould be taken from the Moors ſhould be divided betwixt the King and the Nobility. For the better effect of this, a middle perſon was choſen, commonly called the Juſtitia of Aragon, who having a power like to that of the Tribunes, and armed by the Laws and the Inclinations of the People, ſhould reſtrain the exorbitant Power of the King. He that was firſt elected, and ſubmitted to theſe Conditions, was Enecus Sanctius, from his ſwiftneſs ſirnamed Ariſta Count of Bigorræ, or of the Bigerriones in Aquitain. But theſe things are beyond the extent of this preſent Volume, we onely deſired not to break off abruptly, but to leave the Reader in as much clearneſs as can be, who muſt farther know, that at this ſame time there were Counts of Aragon, deſcended from Aznar the Son of Eudo, as we before hinted, who mixed their bloud by intermarrying with the Kings of Suprarbis, and at length the title of the Kingdom was altered from this of Suprarbis, to that of Aragon. At the ſame time there were alſo Counts of Caſtile, from whom proceeded many Kings afterward as well as Noble families, which to this very day continue. Theſe ſeveral Houſes and Kingdoms by degrees got ground of that of the Saracens, and at length being united, drove the Infidels quite out of Spain. But this happened many Ages after the time whereof we write.

Who recovers the greateſt part of Navarre from the Saracens.

His line failing.

The Nobility enact the Forum Suprarbis.

And the Juſtitia of Aragon.

And elect Enecus Sanctius for their King.

And the Counts of Aragon.

Counts of Caſtile joyning with others, drove the Saracens out of Spain.

FINIS.

THE TABLE.

A

Abaſgians, reduced into obedience under Juſtinian the Emperour 130.
Abderrahman, Miramamolin of the Saracens 512, begins a Mooriſh Kingdom at Corduba in Spain, ib. dyes, 513.
Abderrahman 2. chief Prince of the Saracens 517.
Adnotatio, what 2. and 27.
Aquitain, what 390, waſted by the Franks 399, once more 400, ſubdued and joined to their Dominions 401, ſtirs there 410, but wholly quieted by Pipin King of the Franks 412, whence ſo called 413.
Africk, ſeized on by the Vandals, with their Kings 55, 56 and 57, invaded by the Romans 58, ſetled in peace under Provincials 74, all things in repoſe there 134, invaded by the Perſians 274, overrun by the Saracens 286.
Agila, King of the Goths in Spain and Gall 482.
Alans, ſeize on part of Spain 472, wholly deſtroyed 473.
Alarick 1. King of the Goths in Spain and Gall 472.
Alarick 2. King of the Goths in Spain and Gall 478.
Albion, King of the Lombards 248, overthrows the Gepidæ 250, invades Italy 251, is killed by procurement of his Wife 252.
Alfonſus, 1 King of the Aſturian Goths in Spain 509, recovers ſeveral places from the Saracens and dyes 511.
Alfonſus, the Chaſte, King of the Aſturian Goths in Spain 513, inlarges his Dominions 514, dyes 516.
Alhaca, Prince of the Saracens in Spain 514, his management of affairs and death 517.
Almans, beaten by the Franks 324, again 341, ſubmit to the Franks 354, their Countrey wholly ſubdued 399.
Alulit, Prince of the Saracens in Spain 510, dyes ib.
Amalarick, King of the Goths in Spain and Gall 480.
Amida, a City of Meſopotamia 20, taken by the Perſians 21, recovered by money to the Romans 22.
Anaſtaſius, Roman Emperour 14, takes away the Chryſargyrum 15, makes divers Laws 17, builds Anaſtaſia and fortifies Theodoſia againſt the Perſians 23, perſecutes the Orthodox 25, is killed by Thunder 26, his Character 27, and Laws 28.
Annona, what 219.
Anſiarci Franci 315, overcome by the Romans 324, their ſeats where 460.
Antichreſis, what 174.
Antioch, deſtroyed by Fire 105, by Earthquakes 264, and a Sedition 272.
Antonina, the Wife of Beliſarius, her Character 87 and 155.
Apſimarus, Roman Emperour 292, is killed by Juſtinian the 2*d.* 293.
Aragon, the Foundation and Original of its Kingdom 401 and 509.
Arſaces, King of Parthia 41.
Artabanes, his Conſpiracy againſt Juſtinian 119.
Artaxerxes, the Perſian ſubdues the Parthians 42.
Artemius, Roman Emperour 294, but is depoſed ib.
As, what, and the diviſion thereof 172.
Aſcarius, a French King 322.
Aſpilians, reduced under Obedience to Juſtinian 130.
Athalarick, King of the Goths 74.
Athanagild, King of the Goths in Spain and Gall 482.
Athaulfus, King of the Goths in Spain and Gall 472.
Aurelius, King of the Aſturian Goths in Spain 512, dyes 513.

Bavaria,

The TABLE.

B

BAvaria, what 391, waſted by the Franks 399, ſubmits to them 425, but rebelling is reduced under the French Government 429.
Belgica prima, what 331.
Belgica ſecunda, what 327 and 331.
Beliſarius 34, is made General of the Eaſt 45, defeats the Perſians 46, quells the Mutineers at Conſtantinople 53, takes Ship for Africk 58, defeats Gelimer King of the Vandals 60, overthrows them and the Moors there 63, triumphs at Conſtantinople 65, from thence he goes to Sicily 76, thence to Italy 77, where he takes Naples 78, enters Rome 79, but is therein beſieged 80, lays Siege to Auximum 93, which is ſurrendred 95, enters Ravenna 96, is recalled for the Perſian War 97, which Empire he invades and returns 107, then is ſent again 108, but recalled and ſent into Italy 111, attempts to relieve Rome 113, being left by Totilas, he fortifies it as well as he can 115, ſends his Wife to Conſtantinople 117, is ſent for thither himſelf 118, he oppoſes the invading Huns 154, overpowers them and is recalled 155, the charge againſt him by Procopius, his ſecret Hiſtory 156, he is put out of Command 157, his Character by Agathias 159, his death 160.
Beneventum, and its Duke ſubmits to the Franks 428.
Beſſas, General of the Eaſt 130, his Character 132.
Britains, in Armorica invaded by the Franks 356, ſtirs among themſelves 362, they invade the Countrey near Paris 363, waſte the Countrey near Nantes 373, again 375, ſubmit to the Franks 393, rebelling are reduced to obedience 428, their Arms taken from them as Trophies by the Franks 433.
Brunechild, a French Lady married to King Sigibert 358, then to Meroneus 360, impriſoned by Chilperick ib. releaſed 361, lives ſplendidly at Childebert*'s Court* 370, is accuſed of treachery by Guntram 374, makes her Grandſons quarrel 378, more of her villanies 381, ſhe poiſons Theodorick 385, ſhe is taken Priſoner and kill'd by Clotair 386, her Buildings ib.
Bulgarians, waſte Thrace 19, are bought off 20, haraſs the Roman Territories 289 and 299, quarrel with the Huns 391, are maſſacred by the Franks ib.
Burgundians, their ſeats in Gall 331, are forced to pay tribute to the Franks 341, their Countrey waſted by them 348, another expedition thither 349, their Kings ſeats and period of their Kingdom 350.
Buzes, General of the Eaſt 103, runs away 104.

C

CAbades, King of Perſia takes Amida 21, deſires Juſtin to adopt his Son Choſroes 32, receives an Embaſſy from the Romans 47, dyes 49.
Carloman, French King 404, reduces the Alemans, Saxons, &c. to Obedience ib. turns Monk 405.
Carloman, 2*d.* 415, Marries 418, Dyes 419.
Caſpian Gates 22.
Catalaunia, whence ſo called 515.
Cenſitores, who 220.
Centenarii, who 459.
Charles, Major of the Palace 397, ſets up Clotair for King of the Franks 398, but manageth all himſelf 399, engages and defeats the invading Saracens 400, adds Aquitain to his Dominions 401, reduces the Friſians and Saxons to Obedience 402, dyes 403.
Charles, the Great, King of the Franks 415, ſubdues Aquitain 416, marries 418, ſeizes on his Brother's Kingdom 419, invades Lombardy 420, Conquers it 422, invades Spain 423, ſubdues the Saxons and goes for Italy 425, thence to Rome and afterwards to Saxony 426, ſubduing that People 427, chaſtiſeth the Britains of Armorica 428, ſeizes on Bavaria 429, ſubdues the Vultzi 430, invades Saxony 431, beats the Huns 432, makes another expedition into Saxony 433, goes to Rome where he is Crowned Emperour by Leo the Biſhop 434.
Cherebert, King of the Franks his Character and Death 337.
Childebert 1. French King 347, invades Spain 349, ſubdues the Burgundians 350, is ſevere to his Nephews 351, makes another Expedition into Spain 352, receives Provence from the Goths ib. dyes 355.
Childebert 2. 360, is courted by his Vncles 361, quarrels with Guntram 364, which is made up 365, invades the Lombards in Italy 366, ſends his Ambaſſadour to Guntram at Paris 368, another Embaſſy 370, is adopted Heir to him 371, makes another Expedition into Italy 372, two more 373, ſends an Embaſſy to Mauricius the Emperour 374, ſucceeds Guntram in his Dominions 377, dyes 378.
Childebert 3. King of the Franks his Reign 397.
Childerick 1. King of the Franks 331, who who enlarges his Dominions and dyes 333, the manner of his Sepulchre 334, the ſignification of his Name 335.

UMI

Childerick 2. King of the Franks 395, is ſlain 396.

Childerick 3. King of the Franks 405, is depoſed 406.

Chilperick, King of the Franks 357, marries a Daughter of Spain and ſtrangles her 358, Quarrels with Sigebert his Brother 359, is very uxorious 361, and cruel to his Subjects 362, foments Civil War 364, Marries his Daughter to the King of the Goths in Spain 366, is murthered ibid. his Character 367.

Chindaſuinthus, King of the Goths in Spain and Gall 489.

Chintilla, King of the Goths in Spain and Gall 488, dies 489.

Clotharius 1. King of the Franks 347, ſubdues the Thuringi 348, and Burgundians 350, his Cruelty and unkindneſs to his Nephews 351, he invades Spain 352, is ſole Monarch of the Franks, and Lord of all Gall 355, his Wars, Character, and Death 356.

Clotharius, 2. King of the Franks 368, is Chriſtened 377, defeated by his two Couſens 379, beaten again by Theodorick 381, but ſubdues Sigebert 385, kills him, and Brunichild 386, is ſole Monarch of the Franks 387, releaſes the Lombards of their Tribute 388, ſubdues the Saxons 389, dies ibid.

Clotharius 3. King of the Franks 395,

Clotharius 4. King of the Franks 398, dies 399.

Choſroes 1. King of Perſia 49, his reaſon for the War with Juſtinian 102, which he begins 103, beſieging Antioch 104, which he burns 105, takes Petra 107, maks another invaſion 108, but retreats 109, he invades Meſapotamia 125, lays ſiege to Edeſſa 126, makes a quinquennial Truce with the Emperour 127, purpoſes to be Maſter of Lazica 128, but his Forces are beaten 129, making another attempt, comes off with loſs 130, another Ceſſation for five years 134, at length he obtains Lazica and Telephis 147, Fleas his General alive, and makes Peace with the Emperour 153, but ſoon breaks it 254, taking Niſibis 256, being overthrown, dies in diſcontent 257.

Choſroes 2. King of Perſia 264, denounces War aginſt Phocas 269, waſtes the Eaſtern parts of the Empire 271, hopes to make himſelf Maſter of all 273, overruns Egypt and Africk 274, but at length his Armies are defeated, and he is killed by his Son Siroes 279.

Chryſargyrum, what 14.

Clodio, King of the Franks 328, dies 330.

Clodomir King of the Franks 347, is ſlain by the Burgundians, 348.

Clodonæus 1. King of the Franks 339, beats the Romans out of Gall 340, beats the Almans, and makes the Burgundians pay him Tribute 341, overthrows the Goths 343, enlarges his Dominions, and dies 346.

Clodonæus 2. King of the Franks 392, dies 395.

Clodonæus 3. King of the Franks 397.

Conſtans 2. Roman Emperour 286, defeats the Sclavini 287, is murthered 288.

Conſtantine 3. Roman Emperour 286, is made away ibid.

Conſtantine Pogonatus 4. Roman Emperour 288, makes a Truce with the Saracens for thirty years 289, dies ibid, Conſtantine Copronymus 5. Roman Emperour 297, ſubdues Artubazdus his Brother 298, his Wars with the Bulgarians 300, dies 301.

Conſtantine 6. Roman Emperour 302, depoſeth Irene his Mother 303, his Wars 304, is blinded and killed by Order of his Mother, 305.

Conſtitutions General, what 27.

Conſuls, the laſt Tear of counting by them 98.

Convenæ, their Original 380.

Counts, their Power, Duty and Office 458.

D

Dagobert, 1. King of the Franks 389, makes War upon the Sclavi 390, Maſſacres the Bulgarians 391, invades Spain 392, ſubdues the Vaſcons, and Britains in Aremorica 393, dies ibid.

Dagobert, 2. King of the Franks 397, dies 398.

Daniel or Chilperick, King of the Franks 398, dies 399.

Decani, who 459.

Dilimnitæ, who 149.

Dukes, their Power, Duty and Office 458.

E

Earthquakes, terrible 25, 36, 298.

Edelingi, who 461.

Egica King of the Goths, in Spain and Gall 495, dies 496.

Elephant, how to fright it 133.

England, when the Kings thereof firſt bore the Title and Arms of France 466.

Ermenigild, King of the Goths in Spain and Gall 483, dies 484.

Ernigius, King of the Goths in Spain and Gall 494, dies 495.

Eurick, King of the Goths in Spain and Gall 477, dies 478.

F

Factio Albata, Praſina, Ruſſata, Veneta, what 52.

Favila, King of the Goths in Spain 509.

Fœnus Nauticum, & Trajectitium, quid 174.

Framea, what 334.

Franceſca, what ibid.

Franks invade Italy 93, are invited by the Goths to oppoſe the Emperours Forces 144, but are defeated by Narſes the Roman General 145, they fall upon the Lombards in Italy 259, their Name whence 307, their ancient Seats where 314, a Catalogue of their Kings 319, they ſeize on part of Batavia 321, a ſecond Invaſion thereof by them 322, they again inſeſt the Roman Territories 323, beat the Almans 324, and Vandals 326, ſeize on Belgica ſecunda 327, but are defeated by Ætius the Roman General 330, they inlarge their Dominions 333, their ancient Arms, what 337, beat the Romans out of Gall 340, Conquer the Thuringi 348, ſubdue the Burgundians 350, have Provence delivered up to them by the Goths 352, force the Alemans to ſubmit 354, make War upon the Saxons 355, overthrow the Hunns 358, beat the Saxons 359, have Civil Wars at home 360, heavy Taxes, and a Peſtilence among them 362, are invaded by the Britains 363, another Civil War 364, a Murrain among their Cattel 365, they force the Lombards to ſubmit to them 366, they invade Italy and Spain 372, make two more Expeditions into Italy 373, are infeſted by the Britains 375, ingaged in Civil Wars 377, they ſubdue the Vaſcons 380, fall again into Civil Wars 382, more 384, releaſe the Lombards of Tribute 388, ſubdue the Saxons 389, make War upon the Schavi 390, invade Spain 392, force the Vaſcons and Britains to beg Peace 393, Civil Wars at home 394, ingage with the Thuringians in Battel 395, Civil Wars 396, they reduce the Saxons, Almans, and Bavarians to obedience 399, oppoſe the invading Saracens 400, joyn Aquitain to their Dominions 481, Chaſtiſe the Rebellious Friſians, and Saxons Ibid, defeat the invading Saracens 402, invade Saxony 408, make War upon the Lombards in Italy 409, ſubdue the Saxons, and Inhabitants of Aquileia 410, receive the ſubmitting Vaſcons 412, make Alliances with the Lombards in Italy 418, invade Saxony 419, aſſiſt the Biſhop of Rome againſt the Lombards 420, ſudue the Lombards in Italy 422, invade Saxony, and make an Inrode into Spain 423, but with loſs 424, after another invaſion they Conquer the Saxons, and Tranſplant them 427, ſubdue the Britains 428, ſeize on Bavaria 429, Quarrel with the Hunns 430, reduce the Saxons to obedience 431, ſeveral other expeditions into Saxony 432, their King is Crowned Emperour at Rome 434, their Original Language, what 434, compared with Britiſh 435, with the German 438, when they received the Roman amongſt them 440, which being mixt with their own, is termed Ruſtick 441, when they ſpoke three ſorts of Languages there 343, compared with the Latine 444, their manner of writing and ſpeaking 445, deſire of making it univerſal 446, its Character 447, their Government monarchical Ibid, Hereditary not Elective 448, long Hair worn by them, as a Mark of diſtinction 450, the Prerogative of their Kings 455, their Nobility 458, and Governours 459, whoſe Honours are during the Kings pleaſure 460, their People how diſtinguiſhed 461, the Civil Law when impoſed on them ibid, their Salick Law, what 461, when it was firſt made uſe 465, the ancient diviſion of France 469, other Laws in uſe among them 470, they uſe Feſſs and Fees 471, make Wars upon the Goths in Spain and Gall 474, again 481, the next time they come ſhort home, which ends in a League 485, they defeat the invading Saracens 508.

Fredegundis a French Queen 358, is cruel to her Huſbands Children 361, contrives his Death 366, Cajoles his Brother 368, her Treachery 370, and Villanies 376, trepans the Army of Childebert 377, dies 378.

Friburgi, who 461.

Friſians, who 397, reduced to obedience by the Franks 401.

Froila, King of the Goths in Spain 511, defeats the Moors, and is murthered 512.

G

Gall, poſſeſſed by the Romans, Burgundians and Goths 331, invaded by the Franks 333, who beat the Romans thence 340, force the Burgundians to pay them Tribute 341, beat the Goths 343, ſeize on all parts thereof 346, having ſubdued the Burgundians 348.

Gallia Comata, whence ſo called 450.

Gallia Togata, whence ſo called 461.

Genebaldus, the firſt King of the Franks 319, with an account of him 322.

Geneva, its Situation 420.

Gepidæ, War with the Lombards 120, and 135, whence ſo called 246.

Geſaleich, King of the Goths in Spain and Gall 480, dies Ibid.

Geutharis, uſurps in Africk 73, is killed 74.

Gothick War begun in Italy 56, the occaſion of it 75.

Goths, Maſters of Italy 74, are invaded by the Romans 75, they invade Dalmatia 76, upon which the Emperour ſends Beliſarius againſt them 77, their Kings 78, Wars with the Romans 79, they rout the Roman Army 84, but afterwards are beaten by them 85, invaded by the Franks 93, ſubmit to the Romans 96, more of their Kings 97, who ingage and beat the Romans 99, again 100, upon which Beliſarius makes them another Viſit 110, with freſh ſupplies 111, a famine amongſt them 112, ſeveral Skirmiſhes 114, they proſper in Italy 120, waſte Sicily 122, but are requited by the Romans 123, who defeat them 136, killing their King in Battel 139, ſo that they offer to depart the Countrey 141, having loſt ſeveral Towns, and all their Treaſure 144, their Countrey foraged by the Franks 145, quitted by them, and ſeized on by the Romans 161, their Seats in Gall 331, but invaded by the Franks 342, killing their King 343, and taking ſeveral places 344, forced to quit Province to them 352, and the reſt of Gall 355, their Dominion in Spain and Gall 471, invaded by the Alans, Vandals and Suevi 472, but they deſtroyed the Alans, and drove the Vandals thence 473, invaded by the Hunns 474, but are driven thence by them 475, they ſubdue Gallicia 476, and beat the Romans out of the Countrey 477, are invaded by the Franks 479, again 481, beat the Romans once more thence 482, overturn the Kingdom of the Suevi there 484, defeat the invading Franks 485, reduce the Vaſcons to obedience 486, are ſole Maſters of Spain, 487, ſubdue the Vaſcons 491, are invaded by the Saracens 499, to the ruine of their Kingdom 500, they reflect on their Condition 503. unite 504, ſetling in Aſturia in Spain 506, and at Aragon 509, recovering ſeveral places from the Saracens 511, enlarging their Dominions 514, and expelling the Saracens 517.

Gubazes King of the Lazians, revolts from the Empire 107, begs pardon for it 128, Quarrels betwixt him and the Emperours Officers 147, he is murthered 148, his murtherers beheaded 151.

Gundemar King of the Goths in Spain and Gall 486.

Guntram King of the Franks 357, Quarrels with Sigebert 379, which is made up 360, his kindneſs to his Nephew 361, Commands in the Dominions of Soiſſons 368, ſubdues the inhabitants of Poictiers 370, Adopts Childebert 371, turns cruel 376, dies 377.

H

Heraclius, Roman Emperour 273, endeavours to eſtabliſh his Family 274, his War with the Perſians 275, which being ended, he Triumphs 280, imbraceth the Hereſie of the Monothelites, ibid. his Provinces overrun by the Saracens, and dies 285.

Heraclonas, Roman Emperour 286.

Heruli, who 89, and 120.

Honientes, who 48.

Hormiſda, King of Perſia, but is depoſed and kill'd by his own Son 264.

Hormiſda, the laſt of the Perſian Kings 280.

Hunns Epthalites, who, their Countrey where 44.

Hunns Coturgian, invade the Empire 154, are bought off 160, and beaten by the Uturgian Hunns 161, they overrun Europe 103, ſet one againſt another by Juſtinian 135, are beaten by the Franks 358, but kill one of their Captains 433, invade Gall and Spain 474, but are beaten thence by Thoriſmond King of the Goths 475.

I

Ibrahem, Prince of the Saracens 510.

Idelbald, King of the Goths 97, is murthered 98.

Illyricum waſted 19.

Inſinuation the Form of it 35.

Irene Roman Empreſs 302, depoſed 303, but received again into Court 304, orders the death of her Son 305, but is ſoon after ſhut up in a Monaſtery 306.

Iſaurian War begins 16.

Iſcam, Prince of the Saracens 507.

Iſſem, Prince of the Saracens 513, dies 514.

Juſtin, Roman Emperour 30, forbids Inceſt by a Law 31, invades Perſia 34, Enacts ſeveral Laws 35, makes Juſtinian his Collegue 38, dies ibid. his Character 39.

Juſtin, 2. Roman Emperour 244, makes a Law to diſſolve Marriages by Conſent 245, turns cruel 246, is taken with a Vertigo 254, falls diſtracted 256, makes Tiberius his Collegue ibid. and dies 260.

Juſtinian, Roman Emperour 40, his War with with the Perſians 46, makes Peace with them 50, conſults about the War with the Vandals ib. his preparations for it 58, ſettles the Government of Africk 66, his Souldiers there mutiny 69, the Mutineers quieted 70, and Africk ſetled 74, the occaſion of his War with the Goths 75, which he undertakes 76, but at length neglects it 122, ſends an Army into Perſarmenia, which is beaten 124, makes a Quinquennial Truce with the Perſians 127, ſends aid to Lazica 128, makes another Truce with the Perſians 133, but rejects all terms made by the Goths 136, ſends Narſes his General into Italy 137, ſets the Barbarians againſt each other 153 and 161, has Italy ſetled by Narſes ib. diſcovers a Plot againſt his Perſon 162, he deſigns to make a new Code 168, makes ſeveral Laws 169, publiſheth his Code 177, his Mandate for comprizing the Digeſts 181, he preſcribes Rules for teaching of Law 184, his Preface to his Inſtitutions 186, an Edition of the Code 127, and more Novel Conſtitutions 198, all which ran a risk in the Eaſt, but are admired and received in the Weſt 203, his Character by the pretended Procopius his ſecret Hiſtory 204, his Wife 206, Stories of them 209, which end 228, publiſhed by Alemannus 229, Suida's teſtimony examined 231, Evagrius's 232, a Character and Account of the ſecret Hiſtory 235, &c. his Commendations from General Councils and Popes 233, from good Authours 234, his Magnificent Buildings 236, his Iſſue and Death 242.

Juſtinian 2. Roman Emperonr 289, for his Cruelty is depoſed 291, recovers his Dignity 293, is ſlain 294.

Izit, Prince of the Saracens 507, dyes ibid.

L

LAſſi, who the ſeveral ſorts of them 461.

Leo Iſaurus, Roman Emperour 295, Crowns his Son Conſtantine 296, dyes 297.

Leo 3. Roman Emperour 301, dyes 302.

Leontius, Roman Emperour 291, is depoſed 292.

Liberti, the ſeveral ſorts of them 190.

Liniva 1. King of the Goths in Spain and Gall 482.

Liniva 2. King of the Goths in Spain and Gall 486.

Liti, who 461.

Lombards, their Original 246, their firſt ſeats 247, a Catalogue of their Kings to Albion 248, they overthrow the Gepidæ 250, invade Italy 251, and Cantonize it among themſelves 258, invade Gall 259, ſubmit to the Franks 366, buy off their accuſtomed tribute 388, are invaded by the Franks 409, and forced to quit the Exarchate and Pentapolis 410, make Alliances with the Franks 416, quarrel with the Biſhop of Rome 419, are conquered by the Franks 422, rebelling are chaſtized 423, Longinus, his diſſolute life 5, dyes 16.

Leunigild, King of the Goths in Spain and Gall 482, ſettles affairs at home 483, overturns the Kingdom of the Suevi in Gallicia 484, his Character and Death 485.

M

MAbias, Ameras of the Saracens 286, dyes 289.

Malaricus, King of the Franks 323.

Mandatum, what 27.

Marcomirus, King of the Franks 325.

Mauregatus, King of the Goths 513, dyes ibid.

Mauricius, Roman Emperour 262, his ſucceſs againſt the Perſians 263, receives Choſroes their King 265, diſobliges his Souldiers 267, is killed 269.

Mellobandus, King of the Franks 324.

Mermeroes, the Perſian General 46, lays Siege to Martyropolis 49, returns home 50, goes into Lazica 128, but is worſted 129, till at laſt he becomes Maſter thereof 135, dyes 147.

Meroneus, King of the Franks 330, dyes 331.

Miſſi, who, the ſeveral ſorts of them 459.

Miſimiani, who 151, reduced to Obedience 152.

Muza, General of the Saracens, enters Spain 501, Conquers it 502, returns 503, dyes 506.

N

NAchoragon, General of the Perſians 147. beſieges Phaſis 150, but is forced to raiſe it 151, and flea'd alive by Command of Choſroes King of Perſia 153.

Narſes, Roman General goes into Italy 88, is recalled 93, made ſole General there 137, kills Totilas and overthrows the Gothick Army 139, takes Rome 140, and ſeveral other places 143, goes to Ravenna 144, defeats the invading Franks 145, ſettles Italy in repoſe 161.

Neuſtria, what 469.

Nica, what 52.

Nile, overflows Egypt more than ordinary 117.

Novem-

Novempopulania, what 414.
Numuſa 504, knocked on the head 506.
Nuncupatio, what 167.

P

PArthians, who 40, the Original of their Kingdom 41, and Catalogue of their Kings ibid. and end of their Empire 42.
Pelagius, forced to ſhift for himſelf 496, returns 503, is choſen King of the Goths in Spain 504, ſecures himſelf 505, defeats the Army of the Saracens 506, dyes 509.
Perſians, ſlaves to the Parthians 40, its Empire 42, a Catalogue of their Kings from Artaxerxes down to Cabades 43, its Monarchy ruined 280.
Petra, in poſſeſſion of the Perſians 128, is re-taken 131.
Pharamond, King of the Franks 327, dyes 328.
Philippicus, ſaluted Emperour by the Souldiers 293, hath his eyes pulled out 294.
Phocas, ſaluted Emperour by the Army 268, his Character 270, and Death 272.
Pipin, Major of the Palace in Gall 396, ſubdues the Friſians and Suevi 397, dyes ibid.
Pipin, Son of Charles Martell Major of the Palace 404, ſets up Childerick the Third for King 405, but thruſts him into a Monaſtery 406, his Pedigree 407, makes War upon the Saxons 408, invades the Lombards in Italy 409, defeats the Saxons once more 410, ſubdues Aquitain 412, dyes 415.
Plague, over all the World 109, returns to Conſtantinople 153.
Prodigal, how taken care of 28.
Procopius, an account of him 242.
Pendentes, and their Office 162.

R

RAdagiſus, King of the Franks 322, a Battering Ram deſcribed 81, another ſort 131.
Ranier, King of Aſturia in Spain 516.
Reccared 1. King of the Goths in Spain and Gall 483, defeats the invading Franks 485, dyes 486.
Reccared 2. King of the Goths in Spain and Gall 487, hath the Title of Catholick given to him 509.
Reccesuinthus, King of the Goths in Spain and Gall 491, dyes 492.
Reſcript, what 27.
Roderick, King of the Goths in Spain and Gall 497, his management of affairs, 498, is invaded by the Saracens 499, overthrown and killed 500.
Rome, ſubject to the Heruli 1, then to the Goths 5, re-taken by Beliſarius 79, is beſieged by Vitigis King of the Goths 80, who is forced to raiſe it 88, but is ſurprized by Totilas one of his Succeſſours 114, taken again by Beliſarius 116, a ſecond time taken by Totilas 121, re-taken for the Emperour by Narſes 140, who governed it and Italy 250, Gregory Biſhop thereof, Rebells againſt Leo the Emperour 296.

S

SAlick Law, what and whence ſo called 463, when firſt made uſe of 465, belongs to the Crown of France 466, and alſo to Dukedoms 467.
Salii Franci 315, ſubmit to the Romans 323, their firſt ſeats 463.
Saracens, invade Syria 273, their firſt Kings 280, their Original and firſt ſeats 281, whence ſo called 283, they overrun Egypt and Syria 285, conquer Africk 286, beat Juſtinian the ſecond and have Armenia delivered to them 290, entring Europe they invade Spain 295, thence into France 400, but are met and defeated by Charles Martell ib. make another Invaſion into Spain 494, conquering it 500, ſacking ſeveral Towns there 502, and wholly reducing it to their obedience 503, reſiding at Sevil ib. whence they remove to Corduba 506, invade Gall and Aquitain 508, but are defeated by Charles, Major of the Palace ib. their Dominions, what 510, they loſe ground in Spain 511, but begin a Mooriſh Kingdom at Corduba 512, force the Goths to pay them Tribute 513, which is taken off 514, and they quite driven thence 518.
Saxons, returning from Italy into their own Countrey 259, are defeated by the Sauni ibid, invaded by the Franks 357, twice more beaten by them 359, rebelling, are ſubdued 389, again 399, and 401, their Countrey invaded 408, once more 410, another Expedition thither 419, they invade France 422, but are forced to beg Peace 423, are invaded but with little damage 424, another Expedition againſt them 425, wholly ſubdued 426, and tranſplanted 427, revolting, are reduced 431, again 432.
Senatuſconſultum Pagaſianum, whence ſo called 164.
Silingi, ſeize on part of Spain 472, ſubmit to the Goths 473.
Siliqua, what 173.
Silkworms, when brought into the Empire 135.

Silo, King of the Goths in Spain 513.
Siroes, King of Perſia 79, is killed 280.
Spain, under the Government of the Goths, but invaded by the Saracens 295, by the Franks 349, again 352, united by Marriages 358, invaded by the Franks 372, again 392, invaded by the Saracens 400, ſubject to the Goths 471, overrun by the Barbarians 472, with the diviſion of it among them ibid, Wars there 473, invaded by the Hunns 474, who are driven thence 475, under a threefold Government 477, ſhaking off the Roman Yoke ibid, invaded by the Franks 479, again 481, the Romans once more beaten thence 482, make a League with the Franks 485, force the invading Vaſcons to ſubmit 486, again 490, wholly ſubduing them 491, Civil Wars there 492, ended 493, the invading Saracens defeated 494, the walled Towns diſmantled, and Men diſarmed 469, overrun by the Saracens 500, and ſetled under their Government 503, that part called Aſturia in Spain, ſets up for it ſelf 504, grows powerfull 506, ſeveral Battels betwixt the Goths and Saracens 511, a Mooriſh Kingdom began at Corduba, another place in Spain 512, Civil Wars among them 514, which adds much to the advantage of the Goths 516, who at laſt uniting, drive the Saracens thence 518.
Suevi, ſeize on part of Spain 472, ſubmit to the Goths 473, their Kingdom overturned 484.
Suprarbis, the ſeveral Kings thereof 517, its Original 518.

T

Tejas, King of the Goths in Italy 140, is ſlain in Battel 141.
Theodatus, King of the Goths 75, is murthered 78.
Theodorick, King of the Goths waſtes the Roman Empire 4, and dies ibid.
Theodorick, a Gothick King is made Conſul 5.
Theodorick, 1. King of the Franks 347, invades the Thuringi 348, dies 350.
Theodorick, 2. King of the Franks 378, beats his Couſen Clotair 379, ſubdues the Vaſcons 380, defeats Clotair a ſecond time 381, Quarrels with Theodebert 383, and in Battel kills him 384, ſeizes on his Kingdom, and dies 385.
Theodorick 3. King of the Franks 395, dies 397.
Theodorick Cala, King of the Franks 399, dies 405.
Theodorick 1. King of the Goths in Spain 473, dies 474.
Theodorick 2. King of the Goths in Spain, 475.
Theodorick, 3. King of the Goths in Spain 476.
Theodebald King of the Franks 354, dies 355.
Theodebert King of the Franks 351, invades Italy 353, waſtes Thrace, and dies 354.
Theodora, Wife to Juſtinian, her Original, and Character 205.
Theodoſius, Roman Emperour, but reſigns it to Leo Iſaurus 294.
Theotiſch, Language what 442.
Theudis, King of the Goths in Spain and Gall 481.
Theudiſilus, King of the Goths in Spain and Gall 481, his death 482.
Thoriſmund, King of the Goths in Spain and Gall 474, is murthered 475.
Tiberius 2. Roman Emperour 259, ſecures Sophia the Empreſs 260, makes Mauricius Cæſar 261, dies 262.
Totilas, King of the Goths in Italy 98, beats the Emperours Army 99, takes ſeveral places and Countries 100, beſieges Rome 111, hath it betrayed to him 114, purpoſeth to deſtroy it 115, but is diverted, and lays Siege to Peruſia 117, and proſpering in Italy, takes Rome a ſecond time 121, waſtes Sicily 122, burns moſt of Rome 135, but in a pitched Battel, is wounded by the Romans, and dies 139.
Tungri, who 330.
Tzanians, who 46.

U

Vandals, in Africk 55, a Catalogue of their Kings, from Genſerick to Gelimer 56, their Countrey overrun by the Romans 63, ſeize on part of Spain 472, but are driven thence 473.
Vaſcons, their Original and Seats 379, and 411, ſubdued by the Franks 380, forced to beg Peace 392, ſubmit to the Franks 411, their Language 415, they defeat the French Army in their return from Spain 424.
Venetia 252.
Veremundus King of the Goths in Spain 513, dies 514.
Via Appia 79.
Vicarii, who 459.
Vitalianus, his attempts againſt Anaſtaſius 24, is defeated 25, and killed 31.
Vitigis, King of the Goths in Italy 78, lays Siege to Rome 80, but with ill ſucceſs 82, goes to Ravenna 88, where admitting Beliſarius, he is kept in Honourable reſtraint 97, dies 123.
Ulit, Prince of the Saracens in Spain 501, ſettles ſetles the Countrey 503, dies 506.

Uultzi, who 430.

W

Wallia, King of the Goths in Spain and Gall 473.
Wamba, King of the Goths in Spain and Gall 490, ſubdues the Vaſcons 491, ſuppreſſes Paul the Uſurper 493, defeats the Saracens, and turns Monk 494.
Witterick, King of the Goths in Spain and Gall 486, dies ibid.
Wittiza, King of the Goths in Spain and Gall 496, his Character and Death 497.

Z

Zani reduced under the Roman Yoke 153.
Zeno, Roman Emperour 1, makes ſeveral Laws, 3, is buried and dies 8, more of his Laws 9, &c.
Zuleiman, Prince of the Saracens, in Spain 506, dies 507.
Zuleman, Prince of the Moors at Corduba in Spain 513, depoſed ibid.

FINIS.

UMI

AN INSTITUTION OF General Hiſtory, OR THE HISTORY OF THE Eccleſiaſtical Affairs OF THE WORLD.

Contemporary with The Second Part.

v. 2, pt. 2

CONTAINING
That of the Roman Empire, its firſt countenancing and receiving Chriſtian Religion.

FROM
The Converſion of Conſtantine the Great, to the Fall of Auguſtulus, and the Ruine of the Empire in the Weſt.

WITH
An Account of the Polity of the Church, and the ſeveral Laws and Canons of Moment made, during the Reign of the Emperours both in Eaſt and Weſt to this period.

By WILLIAM HOWEL, LL.D ſometimes Fellow of Magdalen College in Cambridge.

LONDON,
Printed for the Authors Widdow, by Miles Fleſher, 1685.

UMI

TO THE
HIGH and MIGHTY
PRINCE,
JAMES the II.

King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c.

GREAT SIR,

AMONG the Crowds of Loyal Counties and Corporations that Addreſs themſelves unto Your MAJESTY, vouchſafe to permit a Deſolate Widow to approach into Your Sacred Preſence, to congratulate Your Happy and moſt Juſt Poſſeſſion of the Throne of theſe Kingdoms, by laying a ſmall Preſent at Your Royal Feet.

Which is due to Your MAJESTY by a double Title: both by Right of Succeſſion to our Late Gracious Soveraign, by whoſe Royal Bounty this Work was encouraged, and alſo by the Deſignment of the Author, who intended, had not His Death prevented it, to have Dedicated this Book to His Royal Highneſs JAMES the Duke of York, which I now moſt Humbly offer to the Sacred Majeſty of King JAMES the Second.

Whom I beſeech the King of Kings long to Preſerve Beloved of all His Subjects, Dreaded by all His Enemies, and Renowned to all Poſterity in the Hiſtory of future Ages.

So Prayeth with due Reverence,

Your Majeſties

Moſt Loyal Subject

Mary Howel.

PREFACE.

THE Author having all along in his firſt part, intermixed the Eccleſiaſtical Affairs with the Secular, thought it would be moſt uſeful now, to repreſent them by themſelves, ſeparately, in a diſtinct Volume, which is here preſented to the Reader ; wherein he hath brought down his account of them, to the Fall of Auguſtulus and the ruine of the Empire in the Weſt (where the Second part ends) ſetting forth how the Great Emperour Conſtantine was converted to the Faith, and what means and methods he took to propagate the Chriſtian Religion, and deſtroy by degrees the long practiſed Idolatry of the Pagan World. With an account of the Church Polity ; what was its Government, who were its Governours, their ſeveral Offices, Degrees, and Orders. The Affairs of the Church follow from the firſt General Council of Nice againſt the Arians, to the Apoſtacy of Julian ; thence to the Second General Council, ſummoned by Theodoſius the Firſt at Conſtantinople, againſt the Hæreſie of Macedonius : thence to the Third , call'd by Theodoſius the Second to meet at Epheſus ; againſt the Hæreſie of Neſtorius ; and thence to the Fourth, called by Martianus to Chalcedon , againſt the Hæreſie of Eutyches and Dioſcorus ; and ſo down to the depoſing of Auguſtulus, and the Fall of the Empire in the Weſt, with the diviſion of the Church into the Eaſt and Weſt. The Decrees and Canons of each Council are ſet down, both for the ſettling good Order and Government, and for ſuppreſſing thoſe Schiſms and Hæreſies which the Devil raiſed by his aſpiring Agents, that by ſowing ſuch Tares he might ſpoyl Chriſts Husbandry.

In particular, that ſupream Authority uſurped by the Roman Biſhop is repreſented, how, and by what means it was firſt pretended to, but ever rejected by the whole Catholick Church: Which gives to each Metropolitan the ſole juriſdiction over his own Flock, not any General Commiſſion to any one whatſoever, for the ſuperviſing of all, their Authority being equal, and their Power the ſame.

Thus far he proceeded, and left it finiſhed under his own hand, as we teſtifie, who have ſeen the Original.

H. London.
Tho. Ruffen.
Sy. Patrick D. D,
Will. Denton M. D,
Rich. Aſhfeild Gen.

THE Church Hiſtory,
OR THE ECCLESIASTICAL AFFAIRS
Contemporary with the Conſtantinopolitan Roman EMPIRE.

Chap. I.

The Hiſtory of the Reformation of Religion by Conſtantine.

1. Sufferings had hitherto been the Character of the Church, and the Profeſſors of Chriſtianity, the more Active and Vigorous they appear'd, the more exquiſite Torments they were ſure to undergo; the Kings and Potentates of the Earth inſtead of being her Nurſing-Fathers, had all along made uſe of their utmoſt Power and policy not only to Curb and Check her growing Greatneſs, but utterly to extirpate her from off the face of the Earth; ſo that what Advances ſhe yet made were in deſpight of the Malice of her Perſecutors, and the Fruits ſhe brought forth were the bleſſed product of the Blood of her Martyrs. But now in compaſſion to her Afflictions, and in pity to the Pangs and Struglings ſhe laboured under, God raiſes up Conſtantine, not only to be a Protector, but himſelf a Profeſſor of Chriſtianity, that ſo his Church might have ſome reſpite, and enjoy at leaſt a breathing-while in the midſt of theſe her Terrours and Agonies.

The Church and State united.

2. The Name of Chriſt had mightily prevail'd, and the Church of God was upheld by a moſt powerful Support before ever ſhe leaned on the Roman Scepter, the Wings upon which ſhe was Born, and under which ſhe was Cheriſhed and Defended, were ſtronger and more large then thoſe of the Roman Eagle, which hitherto had improved the Vigour of its Eyes, ſtrength of its Beak, and ſharpneſs of its Talents in vain, againſt this Bird of Paradiſe. Neither was it out of need of Reputation, that the Roman Faſces now was to be vailed to the Croſs, the Churches Majeſty and Glory never more appearing, than when ſhe was moſt clouded by Sufferings and Worldly Prejudice; as the deepeſt and blackeſt Clouds are moſt capable of receiving the reflection of the Suns Beauties, and a thick Air the beſt Medium to diſcover the Brightneſs of Heavenly Bodies. Theſe ſtupendious Miracles that ſtopped and diverted the courſe of Nature her ſelf, both in the bigger and leſſer World; in that by the production of Wonders to the outward Senſes, in this by working Effects perceivable both by the outward and inward Sight, to ſuch as were not blinded by ignorance, prejudice or affectation, demon-monſtrated ſuch incomparable Beauty, as would dazle all the Glories of the World though contracted into one Sun. Miracles wrought upon material Subjects, and ſuch as neither the Art of Pagans, nor Skill of the Falſe Gods (who were alſo obnoxious to the ſame Commands) could work, carried with them ſufficient Evidence; but thoſe that appeared in Mens minds, transformed quite from their ordinary Condition, by ſuch Virtues as were but Antiently Pictured on the greateſt Philoſophers, carried along with them abſolute demonſtrations to unprejudiced Judgments, and left others without excuſe. But contempt of the φόϐερων φοϐερώτατον made much more ſure by the Circumſtances attending it; Triumph I ſay over Death, maniſeſted not only the Reality but Glory of the Truth,. which ſtruck the World with admiration and conviction, for that the only Prodigy now, that Man ſeemed, who could be ſo ſtupid as not to believe. Greater were the Conqueſts the Church made by her Spiritual Weapons, viz. Prayers and Tears, than by the acceſſion of Secular Arms, and ſtronger her Natural Power (that is alſo Spiritual) Reputation, than that ſhe obtained by the addition of a Temporal Crown.

3. Yet was ſhe to try all Conditions, and be now refreſhed after ſo great Conflicts as ſhe had ſuſtained. Gods Power is alſo ſeen in calling thoſe that have the greateſt Temptations, and in giving ſight to ſuch whoſe Eyes are put out by too near Approximation to Worldly, but dazling Objects: Neither were ſuch Functions as he Eſtabliſhed by his own Inſtitution to be diſowned by a want of real and the beſt Acknowledgments, nor ſuch as were Gods in this Life by his appointment, to be the only Perſons that were to be Devils in that to come. Therefore after 312. Years or more (during which ſpace we have no aſſurance that any Roman Prince unfeignedly became a Chriſtian) Conſtantine the Emperour the Son of Conſtantius and Helena a Britiſh Woman Converted to the Faith by a Viſion of a Croſs ſeen in the Air, wherein was this Greek Inſcription, ἐν τȣ́τω νικᾶ, or, In this Overcome, as he Marched againſt Maxentius the great Perſecutor of Chriſtians. This all Chriſtian Writers affirm, and as (a) Euſebius tells us, Conſtantine himſelf by Oath affirmed; neither need we at all to queſtion the Truth of it; For that God made uſe of Miracles upon extraordinary Occaſions, we muſt not doubt, and ſuch we muſt confeſs this to have been, if the extraordinary Condition of the Perſon, and the vaſt Conſequences be duly conſidered. That Miracles as at this time were not ceaſed utterly, we may believe from that reaſon which was ever the final Cauſe of them, and from the Teſtimony of ſeveral Writers, who diſcourſe of the firſt Plantation of Religion amongſt Barbarous Nations long after this Seaſon, whom it is little leſs than arrogance to Condemn of Falſhood (although perhaps too Credulous in ſome Particulars) becauſe as extraordinary means ſeem neceſſary for the Converſion of Later, as were uſed for the Conviction of former Diſciples. This Converſion of Conſtantine was in the Seventh of his Reign, the Fourth Year of the 272. Olympiad, of Rome the 1065. A. D. 312. He himſelf the Second time, and Licinius his Colleague alſo the ſecond time being Conſuls.

Conſtantine Converted to the Faith.

(a) In vita Conſtantini, cap. 22.

4. Being fully inſtructed in that way into which he had been ſo Miraculouſly led, he reſolved to proceed in deſpight of all oppoſition, he found the Church in ſuch a Caſe as required an Healing, helping and delivering, not an adorning hand, her Wounds were deep and her Enemies ſtrong, and many who lately had got ſuch ſucceſs, as they eſteemed it, that puffed up in their Imaginations they determined to think of oppoſition for the future, although the Blood of the Martyrs, contrary both to their expectation and deſire, ſtill proved the Seed of the Church. Knowing therefore, like a Skilful Phyſitian, the true Method of her Cure, he firſt applyed ſuch a Medicine, as both ſhould heal her Wounds, and what was more, make her Sword Proof for the time to come; Publiſhing an Edict both in his own Name and that of Licinius, (after the Victory obtained againſt Maxentius) whereby it is declared, that (a) Liberty henceforth be denied to none, of Chuſing or Following the Chriſtian Service and Religion; but that Liberty be granted to every one, to addict his mind to that Religion, which he thinketh fit for him. A ſlow but ſure pace in things of ſuch Conſequence and difficulty is the beſt, all ſudden and Violent Mutations are as to the Body Natural, ſo alſo to the Civil and Spiritual very dangerous, one very Pletherick and weak is gently to be Purged, leſt together with ſome Humours, Life it ſelf is forced out; neither is a quite contrary Dyet allowed all on a ſudden, by that genuine ſaying of Æſculapius Feſtina lente, Conſtantine had learnt from one of his Predeceſſors; and ſat cito, ſi ſat bene, he knew agreeable to Chriſtian Politicks. It is true that Idolatry is not to be

By an Edict gives Liberty of Conſcience.

(a) Euſebius Hiſt. Lib. 10. cap. 5.

per-

UMI

permitted a Moment, and the firſt Minute is the fitteſt to aboliſh it: But a poſſibility muſt then be allowed. Idolatry had taken too deep Root to be Eradicated in an inſtant, nay, many Years were required to do it as we ſhall ſee in due time and order, Long Preſciption and preſent Poſſeſſion are great obſtacles to diſſeiſin, eſpecially when backed with Dignity and Power. And ſuch was the Tenure Idolatry held by at this time, Fool-hardineſs and fury are the greateſt Enemies to Religion; a thing of the greateſt Sobriety and profound Prudence in the World.

Orders the Church Lands to be reſtored, and is further kind to the Church.

Omits the Celebration of the Secular Games.

5. Conſtantine having thus ſecured the being, as much as in him lay, provided for the well-being (a) of Chriſtians, not only by his private Contributions; but by an (b) Edict in his Name and that of Licinius, directed to Anulinus Proconſul of Africk, whereby it is decreed that Poſſeſſions or any Goods belonging to the ‘Church in former Times, ſhould be reſtored, (c) and Freeing the Biſhops and ‘Clergy-men from publick Burthens, ſuch (d) as were Baniſhed into Iſlands, or elſwhere, or (e) Condemned to the Mines, were reſtored to their Natural Freedom; ‘Honours (f) both Military and Civil, were reſtored to ſuch as had loſt them upon ‘this account. The (g) Eſtates of Martyrs, Profeſſors of Religion, or ſuch as forſook their Country for the ſake of it, were appointed to the next a Kin; and ‘to (h) thoſe that had not Kindred, the Church became Heirs; provided that whatſoever they gave in their Life-time ſhould ſtand good. Thoſe (i) that poſſeſſed their ‘Lands, Orchards and Houſes, were Compelled to reſtore them back, but not ‘to make any ſatisfaction for the Rents or Fruits which they had received. (k) All ‘Church Lands or Goods in poſſeſſion of the Imperial Crown, he reſtored. He ‘(l) deſired all Men to be Chriſtians, but compelled none, ſtriving by the greatneſs ‘of his Example to draw them to the Truth; for his Palace (m) reſembled a Church, ‘where Godly People aſſembled together; and he refuſed to celebrate the Secular ‘Games which fell in his Third Conſulſhip, to the great grief of the Pagans, ‘who accounted them Inſtituted by their Gods, and preſented by the Sybilline ‘Oracles for remedies againſt Famine Plague and VVar, they accounted therefore this Omiſſion of them as an Ominous ſign of the Ruin of the Empire, and Zozimus moſt bravely avoweth it ſuch, having no other Deſign as he himſelf witneſſeth of Writing his Hiſtory, then to ſhow forſooth that the Ruin of the Empire came by the means of Chriſtians.

(a) Euſeb. Hiſt. Lib. 10. Cap. 2. & 6.
(b) Idem. ibid. Cap. 5.
(c) idem ibid Cap. 7.
(d) Idem in vita Caſ c. 30. 31.
(e) Idem ibid Cap, 32.
(f) Cap 33. 34.
(g) Cap. 35.
(h) Cap. 36.
(i) Cap. 37.
(k) Cap 39
(l) Idem l. 2. Cap. 55.
(m) Idem l. 4. c. 17.

6. The Original and cauſe of all Miſchiefs, he maketh the Omiſſion of this Solemnity by Conſtantine, whom like an Heathen and prejudiced Perſon, he loadeth with all ſorts of Calumnies out of Malice; whereas it's clear by Teſtimony of all Writers, that the Ages wherein theſe Secular Games were Celebrated, neither wanted Plague, Famine nor War, but conflicted with all ſorts of Miſeries; and in the contrary, this preſent was vow'd of them being very Fortunate both to the City and the World; ſo many Tyrants and Barbarous Enemies being Suppreſſed; but when through the importunity of the Gentiles theſe Games were reſtored by permiſſion of Honorius the Chriſtian Emperour, the former Evils returned as we ſhall ſee in due place. But the Pagans greviouſly Troubled and Afflicted with this proſperity of Chriſtianity, which they ſaw could not be Extirpated by ſuch and ſo many Perſecutions, to divert their Grief, invented certain Greek Verſes, as given out to one that conſulted an Oracle wherein they declared Chriſt innocent of this Error of Sacriledge as they called it, but accuſed St. Peter as Author of that wickedneſs that he might be Worſhipped in Chriſts Name, for the ſpace of 365. Years, after which time this Worſhip was to have an end without delay.

Prohibits Chriſtians to be ſold for Proſtitution.

7. Conſtantine continuing his Reformation as the Times and import of the matter would bear, in the Tenth Year of his Reign, and the Third of his Converſion, he publiſhed an Edict whereby he prohibited, that any Chriſtian Maid-Servants ſhould be delivered into the hands of Bawds, which (a) is yet extant. He made alſo another mentioned by (b) St. Hierome and Sozomenus, though not extant in the ‘(c) Code, whereby he put down the filthy Stews in the Fornices where amongſt ‘Whores, Boys alſo ſtood and were publickly expoſed as Merchandiſe for Luſt: As alſo another mentioned by (d) Lampridius, hath periſhed which forbad Eunuchs (the plague of Princes of thoſe times) to bear any Offices of Majeſtracy, he alſo thought a thing ſutable to Chriſtian moderation (that we may mention a thing not altogether ſo proper to this Subject) to mitigate the Severity of puniſhment formerly due to Malefactors, Repealing by an Edict of this ſame Year, that (e) Law and Cuſtom whereby ſuch as were condemned to the Gladiator's School, and the Mines were to be branded in the Face, ordering the Cauſe of their Condemnation

(a) c. th. de lenon. Lib. 1.
(b) 2. in Eſaiam.
(c) Lib. 1. cap 8.
(d) in. Alex.
(e) L. 2. cod. th. de pœnis.

ſhould be marked either in their Hands or Legs, leaſt as he ſaith the Face which is formed according to Celeſtial Beauty, ſhould be disfigured, which Cuſtom by him thus brought in, is ſtill obſerved amongſt us, except in caſes of ſome Hainous offence deſerving a publick Character of Infamy; although the (f) Thracians accounted it (ſuch is the diverſity of thoughts and manners) a note of Nobility to have their Hands Marked (whence came the Proverb Thraciæ notæ) as alſo the Sarmacians and Dacians, according to (g) Pliny, and the Tentans as (h) Tertullian writeth. The Syrians (i) were wont alſo to be Stigmatized in their Hands or Necks.

(f) Cælius Rhodig. Antiq. lect. l. 7 cap. 31.

(g) Lib. 22. cap. 1.

(h) de virg. veland.

(i) Lucian in nova Syria.

Reſtrains the Inſolence of the Jews.

8. This Year alſo (that we may return to our proper Subject) Conſtantine by an (a) Edict, reſtrained the Sawcy impudence of the Jews, who were wont when any of their Sect turned Chriſtian, to throw Stones at him and abuſe him, with other ſorts of Violence. Such as ſhould do the like for the time to come, he commands to be Burnt whith all their Abettors; and ſubjects all Chriſtians to the ſame puniſhment that ſhall turn to their Religion. About this time it appeareth from Chryſoſtom, that the Jews Rebelled though in what Year is not expreſſed, for which crime Conſtantine Cauſed their Ears to be cut off, and led up and down in all places, as Fugitive Slaves that their Brethren might be adviſed how to carry themſelves towards Chriſtians; but afterward they were quiet, and living in Dutiful Obedience, had the ſame favour as other Subjects, which his Reſcripts made in their behalf ſufficiently declare.

(a) C. Th. l. 1. de Judæis.

9. Such was the Progreſs Conſtantine made in the Reformation of Religion, whilſt as yet he Governed the Empire in Conjunction with Licinius, which at firſt ſeeming to joyn with him, afterwards turned Perſecutor in thoſe Dominions that were ſubject to him. He being overthrown, taken Priſoner, and put to Death, he proceeded with greater Vigour, having by ſeveral Edicts recalled Chriſtianity, Baniſhed as it were out of thoſe Parts; Eſtabliſhed the Church almoſt utterly Overturned and Deſolate, reſtored ſuch as had either been forced or Fled for ſafety from their own Countrys, Releaſed them that were Condemned either to Priſon or the Mines, reſtored ſuch to Liberty as had been made Slaves upon the account of Conſcience; reſtored all to their Eſtates and Dignities, and provided for the Heirs of Martyrs that they ſhould Succeed them according to Law and Conſcience; and if they had no Kindred, then their Eſtates ſhould fall to the Church, provided that whatſoever they gave in their Life-time ſhould ſtand Firm. All thoſe things were included in an Edict, which preſently he put in Execution, diſanulling whatſoever the Tyrants had done, ſo that reſtitution was made to the right Owners according to Law and the Tenour of the ſaid Edict.

Conſule Euſeb. in vita Conſtantini cap. 19. uſq; ad. 42

He prefers Chriſtians to places of Honour and prohibits Idolatry.

10. Now the Biſhops were reſtored to their Sees, and Idolatry was more oppoſed then ever. Conſtantine (a) proceeding to other matters of great Moment, conferring many Dignities on Chriſtians, and making them Governours of divers Provinces, but ſuch as were devoted to Heatheniſm he prohibited to ſacrifice to Idols: For he made a new Law, that if they were Chriſtians all Governours of Provinces ſhould behave themſelves as became that glorious Title; but if they were otherwiſe affected, he commanded that they ſhould not Sacrifice to Idols. Not long after he publiſhed an Edict (b) againſt Aruſpices or South-ſayers, who privately in other Mens Houſes followed their Trade: And about the ſame time he freed (c) all Clergy-men from Offices, except ſuch who for to ſhun all civil Imployments, had upon deſign betaken themſelves to that Function. But when many abuſed this Priviledge and Immunity granted to the Clergy, the Emperour (d) commanded afterward that ſuch only ſhould Succeed them that Dyed as were poor and not liable to publick Imployments.

(a) idem ibid. cap. 43.

(b) l. 1. & 2. c. Th. de malef.

(c) c. Th. l. 2. de Epiſc. & cler. l. 16. tit. 2. §. 3.

(d) c. Th. l. 16. tit. 2. §. 3.

He makes an Edict concerning the obſervation of the Lords day.

11. The Year following being the 16 of his Reign, the 13 of his Converſion, Claudius Cæſar the ſecond time and Conſtantinus Cæſar alſo the ſecond time being Conſuls, he publiſhed an Edict for the obſervation of the Lords Day (a) forbiding all Artificers to work in Cities, but permitting the Exerciſe of Agriculture (b) as alſo Manumiſſions and Mancipations to be made on that day.

Euſebius in the Hiſtory (c) of his Life (a Treatiſe written in an Encomiaſtick way without Method or order) tells us how he ordained that the Lords Day ſhould be Conſecrated unto Prayer, being the chief and firſt Day of the Week, choſe Grave Religious Men to be Deacons and Chaplains in his Court, and had a ſtrong Guard about his Perſon, who as they were faithful to their Prince, ſo by his example learnt to be Religious towards God, and to obſerve the Lords Day, by devoting it to Prayer. And this Gracious Prince, ſaith he perſuaded others to this pious Duty; ſtill praying that by degrees he might bring all Men to the knowledge

(a) c. Juſt. l. 3. tit. 3. §. 12.

(b) c. Th. l. 2. tit. 8. §. 1.

(c) Lib. 4. cap, 18, 19. &c ledge of God: Wherefore he Commanded that throughout the Roman Empire, they ſhould forbear to Labour on the Lords Day, and that they ſhould have a reſpect to the days immediately preceeding the Sabbath, in regard of our Saviours memorable Actions performed on thoſe days; here is the Sixt Feria or that we call Fryday, eſpecially meant as Sozomenus (d) telleth, is becauſe on that day Chriſt was Crucyfied. But whereas Conſtantine in his Edict calls it not the Lords Day after the Eccleſiaſtcal manner, but Dies Solis or Sunday, thence ſome (e) collect that this Law was impoſed as well upon Gentiles as others.

(d) Lib. 1. cap. 8.

(e) Baronius ad

A. D. 321.

12. (a) Euſebius indeed tells us that he inſtructed his whole Army to reverence and obſerve this Holy and Happy day, which was called Sunday, giving Liberty to thoſe by a Divine inſtinct, who had imbraced the Faith, that they might freely frequent the Church of God; and there without any Moleſtation offer up their Prayers unto him. But others that had not yet taſted the ſweetneſs of Divine Knowledge, he commanded that on the Lords day they ſhould go into the Fields, belonging to the Suburbs of the City where they ſhould meet, and joyn together in Prayer to God: For he ſaid that they ought not only to uſe their Spears, or put their confidence in Weapons or ſtrength of Body, but to acknowledge God to be the giver, and as of all other things, ſo of Victory; to whom with Hearts and Hands lifted up to Heaven, we ought to render due Praiſe and Prayer, to beſeech him who is the giver of Victories, to Keep, Protect and Defend us. He preſcribed alſo to his Souldiers a certain Form of Prayer in Latin, which he commanded them to uſe after this manner. (b) We acknowledge thee the only God, we confeſs thee to be our King; we invoke thee as our helper; by thee we have obtained Victories, by thee we have overcome our Enemies, from thee we enjoy our preſent Happyneſs, And hope we ſhall obtain one that is to come, we all become thy Suppliants, beſeeching thee to preſerve long our Emperour Conſtantine ſafe and Victorious, with his hopeful Progeny. This Form of Prayer he commanded his Souldiers to uſe on Sundays, and in their daily Devotions; (c) cauſing alſo the Sign of the Croſs to be Ingraven upon their Armour, and to be carried before the Army, which it was to follow, and not any Golden Standard as formerly. And he not only ſent this Edict for obſervation of the Lords Day to all Governours of Provinces, but alſo for (d) keeping ſuch Holydays as were Conſecrated to the Memory of the Martyrs; and for the ſolemn obſervation of the Feaſts of the Church, all which was performed according to the Emperours Commands.

(a) Lib. 4. vitæ Conſt. cap. 19.

(b) Idem. ibid. cap. 20.

Preſcribes a prayer to be uſed by his Souldiers.

(c) Idem. ibid. cap. 21.

(d) Idem. ibid. cap. 23.

13. This Year he alſo publiſhed a (a) Conſtitution againſt Witches, Inchanters, and ſuch as by Invocation of Devils, raiſed Tempeſts or diſturbed the Brains of Men. By (b) another he gave Liberty to any one to leave by his Will to the Church whatſoever he pleaſed, whereby the Riches of the Clergy ſo vaſtly increaſed with time to the great detriment of the Civil State, that Succeeding Princes, were forced to make Laws of Mortmain, for reſtraining of ſuch Liberality as we ſhall ſee hereafter, by an Edict (c) alſo he preſſed the Re-edifying of Churches. But he ſeemeth in the latter end of this Year, to have pulled down ſome of the Buildings he had raiſed, by another Conſtitution (d) or Reſcript to Maximus Præfect of the City, whereby then reſiding at Sardica, he commanded the Aruſpices or Soothſayers to be Conſulted about ſome Prodigies that had lately happened, and permitted this to be done publickly by all others, a Fact unworthy of a Chriſtian Emperour, eſpecially ſo Zealous as he ſeemed to be, for it's one thing to Connive at a fault, which there is not ſufficient power and opportunity to puniſh, and another to reſtore an unlawful Cuſtom formerly prohibited, and to Eſtabliſh Iniquity by a Law. Hence Zozimus might be ſo bold as to aſſert that Conſtantine till this time although againſt his will, to pleaſe the Senate followed the Pagan Superſtition.

Enacts a Law againſt Witches &c. and is farther kind to the Church.

(a) l. 4. c. de malef.

(b) c. Th. l. 4. de Epiſc. & cler. & l. 16. tit. 2. §. 4.

(c) c. Th. l. 15. tit. 1. § 2.

(d) c. th. l. 1. de Pagan.

By another he commands the Aruſpices to be conſulted.

14. That this his Aſſertion is falſe, the former Laws ſufficiently declare, and not only our own Hiſtorians. Yet hence take occaſion to obſerve that Conſtantine by reaſon of difficulty and importance of the thing, was Conſtrained to Act with great care and Circumſpection, both towards the Senate as yet Pagan for the moſt part, and the People, and ſo to have obſerved his own Religion as in ſo tickliſh a time, not to undo all by once doing, but inſinuating things by degrees, as the publick Affairs and Exigence of times would Comport, to have conſtrained none to his own (though beſt) way, and proceeded but ſlowly and warily in overthrowing Idolatry, as we ſhall farther ſee hereafter, however ſome Writers out of their own Zeal magnifie what they themſelves deſired, meaſuring his Commendation by the Standard of their own inclinations, whilſt they looked more at what ſhould, then what could be, and being better Church-men and Politicians (even in a Chriſtian Sence) by their Panegyrical Flouriſhes, extoll that for zeal, which had it been practiced might through the unſeaſonable application, proved the overthrow of that they moſt deſired ſhould be eſtabliſhed.

15. By their præcipitancy and imprudence (as in ſuch Caſes Princes never want thoſe about them of ſuch Temper, and would be at their Journeys end e're they can well ſet out) might the Emperour be brought to do what he might be tempted afterwards to recall, and thereby both Sin in Eſtabliſhing that by a Law, which it might have been no Sin to permit with ſorrow, when he could not hinder it: As alſo diſcourage Profeſſors, and caſt a great blemiſh upon Religion; or elſe not only venture the overthrow of Religion, and reducing it to its former afflicted Condition, but endanger his Crown and Dignity by Seditions. For the occaſion of this Reſcript, appeareth to have been a great ſuſpicion the Pagans had, that by degrees he would Eradicate their Superſtition; becauſe about a Year a go he had the ſecond time written againſt Aruſpices, which exerciſed their Art in private Houſes. Leaving them to be accordingly Alarmed, hereby it is probable that by an Inſurrection or ſome dangerous attempt, he recalled what he had formerly done, and eſtabliſhed the thing he prohibited. For as (x) one obſerveth, ſeeing that in this Reſcript he declareth that all have Liberty to follow that way of Divination, ſo they abſtain from private Superſtition and Domeſtick Sacrifices; he plainly ſignifieth that by ſome other Edict he had prohibited the publick Exerciſe of Aruſpicina, which it ſeems had wonderfully incenſed the Pagans and excited them to Seditious Attempts, the Aruſpicina being of vaſt Eſteem and Authority at Rome, as it is evident from the Law of the 12 Tables which (x) Cicero reciteth and explaineth. But ſome pretend to obſerve that after this ungodly Edict, whereas Conſtantine formerly had all things according to his hearts deſire, ſo that none ever were more happy and proſperous in Government, now began to feel Gods indignation, ſuch a Domeſtick Fewd ariſing (as David formerly had been puniſhed) that he polluted his hands with the Blood of his deareſt Relations, and was in danger of utter Ruin, had he not expiated the Offence committed againſt Chriſtian Religion, by a certain Remedy.

The occaſion thereof.

(x) Baronius ad, A.D. 322.

(x) de legibus, lib. 2.

Which tending much to the prejudice of the Church.

16. For, whereas by the forementioned Reſcript, he had ordered the Soothſayers to be Conſulted, the Gentiles taking heart hereat, were ſo puffed up that hoping the Emperour had returned to their Superſtition, they endeavoured to force the Chriſtians to a partaking of their Myſteries: Whereupon Conſtantine publiſhed this Conſtitution following.

The Emperour Conſtantine Auguſtus to Helpidius.

Whereas we have found that certain Eccleſiaſticks, and the reſt that obey the Catholick Party. are compelled to the Sacrifices of the Luſtra, by Men of ſeveral Religions; We Ordain by this Conſtitution, that if any one go about to Compell thoſe who are Subjects to the moſt Holy Law, to any Rite of a ſtrange Superſtition, if his State and Condition bear it, he ſhall be beaten with Rods publickly; but if the Condition of his Degree or Honour do withſtand this as an Injury, let him be Fined to publick uſe, as much as poſſibly he may. Given at Sirmium. on the 8. of the Calends of June, Severus and Rufinus being Conſuls, that is, A. D. 323.

By another Law he forbids Chriſtians to be forced to partake thereof.

17. From this Conſtitution we ſhall firſt obſerve, that the Gentiles had their Sacrifices and Heatheniſh Rites, either Entire or for the moſt part preſerved as ſuch to this time, and that publickly Celebrated, eſpecially in Rome and Italy; which were moſt Tenacious of Pagan Superſtition throughout the Weſt, as appeareth alſo by other (a) Conſtitutions of Conſtantine. For Helpidius to whom the Conſtitution is directed, for the prevention and puniſhment of the Injury, was then Vicar of the City or Italy, being two Years before called the (b) vicegerent of the Prſæctus Prætorio, and in (c) another directed to him, mention is made of the Port of the City of Rome, and (c) another Law which hath the ſame Inſcription, is propounded to the Carali a City of Sardinia. But by thoſe Sacrifices of the Luſtra (Luſtrorum Sacrificia) are not to be meant the Luſtrations of private and common Solemnities, properly ſo called and Celebrated on certain days proper thereunto, neither ſuch as Fathers of Families made in their Corn Fields, that theſe Calamities, Mors labes nubula impetigo peſeſtas (or Peſtilence) which were moſt proper Terms as (d) Feſtus witneſſeth to theſe ſorts of Solemnities; might be prevented, as in an old Ruſtick (e) Calender it's found Written, in the

The ſeveral kinds of the Luſtra

(a) Tit. de maleficis & Mathematicis Paganis, Sacrificiis & Templis.

(b) C. Juſtin, l. 6. de edificiis privatis.

(c) & C. Th. l. 4. de naviculariis.

(c) C. Th. l. 1. de feriis.

(d) in voce Peſeſtas.

(e) vide Jacob. Gothofred. de interdict. chriſtianorum cum Gentilibus communicatione.

the Month of May, Segetes Luſtrantur, and in that of April, Oves Luſtrantur. Neither are in this place, to be underſtood the Luſtra, which were wont to be Celebrated at Rome by the Cenſors; after the Cenſus of Citizens was made by a Sacrifice of the Suonetaurilia; for they had ceaſed long ago, as appeareth by what Cenſorinus writeth in his Book de Die Natali; at which time the Office of Cenſors alſo Ceaſed, which ſome endeavoured, though in vain, to re-eſtabliſh.

18. By the Sacrifices of Luſtra, here are meant Publick and Solemn Luſtrations, which were Celebrated about the Pomærium of the City and the Fields, in a Proceſſion called Amburbia and Amburvalis: The Beaſts to be Sacrificed, being led about with certain Verſes uttered in a Set and Solemn Feaſt-day; theſe were Solemnized upon ſeveral Occaſions, as for the Fruitfulneſs of the Earth, and Plenty of Grain; upon inſpection of the Sybiline Books, and a Lectiſternium made for the procurement of the Peace of the Gods, as it was termed, or upon Threats of great Dangers, for Defence of the Country againſt Foreign Enemies; in which Solemnities there was a Luſtration by intervention of a Torch, Sulphur, and Water, and Water was ſprinkled according to Tertullian; of this ſort Anciently were the Armiluſtra, whereby the Army in the Campus Martius was Luſtrated by Sacrifice, as were Navies, Temples, Altars, and Pipes called Tubæ, whence came the word called Tubiluſtria, concerning which the Teſtimonies of the Antients are very obvious.

The Gothick ſports are celebrated by the Pagans.

19. That this Conſtitution not only reſpecteth ſuch Luſtra as were made againſt the Plague, or for benefit of the Villages; but alſo for Victory againſt an Enemy, the Characteriſm of the Date of it ſeemeth ſufficiently to Witneſs. For this ſame Year, and the Conſulſhip of Severus and Rufinus, the Goths made an Incurſion into the Empire, and waſted Thrace and Mæſia, whom Conſtantine Repulſed, and thence were Celebrated the Gothick Sports, whereof Porphyry in his Panegyrick, Ancient Coins, and other things written concerning thoſe Times bear mention, as the Calender called Calendarium Hemagianum, the Author of Conſtantine's Life, and an Anonymous of Sirmundus or Valeſius. Now the Pagans thought they could more eaſily force Chriſtians to thoſe Solemnities, becauſe they were Celebrated without the more Superſtitious Rites and Ceremonies; as perhaps without mutations of the Victimæ, and Circumductions already aboliſhed, neither Sacrifices of the Hoſtiæ (for it is requiſite to expreſs thoſe things in their proper Latin Terms) ſo that it ſeemed not ſo clear, but that Chriſtians, without wounding their Conſciences, might be preſent at them: And the publick Profit was pretended, as the welfare of the Prince and Empire; in which caſe to them, as Apuleius ſaith in his firſt Apology, nothing ſeemed Criminous.

Nihil quod ferendum ſalutis gratia fit criminoſam.

And in ſome ſort countenanced by the Emperour.

20. And indeed Conſtantine himſelf in another buſineſs, ſeemed to Subſcribe to their Opinion, before the making of this Law; by giving way to thoſe Spells and Inchantments which were uſed for the Health of his Subjects, leſt Divine Favours or the Labours of Men ſhould be aboliſhed. Which Conſtitution Juſtinian is juſtly wondred at for putting into his Code, and Leo Philoſophus aboliſhed out of as juſt Indignation. Although that Conſtantine afterwards receded from it: The Learned Gothifred doth not doubt, ſeeing he Abrogated the uſe of the Aruſpicina, which he had formerly Tolerated as we have ſeen, under pretence therefore of publick Safety, eſpecially the Gentiles believed that Chriſtians were to be Compelled to the Sacrifices of the Luſtra, Old Cuſtoms and Rites uſed by Anceſtors Time out of mind, carrying ever a great ſhew of Reaſon, if meant out of Devotion to Prince and Commonwealth; which pretence Theodoſius Junior Condemneth by a Conſtitution, concerning the obſervation of the Lords-day, as we ſhall ſee in due time and place. So that the Pagans objected to Chriſtians Impiety and Irreverence towards their Prince and Country, who on the other ſide refuſed to joyn in this Solemnity, or be defiled by Idolatry; rejecting Communion in all ſuch Caſes, however ſuch things were covered by a ſpecious Pretence of the Publick Safety; whence the Calumny of Zozimus appeareth manifeſt, who writes that Innocent Biſhop of Rome, in the Time of Honorius amongſt ſuch Fears and Dangers as were then great, becauſe of the Gothick War, concented to certain Pagan Rites for defence of the Empire, preferring the Publick Safety, ſaith he, before his own opinion. And like to this is his other ſlander of Conſtantine himſelf, who he ſaith till this time gave Credit to the Aruſpices though a Chriſtian. But by thoſe Slanders of Zozimus we may learn that the true and proper Judgment of Chriſtians, was to abſtain from Communion with Gentiles.

C. Th. l. 3. de. maleficis & Matth.

Novella. 65.

C. Th. de. Spectaculis in l. dominico ult.

Lib 5. p. 816.

21. But

Who they were that were protected by the forementioned Law.

21. But it's made a queſtion who they were that the Gentiles would compel to thoſe Solemnities, and conſequently whom the Emperour protects from their violence by this Law. He nameth certain Eccleſiaſticks and the reſt that Serve the Catholick Sect, then afterward ſuch as Obey the moſt Holy Law, by whom it's queſtioned, whether the Clergy alone, or all Chriſtians promiſcuouſly be meant. But who can believe that Eccleſiaſtical Perſons are barely meant, or that they only rejected Communication in thoſe Sacrifices, and not alſo the reſt of the Chriſtians? The general Inhibition of the Law ſufficiently declares it, which takes care that no ſuch be compelled to the Rite of a ſtrange Superſtition, who ſerve the moſt Holy Law, wherefore the Phraſes Catholicæ Sectæ ſervientes, and Sanctiſſimæ legi Servientes, are ſuch as Imbraced the Chriſtian Faith and lived accordingly, not ſuch only as Miniſtred in Sacred Offices. But Conſtantine by a great Penalty prohibits this Diſorder, viz. by beating them with Clubs, if of vile condition, or impoſing on them an heavy Fine, if Noble, which ſhould Iſſue to the Publick not to the Exchequer, but the publick Treaſury of the Cities concerned, as this ſame Emperour allotted another Fine two Years after; and then the Cities, of Italy muſt here be meant, wherein Helpidius was Præfectus prætorio, to whom the Law is Inſcribed.

C.Th. di. in. l. null. 2. et judiciis 1.

A Canon prohibiting Sacrifices to Idols, concurring with the Emperous Edict.

22. Hereby may both the Mind of Conſtantine and the Diſcipline of that Age be fully diſcovered; there being Canons alſo made at Ancyra, by a Council held there Ten Years before, to this ſame purpoſe, whereby not only Sacrificing ‘ to Idols but alſo eating in their Temples and Feaſting with Pagans is forbidden, ‘ the Ninth Canon being made againſt ſuch as Conſtrained their Brethren to do it, or gave cauſe of that Compulſion; not to ſpeak of thoſe pretended to be made at Eliberis, of the Credit of which many juſtly doubt. Julian the Emperor afterwards knowing the Careſulneſs and Shineſs of Chriſtians in this reſpect, laid what Gins and Snares he poſſibly could for them, expoſing the Faces of Princes (afterward called Labratæ) amongſt the Images of their Gods for the People to Worſhip; and putting them upon offering Incenſe which he knew was all one with denying Chriſt.

The taking of Pagan Offices objected to Chriſtians.

23. As for that which ſome object concerning ſeveral Offices born by Chriſtians, and mixed with Idolatry, whereby they would make it appear that all Communion with the Gentiles was neither forbidden nor ſhunned, it's apparent that the Offices of Centenarii and Dendrophori, were never born by Chriſtians, but at length aboliſhed as Fragments of Pagan Superſtition, and the other of Synarchæ and Aſiarchæ were not at all contaminated by any Superſtition belonging to the care and overſight of Game and publick Mirth, which though at firſt might have been Inſtituted upon Superſtitious Grounds, yet now was only improved to innocent Recreation, whereof this Age was very cautious, eſpecially Antioch the Metropolis of Syria, where the Synarchæ reſided, and the Games called Synarchia were exhibited.

Vide Jacobum Gothofredum de interdicta Chriſtianorum cum Gentilibus communione.

And that Conſtantine and his Succeſſors were ſtiled Pontifex Maximus.

24. But the main objected in this Argument, and that which requires a ſerious ſcrutiny in this matter of Reformation is, that Conſtantine as alſo his Succeſſors Valentinian, Valens and Gratian for ſome time bore the Title of Pontifex Maximus, and therefore neither eſteemed a Pagan Name, nor imployment unfitting for him. For this Accuſation Zozimus is brought as a Witneſs, who Writes (a) ſo much in expreſs words, with whom accords (b) Baronius in his Annals, though formerly in his Notes on the Roman Martirology, he gave him the lye as to this particular. And more reaſon he had ſo to do, then at length thus to paſs over to his Party, that Hiſtorian having neither any probable Author or Ground for his Aſſertion, he himſelf confeſſing that he had not this Fable from any Creditable Perſon, but taken it upon hear-ſay and common Diſcourſe, then which nothing is more vain and uncertain. Then what a worthy Author Zozimus is, how much to be Credited in ſuch Caſes we may ſee, both by his inveterate hatred to Chriſtianity? moved wherewith he wrought his Book, which is ſtuffed with ſuch Fables and Calumnies againſt Chriſtian Emperours, and others of that Religion, eſpecially Conſtantine and Gratian, becauſe he began the Reformation, and this Emperour more effectually inforced it by ſtopping the allowance formerly given to Superſtitious Ceremonies, the Stipends allowed to Prieſts, deſtroying the Altar of Victory, and other Portentous Images, as St. Ambroſe, St. Hierome and Symmachus do Teſtifie.

(a) Lib. 4. p. 760. 761.
(b) ad, A.D. 321.

25. Yet could it be granted that Zozimus was not at all guilty of Spleen and Malice, how can he be Credited who ſo palpably Erred in a matter of greateſt Concernment? Concerning Gracian, Writing that for fear of Maximus the Tyrant

Both which are ſufficiently confuted.

rant; having paſſed the Alps, Rhetia, Novicum, Pannonia into the upper Myſia, he was ſlain at Singidunum, whereas other Hiſtorians unanimouſly agree that being worſted near Paris, he fled and was Slain about Lyons. Farther if we Conſult other Writers, a deep ſilence there is, not one word of this Story of the Pontificate which Zozimus tells us, but in a matter of ſuch Moment, who can imagine they ſhould ſay nothing? Would Pagan Writers, eſpecially the Panegyriſts, whereof thoſe Times were Fruitful, have omitted this Title ſo great, ſo plauſible, when they Extol Chriſtian Emperours to the Skies, and paſs not over things of ſlight conſequence? On the other ſide would the Fathers and Eccleſiaſtical VVriters have omitted to reprehend them for ſo ſcandalous an Office and Title, who are not wont to diſſemble leſſer Faults of Princes? Or who can think that by Hereticks, or one or another, this would not have been laid to their Charge?

From the Conſtitutions and Coyns of thoſe Chriſtian Princes.

26. Then if we look on the Conſtitutions of thoſe Chriſtian Princes, their Coyns and Medals, as alſo ſuch Inſcriptions as are not Falſified, there's nothing in them that gives the leaſt pretence to this Aſſertion, although by them, eſpecially the Titles of Emperours be largely ſet out. If we conſider their minds and Inclinations, we ſhall find that by various Conſtitutions, they endeavoured to Eradicate Paganiſm out of the minds of their Subjects, as the Times and neceſſity of Affairs would permit, forbiding to all Chriſtians Communion with the Gentiles, in their Superſtitious Rites; how then could they themſelves practice what they diſapproved in others? and by ill examples Enervate their own Laws? Eccleſiaſtical VVriters as (a) Theodoret and (b) Sozomenus note it in Julian as a new thing, that he called himſelf Pontifex Maximus, as he alſo ſtiles himſelf in a (c) Fragment yet extant, not to mention Inſcriptions where this Title is found. Theſe things ſeem ſufficiently to Convict Zozimus of Calumny and Falſhood, as to his Aſſertion that thoſe Chriſtian Princes aſſumed this Title. As for what he adds that Gratian rejected it, who can believe that ſo memorable a thing would have been utterly forgot, or never mentioned by Chriſtian VVriters, who are ready enough to give Commendations where due, as mightily extoll the Piety and Chriſtian Zeal of Gratian, eſpecially St. Ambroſe and Auſonius; then the diſtance of place makes againſt this Aſſertion. For if the Pontifical Habit was obſerved to Gratian, by the inferiour Pontifices, and preſently rejected by him, then muſt this have been done at Rome, where they reſided and where we do not Read that Gratian ever came.

(a) Lib. 3. cap. 1

(b) Lib. 5. cap. 1.

(c) pag. 546.

27. Notwithſtanding ſome there are who go about to gain Credit to Zozimus his Story, being willing to believe that Gratian firſt rejected this Title, and for this reaſon you muſt know, becauſe the Biſhops of Rome then began to Challenge it as their due, Baronius a main Stickler for it in his Annals, though of another mind in his Notes upon the Martyrology, brings his firſt Teſtimony out of Auſonius, whence he will make in his return of thanks to call Gratian, Pontifex Maximus. But this ſaith Gothofred, is ſaid gratis. For in two Places (a) indeed Auſonius equalleth Gratian with a Pontifex Maximus, but for his Religion and Chaſtity as he plainly expreſſeth it. And in a (b) third he calleth him Pontifex Maximus, but by a certain alluſion in reſpect of the Old Pontifical Comitia, to which Gratian by Letters ſeemed to allude. The Second Teſtimony he fetcheth from Ancient Inſcriptions; wherein beſides other Titles of Emperours, this of Pontifex Maximus is found, and he inſtanceth in ſeveral, to be met with in the Collection of Inſcriptions, by Graterus. Great heed is indeed to be given to ancient Inſcriptions; but we muſt alſo conſider that in them theſe Emperours aſſume not that Title to themſelves, but it's given them by others, viz. The Superſtitious Romans and Italians, as Pagans in this Age; Sacrificers who made Inſpections into the Entrails of Beaſts; for Chriſtian Emperors (who certainly approved no ſuch things) as we have hinted formerly from (c) Ammianus. And we muſt further know that ſome of thoſe Inſcriptions, had been formerly made for Pagan Emperours, whoſe Names being Eraſed, afterward thoſe of Chriſtian Emperours were Ingraven in their places.

(a) cap. 10. vol. 20. & ca. 18. ſeu. 28.

(b) cap. 12. ſeu. 18.

(c) Lib. 2.

28. This is evident from an (a) Inſcription belonging to Conſtantine, and taken notice of by (b) Baronius himſelf, wherein in a Marble at Rome is read, Magno & Invicto Imp. Cæſ. C. val. Aurelio Conſtantino Pio, Fel. Invicto, Aug. Pontif. Max. Trib. Poteſt. Cos. III. PP. Proc. D. N. Corpus Coriariorum &c. That this Inſcription firſt belonged to ſome Pagan Prince, is evident becauſe in the left ſide of the ſame Baſis are alſo read Dedicata Kal. Jan. DD. NN. Diocletiano III. & Maximiniano Coſſ. For this Conſulſhip was before the time of Conſtantine as is moſt clear to all, and his Name afterwards inſerted; for there are C. Val. Aurel. VVhich

(a) fol. 283.

(b) ad A. D. 312.

Prænomina never belonged to him, his Prænomen being Flavius, but are proper to Maximianus, not Diocleſian as Baronius imagined. This change of Names is alſo found in Money which was ſtamped anew with the Name of another Prince, and was uſed alſo in Statues and Images, which were made to ſerve for the Honour of another Perſon, their Heads or Titles being changed, as Gothofred obſerves, and is clear from many Witneſſes.

29. So weak are the Teſtimonies brought by Baronius and Morinus, (a) who follows him herein; of no greater ſtrength are their Arguments. They believe that Chriſtian Princes reſerved this Title, and might lawfully do it, without any Spot ſticking on them from the Ceremonies, for the amplitude of Power therein contained; not out of love to Superſtition, but for preſervation of their Authority, without the Crime of Idolatry; not to perform any Ceremonies, but for the maintenance of their Prerogative. They urge, that without this Title, the Emperours ſhould have been as no body, for that the Senate and People of Rome, would have preſently Conſpired againſt him, as one who was not a Follower of the Religion of their Anceſtors and Country. That the Authority of this Pontifex, was moſt ample above the Conſuls, and therefore ſeemed neceſſary to the Emperours, that thereby they might, as by the chiefeſt Point of Religion, curb and reſtrain the Senate, which was often refractory towards Princes: and it ſeemed more neceſſary to them, as Chriſtians, who might well perceive they reigned againſt the mind of the Senate; and by their Religion, raiſed the Envy and Malice of the Gentiles againſt them.

(a) In Eccleſia liberata.

30. But to Divines this we leave to be diſcuſſed, whether it were an innocent Myſtery of State only, or a Crime; and whether Chriſtian Princes could, with a ſafe Conſcience, and without Idolatry or Superſtition, envy the Title and Office of Pontifex Maximus. Concerning the neceſſity and utility of this Sophiſm, it is not amiſs to ſay ſomething. It is true that the old Pagan Emperours aſſumed this Title, as a ſtrengthening of their Powers, ſo that they themſelves, ſometimes, performed the Ceremonies, and indeed exerciſed the Function of a Pontifex, as (a) Domitian, (b) Adrian, and (c) Alexander Severus. Yet for the imbracing of this Title, which could not poſſibly be ſeparated from a mixture of Pagan Superſtition, there was no neceſſity for Chriſtian Princes, as if otherwiſe they could not be ſecure; ſeeing that then at Rome their Party became daily ſtrangers, and Pagan Superſtition daily decreaſed, which by the omiſſion of ſuch a thing, could not gather much advantage, the Pagan Superſtition being reſtrained, and the Imperial Power confirmed, ſo that the Senate and People from Conſtantine, looked on them as Protectors of the City, and Authors of Peace and Quietneſs, receiving them gladly, and celebrating their Praiſes with all ſorts of Pomp and Commendations; being permitted to enjoy ſome of their Follies, leſt too great ſtrictneſs and ſeverity ſhould raiſe ſuch a Tempeſt, as could not eaſily be diſpelled, though by degrees a Reformation might be tolerated.

(a) Plin. l. 4: ep. 11.
(b) Spartianus, p. 11.
(c) Lampridius, p. 118.

31. As for Conſtantine, could he take the name of Pontifex, a Pagan Title; (who (as the Author of his Life falſely heretofore thought to be Euſebius, witneſſeth) profeſſed himſelf Biſhop, τῶν ἔξω, or thoſe that are without) certainly it ſmally agreed with thoſe Conſtitutions that were made againſt the Sacrifice of the Luſtra, and his neglecting the Secular Games. Baronius addeth that the Chriſtian Biſhops granted theſe Emperours Power to aſſume that Title, but whereby doth this appear? Becauſe they do not blame them upon this account, as for ſeveral other things; but it may juſtly be Argued on the contrary, that this was never done by Chriſtian Emperours, becauſe we do not find them, upon this account, Chidden by the Fathers, who are not wanting to reprehend them for leſſer Faults. For that which Baronius urgeth as his greateſt force, that Chriſtian Emperours did not, as Pagans, aſſume the Robe and Title of Pontifex Maximus, being not initiated as others were, by drinking Bulls Blood, and otherwiſe, nor by Sacrificing to Jupiter Olympius, or other gods, (which had been an open Apoſtacy from Chriſtian Religion, and not to be covered or diſſembled by any pretext) but only as Zozimus ſaith, that receiving the Robe, he uſed alſo the Title. But Zozimus his meaning is, not only the Habit and Title was aſſumed, but he mentions the Habit, as the Enſign of the Pontificate, as Princes by receiving the Purple, took on them alſo Imperial Power.

32. However, we mean not here the moſt hainous Crime of Apoſtacy (although Baronius objects that alſo to Conſtantine very ſtrangely) nor inquire into the moſt wicked act of Superſtition that could be thought; from which Baronius would endeavour to clear the aſſuming of this Title. But Superſtition he muſt be guilty of, had he aſſumed it; neither can one be accounted free from Idolatry, that is not guilty of the higheſt Crime of that nature, that doth not Sacrifice himſelf, or incourage that abominable Rite by his Authority. Although a Prince uſed only the Habit and Title in Baronius his Senſe, yet conſider ſeriouſly what this Habit was; a Pontifical and Prieſtly Stole, ἱερατικὴ στολὴ, as Zozimus calls it, a Sacred Veſtment, Sacerdotal and Pagan Ornament; a painted Robe, not with any Hiſtory out of the Goſpel; doubtleſs as Aſterius writes, the Clothes of Rich Men in Cappadocia, in his time, were wont to be neither wrought with the Images of Emperours as that Trabea or Palmata was, which Gratian ſent to Auſonius, when he had deſigned him Conſul; but were wrought and painted after the Pagan Faſhion, ſuch as was Myſtical, and ſuch as the Pontifex Maximus received from the hand of inferiour Pagan Pontifices, as Zozimus witneſſeth, which for a Chriſtian to put on, was counted wickedneſs by Gratian, as that Pagan Author relates.

33. What account is to be made of Zozimus his Story, and the defence of Baronius, we may perceive by thoſe things, both who make this Title to have ceaſed in Gratian. But there are ſome that proceed farther, and will have the Title of Pontifex Maximus uſed by Princes after his time, which they would prove from an Edict of Valentinian and Marcian, inſerted into the third Action of the Council of Chalcedon, wherein theſe Emperours are called Pontifices Inclyti; ſo the Edition (a) of Colain, and ſuch as have been printed from it: But that this is falſe, appears from the (b) Greek Copies, wherein no ſuch matter appears, but thoſe Princes are only ſtiled αἰώνιοι Αὔγουστοι. That it was added by ſome fooliſh Writer or Printer it is clear, from other Demonſtrations of his Folly; as there it is ſaid that Marcian had repeated the Tribunitial Power ſeven and twenty times, whereas he Reigned but ſix Years and ſix Months; and the Tribunitial Power being a Conſequent of the Imperial, now had been left off, and not mentioned. And there we find Conſul Semel, a Form of Speech that was never uſed.

(a) P. 826.
(b) P. 442.

34. From all that has been ſaid, it appears that Conſtantine, though the Year foregoing he had permitted the uſe of Aruſpicina to the Pagans, yet neither allowed Communion with them in himſelf nor other Chriſtians, but diſapproved of whatſoever carried Superſtition or Paganiſm with it in ſhew or Title. As for ſuch things as had been Inſtituted by the Gentiles, yet in their name had no appearance of Superſtition they continued, as certain Temples cleanſed of all Superſtition afterwards when Paganiſm by degrees was baniſhed, were ſuffered to continue for Ornament to the places where they ſtood. Naked and ſimple Names and Appellations of Things, Times, Temples and Places, were ſtill uſed by Chriſtians without any harm, or any Fellowſhip in Heatheniſh Rites, being eſtabliſhed by common Converſation and Uſe (the Law and Rule of Speech.) The Holy Ghoſt hath not diſdained to apply unto Sacred Purpoſes words of Art as it were, uſed by Pagan Writers, as Paradiſus, Hades, Apoſtolus, Clerus. The falſe Divinities of the Gentiles they ſtill called Dii or Gods. So the firſt day of the Week they ſtill called (a) Sunday, although ſometimes adding ſomething whereby it might appear that they could like better the Chriſtian name, as Theodoſius the younger choſe rather to call it abſolutely the (b) Lords-day. So the Panthæon was ſtill ſo called, and the Atrium of Minerva, where alſo Chriſtian Princes expoſed to view their Conſtitutions, becauſe of the concourſe of People thither made; all which things (c) Tertullian long before, when the Emperours were Pagan, although ſevere in his Cenſures, would not condemn, ſo that there were Approbation not Participation in the thing.

Several Pagan Names and Places kept up, but their Superſtition aboliſhed.

(a) C. Th. de feriis l. 1.2. & l. 1. 3. de exact. l. 2. de ſpectaculis.
(b) C. Th. l. ult. de ſpectaculis.
(c) Lib. de idol. c. 20.

35. That we ſhould uſe this Form of Speech, ſaith he, Cuſtome and Converſation exacts from us. For we muſt ſay, He is in the Temple of Æſculapius, in the Street of Iſis, and he is made Jupiter's Prieſt, and many other things of this nature, ſeeing that Men are thus named. Neither do I honour Saturn, if I call any one by that name; nor Mars, if I call him Mars. If Gods are to be mentioned, ſomething is to be added, whereby it may appear, that I of my ſelf, do not ſo count them, as the Scripture names Gods, but adds, their Gods, or of the Nations. As Tertullian thus excuſeth theſe things, ſo he affirms it to be a Prevarication in Faith, for any Chriſtian to ſwear by the Gods, which Cuſtom and Ignorance ſometimes extorted. But as in other things, Chriſtian Princes took ſpecial care, not to joyn in Communion with Pagans; ſo they would not ſuffer their Subjects to ſwear by their Genius, yet by their Health or Safety, they did according to the ancient Cuſtom of Chriſtians, by which kind of Oath they witneſſed that the thing was as true and certain, as they deſired the Safety and Proſperity of the Emperour.

Chriſtians not ſuffered to ſwear by the Gods, or by their Genius.

But by the Emperours Health or Safety was permitted.

36. But (to return to our Proſecution of ſuch particular Acts of Conſtantine, as reſpected the Reformation) our Emperour, in the Twentieth of his Reign, by an (a) Edict, commanded the bloudy Combating of Gladiators to be taken away, willing, that ſuch as for Offences committed againſt the Laws, had been wont to be ſubjected to ſuch Conflicts, ſhould be condemned to the Mines; although the Times were ſuch, that this Exerciſe could not preſently be aboliſhed, continuing a long time, but at length it was quite taken away, upon what occaſion we ſhall ſee hereafter. The Puniſhment of Malefactors by the Croſs, he alſo forbid, as (b) Sozomenus tells us, who addeth, that he cauſed his Image upon Coins or in Pictures to be done with a Croſs; as the Lance he was wont to uſe in Battel, ſome ſay (c) he cauſed to be faſhioned into the Form of a Croſs, which being left to his Succeſſors, deſcended as low as Henry the Emperour, and his Son Otho.

He takes away the combating of Gladiators by an Edict.

(a) C. Th. l. 1. de gladiat.

(b) L. 1. c. 8.

(c) Baron. ad A.D. 325.

37. After the Celebration of the Nicene Council, which was in the ſame Year, the former Edict was made, he more vigorouſly proſecuted Idolatry, though he conſtrained no Idolaters, as we ſaid, to his own Religion, but only exhorted and ſought to turn them by gentle means. Eurapius Sardianus complains that he overturned the moſt Famous Temples in the whole World, and every where erected Chriſtian Structures. That this was done preſently after the Council of Nice; Euſebius, or the (a) Author of his Life teſtifies, as alſo Socrates. The former tells us, that ſome of the Pagan Temples, were, by his command, untiled, and the Gates pulled down; others were quite demoliſhed, and the Tiles and Timber carried away. And ſome Graven Images, which the Heathens had of a long time ignorantly adored, were erected in the Market-place of Conſtantinople as opprobious Spectacles. Here Pythius was placed, there Sminthius, in the Cirque the Tripos of Delphos, and the Heliconian Muſes in the Palace. Having once reſolved, he thought not fit to effect his Intentions by any hoſtile Violence, but making choice of certain truſty and approved Perſons, ſent them into all Places to ſuppreſs their inveterate and anciently received Errors. This they did, which muſt be underſtood in part, and as the times would give leave, for all Idolatry was not aboliſhed, nor all Pagan Temples broken down a long time after.

He farther Proſecutes Idolatry, by deſtroying their Temples.

And removing their Images.

(a) L. 3. c. 52. &c.

38. But mention being made by the forecited Writers of Conſtantinople, how Images were in deriſion erected in the Forum of it, we muſt not forget to ſignifie, that the Reformation of Religion gave occaſion to the building of that City, if Zozimus may be believed. He writeth, that a certain Feſtival-day being come, wherein it was the Cuſtom for the Army to aſcend into the Capitol, he ſpoke againſt the Ceremony contumeliouſly, and contemning it, incurred the Hatred both of Senate and People, whoſe Curſes not able to bear, he ſought where he might find a City equal to Rome, wherein to fix his Imperial Seat, and at length pitched upon Byzantium, which happened to be Dedicated afterward in the Five and twentieth Year of his Reign. In his One and twentieth Year, having taken away the publick Schools of Luſt, he publiſhed an (a) Edict againſt private Uncleanneſs, Ordaining, that if any Woman lay with her Slave, ſhe ſhould be put to death, and he burnt. A little after he took away the uſe of (b) Concubines, which yet came in faſhion again, and was permitted in the time of Juſtinian, ſo a Man was unmarried, and had but one, which thing being a great flaw of that Age, and very ſcandalous to Chriſtianity, was by Leo Philoſophus removed, (c) Ordaining, that it ſhould not be lawful for Chriſtians to have Concubines, ſubjoyning that excellent Reaſon out of Solomon's Proverbs: "That it was an unworthy thing, when Water might "be had out of a pure Fountain, to ſeek for a muddy a diſtempered one; "neither could it be difficult for any to find a Conſort and Yoak-fellow. Whoſe example Conſtantinus Porphyrogenneta imitating, that amongſt Chriſtians there ſhould no difference be accounted betwixt a Concubine and an Whore; and that it ſhould not be lawful for any Chriſtian to have one, as Harmenopulus witneſſeth.

He fixeth his Imperial Seat at Byzantium or Conſtantinople.

Where he prohibits publick Bawdy-houſes, and the uſe of Concubines.

(a) C. Th. l. 1. de muliere quæ Ser.

(b) L. 1. C. de Concub.

(c) Novella, 91.

(d) L. 4. c. 7.

39. Conſtantine his new City being perfected, was a great Monument and Teſtimony of the Reformation. For he (a) purged it from all Superſtition and Idolatry, ſo that no where therein were Statues of Idols in their Temples, nor Altars defiled by the Blood of impure Sacrifices, nor Feaſts of Devils celebrated. St. Auguſtine (b) reckoning up the ſeveral parts of Conſtantine's Felicity; amongſt other Accounts this not the leaſt, That God granted his deſires in building a City, which ſhould be as the equal or Daughter of Rome, but without any Temple or Image of Devils. He Adorned it with many Churches, whereof one was called the Church (c) of the Apoſtles; another of Peace, being alſo called Sapience; and another (d) built without the City, and named Michaelium, in memory of St. Michael the Archangel, who is ſaid, there to have appeared; beſides others mentioned by (e) Nicephorus; all which he took care ſhould be well furniſhed with Books, the charge of which Work, he impoſed on Euſebius Biſhop of Cæſarea by this Letter.

Adorns his new built City with divers Churches.

(a) Euſeb. ſive Auth. vitæ Conſt. l. 3. c. 47.

(b) De civit. Dei. l. 5. c. 25.

(c) Socrates, l. 2. c. 12.

(d) Sozomenus, l. 2. c. 2.

(e) L. 7. c. 49, 50.

40. Seeing (a) that by God's Divine Providence, a great multitude of People in this City, which is called after me Conſtantinople, have devoted themſelves to the true Church; it is fit, that as their number increaſeth, ſo more Churches ſhould be erected. Know therefore, that we thought it neceſſary to ſignifie to your Wiſdom, that you ſhould provide fifty Church Books, containing thoſe parts of Scripture which you think moſt uſeful and profitable to the Church, and moſt portable, being fairly and legibly writ in ſmooth Parchment. And we, out of gracious Clemency, have ſent our Letters to the Governour of your Province, to furniſh you with all things neceſſary for the charge thereof; you ought only to take care the Books be written with all ſpeed. And we give you Power and Authority, by theſe our preſent Letters, to take up two Waggons for carriage of the Books. Moreover, when they are fairly written, I would have them brought to me by a Miniſter delegated to that purpoſe out of your Church, whom when he comes, we will reward. God keep and preſerve you dear Brother. The Emperours command was ſpeedily performed, ſo that we ſent him, ſaith our Author, fifty Books curiouſly written in Parchment, as may appear by his Letters of Anſwer, wherein he ſignified his joy and gladneſs when he heard that Conſtantia (formerly called Gaza in Paleſtine, but upon this change, named by him after his Siſter) was Converted from Idolatrous Superſtition, to the true Religion.

(a) Euſeb. in vit. Conſt. l. 4. c. 50.

Furniſhing them with Books.

41. But not only at Conſtantinople, but in Italy, at Rome, and throughout the Empire, great was his Magnificence in the building and endowing of Churches, concerning which, a Book was written, which Anaſtaſius the Vatican Library keeper publiſhed out of it; ſeveral are mentioned by the Author of his Life, and other Writers. He commanded one to be built in the very place where our Saviour's Sepulchre was, which the Heathens endeavouring to deface, had there built a Chappel to Venus. Vaſt was the Magnificence of this Church, as it is deſcribed in his (a) Life; wherein are alſo mentioned others built at (b) Bethlem, and on the Mount of Olives, at (c) Nicomedia, and other Cities; one at the (d) Oak of Mambre, where it was thought our Saviour appeared to Abraham; another at (e) Heliopolis in Phœnicia, where was demoliſhed the Image of Venus. Others ſpeak of the (f) ſtately Church from the former called Conſtantiniana, but more commonly Saviour's at Rome, below his Palace on Mount Cœlius, having before cauſed to be built a more ſtately one at the Confeſſion of St. Peter, where he himſelf firſt opened the Ground, and in memory of the Twelve Apoſtles, bore upon his ſhoulders ſo many Burthens of Earth; as Veſpaſian had formerly done, at the re-edifying of the Capitol. Many, beſides theſe, were raiſed in Italy, Gall, and other Parts, ſo Manificently built, ſplendidly furniſhed, and plentifully endowed, that Pagan Hiſtorians hence accuſe him of immenſe Profuſeneſs, and extravagant Building of unprofitable Places.

Builds another Church at our Saviour's Sepulchre.

With ſeveral others in divers places.

(a) L. 3. c. p. 28. &c.

(b) C. p. 40. 42.

(c) C. 49.

(d) C. 50.

(e) C. 56.

(f) Acta Sylveſtri apud Baronum ad A. D. 324.

His Abſtinence in not meddling with the Wealth of the Idol Temples near Rome.

42. Yet notwithſtanding theſe vaſt Expences, ſuch was the Abſtinence both of him and ſeveral his Succeſſors, that having the Wealth of the Idol-Temples in their Power, though ſuch a thing might have been done upon a Religious account, and to make amends for all the Injuries and Loſſes the Chriſtians had ſuſtained from the Pagans, for above three hundred Years, they abſtained from it at Rome; although in the laſt, where the Influence of the Senate was not ſo great, ſometimes Conſtantine, as he juſtly might make bold with it, as the Author (a) of his Life writes concerning Golden Images which he cauſed to be melted, and reſerved the Mettal to his own uſe. Such alſo was his Modeſty, that

(a) L. 3. c. 52.

His Modeſty in refuſing his Name to be engraven on any of the new Buildings.

that although he had Erected ſo many Monuments of his Glory, yet upon none of them was his Name ingraved, contemning that which moſt of his Predeceſſors had ſo earneſtly thirſted after, of whom Trajan, though accounted the beſt, cauſed his Name to be affixed to all his publick Works, ſo that Conſtantine facetiouſly and wittily called him herba parietina, as Aurelius Victor tells us.

He encourages and provides for thoſe that turn Chriſtians.

And exhorts all men to embrace the Faith of Chriſt.

43. Such was Conſtantine's Care and Coſt for the publick Worſhip. For the encouragement of private Perſons, we read, (a) that (beſides what we have formerly mentioned) he Ordained, that ſuch Sons or Slaves that were born in Superſtition, ſhould not be forced to keep to it againſt their minds: that Maintenance out of the Exchequer was plentifully allotted to ſuch as turned Chriſtians: in the firſt place a white Garment for Baptiſm, and twenty Solidi were allowed, provided (you muſt know) that they brought for their admittance, a Ticket from the Biſhop of Rome. (b) Nicephorus writes, that in one year at Rome, were Baptized above twelve Men, beſides Women and Children. In the former Treatiſe is found, that Conſtantine at the ſame time in the Vlpian Palace, made an Oration to the Roman Senate and People, 'Concerning the Faith of Chriſt to be imbraced by all, leaving yet a free choice to ' every one, what Religion they would cleave to; but declaring, that they ' were more acceptable that turned Chriſtians. To the ſame purpoſe he publiſhed an Edict, which we have exemplified in his (c) Life, directed as well to the Princes of the Eaſt, as thoſe of the Weſt, wherein he aſſerts the truth of divers Arguments firſt, and then invites all to imbrace it, declaring that none ſhould be forced, but received if coming on their own accord, and permitting others to frequent the Temples of their Idols, and uſe their Rites. From which it appears that ſuch are miſtaken, who ſuppoſe that all Temples were ſhut up, and their Ceremonies baniſhed utterly, eſpecially in Italy, and thoſe places where the Roman Senate had the moſt Influence. Yet did he forbid ſuch Magiſtrates, publickly to Sacrifice to Idols, as were choſen from amongſt the Pagans; by a Law prohibited Divinations, and Commanded, as we have ſaid, Churches to be built, as he had given example at Rome, larger than ever.

(a) Acta Sylveſtri ubi ſuprà.

(b) L.7.c.34.

(c) L.2.c.47. &c.

He gives Food to the Inhabitants of Conſtantinople.

44. We muſt alſo account the Munificence of Conſtantine, which he ſhewed towards his new Citizens of Conſtantinople; not only an incouragement to ſuch as ſhould inhabit that City, but alſo to the Profeſſion of Religion, if we conſider the reaſon alledged by Zozimus for the founding of it, and the great care the Emperour took to have it clear from Idolatry, making it a Chriſtian Colony, and the firſt Chriſtian City (univerſally ſuch) throughout the Empire. Firſt of all he beſtowed Bread (a) on ſuch as had Houſes at Conſtantinople, which Loaves were called (b) Palatine. Others (c) he aſſigned to Souldiers that alſo had Adorned the City with Buildings. And other Loaves (d) that year wherein he was Conſul, he cauſed every day to be diſtributed to the common ſort, to which he added Wine, Fleſh, and Oil, as Suidas (e) tells us, which was obſerved for many years. (f) One ſays he dayly beſtowed on the Poor eighty thouſand Loaves, (g) another eighty thouſand Modii of Wheat. This Bread was courſe, weighing two Ounces and an half. But Valentinian gave it pure weighing ſix Ounces, and the allowance was increaſed afterward, both by (h) Theodoſius the Great, and (i) Marcian. For the diſtributing of it, Scaffolds were erected in many places, to which the Poor aſcended by Steps. For one only place being not capable of ſuch a vaſt Multitude, one hundred and ſeventeen Marble Stairs or Steps throughout the fourteen Regions of Conſtantinople were made, as we find in the Ancient Deſcription or Survey of that City placed before the Notitia, whence this Bread was termed gradilis, it being unlawful for any to receive it, but on the Stairs according to aſſignment.

(a) C. Th. de annon. Civit. l. 8. & 9.

(b) C. eodem l. 12. & 13.

(c) C. eodem l. 1. & 10.

(d) De anno Civit.

(e) In voce παλατῖνοι.

(f) Metaphraſtes in Paulo Patriarcha Conſtan*tinop.*

(g) Socrates.

(h) C.*Th.l.*5.

(i) C. Th. l. penult.

45. For to every Tribe certain Stairs were aſſigned, which it was unlawful to change; the Officials of the Præfectus Annonæ, to whom (a) the caſe of this diſtribution was committed, ſtrictly looking into it. Theſe Loaves are called Civiles, becauſe they were beſtowed on Cives or Citizens in diſtinction, from the Palatine, and others that were given to certain Schools or Academies of War: this Annona or Proviſion was alſo called (b) Popularis and Civica. The ſame ſort of Liberality, but not in ſuch a meaſure, had Trajan ſhown at Rome, allowing Food to (c) twelve thouſand Boys and Girls, of which Aurelian increaſed the number, as Vopiſcus ſaith; whereupon in moſt of the Coins of Trajan and Hadrian, theſe Stairs are ſeen, by which the People aſcended to receive Bread, on the top whereof is ſeen a Scribe, and another with a Badge of

(a) C.*Th.l.*2.

(b) De annon. C*ivit.* l. 2.

(c) Plin. in Panigyrico.

of diſtinction, who diſtributed the Loaves. At firſt this Allowance could neither be alienated, nor transferred from one to another; but afterwards being alienated, Theodoſius confirmed the Contracts, and permitted it to be removed from one to another, ſo that afterward they might both be alienated otherwiſe, and given in Dowry.

He provides for the Interment of the Dead.

Novell. 59. & 43.

46. Yet his care extended not only to the Living, he thought it a Point of Chriſtian Prudence and Piety to provide for the decent Interment of the Dead; and therefore Inſtituted a company of Men, who were to take care of it gratis, being called Lectuarii, for carrying the Dead out on Beds, and Decani, perhaps becauſe they were divided into Decads or Tens. For the maintenance of this Company, he gave to the greater Church of Conſtantinople Nine hundred and fifty Shops, to which Anaſtaſius afterward added One hundred and fifty, with certain other Revenues. The Prefect of the City had the inſpection over them, whom Juſtinian ordered to reſtore ſome of them to the Church which had been uſurped by private Men, and appoint to the Defenders of the Church (Defenſores) Eight hundred, to the Oeconomi or Stewards Three hundred, who out of their Revenues ſhould monthly allow Four hundred Aurei to Religious Perſons, viz. to the Decani One hundred eighty two, thoſe called Aſcetrii or Eight Moniales, who ſung after the Beire Ninety one, to Acclythi that carried Lights Ninety one, to Canonical Women that ſerved the Hoſpital and Sung, Thirty ſix; which Sum yearly amounted to Four thouſand eight hundred Aurei. Such as would be at a greater Expence, both for Beds (or Biers) and more Aſcetria too, were to pay what is ſpecified in the Novel of Juſtinian, which will have an Aſcetrium to conſiſt of Eight Moniales and Three Acclythi. But the Lectuarii bore the Body, made the Grave, and did other things belonging to this Office, whereupon they were called κοπιαταὶ or Labourers, being put in their places by the Præfect of the City. At Conſtantinople, it is not certain where their Reſidence or Habitation was, though it be probable that they lived together, that ſo they might the more eaſily be found out, as at Rome, where they lived in one place (in the Fourteenth Region of the City) called Caſtra Lectuariorum. As for their number, it doth not appear.

His further kindneſs to Chriſtians and its Religion.

47. Thus much did Conſtantine really do for a Reformation, firſt removing Penal Statutes againſt Chriſtians, then incouraging them by Reſtitution of their own, afterward by diſcountenancing Idolatry, as much as the neceſſity of times would permit, and by his Liberality towards Profeſſors of the true Religion. The Paſtors or Biſhops thereof, he imbraced with ſingular kindneſs, and a tender Fatherly care, not ſowing amongſt them Diſcord, but compoſing their Differences, not by owning a Monarchy in a Monarchy, or making one Lord of the reſt, and of all Gods Inheritance; by giving him incouragement in earthly Dominion, or affording fewel to that flame of Ambition, which ſhould at length prey upon the whole Chriſtian World. Yet ſome Men have proceeded to that Vanity, as having firſt fancied to themſelves a Spiritual Monarchy by Divine Right, in the next place, to impoſe a neceſſity upon the ſame Providence, for the maintenance of it in a Secular way, and Conſtantine, the firſt Reformer, Incourager and Indower, muſt have the Honour, not only to provide for the Body due maintenance, but a Crown alſo for the Pride and Haughtineſs of a Suppoſititious and Prodigious Head. The good Man dreamed of nothing leſs. He knew no Head of the Church but him in Heaven, and though priority of place he might account reaſonable to him who governed the Church in the Metropolis of the Empire, yet he perfectly underſtood the quality and limits of his Power, not judging his own concernments in Religious Matters, leſs than thoſe of the Kings of Iſrael in old time, nor imagining that our Saviour, who ſaid his Kingdom was not of this World, had deſigned the leſſening of Temporal Power, or ſubduing it wholly to a Spiritual Empire.

48. Yet is he made a great and voluntary Agent in ſuch a prodigious Deſign, and as a Teſtimony thereof, a Conſtitution of his is produced, whereby a vaſt Temporal Dominion is beſtowed on Sylveſter Biſhop of Rome and his Succeſſors. Great difference there is amongſt the Aſſertors of the Spiritual Empire, concerning the Authority of the Edict, and even the verity of the Donation, the reputation of it being almoſt extinct, till a little revived of late times by one Marta a Doctor of Naples, who is ſo confident of the certainty and truth thereof, that he ſaith, Non eſſe ulterius dubitandum, None ought hereafter to doubt, but that it was really made by Conſtantine. But that which gives greateſt countenance to the Edict, is the Decretal Epiſtle of Pope Leo the Ninth, who verbatim almoſt, repeats it whole ſo far as concerns the Donation.

A forged Edict of Conſtantine's, to Silveſter Biſhop of Rome.

Epiſt. I. Leon. 9. c. 12, 13, 14.

49. "As namely how Conſtantine wrote in his Edict, that he would exalt "the moſt Holy See of Peter more than his own Empire or earthly Throne, "giving unto that See, Poteſtatem dignitatem & honorificentiam Imperialem, "Imperial Power, Dignity, Vigor and Honour, (whereby the Pope, of a "Biſhop, is made an Emperour, and above the Secular Emperour himſelf.) "How he Decreed, that the Roman See Principatum teneat, ſhould be Chief "of other Churches, and have Principality above the See of Alexandria, "Antioch, Jeruſalem and Conſtantinople, and of all other Churches in the whole "World, (whereby the Spiritual Principality above other Patriarchs and Biſhops "is conferred on the Pope.) How he gave to Sylveſter and his Succeſſors "for ever, his Lateran Palace, which is preferred above all Palaces in the "World, his Diadem and Crown, his Mandilion, his Cloak, his Coat, & "omnia Imperialia indumenta, all Imperial Robes which he himſelf wore, his "Imperial Guard, his Imperial Scepter, & omnem proceſſionem Imperialis culminis, & gloriam poteſtatis noſtræ, and all the reſidue of his Imperial Dignity, "Honour and Power. There is his Eſtate ſuch, and ſo Pompous, that Conſtantine himſelf, (as the Charter ſaith) held the Pope's Bridle, and performed "officio Stratoris, the Office of a Groom of the Stable, or Yeoman of the "Stirrup unto the Pope. Here to the end that the Pontifical Height ſhould "not ſeem vile, but be Adorned more than the Dignity and Power of the "earthly Empire; he gave unto Sylveſter and his Succeſſors for ever, both "the City of Rome, and all the Provinces, Places and Cities of Italy, and the "Weſtern Countries, Decreeing all theſe his Grants to be kept inviolable "and unchangeable, uſque in finem mundi, even to the end of the World. Here's the Popes Revenues, and the Rich Patrimony of St. Peter.

50. Thus much and far more doth Pope Leo verbatim recite, out of the Edict or Charter of Conſtantine, all which he ſaith, he ſets down, leſt any ſcruple of doubt ſhould remain, touching the Popes earthly Dominion, Neve leviter ſuſcepiſcemini ineptis & anilibus fabulis ſanctam Romanam ſedem velle ſibi inconceſſum honorem vendicare & defenſare aliqua tenus; Leſt any ſhould ſo much as but lightly ſuſpect, that the Roman See would challenge, or any way defend their Honour, by fooliſh and uncertain Fables. Yea, he adds of this Edict, and that which he cites out of it, that he therefore relates it that hereby, Veritas fundetur & confundatur Vanitas; That Truth may be confirmed, and Vanity confounded, and that all Catholicks may know, nos, himſelf and other Popes, to be the Diſciples of that Peter, who ſaith of himſelf, We have not followed Vnlearned, or ſophiſticated or falſely deviſed Fables. And yet more to Commend this Edict, he adjoyns; "Know ye that we do inculcate unto you theſe "things which we have not ſo much recovered, Relatu quolibet, by any Re-"lation or Hearſay, quam quæ ipſo viſu & tactu comperta ſunt; as which we have "found out by our own ſight and feeling. Thus writes Pope Leo for the Certainty, Truth and Credit of this Charter of Donation, ſo Pontifically and Aſſuredly, as one ſaith, as if he had ſeen Conſtantine ſet his Seal unto the ſame, or lay it with his own hand upon the Body of St. Peter, as the ſame Leo ſaith he did.

Dr. Crackanthorp in his Defence of Conſtantine. p. 127.

Which is plainly proved to be ſuch upon theſe accounts.

51. This Charter carries in its own Face ſuch manifeſt Tokens of Forgery, that the recital may well enough ſeem a ſufficient Confutation of it, and to ſuch as are converſant in Hiſtories, and not ignorant of the State of Rome, and all the Weſtern Provinces long after Conſtantine's time, and how they were governed, it cannot but ſeem exceedingly Ridiculous. But farther obſerve, that the very Ground and Occaſion why Conſtantine is ſaid to have made this Charter, is falſe and forged, viz. the ſuppoſed Leproſie, Perſecution and Baptiſm of Conſtantine by Sylveſter, as we ſhall ſee in due time and place. Secondly, who can abſtain from ſmiling, to find the See of Conſtantinople mentioned in this Edict, as one of the Patriarchal Sees, whereas neither had it Patriarchal Dignity, before the ſecond General Council, (that is more than fifty Years after the Donation is ſuppoſed to be made) nor was there at that time ſo much as the name of Conſtantinople; for the City was then called Byzantium, and ſeveral Years after, not changing its name till after the Nicene Council, as Baronius acknowledgeth. But this Donation of Conſtantine being made a little after his ſuppoſed Baptiſm by Sylveſter (the fourth day, as the Acts of that Pope declare) fell into the Twenty ninth year of his Reign, and that preceding the Nicene Council.

One would therefore think that there was ſome Fraud uſed in the inſerting of this name, but that there is an uniform Conſent in all the Forms and Copies of the Charter, both Greek and Latin, kept ſafely in their Vatican, as they affirm, and ratified by the Decretal Epiſtle of Pope Leo for true and Authentical; ſo that there can be no ſuſpition of Corruption in thoſe words of the Edict. The Errour and Corruption was in the Author alone, who forged ſuch a groſs and uncreditable Untruth.

52. But Thirdly, had Conſtantine given Principality to the Roman See above all Churches in the World, as the Charter ſaith he did, what Folly was it in John Biſhop of Conſtantinople, Cyriacus and others, to ſtrive for that Preheminence? Why did not Boniface the Third ſhew this Charter made by Conſtantine? Why did he uſe ſo much intreaty and means to Phocas a Murtherer (as Platina ſaith he did) that the Church of Rome might be called Firſt of all Churches? When the ſame was long before almoſt three hundred years, granted by a fair Charter to the Roman See, by ſo worthy and renowned an Emperour. Fourthly, In this Edict Conſtantine is made ſolemnly to give to Pope Sylveſter the Lateran Palace which Sigonius, Baronius and Binnius (all) will have beſtowed long before on Pope Miltiades his Predeceſſor, in the Seventh year of Conſtantine, viz. twelve years before he was either Baptized, or made this Charter of Donation. Fifthly, In this Edict Conſtantine is made to ſay, that he will have all People in the World to know, that he had builded unto Chriſt within his Palace of Lateran, a Church from the very Foundation, together with a Font; yet was the Edict made, as they themſelves profeſs, in the fourth day after Conſtantine was Baptized, and how then was it poſſible that ſuch a Stately Fabrick ſhould be raiſed in four days? Eſpecially conſidering that the Acts of Sylveſter having declared what Conſtantine did all the ſeven days he was in Albis after his Baptiſm, ſay, that he laid the Foundation of this Church on the eighth day. Whether then could that Church be builded on the fourth day, whoſe Foundation was but begun and the Earth firſt digged on the eighth day after his Baptiſm?

53. Further, Sixthly, This Edict, as by the words of it are evident, followed the Leproſie of Conſtantine ſuppoſed, and his Baptiſm, and therefore could not be made before the ninth year of his Reign, wherein both theſe, Baronius and Binnius account to have happened. Yet is it dated in the fourth Conſulſhip of Conſtantine, which he exerciſed with Gallicanus, whereas his fourth Conſulſhip was in the Tenth year of his Reign, by which account he ſhould have made this Edict and Donation eight or nine years before the occaſion and cauſe thereof was preſented; beſides (ſee the Stupidity of the Forger) not Gallicanus, but Licinius the fourth time was Conſul with Conſtantine in his fourth Conſulſhip, as appeareth both by the Faſti and many Imperial Conſtitutions of this Year. And indeed foraſmuch as Gallicanus was never Conſul with Conſtantine, as by the Faſti is evident, this Edict ſuppoſed to be made in their Royal Conſulſhip was never made.

From the Teſtimony of Cardinal Baronius.

54. To theſe reaſons may be added the Teſtimony of their Cardinal Baronius, with whom agreeth Gretzer, who hath written an Apology for him in this very Point. He (a) proves it a meer Figment and Forgery, becauſe firſt the antient Popes ſince Conſtantine's time, though having many occaſions to diſpute againſt Princes touching the Rights and Prerogatives of the Church, yet none of them before the thouſandth year after Chriſt, is read to have defended the ſame by Authority of this Edict, and yet they knew and make mention of Sylveſter's Acts. 2. It is certain that the Emperours make no mention of that Edict of Conſtantine's Donation, and yet in the Charter of Henry the Firſt, there is mention made of all the former Emperours who had made ſuch ample Donations to the Roman See. 3. This Edict was not in the Ancient Acts of Sylveſter, but was by Forgery inſerted into them after the thouſandth year of Chriſt, being feigned by ſome Græcian under the Name of Euſebius, and publiſhed by Theodorus Balſamon, whereas till then no Græcian had ſet it forth: and from the Græcians it came to the Latins and Weſtern Church: Leo the Ninth being the firſt Pope that makes mention of it. Thus by the Cardinals acknowledgment, we may ſee what Truth there is in Popes, eſpecially in Leo, who in his Decretal Epiſtle moſt ſolemnly commends this Edict for an Ancient and undoubted Evidence, ſuch as he knew by ſight and ſence to be the true Deed of Conſtantine, which yet the Cardinal, after long ſifting of Monuments and Records, teſtifieth to be a Forgery, and that of the Græcians firſt of all deviſed, as he ſaith, about Seven hundred, and publiſhed Eight hundred years after the Death of Conſtantine. Stenchus (b) againſt this

(a) Baron. ad An. 1191. Num. 52. &c.

(b) De Don. Conſtant.

Date aſſerteth it for marvelous Impudence in any to deny that this Donation or Edict is ſet down in thoſe Acts of Sylveſter, whereof Gelaſius ſpeaketh, ſaying, I can produce all Libraries for witneſs hereof, all which have, together with the Hiſtory of Sylveſter's Baptizing Conſtantine, this Donation Priviledge or Edict.

And Stenchus the Vatican Library-keeper.

55. This Stenchus, who was alſo Library-keeper to the Pope, convinceth as an eye Witneſs his Fellow Baronius of Impudence and Untruth, for denying this Donation to be mentioned in theſe Acts of Sylveſter, of which Gelaſius ſpeaks, and for ſlandering the Greeks as deviſers of it about the Year 1000, which to have been in their Vatican before that in the time of Gelaſius, he for a certainty aſſures us. Hence a Learned Man deſervedly breaks forth into this Exclamation: How may we truſt any Vatican Library-keeper, if Stenchus, an Eye-witneſs, be not to be truſted in this Caſe? And if we credit him, who ever hereafter will truſt his Fellow Baronius, who thus notoriouſly downſaceth the Truth? However one may rightly affirm that both of them do in part ſay truth, and both of them in part do err. That this Edict of Donation is a very Figment, Baronius rightly avoucheth, but Stenchus and the reſt holding the contrary with him, ſpeak far amiſs. Again, that this Edict was of Ancient time in the Popes Library, and in thoſe Acts of Sylveſter, which Gelaſius mentioneth, in this Stenchus deſerveth to be credited. But Baronius, in ſaying it was not extant till the 1000 year after Chriſt, nor publiſhed till Balſamon's time, in thoſe the Cardinal ſaith far amiſs. So with Stenchus we profeſs, and have proved alſo the ſame Edict to be nothing elſe but a Forgery and Figment. What they ſay amiſs we reject in either: what they rightly affirm, we accept of either, and upon the true Confeſſion of Baronius, we conclude it to be a Forgery. And upon both theſe Truths, which they ſeverally profeſs, we rightly and ſafely conclude it to be an Ancient Forgery.

Dr Crackanth. quo ſupra.

Another Popiſh Argument for the Donation

56. But though the Edict or inſtrument of the Donation be forged or falſified, yet the Donation it ſelf may be good, ſaith (a) Gretzer, who for ſuch Labours to defend it, telling us that the Popes have other undoubted Charters for their Temporal Dominions, (which Cardinal (b) Albanus flatly denies) though their Rights juſtly rely alſo upon the Donation of Conſtantine. His ſtrange reaſoning lyes in perhaps, an acute Logician, ſaith he, will ſay, That perhaps the Donation was made by witneſſes only without any Inſtrument. But though a frivolous caviling Sophiſter may, yet no ſober Man will ſay ſo. Where are theſe Witneſſes, or who ever heard of them? Why may not the Biſhop of Conſtantinople plead the like Donation by word of Mouth, of Rome and Italy from Conſtantine to him and his Succeſſors for ever; and ſay it is proved by Witneſſes, that now are dead without any Deed or Inſtrument to teſtifie the ſame? And how can an acute Logician effectually overthrow the one and defend the other Donation? But to ſilence the Jeſuits acute Logician, three ſeveral Popes, viz. Adrian, Leo the Ninth, and Nicholas the Third, are Witneſſes that the Donation of Conſtantine was made by a Charter and Inſtrument, whereof the firſt ſaith of that Conſtitution, and others that they were kept in Lateranenſi Scrinio, in the Lateran Regiſtry; and this was about the Year 790. The ſecond tells us he ſaw and handled the very Charter of Conſtantine's Donation, which was about the Year 1050. And the third ſaith that Conſtantine left unto Sylveſter the City of Rome, and declared Per Pragmaticum Conſtitutum, by a Pragmatical Conſtitution or Writ of Record, that he and his Succeſſors ſhould have the diſpoſing or Government thereof; which was about the Year 1280. To theſe might be added the Teſtimonies of Cardinal Albanus and ſeveral others, of whom ſome profeſs they were Eye-witneſſes of that (forged) Conſtitution.

Drawn from perhaps.

(a) Append. ad lib. de munific. Princip.
(b) Lib. de Don. Conſtant.

57. Gretzer his acute Logician will farther ſay. It may be that the Inſtrument or Charter is either periſhed or corrupted by long Continuance. A Saying every whit as worthy and rational as the former. So may alſo another, and as good a Logician ſay of the Donation of Rome and Italy made by Conſtantine to the Biſhops of Conſtantinople. And whether is Stenchus, with all Libraries, Pope Gelaſius, and Leo the Ninth, ſo aſſuredly teſtifying the forged Charter not to be loſt or periſhed: or Gretzer's Logician, coming in with another perhaps more to be credited in this Cauſe? After theſe ſo furious Aſſaults of Logick, he leads on his great and prevalent Arguments, which he is forced to call Probabilities or Conjectures. One of the beſt is taken out of Baronius, who ſaith. It is not for nothing that the French Kings in their Writs of Donation do profeſs that they reſtore to the Roman Church the Dominions which they took from the Lombards.

And from Probabilities and Conjectures.

But the Inference thence made, is neither neceſſary nor probable. They might be reſtored, though the Popes had got them by Invaſion, wrongful Intruſion, Fraud, Robbery, Rebellion or Treaſon, as the Popes got them in very Deed, from the Eaſtern Emperour, not poſſeſſing them by Right or by any Donation, much leſs that of Conſtantine, as is clear from Sigonius an Hiſtorian of their own, and we ſhall particularly diſcover in due time and place. His other Conjecture is, Seeing it is moſt certain that before Pipin's time, yea before Aripert's (that is before the 704. year of our Lord) the Popes had divers Provinces ſubject to their Dominion, and there appears no Evidence for any other Title, whereby they ſhould have and hold thoſe Lands, it followeth that the right to have them is not unprobably derived from the Donation of Conſtantine.

58. His Proof is only of the Patrimony of the Cottian Alps, and his Concluſion is of many Provinces, whereas that Patrimony was ſo far from (a) containing many or any one Province, that it was but certain Villages or Farm-houſes in the Northweſt Part of the Alps; and what is this to the Donation pretended from Conſtantine? A few Cottages or Farm-houſes, as he himſelf calls them, to Rome, to all Italy, to all the Weſtern Provinces and Kingdoms. And were there not many other means how the Pope might get them beſides Conſtantine's Donation? Beſides it is clear from Sigonius, that Aripert and Litprandus gave of their own to the Roman See, as well as reſtored thoſe Farms, and how could they give what was its Right before? And farther, what is this Patrimony which their own Writers confeſs to have owned ſubjection to the Emperour by Tribute, to an Imperial Monarchical Supream and Independent Dominion in all Italy and the Weſtern Provinces? Theſe Arguments are too frivolous to be inſiſted on: we ſhall come to thoſe of our own againſt this Donation, which carry with them much more weight, and will, to any indifferent Perſon, put the queſtion out of all Diſpute. The firſt is drawn from the Teſtament of Conſtantine, wherein he is ſaid to have divided the whole Empire amongſt his Sons. To be ſure whether it was divided before or after his Death, the Weſtern Part fell to Conſtantine and Conſtans, the Eaſtern to Conſtantius, even by conſent of the Pope's greateſt Diſciples Sigonius and (c) Baronius. Then is it at all to be believed, that if Conſtantine had formerly made, either by Word or Writing, an abſolute Donation of Rome, Italy, and the Weſtern Provinces to the Pope (and that ſo Solemnly, that as Leo the Ninth ſaith, he Decreed that Donation to abide firm and inviolable unto the end of the World) ſo Pious and Prudent an Emperour would within twelve Years after do contrary to his own Act? Eſpecially in his laſt Will and Teſtament, wherein he would rather have teſtified his Religious Affection and Love to the Church, by an Addition of ſome other Gift, than leave ſo eternal a Blemiſh upon his Name, of Inconſtancy, Injuſtice, Impiety, Sacrilege, and making his own Children Inheritors of what he knew was neither his to give, nor which they, without open Injuſtice (if he had right to give it) Impiety and Sacrilege might accept, hold or Poſſeſs.

(a) Sigonius de Regn. Ital. lib. 1.

Which are ſilly, and as ſuch proved by three convincing Arguments.

(b) De occident. Imp. l. 5.
(c) Ad Ann. 337.

59. A ſecond reaſon is, the perpetual Poſſeſſion and Dominion which the Emperours had of Rome and Italy, with the Government thereof, which continued ſtill in them, not only after Conſtantine's time, but even whilſt he lived, till it was unjuſtly firſt taken from them by the Popes, and then confirmed by Pipin, Charles the Great and others. In the very next Year after this ſuppoſed Donation, was (a) Severus Præfect of Rome appointed by Conſtantine to govern it, with the Cities belonging thereunto, by Imperial Authority as it formerly had been: The next year after was (b) Maximus, the two following (c) Ancius Julianus and Optalianus, and throughout all Conſtantine's time, every Year he had his Lieutenants to Govern the City of Rome for him and in his Right. It were eaſie to expreſs almoſt in each Year the ſeveral Præfecti urbis under Conſtans, Conſtantius, Valentinian, Theodoſius and other Emperours, for more than One hundred Years after Conſtantine, and ſeveral have according to occaſion been mentioned. After the time of Valentinian the Younger, when the Weſtern Empire, through the Corruption of Barbarous Nations, began to decay, that the Supream Government of Rome and Italy ſtill remained in the Emperour his appointing Kings of Italy, after them Dukes of Rome, and Exarchs of Ravenna is a ſufficient proof, and this is evident, not only from other Authors, but Sigonius (d) the Popes own Servant. Now can it be imagined that all theſe Emperours would ſo injuriouſly intrude into St. Peter's Patrimony? Can any one imagine that the Popes, Men of high Courage to defend their Right, would have put up ſo great Wrong, without ſo much as once checking

(a) C.Th.l 2. de judiciis.
(b) C.*Th.l.*2. ad legem com. de falſo.
(c) Onuph. in Faſtos. l. 2.
(d) L. 14, 15, &c.

checking the Emperour for ſo open Injuſtice, Sacrilege, and Uſurpation? May not the ſilence of ſo many Popes, and continued Poſſeſſion by ſo many Emperours, be thought a juſt reaſon to condemn that pretended Donation?

60. But the third Proof, that Conſtantine made no ſuch Donation, is the Teſtimony of their own Writers, who ſeeing that neither Euſebius, Rufinus, Theodoret, Socrates, Sozomen, Eutropius, Victor, St. Jerome, St. Auguſtin, St. Baſil, St. Chryſoſtome, nor Ammianus, the Tripertite Hiſtory, Damaſcen, Bede, nor Oroſius, nor any who have moſt diligently written the Acts of Conſtantine (being Authors of good Credit) not only do make no mention of this Donation, but further declare that he ſo divided the Roman Empire amongſt his Three Sons, that all Italy was alotted to one of them. And own it as a Fable concerning the Teſtimonies of whom, as alſo the Arguments offered by Marta and others in vain, to confirm the Fictitious Donation, amongſt many others who have written abundantly to ſatisfaction in this Argument, Dr.* Crackanthorp a moſt Learned Church Antiquary is eſpecially to be conſulted, we having rather by ſaying ſo much, tranſcended the Nature of our Deſign.

61. Conſtantine, though not guilty of ſuch a Crime, as to found or eſtabliſh a Spiritual Tyranny, yet ſufficiently provided for the Patrimony of the Church, firſt by (a) reſtoring, as we formerly ſaid, its Ancient Poſſeſſions, of which it had been robbed in times of Perſecution, the Oblations and Treaſures of the Church being before his time ſo very great, that the Biſhops of Rome might eaſily purchaſe much more than that one Patrimony in the Cottian Alps, containing a few Farms or Villages. He became a very great Benefactor by that Law mentioned by the (b) Author of his Life, by Virtue whereof; If none of the Kindred of Martyrs Confeſſors and Exiles were alive, who might ſucceed them as Heirs, it was Enacted, that every where, and for ever, the Church ſhould have and enjoy their Poſſeſſions. Theſe Incouragements his own Example and the Religious Inclination of Chriſtians, always affectionate in their firſt Converſion, were ſufficient Foundations for ample Structures. Many private Men gave not only Goods, but Lands and fair Poſſeſſions both to other Churches and that of Rome. Proſper (c) writes, that the Church of Arles was inriched with the Poſſeſſions that many beſtowed on it. So many and ſo ample Donations of Lands were made to the Church in St. Auſtin's time, that both Aurelius (d) his Predeceſſor, and (e) himſelf alſo ſometime, refuſed Lands that were offered to be given, ſometimes reſtored them, and that unasked, after they were given. The like Donations might be ſhewed in other Churches, eſpecially in the Roman, to which they were ſo uſually made, that Chriſtian Emperours (as Valentinian, Gratian and Theodoſius) by their (f) Edicts did reſtrain them; and the like Laws were made in Spain and France in after-times, which were imitated by the Famous Statute of Mortmain, Enacted here in England Novemb. 4. in the Seventh Year of Edward the Firſt. But thus much of the Reformation of Religion by Conſtantine, carried on as the Times and Affairs would comport, the Progreſs and Perfection of it we ſhall diſcover in due time and order.

Such large Gifts to the Church, that enforceth a Statute of Mortmain.

* In his Defence of Conſtantine and his Treatiſe of the Popes Temporal Dominion

(a) Euſeb. Eccl. Hiſt. l. 10. c. 5. & vita Conſtant. lib. 2. c. 39.

(c) L. 2. c. 36.

(c) De vita Contemp. l. 2. c. 9.

(d) Serm. 49. de diverſ.

(e) Poſſidonius in vita Aug. c. 24.

(f) C. Th. l. 20. de Epiſt. Eccl. & clericis.

Chap. II.

The Church Polity.

Order and Government abſolutely neceſſary.

1. THat Government and Order are neceſſary for the well being of Mankind, however diſtinguiſhed into Parties and Societies, is too evident to be diſputed; the Effects of them, and of their Contraries, are ſo convincing, that they equal the Cauſes of the moſt clear Demonſtrations. Such is the Depravity of Mens Minds and Inclinations, ſo violent their Tendency to all Miſchief, that they can no more ſubſiſt without Government, that live without Diſorders (if left to themſelves) and mutual Injuries. Therefore hath the wiſe Creator and Diſpoſer of all things, that he might regulate our Inconſtancy, and bridle the Extravagance of our wild and violent Affections, ordained his Deputies in the World, with a Rule for Direction, and a Rod for the Corruption of Manners, with that to lead, and this to drive us on in the right way, leſt the diſturbance of Order ſhould bring Confuſion, and Confuſion certain Ruine and Deſtruction.

2. Such being Gods Ordinance and Conſtitution in Civil Society and external Commerce, can it be ſuppoſed that equal Care ſhould be wanting for the Government of his Church, which is the Houſe of God, the City of the living God, the Kingdom of his moſt dear Son. He that takes ſuch Care for Kingdoms of the World, would he not make as good Proviſion for ſuch as he hath taken out of the World? If Diſorder, Confuſion and Anarchy be a thing to be dreaded in the State, is it not as much to be feared in the Church? God is no where the Father of Confuſion, but of Order and Peace, how much more than in that Spiritual Community? Where he Commands that all things be done Decently and in Order? But what Order can there be, where there is no Governour, where there is none that obeys, where every one may do what is lawful in his own Eyes? Therefore hath he appointed Stewards over his Family, Leaders over his Flock, Labourers over his Harveſt, Husbandmen over his Field, in ſum, Diverſities of Adminiſtrations both for the Building and Preſerving of his Church, which is the Body of Chriſt. In it hath he placed, as in the Humane Body, ſeveral Principal Members in Subjection and Subordination to himſelf the Head, which being as Eyes, Ears, Mouth and Hands, the Body might not ſeem Deformed and Maimed, nor be unable, for want of Help and Conduct, to look to it ſelf, or provide for its own Health and Security. But we muſt not ſuppoſe that Diſcipline is neceſſary in the Church meerly for to contain the People in Obedience, for regulating the Flock, and not for the Government of the Paſtors. This were to ſecure the Feet, and neglect the upper and moſt Principal Parts, which by how much they are more Excellent, the Diſeaſes of them are more Dangerous? The Houſe cannot ſtand, if the Builders themſelves pull it down, the Harveſt muſt be loſt, if the Labourers Scatter, and Gather not. If the Salt have loſt its Savour, wherewith ſhall it be Seaſoned? If the Light of the day be Darkneſs, how great is the Darkneſs of the Body? If the Leaders themſelves go Aſtray, the Souldiers muſt needs go aſide and Wander.

For Regulating the Paſtors as well as the Flock.

3. Yet in a thing of ſuch Conſequence, and wherein no leſs than the Welfare of the Body of Chriſt himſelf is concerned, a Polity and Government is not to be Framed according to the Pleaſure of Man, neither is his Fancy to be the Standard where Decency and Order are the utmoſt Bounds. An indeavour is to be uſed ever, that the ſame Adminiſtration of External Diſcipline be uſed in the Church, which our Lord himſelf hath taught, and from the Beginning of the World approved. Now that Polity which God appointed at the Beginning for the External Government of his People (the Internal by his Spirit in the Hearts of the Faithful we own and meddle not with) conſiſted in the Authority and Power given to Fathers over their Families. For he would that the Fathers ſhould be both Inſtructors and Governours to their Children, Nephews, and all under their Power, commanding their whole Off-ſpring to pay them Honour, Obedience and Obſervance, to acknowledge the Will of God revealed to their Fathers, and obey their Admonitions and Inſtructions in his Worſhip. A moſt certain Paternal Government firſt appointed by God himſelf.

Conſule Bilſonum Epiſcop. Vintonenſem lib. de perpetua Eccleſiæ Chriſti Gubernatione cap. 1. &c.

certain Reward of this Obedience, was the Bleſſing of God pronounced by the Mouths of Parents, who alſo foretold the Curſe of God againſt Diſobedient and Rebellious Children. The Patriarchs of old were Prieſts and Prophets for their Progeny, and Magiſtrates alſo for the Government and Reſtrainment of them, it being the Will of God in thoſe times to have his People ruled only by Paternal Power. Hence in the Decalogue Moſes comprehends Princes per Magiſtrates in the name of Parents, and in the Old Teſtament almoſt every where Princes and Goverours are ſtiled Fathers, the Holy Ghoſt ſignifying that Princes ought to imbrace and tender their Subjects with the ſame Love and Care that Parents bear to their own Children, for as much as by Divine Inſtitution all the Power of Princes flowed from Paternal Authority. From Adam to Moſes we have deſcending a Power of Fathers over their Children, and Eldeſt Sons (except where by an extraordinary Providence the Caſe was altered) over their Brothers and the reſt of the Family, in a continued Series for the Government of the Church eſtabliſhed and approved by God, but of Equality or Colation in Government, neither any Precept nor Example.

A Select Tribe choſen to the Exerciſe of Holy things.

4. The Family of Jacob being grown into a Nation, that Domeſtick Diſcipline, as more agreeable to a Family than a Nation or Region, was abrogated; and out of Twelve Tribes one was choſen for the Exerciſe of Prieſthood, and the Charge of all Holy things; wherein, according to the Number and Order of ſuch Princes as deſcended from their common Progenitor Levi, God Ordained ſeveral Degrees and Dignities, for the Interpretation of the Law and the Service of the Altar, which Degrees were ſo regulated, that not only the Levites were under the Prieſts, but alſo of both ſorts ſome were inferior and ſubject unto others. Of the Levites were Princes ſuch as were Chief of the Families of Gerſhon, Kohath, and Merari, the three Sons of Levi, after whom followed other Fathers who directed their Brethren the Levites in their Miniſterial Function, and whereof ſome were made Judges and Magiſtrates, as well elſewhere as in their own Cities, not only in the work of the Lord, but the Kings buſineſs alſo. And ſome of them were Aſſiſtants in the Great Council or Synodrium of Hieruſalem, to the Princes of the Prieſts and Tribes. Amongſt the Prieſts themſelves the Prime Dignity remained in the High Prieſt, who by Divine Inſtitution was Chief or Prince of the Princes of Levi, and was over the Chiefeſt Judges at Hieruſalem, as well Prieſts as others, in the Lords buſineſs. Which Honour was given him, not becauſe herein he was a Type of Chriſt, but becauſe this Form of Government was fitteſt for the Jewiſh Church: For neither Aaron nor any of his Succeſſors repreſented the Kingly Office of Chriſt; otherwiſe our Saviour had been a Prieſt after the Order of Aaron, as well as that of Melchiſedeck, if Aaron as well as Melchiſedeck had obtained as well the Dignity of King as Prieſt: but it is ſufficiently clear, that the Scepter belonged to Judah, and not to Levi.

Who govern it with equal Power, but are of different Orders and Degrees.

5. To the High-Prieſt (who ever ought to be of the Family of Eleazar and Phineas) was adjoyned another, as his Second or Deputy out of the Progeny of Ithamar the other Son of Aaron, to whom were ſubject the Gerſhonites and Merarites in the Miniſtery of the Tabernacle. And from theſe two Roots as it were ſprung thoſe Four and Twenty (a) called Heads and Fathers of the Prieſts, amongſt whom David cauſed Lots to be caſt, that they might by turns ſerve in the Houſe of the Lord. And as they were ſubject to the former two Princes or Heads, ſo had they others (b) ſubject to them, as well Prieſts as Levites, whoſe Service they uſed in the diſcharging of their Courſes. Their number ſometimes failed both by reaſon of frequent Exile, and the decay of Families; but in the Old Teſtament they were called (c) Fathers and Heads of the Prieſts, and in the New Chief Prieſts or 'Αρχιερεῖς. Of both ſorts we ſaid not only Prieſts but Levites were Judges appointed and Governours of Cities as well others as their own Forty eight. And many Cauſes of greateſt moment were brought before them alone, or for the moſt part, as thoſe concerning Leproſie, Jealouſie, Secret Homicide, Falſe Witneſs and the like, in which Matters the People and Magiſtrates were bound to conſult and expect the Sentence of the Prieſts. But we muſt not forget that the moſt Doubtful Intricate and Weighty Matters were referred to the greateſt and graveſt Council or Sanhedrim, which being to ſit by Gods Command at the place where the Ark of the Teſtimony abode, in the time of King Jehoſhaphat, conſiſted of the Levites, Prieſts, and Heads of the Families of Iſrael, had Amariah the High Prieſt, Prince or Chief in all Matters of the Lord, and Zebadiah Prince of the Houſe of Judah, chief in the Kings buſineſs.

This

(a) 1 Chron. 24.

(b) Nehem. 12.

(c) Ibid.

(d) Mat. 12. v. 16. Mark 11. v. 14.

This Sanhedrim thus Conſtituted in the time of Jehoſhaphat, a Prince moſt obſervant of the Moſaical Law, was but a continuation of that great Council of Seventy Elders whom God Ordained as Aſſiſtants to Moſes in the great Burthen of Government. Now although we ſhall not deny, that by reaſon of the peculiar Conſtitution of the Jewiſh Commonwealth under the Moſaical Law, no * neceſſary Conſequence can be drawn from the diverſe degrees of Prieſts and Levites, to the framing of the very ſame Polity in the Church of Chriſt, yet for Preſervation of good Order, that the Paſtors and Governours of Gods Flock may the better do their Duty, and not be found unworthy of their calling, either in reſpect of Depravity of Manners, or unſoundneſs of Opinion, the Wiſdom of God that evidently appeareth in the Levitical Polity, is not lightly to be eſteemed or rejected. For if in every well conſtituted Society Order is very neceſſary; and Confuſion, of which God never is Author, is with all Induſtry to be ſhunned; we neither ought to inquire for, neither can we find a more excellent or perfect Pattern of Church Government (ſo far as time, place, and the Condition of Perſons will bear) than what by God himſelf was ſettled and confirmed in the Church and Commonwealth of the Jews. And although that Government be not thoroughly known, neither is there neceſſity of being fully conformable to it, by reaſon of the many and various Differences and Diſproportions betwixt that Commonwealth and the Chriſtian Church, ſpread ſo far and wide amongſt ſo many and various Nations; yet this is clear, that God would not have that Church governed by all the Prieſts and Levites qualified with equal Power and Authority, but that he ſubjected ſome to others, as well in the Sacred Function as the Civil Government, and that all ſate not promiſcuouſly in that great Sanhedrim of the Seventy Elders, but ſuch only were choſen into that Aſſembly who were eminent for their Virtue, or Nobility of their Extraction. Hence it is evident from the Levitical Diſcipline, that the Government of the Church by Miniſters of unequal and differing Orders and Degrees, is more agreeable to the Wiſdom of God revealed in his word, than that which indifferently allows to Paſtors equal, or one and the ſame Authority.

* Vide eund. cap. 4.

Subordinate to each other.

6. Whilſt our Lord himſelf was upon Earth, although all Power in Heaven and Earth was given him, yet did he not manifeſt or challenge it till he was riſen from the Dead, but the External Government of the Church he left to others, as not ſo proper to the Son of God as to Mortal Men. His Kingdom was not of this World, but Spiritual, exerciſing his Authority over all in the Power and Majeſty of the Spirit, protecting and defending his Subjects againſt all outward and inward Enemies, and carrying on his work notwithſtanding all Oppoſition, in an irreſiſtible, though Secret and Spiritual way. The external Adminiſtration of Power, ſuch as was convenient for the Peace, Order, and Decency of his Church, he delegated to thoſe whom he made Leaders of his Flock and Stewards of his Houſhold, upon the removal of his Corporal preſence. Thoſe were his Diſciples of whom whilſt yet he was upon Earth he made two Orders or Ranks, one of Apoſtles, being Twelve Meſſengers inveſted with chiefeſt Authority; another of Seventy Perſons more in number, but with leſs Power, whom he ſent before him to Preach in each City or Town whether he ſhould come. They (not thoſe) were his conſtant Followers and Domeſtick Attendants, heard all his Sermons, ſaw all his Works, being choſen for this purpoſe to be certain and Eye-witneſſes to the World of his Doctrine, Miracles, Afflictions, Death and Reſurrection. They and no others were at Table with him at his laſt Supper, heard the Prayers he made, received his comfortable and incouraging words, and the large Promiſes he made at parting. To them did he aſſign the whole World as a Province to Teach and Baptize; and thoſe did he ſend as Ambaſſadors à latere not only to Preach the Heavenly Truth, and Found Churches throughout the World, but to direct and order in his Name and by his Authority, all the Faithful in all things concerning Faith and Manners; to preſcribe Order in Government of his Church, and therein Eſtabliſh what might be neceſſary for its Increaſe, Peace and Unity, for reſtraining the Rebellious and Refractory, Proviſion of Faithful Paſtors, ſtopping the Mouths of gainſayers, and delivering up to Satan ſuch as were incorrigible in Wickedneſs and Blaſphemy. And for all thoſe things they had moſt ample Gifts of the Spirit, and were indued with Power from on High.

Chriſt appoints his Apoſtles and the Elders in like manner.

7. In this manner of chuſing Diſciples and gathering the firſt beginnings of his Chriſtian Church, our Saviour ſeemeth to have reſpected the Jewiſh Polity, wherein Twelve Princes by Gods appointment were choſen out of the Tribes, one out of each, and afterwards Seventy Elders were joyned with the reſt in Council. By which diverſity both of number and degree, a difference appears clearly in the Dignity of Governours, both in the People of God and Chriſt's Church, and is evident in the promotion of Matthias, after the Treaſon and end of Judas, who was one of the Seventy. The Apoſtles had under them certain Diſciples, whom they ſtill took with them as well for eaſe as Company, and when they had been ſufficiently inſtructed, they partly ſent to plant other Churches, when they themſelves were called away into other places, ſometimes imployed in perfecting what was begun, reſtoring what was decayed, or otherwiſe as occaſion required: And for that they knew by reaſon of their conſtant Converſe the whole ſenſe and mind of the Apoſtles, they were appointed (as Timothy by St. Paul) to Ordain and Govern other Paſtors and Teachers, than whom they were therefore more eminent and of greater Dignity in the Church.

Nam qui provehitur de minori ad majus provehitur.

Par in parem non habet imperium.

8. The Apoſtles were all of the ſame † Dignity and Power, not one placed above another as to Authority. Their Lord forbad them all Ambitious Deſires, which before his Reſurrection they were not free from harping ſtill upon a ſplendid Temporal Dominion, as their Country-men do at this hour, which the Meſſiah ſhould enjoy. As he checked ſuch Imaginations, and denied them the uſe of the Temporal Sword, (which as he found ſo he left to the Magiſtrate,) he was ſo far from forbidding them the exerciſe of juſt Authority over others, that he placed them in Dignity above all others in his Church, neither forbad them to receive any Names or Titles of reſpect, but ambitiouſly to ſeek after and deſire them. Neither did he joyn in equal Authority any Presbytery or Society of inferior Paſtors for the Government of the Church, much leſs any Lay-perſons, an Invention that bears not the Date of One hundred and fifty years, and never was heard of till of late time in the Church of God, whatever is pretended. The Apoſtles were furniſhed with admirable Gifts of the Holy Ghoſt, but ſuch as were requiſite for the laying of ſuch conſiderable Foundations as thoſe of Chriſtianity; for converting the Incredulous that never had heard of Chriſt, and when they did, would be too apt to ſtumble at his Sufferings; for ſtrengthening the Faithful, who were but ſadly entertained by the unbelieving World; and for furniſhing ſo many Churches newly planted with careful and able Paſtors. The Church being ſettled, there was no neceſſity of the continuance of ſuch Miraculous Power. The Scripture is ſufficient in all Ages to declare the Truth; the Miracles then wrought give it ſufficient Teſtimony; the Authority of that firſt Commiſſion is ſtill continued by Succeſſion: The Abilities of Paſtors do not now appear on a ſudden, but ripen with time if they be induſtrious. Yet thoſe parts of Apoſtolical Office which lye in Teaching, Baptizing, Adminiſtring the Lords Supper, looſing and binding, laying on of Hands in the Ordination of Paſtors and Miniſters, theſe ſtill continue in the Church, and ſo muſt as long as the Church it ſelf continues. Theſe we may in fewer words diſtinguiſh into Doctrine and Diſcipline, Adminiſtration of the Word and Sacraments, and the Power of the Keys and Ordination.

† Nam Apoſtoli omnes pari Conſortio præditi erant & poteſtate. Cyprian de unitate Eccleſiæ.

Claves Regni cælorum acceperant, & ſuper eos Eccleſiæ ſoliditate æquo fundata eſt. Hieronym. adverſus Jovinianum.

Vide Bilſonum ut ſuprà c. 7. &c.

9. The former did belong indifferently to all Paſtors and Miniſters of the Church, Preaching the Word and Adminiſtring the Sacraments, was their general Office and Duty whilſt the Apoſtles yet lived, who reſerved Power of the Keys and Ordination to themſelves. Such they choſe at firſt for Paſtors and Teachers, as were for their Age and Gravity moſt capable of Reverence and Honour, in which reſpect they were called Presbyters (from which word is derived the French Preſtres and our Prieſts) or Elders. Afterwards ſuch Young Men as were of ſpecial Abilities were admitted, and yet retained the old Name which uſe had made Familiar. The Apoſtles themſelves are ſometimes called Presbyters or Elders, as (a) St. Peter taketh that Title upon him, and thoſe Presbyters from their inſpection or overſight are termed Epiſcopi or Biſhops, thoſe Names being (b) promiſcuouſly uſed at the firſt Plantation of Chriſtian Churches, which were governed by all thoſe Presbyters in common under the Apoſtles. But afterwards, as (c) St. Hierome writes, Factions and Parties being made by ſuch as training and Baptizing ſought to draw Diſciples after them, it was Decreed throughout the whole World, that for the removing of Schiſm and Diſſentions, one of thoſe Presbyters ſhould be choſen and ſet over the reſt, and him to whom the

(a) 1 Pet. 5.

(b) Philip. 1. Tit. 1. Act. 20.

(c) Ad Evagrium & in Tit.

Schiſms ariſe in the Church by reaſon of the Equality of Presbyters.

the whole Care of the Church ſhould belong, they named (in a peculiar and eminent way) Epiſcopus or Biſhop. Indeed the Apoſtles at their firſt Preaching of the Goſpel, might not think it neceſſary to commit the Government of Churches unto Biſhops, becauſe the chief Authority of Impoſition of Hands, and binding and looſing they would keep in their own Hands; and being by Chriſt himſelf made Univerſal Biſhops and Overſeers; as alſo becauſe they would not commit ſo great a Charge to any, before they had had ſufficient Experience of their Fidelity, Gravity, Prudence and Learning; and alſo leſt they ſhould ſeem rather to ſtudy the Honour and Preferment of their Diſciples than the Converſion of Souls; therefore they ſuffered the Churches firſt to make trial of many Governours, from the equality of whom great Diſturbance and Confuſion ariſing, and they being called ſtill away into other places by freſh Occaſions, were neceſſarily conſtrained to ſet over each Church a Paſtor of approved Fidelity, which willingly received him, having by ſad Experience learnt what Diſturbances Hereſies and Schiſms the Wickedneſſes and Diſcord of Teachers had produced, and how unfit the confuſed Rule and equal Power of Presbyters was to prevent or remove thoſe Diſtempers.

Epiphanius.

For prevention thereof Biſhops are made.

10. That thoſe Factions and Diſſentions ſpoken of by St. Jerome happened in the time of the Apoſtles, is evident from the Epiſtles written by St. Paul to the (a) Corinthians, (b) Romans, (c) Galatians, (d) Philippians, (e) Coloſſians and (f) Theſſalonians, and the Writings of (g) others of the Apoſtles. And St. Hierome himſelf (though thought none of the greateſt Friends of Epiſcopacy) beareth witneſs in that he compareth the Polity of the Chriſtian Church to that of the Jewiſh, and ſaith, the Apoſtolical Traditions were taken from the Old Teſtament, (h) and what Aaron his Sons and the Levites were in the Temple, that may Biſhops, Presbyters and Deacons challenge to themſelves; clearly hinting, that as in the Temple amongſt Prieſts, ſo in the Church of Chriſt the Apoſtles made a difference betwixt Biſhops and Presbyters; as he doth in another place plainly affirm, that (i) the Safety of the Church hangs on the Dignity of a Chief Prieſt (or Biſhop) to whom, if a free and eminent Power, after all the reſt, be not granted, as many Schiſms as Prieſts will be made in the Church. Elſewhere, (k) That afterwards one was choſen who ſhould be ſet over the reſt; a remedy was made in Schiſms, leaſt every one drawing to himſelf, ſhould break the Church of Chriſt. Now at Alexandria from Mark the Evangeliſt unto Heracles and Dionyſius the Biſhops, the Presbyters ever named ſome one Biſhop that was choſen from amongſt themſelves and placed in an higher degree. Hence it appears plainly, that Epiſcopacy is of Apoſtolical Inſtitution, which the ſeveral Succeſſions of Biſhops in ſeveral Sees before the death of St. John make evident; ſo that the Superiority in Biſhops, which he ſaith was brought in rather by the Cuſtom of the Church than Divine Diſpoſition; rather reſpect ſuch Cuſtoms as were afterwards brought in by Cannons (ſuch were, that Presbyters could not Baptize without the Biſhops Licence, nor Preach in his preſence) at leaſt if the Apoſtles had no expreſs Command for it, as St. Paul (l) diſtinguiſheth betwixt that and his own Opinion and Judgment in the matter of Virgins; yet muſt we not think (as the Apoſtle in modeſty expreſſeth himſelf) that they had the Spirit of Chriſt, who would not doubtleſs leave them to a Fallible and Humane one, in a buſineſs of ſuch Conſequence, as the Government and well ordering of his Church.

(a) 1 Cor. 11.
(b) Rom. 16.
(c) Gal. 1. & 3.
(d) Philip. 3.
(e) Coloſſ. 2.
(f) 1 Theſſ. 2. 2 Theſſ. 2.
(g) 2 Pet. 2. 1 John 2. &c. 2 John.
(h) Ad Evagrium.
(i) Adverſus Lucif.
(k) ad Evagr.
(l) 1 Cor. 7

Epiſcopacy of Apoſtolical Inſtitution.

The manner of chuſing or electing a Biſhop.

11. Such an Officer by the name of Epiſcopus or Biſhop, was choſen after this manner: When a Biſhop was dead, whoſe Church was furniſhed with many Presbyters fit to ſucceed him, the Biſhops neareſt to him of the ſame Province meeting together, agreed upon a day for an Election, which day they divulged both to the People and Clergy. At the day appointed both People and Clergy meeting in the Church, as many Biſhops as poſſibly could be preſent (but without Three nothing could be done) gave their attendance on the Election, and took notice of ſuch as the People and Clergy choſe. If all or the greater part of any Sort or Order unanimouſly pitched upon one Perſon, he was declared Elect, and a day was named for his Conſecration, his Name and the time of his Conſecration being affixed to the Doors of the Church, with warning, that if any one would object any thing againſt the Party to be choſen, they ſhould appear ſufficiently furniſhed for ſuch an Affair at ſuch a time and place. At the ſecond time of their meeting, ſuch Biſhops as aſſembled for Conſecration and Impoſition of Hands, if after diligent inquiry into the Manners of the Party, they found him ſuch a one as the Apoſtle had deſcribed, they Cypr. l. 1. ep. 4.

Ordained him Paſtor, and gave him a ſtrict Charge in the preſence of all the Multitude. If any Crime was objected, and proved againſt him, they judged him unworthy, and proceeded to the Election of ſome other whom both the Clergy and People did unanimouſly deſign to this Office. The Care of the Ancient Chriſtians in chooſing their Paſtors was ſo remarkable to the Heathens themſelves, that Alexander Severus the Roman Emperour is ſaid by Lampridius to imitate it as that of the Jews in this manner: For when he would make any Governours of Provinces or Chief Commanders, he publiſhed their Names, deſiring the People, that if any of them were guilty of any Crime, it might be evidently proved: And he ſaid it was a ſad thing that this ſhould not be done in the Provinces which Chriſtians and Jews practiced toward ſuch of their Prieſts as were to be Ordained.

In Alex. Sev.

Of Poſtulation or calling for a Biſhop.

Cann. 4. & 6.

12. But it happening that in certain places there were very few Clerks, or ſuch as were not fit for ſuch a Calling, in ſuch a caſe they betook themſelves to the Biſhop of the Metropolis or Mother City of that Province, and of him they deſired either ſuch a Perſon as they themſelves made choice of, or one whom he himſelf ſhould commend to them. This way of looking after a Biſhop was called Poſtulation as the other Election. At their Petition the Metropolitan having adviſed with that Biſhop whoſe Clerk they choſe, and called to him other Biſhops (two at leaſt) Examined and Conſecrated him in like manner as the former, or ſome other, if juſt cauſe required, of more approved Integrity and Worth. For the reſtraining of the Factiouſneſs of the People, and the Ambition of the Clergy, the Biſhops of the ſame Province were commanded to be preſent, that they might take care leſt Corruption, Ambition and Tumult prevailed. And for a curb to thoſe Biſhops, leſt Hatred and private Favour ſhould diſturb or pervert the Work, the Metropolitan was to be made acquainted with the whole Proceeding before they could lay Hands on him: as if any one accuſed them as far more prone, and not indifferent as to the Parties concerned, it was proper to the Metropolitan to hinder their Attempts, and with the aſſent of the greater number of Biſhops to hinder the Election, if, upon Examination, they ſaw it requiſite. The Nicene Council, as to this Matter, Decreed, That a Biſhop ſhould be Conſecrated by all the Biſhops of the ſame Province; at leaſt, that Three ſhould meet together and have the conſent of the reſt expreſſed by Letters before they ſhould lay Hands on him. And that if any were Conſecrated without the knowledge and Conſent of the Metropolitan, he ought not to be owned as Biſhop, and that upon diſſent the Matter was to be decided by the major part.

A difference in Degree and Power amongſt Biſhops.

The Chief called Metropolitan who præſides over the reſt in Church Matters.

13. From this moſt Antient of all General Councils, we muſt obſerve, that at that time there was a difference in Degree and Power amongſt Biſhops themſelves, that an Inſpection was given to ſome one over ſeveral others, that he was called Metropolitan, and the place of his Authority and Juriſdiction his Province: The Metropolitan was ſo named from the Metropolis or Mother City, ſo called either in reſpect of Colonies ſent abroad, which owned her as their Mother, or by reaſon of Power and Preheminence over and above the adjoyning Cities. This difference and relation being betwixt ſuch places long before the beginnings of the Chriſtian Church, when it came to be Eſtabliſhed, it found a neceſſity of modelling its Government according to the Secular Form. For long before Princes gave their Names to the Chriſtian Profeſſion, when the Church had no other means of diſtinguiſhing right from wrong, and Truth from Falſhood, but only by Synods, or the Meetings of Religious and Prudent Paſtors, there being no Chriſtian Magiſtrate, but the Swords being imployed not for, but againſt the Faithful in many exquiſite Perſecutions; ſuch Meetings were thought moſt convenient to be called by the Biſhops of ſuch Principal Cities or Metropolies, and for that ſome muſt neceſſarily præſide in them as Moderators and Governours, they were thought moſt fit ſo to do, and by ancient Councils are called Metropolitans, as alſo Archbiſhops. After the Converſion of Conſtantine, when Princes never had owned and imbraced the formerly diſputed and perſecuted Name of Chriſtians, they began to increaſe the number of Synods, and confirmed not only the Decrees of General Councils, but what was alſo reſolved on in Provincial Meetings, as wholeſome Remedies againſt Diſorders both of Church and State. And as by their Edicts, which had the Power of Laws, they referred Eccleſiaſtical Cauſes to Eccleſiaſtical Judges; ſo did they take Care, that according to the Cannons, thoſe Metropolitans ſhould twice in a Year aſſemble the Biſhops of their reſpective Provinces, and in thoſe Synods determine ſuch Differences and Conteſts as had happened in Matters of Religion. In proceſs of time buſineſs growing every day more large and intricate, and Biſhops neither being able to defray the Charges of ſo frequent and great Journeys, nor being well ſpared from their Sees, there was neceſſity of reducing Provincial Synods to one yearly Meeting, and in the mean time of committing the Cognizance of ſuch Matters as would bear no delay, would prove too tedious for the ſmall time allowed to their meeting, to the Metropolitan of that Province where they aroſe.

The Original of Metropolitans.

14. Some think the Original of Metropolitans of as high a Date as the time of Timothy and Titus. That it was moſt Ancient, appears from the Cannons as well of the firſt Nicene, as other General Councils which ſpeak of thoſe kind of Governours, not as lately ſet up, but as ordinary Officers of the Church, and take care (a) every Metropolitan City retain its ancient Dignity. And ſuch was the Government of the Church when perſecuted: After that Conſtantine had vailed the Faſces and Eagle of the Empire to the Croſs, and had quite changed the ancient Form of Subordinate Majeſtracy, the Form of Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction was alſo much altered: as well in the changing of Cities for Metropolitan Power, as erecting of new ſorts of Governours. The Eaſt felt the greateſt force of this alteration, (though the extravagance of the Emperours eſpecially ſay their Roman Æmulators,) but the Weſt alſo found a neceſſity, though not in ſo large a meaſure, of conforming the Eccleſiaſtical way of Adminiſtration to that of the Civil. For another Form of Provinces being made, and other Cities Erected into Metropolis, to the Biſhop of thoſe newly upſtart Cities was given the Title of Metropolitans, yet had they but the meer Title and place; no Metropolitical Authority or Juriſdiction, preceding their Colleagues of their ſeveral Provinces, and placed next to the Metropolitans, but ſubject to them as the reſt of their Fellow Biſhops. The Emperours might at their pleaſure divide and multiply Provinces, which if the Biſhops indeavoured to do, they incurred the pain of Depoſition.

(a) Τὰ πρεσβεῖα σώζεσθαι ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις, Can 6.
Τῇ μητροπόλει σωζομένου τοῦ Οἰκείου ἀξιώματος, Can.7

Conſule Cann. 12. & 17. Concilii Chalced.

15. It was conſidered that the Apoſtles and their Succeſſors had delineated and aſſigned the Limits and Borders of Church Government, according to the Dignity and Order of the ſeveral Cities, and that the reaſon was now the ſame, if poſſibly an Alteration without great Inconvenience could be obtained; that the leſſer Cities are dependent upon the greater, to which is dayly great Confluence upon the account of Traffick and publick Buſineſs; and much intercourſe neceſſarily being betwixt the ſeveral Biſhopricks and Pariſhes and Metropolitan Cities, it neceſſarily muſt follow, that there it is moſt convenient the Metropolitan ſhould have his See, where was the Metropolis for Civil Matters, that the ſeveral inferiour Officers of his Province might have the more eaſie acceſs to his Perſon: the force of which Conſequence appears manifeſtly in this, that where Cuſtom or a certain Veneration of particular Places or Perſons has confined the Metropolitan See to ſome private City in the Province, yet is the Prelate neceſſitated to reſide for the moſt part in the Civil Metropolis. To thoſe Reaſons as are moſt weighty, may be added that Honour and Eſteem that all Chriſtians have to the Perſon and Memory of Conſtantine. If the Apoſtles and Apoſtolical Perſons imitated in their Church Polity the Method and Order of Heathen Perſecutors, much more did it ſeem fitting and convenient to the Biſhops, to follow the pattern of ſo Pious and deſerving a Prince.

The place of his Reſidence.

16. Before this time therefore Biſhops being ſet over ſeveral Cities, and Metropolitans, or Archbiſhops over Provinces: When as the Civil Dioceſſes were appointed, whereof each contained ſeveral Provinces, it was thought fit that over every Dioceſs ſhould alſo one Biſhop be appointed to govern the Archbiſhops, as the Archbiſhops did the Biſhops. Where the Preſidents, Conſolares, and Correctores were, there ſate the Metropolitans. And when the Vicarii were brought up and ſet over the Governours of Provinces, Primates were conſtituted in the Church to overſee Metropolitans and other inferiour Officers. The Vicarius was over ſeveral Provinces, ſo was the Primate; the Vicars Charge was called Diœceſis, ſo was that of a Primate. From the Conſulares and Preſidents of Provinces, there lay Appeal to the Vicars, ſo did there to the Primates from the Metropolitans or Exarchs. From the Sentence of Vicars lay Appeal to the Præfecti Prætorio; and ſo from the Primates and Exarchs to the Patriarchs hereafter to be ſpoken of. But that in imitation of the Vicars, the Office and Dignity of Primates was Inſtituted, ſeemeth to ſome moſt demonſtrable from this, that before the time of Primates Superior to Archbiſhops or Metropolitans.

Conſulas Morinum Exercit. lib. 1. 19.

Conſtantine there are no Teſtimonies nor Footſteps of any Juriſdiction of thoſe Vicars, neither in Eccleſiaſtical Writers any mention of Primates, Enarchs or Dioceſſes in this Senſe: All Hiſtories, Councils, that of Nice give only Priority of place to the Biſhops of Rome; Alexandria, Antioch, and Jeruſalem own no Biſhops above Metropolitans, no Dioceſſes above Provinces, no Dioceſſan Councils above Provincial. But preſently upon the Inſtitution of the Vicars, and a diſtinction of their Dioceſes from Provinces, there is moſt frequent mention made of Enarchs, Primates, Dioceſſes, and Dioceſſan Councils in Eccleſiaſtical Authors; ſo that the firſt Conſtantinopolitan Council ſpeaks of them as already made and confirmed. Theſe Primates were called Primates Patriarchales, but in a ſtrict Senſe are not to be confounded with Patriarchs.

Patriarchs choſen in the Church.

17. The Jews had their Patriarchs, to whom were ſubject all the Synagogues in the World, which ſo far owned their ſubjection, that they paid them Tribute, as appears from the (a) Code of Theodoſius. This Tribute was called (b) Apoſtole, and ſuch as gathered it Apoſtoli, whoſe Office it was to execute the Commands of theſe Patriarchs, the Original of whom is to be derived no higher than the Deſtruction of Jeruſalem, and the Univerſal Captivity of that Nation. The Montaniſts it ſeems, in imitation of them, had alſo their Patriarch, as we learn from (c) St. Jerom, as ſome (d) obſerve from Herodotus, that the Heathen Ægyptians called their Chief Prieſt by that Name, of whom is to be underſtood that Saying of (e) Hadrian in Vopiſcus, and neither of a Chriſtian Patriarch nor the Jewiſh, as ſome would have it. The Chriſtian was of much a later Date, though the Romaniſts from ſome forged Writings will needs have them Inſtituted and Seated by the Prince of the Apoſtles. If they ſpeak by way of Anticipation, and will contend that ſuch Sees as were firſt appointed by the Apoſtles, came to be afterwards Patriarchal; we ſhall not at all contend, that the Patriarchal Sees (though not as Patriarchal) were by Apoſtolical appointment. But the Patriarchs themſelves were of a later Date than the firſt Nicene Council, no mention being made of them by any Chriſtian Writer of Credit, till about or after the Death of Conſtantine. As for the Epiſtles of Anacletus Biſhop of Rome, from whom the Cardinal Annaliſt, and others, would prove the Series of the firſt three Patriarchal Sees, and the Supremacy of the Roman; it and all the reſt of the Epiſtles of the old Popes are Spurious, being unknown to the World before the Ninth Century, and then ſuch were, as they are vented out of Spain into Europe, as (f) many have ſufficiently evinced. Of as ſmall Credit are the Councils held under them: And the Sixth Cannon of the Nicene Council, though it takes care for the Power and Precedence of thoſe Biſhops of Alexandria and Antioch, conforming them to him of Rome; yet doth it not ſpeak of them under the Name and Title of Patriarchs, but as Metropolitans or Primates.

In Imitation of the Præfecti Prætorio.

Five in all.

18. Patriarchs therefore ſeem to have been ſo named and obeyed, in Imitation of the Præfecti Prætorio, though there be no full conformity as to their number, there being at firſt but Three of them, and Four of the later. The firſt Three were the Metropolitans of Rome, Antioch and Alexandria, the preciſe time of whoſe Promotion is not known. Afterwards the Metropolitan of Conſtantinople by the Decrees of the Councils of Conſtantinople and Chalcedon obtained that Dignity as moſt congruous to that Imperial Seat, which had the Title and (a) Priviledges of New Rome. After this the Biſhop of Jeruſalem was dignified with the ſame Title, who had anciently been graced with particular Reſpect and Honour, yet ſo that the Biſhop of Cæſarea (ſo unwilling were the Ancient Fathers to change the Cuſtoms of the Church) retained all Rights and Priviledges of Metropolitan, which the Nicene Council alſo confirmed. But at length Favour prevailed for this moſt Ancient Church, which as a (b) Romaniſt obſerves, is ſtiled by Theodoret, Mother of all Churches, and by Juſtine the Emperour, Mother of the Chriſtian Name and Profeſſion; upon this account, that from Her all other Churches were diffuſed throughout the World. And after many endeavours uſed, this Honour was obtained for her, as we read in the Acts of the Council of Chalcedon, notwithſtanding the violent reſiſtance of Leo the Great, Biſhop of Rome, who, as one ſays, alluding to the Speech of Lyſander, and that Popes Name, to the Lyons skin ſewed the Foxes, and omitted nothing that might hinder the Promotion of thoſe two Sees; inſomuch that ſome grounding their Opinion on a place in Gulielmus Tyrius, have thought that Dignity was not Eſtabliſhed and Confirmed to Jeruſalem before the Fifth Council in the time of Juſtinian.

19. Such

(a) C. Theod. l. ult. de Judæis.

(b) Vide Berterii Pithanon. l. 2. c. 1.

(c) Epiſt. 54.

(d) Baron. Ann. ad annum. 111.

(e) Ipſe ille Patriarcha cùm Ægyptum veneret ab aliis ſerapidem adorare ab aliis cogitur Chriſtum.

(f) Poſt alios fuſe Blondellus in Pſeudo Iſidoro & Turriavo vapulantibus.

(a) Τὰ τῆς νέας Ῥώμης πρεσβεῖα.

(b) Betlerius Pith. Diatr. 2. p. 150.

The Church and State alike in its Government.

The Eaſtern Diviſion of the Church.

19. Such was the Polity of the Ancient Church, conformable as to place and Dignity with that of the State, then which a more Commodious could not be invented, both for preſerving Peace, and ſafe to every Biſhop his proper Juriſdiction. But we ſhall ſee how the Partition of Dioceſſes and Provinces agreed. As the Roman Empire was divided into two general Parts or Worlds (ſo (a) ſometimes they ſtiled them) ſo was the Church diſtinguiſhed generally into Eaſtern and Weſtern. As in the Eaſt there were Seven Dioceſſes, and Six in the Weſt, beſides the Præfecture of Rome, in like manner the Church had of old its Fourteen Dioceſſes. Thoſe of Eaſtern both Church and Empire were, firſt Egypt, the Provinces whereof, as alſo thoſe of Libya, Thebais and Pentapolis, were ſubject to the Patriarch of Alexandria. 2. The Eaſt more particularly ſo called, ſubject to the Patriarch of Antioch. 3. Aſiana, whoſe Provinces belonged firſt to the Primate of Epheſus, afterward to the Conſtantinopolitan Patriarch. 4. Pontica the Metropolis whereof was Cæſarea. 5. Thracia, which with its Provinces Greece, Achaia, and others, were under the Inſpection anciently of the Biſhop of Theſſalonica as Primate of the Dioceſs, afterward ſubject to the Patriarch of Conſtantinople. 6. Macedonia. 7. Dacia.

(a) Conſpirant gemini frænis communibus ab Claud. Gemini commercia mundi. Vide Berterium & Uthorpum contra Spalatenſem Morinem in Exercitationib.

The Weſtern.

20. In the Weſt we alſo found Seven Dioceſſes. Hereof the firſt was the Roman, which contained the * Suburbicarian Provinces, ſubject in Civil Matters to the Emperours Vicar, in Eccleſiaſtical to the Roman Patriarch, and are in any wiſe to be diſtinguiſhed from the Provinces of Italy, and were Ten in number: Three Iſlands, Sicily, Corſica and Sardinia, with Seven others in that Tract of Italy lying on the Eaſt and South, as 4. Campania, 5. Tuſcia, 6. Picenum Suburbicarium, 7. Apulia and Calabria, 8. Brutium, 9. Samnium, and 10. Valeria, all which were ſubject to the Roman Patriarch, and Conſtituted his proper and peculiar Dioceſs, and extended no farther Weſtward than the River Magra, the limit of Hetruria, and that called Aſius (but Eſis by Pliny and Blondus) not far from Ancona, which manifeſtly appears in that one part of Picenum is called Picenum Suburbicarium, and the other Annonarium; ſo that in that Country the Suburbicarian Provinces were terminated. The Second Dioceſs of the Weſt, was the Italian, containing Seven other Provinces of Italy, viz. Venetia with Iſtria, Æmilia, Liguria, Flaminia with Picenum Annonarium, and Rhætia Secunda, all which in Civil things obeyed their Vicar, and in Eccleſiaſtical the Metropolitan of Milaine; in which reſpect this City is called by St. Athanaſius the Metropolis of Italy, as Rome of the Roman Juriſdiction. The Third Dioceſs, the African, wherein ſometime were numbered more than Two hundred Biſhops and ſeveral Metropolitans, all which with their Provinces, were ſubject to the Biſhop of Carthage as their Primate. The Fourth Illyrium, which formerly had its Primate and Provinces, but was afterwards ſubjected to the Patriarch of Conſtantinople. The Fifth Gall, which once owned Auguſta Treucrorum or Triers for its Metropolis, and the Biſhop of Triers for its Primate, but thence transferred the Dignity to Arles. The Sixth Spains, the Metropolis whereof Hiſpalis ſeems firſt to have been, but afterwards, together with the Royal Seat, the Dignity was transferred to Toledo. The Seventh Brittains, in the Plural number alſo, the Metropolis of which was anciently York as it is conjectured, where the Emperours, when in this Country, reſided. But many agreed, this Honour was conferred on Canterbury, the Biſhop whereof is Primate, or (to uſe the words of (a) Malmsbury, and the Gloſs (b) of the Cannon Law) Patriarch of the whole Dioceſs; and in a ſober Expreſſion alterius orbis Papa, Pope of another World. Thus was anciently the Church divided into Dioceſſes, according to the Form of the Empire, much altered in following Ages by Emperours and Councils, as we may ſee hereafter, eſpecially by the Roman Patriarch after his Incroachment and Uſurpation; ſo that the Marks of thoſe ancient Dioceſſes are hardly to be found out, or the Footſteps of their Patriarchs and Primates not eaſily diſcovered.

* Nec obſtat differentia à Morino inter urbicarias & Suburbicarias allegata.

(a) In Prolog. de geſtis Angl. Pontif.

(b) Cap. cleros Diſtinct. 21.

The Power of Patriarchs.

21. Thus we ſee the Church its Polity, in reference to the Diviſion of Places under their ſeveral ſorts of Prelates. Now muſt we conſider their Power, and ſo deſcend to inferior Miniſters. The Patriarchs Power was great in the Creation of Metropolitans and Biſhops. From Metropolitans Appeal lay to his Tribunal; he appointed Judges, and took cognizance of their Cauſes, called Synods of his Dioceſs, and decided other great and weighty Affairs. Of all theſe Five the Roman, becauſe of the Quality and Antiquity of the City, was firſt in Order, but in Dignity and Juriſdiction Collateral, not Superior. For the Nicene Council gives as much Power and Authority to him of Alexandria in Conſule Berterium ubi ſuprà.

Et Morinum.

in Egypt, Lybia and Pentapolis, as the Roman had over the Suburbicarian Provinces,and Juſtinian the Emperour ordained that the Biſhop of Juſtiniana Prima in Pannonia Secunda,ſhould have the ſame Right and Priviledges over the Biſhops, ſubject to him,as the Roman Pope had over the Biſhops within his juriſdiction ; and on the Patriarch of Conſtantinopole, were conferred equal priviledges; as his City was advanced to the ſame Dignity with Rome, though the Elder in order præceded the Younger. As for the Titles given to the Patriarch of Rome, however Glorious they may ſeem to ſome, and to portend ſome Principality, Juriſdiction and Power over others,yet are found but common to him with others. Great are the Epithetes given to St. Peter, from whom his Holyneſs would derive his Pedigree; yet as great are given to St.Paul,his Colleague. “ Is St.Peter called head of the Church? ſo are all the (a) Apoſtles. Is he ſtiled Pontifex or Biſhop of the Church? ſo is St. Paul of the (b) whole World: Who hath alſo as good reaſon to be called (c) Pilot,and Governour of the whole World,as one Ship,(d) and Pilot of the Church ſtronger and more ſolid then Peter; who was ſhaken grieviouſly by Temptation, both to deny and diſſemble. Had St. Peter the care and charge of the whole Church? ſo had (e) St. Paul of the whole World, which to preſent unto God, ſo as it might be acceptable to him was his great endeavour. If Peter be ſaid to have had abſolute and moſt ample power over the Church, ſo had all the Apoſtles, as the Romaniſts themſelves confeſs; (f) was Peter called Prince of the Apoſtles? ſo alſo was Paul.(g) All the Apoſtles were (h) Petræ as well as he: St. Paul ſaith himſelf he was (i) nothing inferior to the chiefeſt Apoſtles. And therefore with good reaſon doth St. Cyprian affirm that all the (k) Apoſtles were furniſhed with equal Conſortſhip and Authority.

That of Rome but equal, not ſuperiour to the other four.

22. No Title of Honour was anciently given to the Biſhop of Rome, but the ſame was alſo beſtowed upon others. Is he called Papa or Pope, ſo is alſo (a) St. Auguſtine, and this Title was anciently common to all Biſhops, as thoſe indifferently converſant in Antiquity do know: But as the word Tyrannus was once (b) common to all Kings, but afterwards through the inſolence of ſome particular Perſons became proper to ſuch whom the Modern ſignification doth moſt concern, ſo came this Title to be chalenged in after Ages, and yielded to the Roman Uſurper; is he ſtiled Pater Patrum and Epiſcopus Epiſcoporum, which Honour (c) Tertullian grudgeth him; ſo is Lupus the Biſhop of Gall by (d) Sidonius, as (e) Magnericus Biſhop of Triers, Culmen honorificum, and Patrum Pater Archſacerdos. In general Councils (f) John Biſhop of Hieruſalem, (g) Sergius of Conſtantinople, By Theodore Balſamon, (h) Marck Biſhop of Alexandria are called Patres Patrum, as indeed all not only Patriarchs but even Arch-Biſhops and Metropolitans, becauſe ſet over many Biſhops are called both Patres Patrum and Epiſcopi Epiſcoporum. We grant the Biſhop of Rome had not only the Dignity of Patriarch but is alſo ſtiled Patriacharum Epiſcopus, Biſhop of Patriarchs; but ſo might in ſome ſence, not only he, but all other Patriarchs; to whom Metropolitans were ſubject, who becauſe they preſided over many Biſhops or Fathers; therefore were anciently called Patriarchs.

Their Titles of Honour the ſame.

23. He of Rome is ſtiled Summus Sacerdos, Pontifex Maximus and Princeps Sacerdotum: High Prieſt, greateſt Pontifie and Prince of Prieſts; ſo is (a) St. Athanaſius called Chief Prieſt of Chief Prieſts; (b) Fælix ſaid to have overthrown the Government of Chief-Prieſt-hood; the Fathers in the Council of Orleance ſtiled (c) Summi Antiſtites, and others (d) elſwhere Pontifices in ſummo ſacerdotio Conſtituti, as the Biſhop of Antioch and he of Alexandria is termed by (e) Rabanus, Summus Epiſcopus, Princeps Epiſcoporum, and Pontifex Maximus. By Gelaſius every Biſhop is called Summus Sacerdos, and in old Time that Title and the other of Summus Pontifex was ordinary and common, as that of Princeps Sacerdotum to a Metropolitan, order being taken in the (f) Council of Carthage that for the time to come, none ſhould be called either Princeps Sacerdotum or Summus Sacerdos, but only the Biſhop of the firſt See. Farther as he aſſumeth the Title of Chriſts Vicar, this is applyed by a (g) Father to all Biſhops; if he be termed Pillar of the Church ſo is (h) Athanaſius by Nazianzen, and all (i) Biſhops by a Pope himſelf, as all Biſhops and Preachers are called by Gregory the Foundation of the Church. He had the Name of Head of the Church, but St. Athanaſius is alſo ſtiled by (k) Baſil head of all; and is ſaid by Nazianzen, to have given Laws to the World: Venantius the Poet giveth the Epithets of Splendor, Apex fidei, caput Pontificum to Nicetius of Triers. Conſtantinople is by Chryſoſtome called Metropolis of the whole World, by Nicetas, Queen of Cities, and by Juſtinian, of all the Cities the Head.

* Vide Trileſacum de Sacr. Epiſt. author. c. 9.

ἴσα πρεσβεῖα.

(a) Beb.lib 1. or Pontif.c. 11.

(b) Chryſoſt. hom. 2. in Tit.

(c) Idem hom. 25. in 2. ad corin.

(d) Idem hom. 2. ad Roman.

(e) Idem de præfect Evang. & hom. 1. de laud. Pauli.

(f) Beb. lib. 1.de Pontif. 11.

(g) Idem ibid. c. 27. v. Greg. 7. apud Stat.

(h) Origin. hom. 1 in Matth.

(i) 2.*Cor.*12.11.

(k) de unitate. Eccleſiæ.

(a) Heron epiſt. ad Auguſt. quæ eſt 3. inter Epiſt. Aug.

(b) Vide Partis Inſtit. primæ. Lib. 2. c. 2. §.1. Paragr. 2.

(c) de pudic. lib. 1.

(d) L. b. Epiſt. 1.

(e) Venutius. lib. 3.c. 11.

(f) Sub Menua Act. 5.

(g) In gennali 6. *Act.*13.

(h) *L.*5.Reſp.

(i) Evagrius L. 4. c. 11. Berter.Diat .2. cap. 4. & Baron. ad ann. 533. num. 36. Caſſidd. l. 9. Epiſt. 15.

(a) Nazianz. Orat. 22. ad Heron.

(b) Ambr. epiſt. 5. l. 1.

(c) 1. *cap.*3.

(d) in Conc. Agath. can. 6.

(e) L. 1. de Juſt. cler.

(f) can. 26.

(g) Chryſoſt. hom. 7. in Matth.

(h) Orat. 18.

(i) Ep. 3.

(k) Epiſt. 52.

24. All Biſhops, as well as he, are termed (a) Paſtors of Chriſts Sheep, (b) Athanaſius Governour of Gods Houſe, of whom Nazianzen Writes that the Præfectſhip, or Government of the univerſal World, was intruſted with him; St. Cyprian Doctor of all Chriſtians, and (c) Oracle of the univerſal Church, and (d) Succeſſor of the Apoſtles, as all Biſhops are who were ſeated in their places, throughout the World, and received the Titles of (e) Spouſes of the Church. He takes the Title of Univerſal or Oecumenical Patriarch, and ſo was ſtiled John of Jeruſalem by the whole (f) Conſtantinopolitan Synode, as Mennas often by a (g) General Council, and by (h) Juſtinian the Emperour, ſo was Sergius Biſhop of Conſtantinople, in the (i) ſixth general Council; and Tharaſius in the (k) Second held at Nice, and not only by the Biſhops of the Eaſt, but by (l) Hadrian of Rome himſelf. To all Biſhops indeed, (m) care of the univerſal Church is committed by Chriſt; as ſeveral Popes confeſs, and therefore by Argument drawn from the (n) greateſt Champion of their Uſurpation, they are Univerſal Biſhops in a ſober ſenſe: But in any other, that one ſhould have Juriſdiction and Authority over all the reſt; neither the Roman nor any other can challenge that Title.

His pretended Supremacy rejected by all.

25. Neither was he in moſt Ancient Times, accounted ſuch an Oracle of Faith, as to be reckoned Maſter of Eaſt and Weſt; as appeareth from St. Cyprian, who refuſed to be inſtructed by him; in the Caſe of Re-baptizing, from Familianus and the whole Eaſtern Church in the ſame cauſe, which call him proud Fool and a Counterfit Chriſtian: From St. Irenæus and Polycarpe in the Controverſie about Eaſter, who accuſe him of raſhneſs and perverſeneſs; ſuch an Oracle was he accounted by the Africans in the time of St. Auguſtine, when endeavouring to eſtabliſh his Supremacy by the way of Appeal in thoſe Provinces, he was branded by them with Pride and Fraud in Corrupting, and Perfidiouſneſs in violating the Nicene Cannons. Such was the Infallibility eſteemed, when Liberius was taxed for Arianiſm, Vigilius for Neſtorianiſm, and Honorius for the Hereſie of the Monothelites, by the whole Church; when Hildebrand for his Doctrine of depoſing Kings, and abſolving Subjects from their Allegiance, was by all good Men and ſeveral Councils eſteemed a Violator of all Divine and Humane Laws, as Maſter of Perfidiouſneſs and Perjury, a Tyrant and even Antichriſt himſelf; when Leo the Tenth his opinion of his own Holyneſs, his Superiority above a Council, was cenſured as Heretical by all Orthodox Men, and for 1400. Years none had ever doubted of the contrary: What Authority he had in ancient Times, either in promoting or degrading his fellow Patriarchs, we may ſee clearly in the Caſe of the Patriarchate of Conſtantinople, which notwithſtanding the utmoſt endeavours of Leo, was confirmed by a general Council; in that of Meletius Biſhop of Antioch (an admirable Perſon if Baſil may be believed) whom Damaſus of Rome had by his Sentence deprived, which Sentence was rejected by the ſecond general Council; and in that of Athanaſius, who was not reſtored after his ſeveral Baniſhments and Perſecutions by the Biſhop of Rome, (as Sozomen falſly Writes of Julius) but by Imperial orders, and the judgment of the Council of Sardis; how great an eſteem the ancient Fathers had for his Infallibility or Authority we find when Cyprian and Formilian being rebuked by Stephen, they reply upon him, as an arrogant Fool and a Counterfeit Chriſtian; when the Eaſtern Biſhops rebuked by Julius Excommunicate, deprive him, and by their Letters, ſignifie to all other Biſhops that they neither admit him into Communion, Write to him, or receive any Letters from him: When Dioſcorus the Alexandrian Patriarch, cenſured (and juſtly) by Leo, durſt give ſentence againſt, and Excommunicate him; when Vigilius, whilſt Orthodox was Synodically Excommunicated by the African Biſhops, and when he turned to be a Defender and Patron of the three Chapters, was condemned and Anathematized as an Heretick, by the fifth general Council: Infinite were examples in this kind. Well might the Roman Patriarch have precedence in order, as agreeable to the Dignity of the City, which though ſhe was Queen of the Empire, yet could not create him any Title to one ſingle (not to ſay a Triple) Crown.

Inſtances of their Coequal Power.

Enſigns of Honour pay'd then to Patriarchs.

26. To (a) Patriarchs only, after the Emperours, was that Royal Ceremony of having Fire or Lights carried before them, an ancient Cuſtom in the time of Balſamon, and taken firſt out of Perſia. Other Enſigns of Honour they had, which became afterwards common to the Metropolitans, as Croſſes, Palls, &c. Next to the Patriarch was the Primate, and although not in Dignity, yet in Power equal to him, if we believe (b) Gratian; but this opinion ſeemeth to have proceeded from the ambiguity and promiſcuous uſe of the Words, which in this Controverſie of Church Government hath begot ſtrange Errors and Contentions,

as

(a) Cyprian l. 3. Ep. 13.
(b) Naz. Orat. 18.
(c) Spolat. de Rep. Eccleſ. l. 2. c. 7.
(d) Rabanus ubi ſuprà c. 4. & 5.
(e) Euariſt. Ep. 2.
(f) Sub. Menna Act. 5.
(g) Act. 4. & alibi.
(h) Novel. 42
(i) Act. 13.
(k) Act. 3.
(l) Epiſt. ad Tharas. in Conc. Nicen. Act. 2.
(m) Johanni & Eleutherius in Epiſt.
(n) Bel. lib. 1. de Pontif. c. 31.

(a) Balſam. in reſpons. ad Patriarch. privileg.
(b) Diſtinct. 99. De primat.

as will be ſeen hereafter ; ſeeing there were other Primates beſides the five Patriarchs, who owed ſome ſort of obedience to them receiving , and performing their orders in aſſembling Councils and other buſineſs. And as theſe Primates were diſtinguiſhed from Patriarchs, properly ſo called, ſo alſo Conſtituted a peculiar Degree and Dignity above other Metropolitans ; notwithſtanding what ſome Object from an Epiſtle of Pope Boniface, that two Provinces could not be ſubject to one and the ſame Perſon: For not to make uſe of what might be objected againſt theſe Epiſtles ; this expreſſion may well be admitted in this ſence, that no one Perſon could ſo præſide over two Provinces, as to exerciſe the Function of a Metropolitan in any other than his own Province: For when Primates were ordained any where, care was taken to preſerve the Rights of Metropolitans inviolate, as appears from ſeveral examples. But though Preſidents ſhould fail in this Caſe, yet the nature of the thing doth evidently demonſtrate it : For if the Primate ſhould exerciſe the office proper to a Metropolitan, what need were there of a Metropolitan ? if a Metropolitan that of a Biſhop in his Province , what need were there of a Biſhop ? Therefore the Biſhop his Paræcia is ſubject to him in a certain and peculiar manner , wherein it is not ſubject to a Metropolitan: The Caſes of Viſitation, Appeal, and others Canonical excepted, otherwiſe there would be Biſhops, but all Biſhops, Vicars, or Vicegerents only of Metropolitans ; but as St. Cyprian ſaith, there is one Biſhoprick, whereof all are partakers in Solidum : So is a Province in ſo peculiar a manner, ſubject to a Metropolitan, as not to a Primate, except in Caſes expreſſed in Law ; and whatſoever a Metropolitan may do in his Province, a Primate may not ; elſe there would be no Metropolitans, but all Vicegerents of Primates. And ſuch is the eaſe of a Patriarch, in reference to that of Primates ; the ſeveral Rights Patriarchical, Exarchical, Metropolitical and Epiſcopal being diſtinct and ſeveral, whereof none could be juſtly invaded : The Patriarch in his own Parœcia exerciſe Epiſcopal juriſdiction ; viſited thoſe under him, aſſigned them Governours, and did other matters too long to be recited : In his own Province he had Metropolitical juriſdiction, not Epiſcopal ; in his Dioceſs Exarchical or that of a Primate, not Metropolitical nor Epiſcopal ; in his Patriarchate, he had Patriarchical, not Exarchical, Metropolitical or Epiſcopal.

Conſulas Morinum Exer. 23. & 24. l. 1.

Patriarchical, Exarchical, Metropolitical, Epiſcopal Juriſdiction diſtinct.

27. To Primates therefore firſt, this is obſerved to have been due as a Priviledge to approve and confirm Biſhops and Metropolitans Canonically Elected. Secondly, They examined and paſſed judgment on ſuch matters as had been determined and judged in Provincial Synods. For from Provincial Synods, appeal lay to Primates ; and Thirdly, To them belonged the Celebration of Dioceſan Councils, ſummed out of ſeveral Provinces , Primates having Authority, when they judged it convenient, to make ſuch Aſſemblies. Fourthly, They were appointed as Watch-men in ſo many Watch-Towers ; and Overſeers in the Name of the Patriarch, to inquire and obſerve, whether Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline was diligently obſerved ; and affording, an helping and healing hand where it was wanted. Inſomuch, that they had not only power of calling Synods of ſeveral Provinces , but in urgent Affairs, to ſend for Biſhops out of divers Provinces, and with them to debate and ſettle Matters ; which was given to the Biſhop of Arles, by ancient cuſtom in the days of Gregory the Great, who defines twelve to be a compleat number of ſuch Aſſiſtants. Fifthly, They gave Certificates of Letters, commendatory to all Clerks, Metropolitans and Biſhops, travelling out of their Dioceſs ; by vertue whereof they might be received into Communion with other Churches : That thoſe things were always and univerſally true cannot be ſaid, but often or for the moſt part, and never juſt except the Authority of Princes was therein duly conſidered ; who, beſides their undoubted right of being nurſing Fathers to the Church, are owned by thoſe * that would rather place that honour in the Biſhop of Rome, as Author of new Sees in the time even of Juſtinian.

Idem ibid.

The Priviledge and power of Primates in the Church.

* Fileſacus ex Demetrio Chomatero Balſamone & aliis l. de ſacr. Epiſt. author. C. 7.

28. It appears from the Preface to (a) one of the Emperours Conſtitutions, that this Power then reſided in Princes, to change and make new Sees of Metropolitans, the Authority of whom, we are next to conſider : of Metropolitans there were two ſorts, in latter times, one, which was ſubject to the Primate, and another that acknowledged no Subjection ; ſuch thoſe Arch-Biſhops accounted themſelves, that were not ſubject to any Primate. And ſuch were all the Metropolitans of Africk, who were called Primates, but never Exarchs ; as (b) one obſerves, as if this name was only proper to the Primates of Dioceſſes (not of Provinces) ſuch as the Biſhop of Carthage, who by (c) Leo the Ninth, is ſtiled Maximus Africæ Metropolitanus, the greateſt Metropolitan of Africk: And yet (d) Juſtinian glories that he had ſet that Biſhop over all Africk, and the ſame Perſon obſerves, that he

The Authority of Metropolitans.

Two Sorts of them.

(a) Novel. 11.

(b) Berterius Pythan. Diatr. 1.

(c) Epiſt. 4.

(d) Novel. 131.

he rather reſtored him to his Dignity, after the Vandals were expelled that Country, than beſtowed any new honour on that See ; ſo that if the other Biſhops were ſubject to him, they muſt be ſubject to him not as a Patriarch, but a Primate, and therefore could not properly and ſtrictly be ſtiled Primates themſelves : However, if they owned no ſubjection to Primates, their Power though not their Dignity, was ſuitable to theirs. If under their inſpection their juriſdiction was ſubordinate to theirs, as that of the Primates to the Patriarchs in matters of Synods, Appeals, and other matters, lyable to the cognizance of Superiours ; they preſiding in the manner and Governing thoſe Arch-Biſhops and Biſhops, that were within the limits of their Metropolitical juriſdiction.

29. For in the Greek or Eaſtern Church, it's manifeſt that for ſome time there was a diſtinction betwixt Metropolitans and Arch-biſhops, who Conſtituted a peculiar Rank or Order betwixt them and Biſhops. And for that time the Arch-Biſhop was within the juriſdiction of the Metropolitan : At length thoſe Arch-Biſhops were exempted from their power, and ordained by the Patriarch, as appears from Balſamon and the Notitia of Metropolitans and Arch-Biſhops ſubject to the Conſtantinopolitan Patriarch, to whom Innocent the Third Biſhop of Rome, after Conſtantinople was ſubjected to the Latins willingly aſcribes that Office. But excepting this caſe of the Greeks, Arch-biſhops were the ſame with Metropolitans, having the ſame power of Ordination, aſſembling Synods, and receiving Appeals within their reſpective Provinces, if in Priviledge and Authority they were really ſuch ; for we find that in the Eaſt towards the decay of the Empire, there were ſome called Arch-biſhops, who had no juriſdictioon over other Biſhops, meerly titular, and ſo named only becauſe they had honour and præcedence before their fellow Biſhops of the ſame Province.

Chalced. conc. can. 12. vide Morinum p. 77. & 217. Berterium pith. diatrib. 2. c. 3.

Titular Metropolitans.

30. The Power, Office, and Authority of a Biſhop (wherein all thoſe ſorts agree) being in power and juriſdiction, not in order diſtinct from one another) is moſt weighty and conſiderable, moſt controverted, and of late impugned. At firſt the Presbyters as we ſaid under the Apoſtles in common care and Council Governed the Church ; but by degrees neceſſity of Peace and Order brought the Goverment upon one mans ſhoulders, though ſupported by the aſſiſtance of others ; for what St. (a) Cyprian ſaith of after times, may well be applyed to the moſt Primitive, that thence Hereſies and Schiſms aroſe, becauſe Gods Prieſts was not obeyed, and ſome one was not thought of, who for a time ſhould be Judge of the Church, in the room of Chriſt ; by which words he means not the Biſhop of Rome, as ſome vainly imagine but himſelf.

The Power, Office and Authority of Biſhops in the Church.

31. The moſt certain note of difference betwixt Biſhops and Presbyters, this became, that in every City were ſeveral or many Presbyters, but only one Biſhop, except any by force intruded and made a Schiſm, or the Biſhop by reaſon of Sickneſs or Age, was neceſſitated to have an aſſiſtant ; who yet in his preſence was of no Authority. Another note and a part of his power was impoſition of hands upon Biſhops and Presbyters, called Conſecration and Ordination, which (b) St. Jerome, otherwiſe thought no friend, makes peculiar to him in the moſt Primitive times, although in his own, the Cannons had given much more authority to a Biſhop, in this duty, the Presbyters preſent (at the Ordination of a Presbyter) as appeareth from the Fourth Carthaginian Council, were to lay their hands alſo on the Head of the Ordained, whilſt the Biſhop held his thereon, and bleſſed the Party, rather in teſtimony of their conſent, than as partakers in the Office of Conſecration, which the Church believed ſo proper to Biſhops, that Presbyters of themſelves could not perform, and therefore (c) declare ſuch as was performed by them as null, nay although the (d) Biſhop impoſed his hands becauſe a Presbyter read the words of Conſecration ; Sometimes it happened that a Biſhop had (e) but one Presbyter under him, who might for juſt cauſe be removed elſewhere, yet that this Biſhop having not a Presbyter left, might ordain others if he would, and if he could make none of his own, might have elſwhere ſome to ordain according to the number he had loſt : Whereby it appears that a Biſhop though he had not a Presbyter at all to Celebrate the Office of Ordination with him, might alone by himſelf either ordain his own Clerks, or thoſe procured from other places : All Laws Eccleſiaſtical and Civil, which have been made againſt the Corruptions in ordaining Prieſts and Deacons, ſpeak in the ſingular number of one, not in the plural of many ; as pointing at the Biſhop as the Agent, who if any offence againſt the Cannons was committed, was ever puniſhed ; not the Conſecration and Ordination being peculiar to them.

(a) Lib. 1. Ep. 3

(b) Ad Evagrium Quid facit excepta Ordinatione Epiſcopus, quod Presbyter non facit.

(c) Athas. Apol. 2. in tit. Presb. Marit ad Canos & Philagr.

(d) Concil. Hiſpal. Can. 4.

(e) Vide Concil. African. c. 56. & Carthag. 3. c. 45.

Presbyters who were not parties, but only Acceſſories or Witneſſes to the Principal.

Other priviledges.

32. From the end of their Inſtitution (which was to prevent Schiſms, and eſtabliſh Power and Peace in the Church) we may well gather, that beſides the power of Ordination, they had the other Priviledges (and Tasks) by St. Paul conferred on Timothy and Titus, viz. Of examining, reproving and removing ſuch Presbyters as were guilty of unſound Doctrine, and corrupt Manners; which were to continue till the coming of Chriſt, not ending with thoſe two, and therefore if belonging to any as their Succeſſors, certainly to Biſhops, who præſiding in their ſeveral Churches, had Paſtoral and Fatherly Power over both People and Presbyters under them, according to their Office: They had and have the Authority of the (a) Apoſtles in the Church, to bind and looſe, elſe how could they puniſh and Conſtrain, and without puniſhment no awe, and without awe, none can preſerve Peace and Order. Where they could not be themſelves preſent, to Preach and Adminiſter the Holy Sacraments, they provided for ſuch places, fit and convenient Paſtors, that they might be Rightly and Chriſtianly inſtructed; took care leſt any Hereſies, Errors or Diſſentions crept up amongſt them; afforded them their Council in doubtful matters, their aſſiſtance in difficult, and without troubling the whole Province, put an end to their private Controverſies and Contentions, excellent effects of Paſtoral Care and Vigilancy. Beſides thoſe things that were connative with their Office, ſucceeding Ages for the ſame reaſons thought fit to enlarge the Bounds of their Power and Priviledges; that all things might be done in Peace, Decency and in Order. Hence came it that by proviſion of Cannons and Cuſtom of the Church, they had many other Prerogatives; as Reconciliation of Penitents, Confirmation and Impoſition of hands on the Baptized, Dedication of Churches and the like: And ſo great was the power intruſted with them, that (b) no Presbyter could baptize without the Biſhops Licenſe, nor Preach if he were preſent, in ſome places.

(a) Greg. hom. 26.

(b) Hierom contra Lucif. & ad Nepotianum.

Having the ſole power of their Dioceſs, in Preaching and giving Licenſe ſo to do.

33. Nay, as ſoon as Eccleſiaſtical Matters came to ſome Form, Regulation and Order, and the Government by Biſhops Prieſts and Deacons eſtabliſhed: Biſhops within their own Dioceſs had the ſole power of Holy Functions, and (although at the firſt beginning of Chriſtianity, moſt things might be common to Presbyters and Biſhops) Prieſts and Deacons might be added to them, to aſſiſt them, and be employed according to occaſion, and their Abilities by their overſight and diſcretion; ſo that a Prieſt might not Baptize nor Adminſter the Holy Communion, nor Teach nor interpret the Scriptures; de loco Superiore Eccleſiæ, as St. Auguſtin calls it, or de Cathedra, as St. Ambroſe, as a διδάσκαλος or a Doctor (for ſo they were then called, that did it either of their own Authority as Biſhops, or was allowed it as Prieſts, according to the Preaching now in uſe) without peculiar allowance of the Biſhop of that Dioceſs. In many places Prieſts were not allowed to do it; it was not then thought to belong to them, but the task of the Biſhop alone, becauſe he in his Office repreſenting more immediately Chriſt himſelf, was looked upon as him from whom Holy Offices were derived: Which made him ſo abſolute in his Dioceſs, that it was accounted great Uſurpation for any Man to challenge any power in Spirituals (as ſuch) but under him, and by his deputation. By reaſon alſo of the inſufficiency of every Prieſt, for ſuch an imployment, as Preaching or Teaching by way of Authority (ſuch as our Pulpit-preaching) which gave them the Title of διδάσκαλοι or Doctors as witneſſeth (a) St. Chryſoſtome, who tells us, that to preach the Goſpel of Chriſt (in this manner) it's well if one or two may be found that are fit: But to baptize, any man that is a Prieſt, and therefore, ſaith he to this day we commit Baptizing (which he only mentions, though much more did belong to a Prieſt, becauſe St. Paul only mentions it in the place he explains) to the weaker, but the buſineſs of Preaching or Teaching to them that are more Learned or Wiſe. And Balſamon upon the Cannons affirms that to teach the People (in this manner) was granted unto Biſhops alone, that to teach the People of God, and interpret divine Decrees, was granted by the grace of the holy Spirit unto the Biſhops only, and to them that are permitted and Authorized by them.

(a) Ad 1 Corinth. c. 1.

34. Both by Sozomen and Socrates, we are aſſured that in Alexandria, the Biſhops only did Preach or Teach the People in this manner; and in the numerous African Churches, as witneſs both St. Jerome and St. Auguſtin, till Valerius his time (by whom Auguſtin was conſecrated) Prieſts were not allowed to preach; this Office being accounted one of the Biſhop his peculiar priviledges) at leaſt not in the preſence of their Dioceſan: Nay, ſo ſtrict was the Ancient times in preſerving the abſoluteneſs of a Biſhop in his Dioceſs, that by ſome Cannons ſuch Biſhop was puniſhed with Depoſition, as preſumed to preach in anothers Dioceſs, without Licence firſt obtained, much leſs could any Prieſt belonging to any other Biſhop do it, who by the Canonical Laws, could not exerciſe his Function or Prieſthood without approbation, to which were required Letters Commendatory from his Prelate; in thoſe times Biſhops whether at home or a broad, if no lawful impediment (as Age, indiſpoſition of body, urgent occaſions, publick buſineſs (ſtrong enough to procure Diſpenſation) did hinder, thought themſelves bound to preach every Sunday, and by ſome Cannons of Councils in ſome places were bound ſo to do; which Cuſtom was much followed in the days of our Famous Queen Elizabeth, and eſpecially by that (a) Jewel of Salisbury (one of the greateſt Divines, and moſt pious Biſhop that ever lived) who to the intreaties of his Friends, adviſing him to preach ſhort and more ſeldom, that he might preach long, was wont to oppoſe that ſaying of (b) Veſpaſian altered and fitted to his own office, Oportet Epiſcopum Concionantem mori.

And puniſhable if without Licence of the Dioceſan.

(a) conveniunt rebus nomina ſæpe ſuis.

(b) Oportet Imperatorem, ſtantem mori.

35. But as Biſhops, their proper work ſeemeth to be Government rather than preaching, and ſo much the Etymology of their name hinteth to us. Indeed being the Miniſters of Chriſt in an eſpecial manner, their office includes all univerſal Duties; which as the ſtate of the Church requireth according to its neceſſities, are to be diſcharged by them, ſo that in times of Ignorance they ought to preach, and other whiles as others Comport, behave themſelves in their general practice, not only acting themſelves, but overſeeing alſo others; directing and ruling Prieſts in their Eccleſiaſtical Functions: By which Acts they are chiefly diſtinguiſhed from inferiour Miniſters. Now beſides theſe Epiſcopi or Biſhops, there were Choreipiſcopi, ſo called from the Country or Villages which they Governed. Their original is by ſome fetcht from Apoſtolical Inſtitution, as if they were made as Succeſſors to the Seventy Diſciples, as Biſhops are to the Apoſtles; but it's uncertain both what time they began, and when preciſely they came to their period. Gratiancites (a) Pope Damaſus telling the Biſhops of Africk, that they were then forbidden throughout the World; but his Succeſſor, Nicolas writes an Epiſtle to Hosbaldus as Chorepiſcopus, ſo that Sormandis (b) the Jeſuit with reaſon affirms both the Epiſtles of Damaſus and Leo the firſt, concerning theſe Chorepiſcopi to be ſpurious, and from Pope Nicolas in his Epiſtle to Radulphus quotes thoſe words in imitation of the ſeventy, Chorepiſcopi were ordained, concerning whom, who can doubt but they had the Offices of Biſhops? Gratian aſſigns this difference betwixt them and Biſhops, that Biſhops could not be ordained but in Cities, but they in Villages; Biſhops granted Letters called Formatæ or Dimiſſoriæ (by which one was exempted from the juriſdiction of his Biſhop, which were wont to be given with great Solemnity) the Chorepiſcopi could only grant Letters Commendatory (called alſo pacificæ, granted to Clerks travelling, whereby they were commended, that they might quietly execute their Office in other Dioceſſes) although the Gloſs denies they could grant them, and makes them only proper to the Biſhops, who alſo had the right of Conſecration, whereas the Chorepiſcopi could only confer the leſſer orders. That pretended Epiſtle of Leo, reckons up Ten ſeveral things which belong to the Office of Biſhops, the Chorepiſcopi were not to meddle with. (c) Fileſacus tells us that, a Biſhop being ordained by Hereticks, if afterward he became Catholick, was made Chorepiſcopus: But thoſe ſorts of Prieſts which we may call puny Biſhops (being betwixt a Biſhop and a Presbyter) grew out of uſe by degrees, and Rural (d) Deans came in their room (as it's ſaid) but with a more reſtrained power.

Biſhops govern as well as preach.

Chorepiſcopi ordained.

(a) Quem conſule diſt. 68. & 50. ſtudeat.

(b) Antioch. 2. contra Patrum Aurelium.

(c) Ex conc. Regienſi in Gallia Narbonenſi can. 3. tract. de orig. paræch. c. 2.

(d) vide moreuſim in cucchi Juſt. Canon lib. tit. 3.

The office of Presbyter, Prieſt or Curate.

36. The next in the order of this Hierarchy, was the Presbyter or Prieſt, who by direction and under the inſpection of the Biſhop, Celebrated Divine Service, Adminſtred the Sacraments, and preached Gods Word; of all thoſe the Paræcus, Parſon or Pariſh Prieſt, is moſt conſiderable. The rank of Curates (the ſame with our Parſons, in French called Curès, ſaith Gerſon, (a) is the next in order to that of Biſhops; it's manifeſt, in that the ſame Hierarchical duties are incumbent upon them as upon the other, although not in ſo excellent a degree: For it's their duty to Puriſie thoſe committed to their charge by conviction and reproof, to illuminate them by Teaching and Preashing, and to adminiſter the Satraments; and they are bound, if occaſion be, as well as Biſhops, to lay down their life for their Sheep

(a) Patre. 3. de Concil. Evaagel. & ſtatu perfectionis.

Sheep; ſo that when Chriſt ſent abroad the Seventy Diſciples, to whom ſucceed Curates, both according to the opinion of Divines and Lawyers, he committed in effect the ſame Charge to them as he did to the Apoſtles. Elſewhere (b) he writeth that this rank of Curates was figured in the old Law by the Levites, that it was Inſtituted by Chriſt and his Apoſtles in the very beginning of the Church, which Inſtitution became more evident by the Declarations of Popes, and as well General as Particular Councils. So doth Gerſon deſcribe this ſort of Eccleſiaſtical Miniſters, and without any Partiality, although being Chancellor of the Univerſity of Paris, he was alſo Curè or Pariſh Prieſt of St. John in Grave in the ſame City, as his Learned Country-man Fileſacus (c) engageth himſelf to evince.

A Pariſh Prieſt deſcribed

Their Original.

Their ſeveral ſorts of Names.

Curatus whence.

37. He deſcribes our Paræcus or Pariſh-Prieſt, to be one aſſigned to ſome certain Churches, as having the overſight of a People, in behalf of which he officiates, which he is obliged to teach, and to Adminiſter the Holy Sacraments, and who for ſo doing ought to be maintained by the Offerings of thoſe that are committed to his charge. Concerning their Original, he ſuppoſes certain Prieſts to have been Ordained at firſt by St. Peter, as the number of the Faithful increaſed in Rome, and from the Pontifical Hiſtory of Pope Damaſus, indeavoureth to prove that they were reduced to a certain number by Cletus, and he Proſecutes their Hiſtory as well to other places as Rome, proving that in moſt antient times, Pariſhes in many Countries were Eſtabliſhed. Here let our Reader take notice of the ſeveral ſorts of Names by which this Prieſt is called. Sometimes Paræcus and Parochus, ſometimes he is ſaid to be a Presbyter, Ordained or Inſtituted in a Pariſh or Church, for by the Sixth Cannon of the Firſt Council of Chalcedon, no Prieſt is to be Ordained, but to ſome certain Place or Church, which Law was indeed of force in the moſt Primitive times. At Rome it being ſometimes requiſite to have ſeveral Prieſts in one Church, over them all one was ſet, who was therefore called Presbyter Cardinalis or Principal Prieſt, which Title was not confined to the City, but given alſo to other Prieſts, whoſe charge lay in the Country. Sometime he is called Presbyter or Prieſt ſimply without any addition; other whiles he is underſtood by the word Sacerdos, ſometimes ſtiled Rector Eccleſiæ, Proprius Presbyter, Presbyter Parochianus, Presbyter Plebis, and Plebanus, Presbyter Parochitanus and Parrochialis, Clericus Paræcialis, Clericus Localis. And, as in Councils he is diſtinguiſhed by the name of Presbyter not ſeldom, as being more truly ſo than others under him, ſo is he called ſimply Clericus, as Principal or above other Clerks. In more late times we meet with the names of Curio and Curatus, not derived from the antient Roman Curiones, as ſome have imagined, ſeeing it was never heard of till thoſe latter Ages, but from the care and ſollicitude they ought to have for their Flocks; and it was firſt brought up by the Cannons of the Gallican Church. We in like manner have the word Perſona or Parſon peculiar to us in England. And it muſt not be omitted, that this ſame Prieſt is ſometimes called Presbyter and Clericus Dioceſanus.

Dioceſis and Paræcia what.

38. For in the antient Monuments of the Church, it is often found that the words Dioceſis and Paræcia are promiſcuouſly uſed. Dioceſis ſometimes ſignifies the ſame thing which we in the preſent Modern Sence call a Pariſh, although moſt commonly by it is meant a Territory of great Extent both in an Eccleſiaſtical and Civil Senſe, as formerly we have obſerved. By Paræcia (rather to be written † Paroecia) at the beginning of Chriſtian Religion, and not a few Ages after, was not meant a Society or Communion of Neighbours meeting at the ſame Church, but that which we call now a Dioceſs or a Biſhoprick. Fileſacus traces it down beyond the Nephews of Charles the Great, as far as Arnulphus the Emperour. This promiſcuous uſe of Names which we find to be very frequent in the Hierarchy, is to be attributed partly to the extent of their ſignification, many being applicable to the ſame Perſon and thing in ſeveral reſpects, partly to the viciſſitude of all Humane Affairs, wherein Language hath a very great ſhare, nothing more depending upon the Fancy of the Vulgar: and partly to the Latitude of the Chriſtian Church, which extending it ſelf through all places and Countries, no wonder that it receives diverſity of Terms, for we ſee particular Regions, though of the ſame Language in groſs, yet have ſeveral Dialects and Idioms. Notwithſtanding the promiſcuous uſe of words, the things themſelves are not ſo hard to be diſtinguiſhed, but that their diverſity may be diſcourſed

(b) De Statutis eccleſiaſticis tit. de ſtatu curatorum conſid. 1.

(c) De Paræciarum Orig. c. 4.

† From the Greek παροικία.

diſcovered by unprejudiced minds, although with that difficulty which ever accompanies matter remote, and of ſo large a diſtance.

The Office of a Deacon in the Church.

39. At length we arrive at the loweſt ſtep of thoſe Sacred Promotions, and that is the Office of a Deacon. To a Deacon it (a) belonged to aſſiſt the Biſhop and Prieſt, and miniſter in all things concerning the Sacraments of Chriſt, to receive Offerings, and Preach (or read) the Goſpel, the New Teſtament being delivered to him for this purpoſe. To him alſo belonged the Offices of Prayer, writing of the Names of ſuch as were to be Ordained, Baptized, the Dead and Excommunicate. He was wont to exhort unto Prayer, and give notice in the Celebration of Divine Offices, give the uſual Bleſſing, and publiſh the Feſtivals of the Church. Such was the Polity of the Antient Primitive Apoſtolick Church for the main, Ordained and Eſtabliſhed by Chriſt's Apoſtles, circumſtantiated according to the Exigence of Affairs, and that Liberty which our Saviour hath left to his Officers in Matters of Prudence, Decency and Order. And no other ſorts of Orders dare we acknowledge of Divine Right; the (b) Romaniſts themſelves confeſſing that the leſſer ſorts have no ground in Scripture. Dionyſius who calls himſelf the Areopagite owneth only the Three Orders of Biſhops, Prieſts and Deacons. The Cannons that go under the name of the Apoſtles, reckon but Five, of Biſhops, Prieſts, Deacons, Readers and Chanters. The Maſter of the Sentences himſelf confeſſeth that the Church in ſucceeding times Ordained Sub-deacons and Acolythi, ſo that farther the Canoniſts for their number of Nine, nor the Divines for that of Seven, can bring any certain thing out of the beſt and pureſt Antiquity. But how theſe might come in, as alſo concerning the nature of their Offices, beſides concerning the Original and Nature of other Dignities, which the Prudence of latter Ages thought fit to Eſtabliſh, we ſhall ſpeak upon occaſion in their due and moſt proper place.

(a) Diſt. 25. Perlectis.

Dominus vobiſcum pax vobiſcum.

(b) Forinus Jeſuita cont. 26. n. 2.

(c) Lombard. 4. diſt. 24. lit. I.

The Sallary of the Spiritual Souldiers.

40. But having given a proſpect of this ſtately Primitive Building, it remains to ſhew, how in an Humane way it was maintained, how theſe Officers ſubſiſted, what was the Sallary of theſe Spiritual Souldiers, and what ſtrength the Secular Arm afforded to the Spiritual, in the erecting of its Authority and Power. At firſt all things were common amongſt Chriſtians, afterward this Community ceaſing, when the cauſe was removed, this Cuſtom was introduced, that all Contributions towards the Maintenance of the Miniſtry ſhould be at the diſpoſal of the Biſhop. This being divided into Four parts, he himſelf had one, his Clergy another, the Third was diſtributed to the Poor, and the Fourth was reſerved for the Repairing of Churches; thoſe times of Perſecution affording all ſorts of Diſcouragements to needy Perſons, and being ſo far from Contributing to the ſupport of thoſe Religious Edifices, that they rather were imployed in Burning the Temples and Worſhippers together. At this time Prieſts were Arbitrarily ſent into ſome certain place or Pariſh by the Biſhop, whoſe Revenues and Work were not then ſo great, but that he could eaſily undergo the trouble of Inſpection over his whole Dioceſs, inſomuch that all Dues were paid to him, and by him to his Clergy; which Dues, if Credit may be given to an Arabick Cannon of the Firſt Nicene Council, were Collected by the care of the Chorepiſcopus.

Beda lib. 1. c. 27.

41. After that Chriſtianity was more diffuſed and ſettled, and that particular Churches were aſſigned to Reſidentiary Incumbents, a more certain way of Livelyhood was obtained, and the Maintenance of the Miniſter became the Burden of the Soil. When Kings once became Nurſing Fathers and Queens Nurſing Mothers to the Church, Biſhops were preſently provided of an ample and certain Revenue. Their Endowments conſiſted not in Tithes, but in good Temporal and Forable Land beſtowed on them by Princes and other Benefactors. This appeareth out of the Code (a) where we find ſeveral Laws of Conſtantine the Great, and other Emperours, down to the time of Juſtinian himſelf, both for conferring of Lands upon the Church, and ſuch Lands as ſhould neither be Barren, nor burdened with Statute or other Debts of the Exchequer, as alſo for the preſerving of Lands in ſuch manner conferred: and if thoſe Emperours had any occaſion to change the Lands of the Church, they would ever (b) allow them ſuch as ſhould be of as good value or better. Pariſh Prieſts were maintained by Tithes which were paid even before the Reformation by Conſtantine, as appeareth from St. Cyprian (c) who adviſeth the Clergy of his time, ſeeing they had

(a) Lib. 1. de ſacros. Eccleſ. & de Epiſc. & clericis tot. tit.

(b) Authent. de non alterand. herred. Eccleſ. &c.

(c) Epiſt. 66.

UMI

had Tithes allotted for their Maintenance, that they ſhould not withdraw themſelves from the Service of God. The orderly aſſignment of Tithes to every Pariſh is aſcribed to Dionyſius Biſhop of Rome, who in imitation of St. Paul's appointing Biſhops in Cities, is ſaid alſo to have made and diſtinguiſhed Pariſhes about the Year 266, into ſuch Form as now they retain. Cod. lib. 1.

Juriſdiction in Eccleſiaſtical Affairs given to the Church.

42. Then foraſmuch as it was neceſſary that the Spiritual Power ſhould be ſtrengthened and aſſiſted by the Temporal, purity of Doctrine in the Church not always procuring goodneſs of Manners, that which to ſome is Religion, being to others no more than Faction, and Love being too cold to procure perfect Obedience, except it was backed by awe and fear; to Biſhops was granted peculiar Juriſdiction by Chriſtian Emperours, Thoſe extended to Perſons and Cauſes Eccleſiaſtical, ſuch as touched the Soul and Conſcience, and appertained to Charitable and Godly Uſes: To the Laity alſo ſo far forth as it either concerned their Souls Health, or the external Government of the Church in things decent and comely; or as reſpected poor and miſerable Perſons, ſuch as Widdows, Orphans, Captives, and ſuchlike helpleſs People, or where the Civil Magiſtrate could not be come by, or willfully delayed Judgment, in which Caſes the Prelate was to diſcharge the Office both of an upright Judge and an Holy Biſhop. Againſt Hereticks and thoſe that diſturbed the Peace of the Church, they had Power alſo granted, not only to confute them by Learning and rational Diſcourſe, but alſo to ſuppreſs them by Authority. All which the Fourth Book of Juſtinian's Code doth ſufficiently declare.

CHAP. III.

From the firſt Nicene Council called by Conſtantine, to the Apoſtacy of Julian.

The ſpace of Thirty ſix Years.

Arius a diſcontented Heretick.

Niceph. l. 8. c. 9. Theodor. l. 1. c. 1. &c. Sozom. l. 1. c. 14. Epiphan. l. 2. Tom. 2. Her. 69. Soc. l. 1. c. 6.

1. Conſtantine having delivered the Church from Perſecution and other external Preſſures, it began ſpeedily to be more afflicted than uſual by internal Evils. The pinching Cold of Adverſity makes us keep cloſe and unite together, nipping the Paſſions of Strife and Æmulation in their Bloſſoms, but in the Sunſhine of Proſperity we ſeparate our ſelves, and the evil Roots of Pride, Vain-glory, Hatred and Contention, then put forth and ſprout amaine. One Arius gave the occaſion to theſe Diſtempers, a Man born (for publick Miſchief) as moſt Writers ſay in Alexandria, Educated at School in Antioch, where he attained a Competency of Humane Learning, and having by his good Parts grown into Fame for Philoſophy, fell to the Study of Divinity. Thence furniſhed with competent Learning, he returned to Alexandria, where he ſo well behaved himſelf, that he was admitted to be a Deacon by Peter the Biſhop, but joyned himſelf with the Diſciples of Meletius, who had made a Separation from that Church, accuſing the Biſhop of Auſterity, for not having received Meletius too readily to Communion after he had, for fear of Death, offered Incenſe to the Heathen Gods. After the Martyrdom of Peter, at his return to Alexandria, he was by Achillas his Succeſſor, reſtored to Communion with them, and ſo continued till he was become one of the Presbyters there, and till Achillas died. He ſeemed then a Competitor with Alexander the following Biſhop, and failing of his Expectation, grew diſcontented, and thence fell into the itch of diſputing certain Principles of Religion, and hard Points (as Hereticks are obſerved to do) in the concourſe of People.

Diſputing about the Trinity gains ſeveral Proſelytes.

2. Having the Advantage which ſo abſtruſe and high a Point as the Myſtery of the Trinity affords, beſides the Ignorance of the Times, and the eaſineſs of Vulgar Spirits, he made ſuch progreſs in his deſign, that he had ſoon gained Seven hundred Women, ſuch as placed Sanctity in the Profeſſion of Virginity, beſides Seven Presbyters and Twelve Deacons, before Alexander the Biſhop took any notice of it. At length Miletius having diſcovered it by the Poyſoning of certain of his own Sect, Alexander by Preaching and Argument endeavoured to obviate the growing Miſchief, wherein Arius found himſelf ſo concerned, that he fell into a Conteſt, and poſſeſſed the People with an Opinion that their Biſhop maintained the Doctrine of Sabellius, ſo that Alexander was conſtrained to Aſſemble a Provincial Synod, as well to juſtifie himſelf from ſuch unjuſt Aſperſions, as to determine the Matter concerning Arius. But he managed the Affair with too much mildneſs, inſomuch that the Arians were rather emboldened. For although the Synod determined againſt the Arian Tenets, and inhibited Arius from further publiſhing any ſuch Opinions, yet, when they came to Subſcribe, Ten Perſons refuſed, as well as Arius, of which number Five were Presbyters, and as many Deacons: The Multitude was ſtill for the neweſt Opinion, and was prejudiced much againſt the Truth by that Reverence which now it bore to the Perſon of Arius. For he had a ſmooth and flattering Tongue, was of a winning Behaviour, though ſerious Aſpect, and indeed every way a goodly Perſon; a very prevalent means to procure reſpect (even Cæteris imparibus) from ordinary Capacities, eſpecially thoſe of the weaker Sex.

But is condemned by a Provincial Synod.

His Tenets.

Philaſtr. de hæreſ. Caſſiod. trip. hiſt. lib. 1. c. 12. &c. Niceph. l. 8. c. 5. &c. Hieron. Aug. &c.

3. Now therefore he held and publiſhed theſe following Doctrines with more Reſolution and Animoſity. "First, That the Son of God is like unto God in "Name only, but not in Subſtance. Secondly, That the Father, Son, and Holy "Ghoſt, are not of the ſame Nature, Power and Majeſty, inaſmuch as the Father
"alone is the Inviſible God, and alone to be Worſhipped; the Son may be called
"God,

" God, but is a created God, being the Son of God by Adoption, and not by " Nature, for there was a time when he had no being at all. Thirdly, That yet " the Son of God was the firſt Creature that ever God made, and was made " of thoſe things which have no exiſtence, and is the moſt excellent of all " Creatures. Fourthly, That the Son of God is the Inſtrument of God his " Father; by whom he made all other Creatures, yet doth he not know his " Fathers Secrets, nor comprehend his Nature and Eſſence. Fifthly, That the " Son is not Infinite as his Father is, for when he lived in the World with " Men, he was not then in Heaven with his Father, and that his Kingdom ſhall " end with the World. Sixthly, That the Holy Ghoſt is a Creature, Created of " the Son of God, knowing neither the Secrets and Nature of the Father nor the " Son, being much Inferior in Nature and Dignity to them both, their Subject " and Servant.

4. Arius refuſing to ſubſcribe the Decrees of the Alexandrian Synod, and proceeding in the publication and owning of his Opinions, was with his Followers He is Excommunicated. ejected from their ſeveral Benefices, and from Communion with the Church. Yet, as it happened in ſuch caſes, being eſteemed Confeſſors for this their Suffering, and more eſteemed by the Ignorant and prejudiced ſort, was he ſo much flocked after, that Tumults aroſe, and ſeveral Outrages were committed, to the great Scandal of the Chriſtian Faith. The Proceedings of the Alexandrian Council were now the general diſcourſe of the Chriſtian World. Alexander the Biſhop, to prevent and avoid falſe Repreſentations, was conſtrained by Letter to ſeveral Churches to make Relation of Particulars, which gained belief according to the Inclination of the Receivers; and ſtill the Arians ſeemed to get ground. The Biſhop then conſidering what influence Preaching hath upon the Multitude, and how the Pulpits were made to ſerve the Deſigns of Factions and Heretical Spirits, Humour, Paſſion, Ignorance, and all Diſtempers paſſing under the Vizard of Gods Word, he ordained that no Prieſt in Alexandria ſhould Preach without eſpecial Licenſe firſt obtained. This proved ſo efficacious a Counter-plot to their Devices, that Arius forſook his Poſt, and departed into Goes into Palæſtine. Palæſtine, where meeting with leſs oppoſition, he got opportunity to Preach and gather Companies together, as he and his Party had been accuſtomed.

5. Yet were thoſe of Palæſtine ſo ſenſible of the good Effects of Order and Government, that they preſſed Arius to ſubmit to his Biſhop, and return into Applies himſelf to Euſebius Biſhop of Nicomedia. Communion with him. But he not able to ſtoop ſo low, repairs to Euſebius Biſhop of Nicomedia, his old Acquaintance when he ſtudied at Antioch, who having heard his Tale, ſo far complies with him, as to repair to the Emperour, and miſrepreſent to him the Dealings of the Council of Alexandria. Conſtantine became ſo taken with Euſebius, that ever after he had much his Ear, and in Church Matters had great Application made to him. Thinking himſelf no mean Man, he writes to Alexander, adviſes him to paſs by the matter concerning Arius, and receive him and his Followers again into Communion, other Churches he ſtirs up to reſiſt the Proceedings of the Alexandrian, and ſtrengthens the Hands of the Meletians in their Faction and Schiſm. By this means the buſineſs came to more Heat and Contention, and Sylveſter Biſhop of Rome much Upon which a General Council is ſummoned at Alexandria. concerned himſelf in it; by his endeavours a General Council is appointed at Alexandria, over which præſided Hoſius Biſhop of Corduba in Spain. He taking Nicomedia in his way, where the Emperour then reſided, received his Letters to Alexander and Arius, wherein one may perceive the Finger of Euſebius, ſo ſlight a matter they make of the Difference betwixt them two. But Hoſius, notwithſtanding his great Abilities and Endeavours, could do little good, the Council ending without any conſiderable Concluſion. Yet the ſeveral Caſes of Iſchyras Athan. Apol. 2. and Coluthus are remarkable, of whom Coluthus a Prieſt, bearing himſelf as a Biſhop, and Iſchyras a Lay-perſon, as a Prieſt, was reduced into Order by the Fathers. The Hereſie of Sabellius alſo, though formerly condemned, yet in thoſe Parts having again got ground was now exploded, and for that he had confounded the Three Perſons in the Trinity, taking away all diſtinction by means of this Synod, one οὐσία or Eſſence was ſaid to be in the Bleſſed Trinity, and three ὑποστάσεις or Perſons, from which Terms afterwards a great Controverſie aroſe.

6. Little

Who do nothing in that Matter.

6. Little good proceeding from the Council of Alexandria, or any other means of Reconcilement, the Empire began to be generally infected with the Diſtemper of Arianiſm, ſo that againſt a Diſeaſe ſo Epidemical as this was like to prove, ſome Catholick Remedy was to be provided; ſuch, an Univerſal or General Council out of the whole Empire ſeemed to be, which Conſtantine at length reſolved ſhould be Summoned to Nice, a City of Bithinia, as moſt convenient for all Parts, by reaſon of its Scituation. Now in this reſpect was the Scene of Affairs happily changed. Formerly in great Fear and Secreſie did the Biſhops and others aſſemble to compoſe Differences ſprung up in the Church; Great and Solemn Meetings would have given occaſion of Jealouſie and Cruelty to have been exerciſed upon ſo many Paſtors ſo opportunely met at one time and place. Before thoſe times Differences went not out of one City, or at the moſt out of a Province: now by reaſon of the Liberty of meeting together they extended themſelves over the whole Empire; wherefore it was neceſſary that Councils (the uſual remedy) ſhould alſo be aſſembled from places at a farther diſtance.

Another Council at Nice in Bithinia.

Vide Paulum Venetum in Concilii Tridentini Hiſt.

Which is ſtiled a General Oecumenical Council.

7. Hereupon a Council of the whole Empire being Aſſembled, now by the (ſole) Authority of the Prince, it had the Name of the Holy and Great Synod, and a little after was called the General and Oecumenical Council, though it were not Aſſembled from all parts of the Church, a conſiderable part whereof, even long before this time, having extended it ſelf beyond the Limits of the Roman Empire, but becauſe it was the Cuſtom of thoſe Ages to call the Emperour Lord of the whole habitable Earth, although the Tenth part of it was not ſubject to him. After this pattern were Councils called by the Succeſſors of Conſtantine, upon all ſuch urgent Occaſions, as well after that the Empire was divided into Eaſtern and Weſtern, as before, the Affairs thereof being ſtill managed under a common name as well Secular as Eccleſiaſtical. But when the Eaſt came ſo to be divided from the Weſt, that there remained no more Communion in the Soveraignty, as it happened after the promotion of Charles the Great, after that, the laſt was for the moſt part poſſeſſed by Saracens, and the Weſt Cantonized into many Kingdoms and Signories, the name of an Oecumenical and Univerſal Council was no more derived from the Roman Empire, but amongſt the Græcians from the Aſſembly of the Five Patriarchs, and in the more Weſtern parts from the Unity and Communion of ſuch Kingdoms and States as obeyed the Biſhop of Rome in Cauſes Eccleſiaſtical. And the aſſembling of thoſe for the moſt part, hath been not principally for the deciſion of Religious queſtions as formerly, but either to make War in the Holy Land, or to compoſe Schiſms and Diviſions in the Church of Rome, or for the ending of Controverſies between the Biſhops and Chriſtian Princes. All which we ſhall ſee in their proper places.

The Perſons ſummoned who.

8. Councils for about (a) Eight hundred years were called by Chriſtian Emperours and Kings. Unto them firſt, and in the chief place were ſummoned Biſhops, as the moſt proper Paſtors and Rulers of the Church. After them (b) Prieſts or Presbyters had the next place ſitting together with the Biſhops, and giving their voices. Deacons were preſent alſo of old, but ſtood by with the reſt of the People. In (c) the moſt antient times Chriſt and the Holy Ghoſt preſiding, and Charity prevailing againſt all Heat and Paſſion, they adviſed and reſolved without Ceremonies or Forms preſcribed. Before the days of Conſtantine, there being a neceſſity to govern them with ſome order, that Biſhop chiefeſt for Learning, or the greatneſs of his See, or for ſome other reſpect of eminency, had the charge to propoſe and guide the Action and collect the Voices. Afterward the Action was guided by thoſe Princes or Magiſtrates that had called them together, who alſo were perſonally preſent, propoſing, governing the Diſpute, decreeing interlocutorily the occurring Differences, but leaving the Deciſion of the principal Point to the major part of Voices. Conſtantine ſo ordered Matters in this of Nice and others elſewhere, as will be ſeen upon occaſion.

The Management of Matters in Diſpute.

9. Of old, ſometime the Matter was ſo eaſie, that all was diſpatched in one Meeting. Sometime by reaſon of the difficulty or multiplicity of buſineſs, there was neceſſity of making many Seſſions in the ſame Council. But this was done without Ceremony, or with intention only to publiſh what was done before, or digeſted elſewhere, but that the opinion of every one might be underſtood, and the Colloquies, Diſcuſſions, Diſputes, and whatſoever was done or ſpoken, was called the Acts of the Council. The Notaries appointed to Collect the Voices when a Biſhop ſpoke and was not contradicted, wrote not his proper Name, but this The

(a) Cuſanus Omnia octo univerſalia Concilia per Imp. Congregata leguntur.

(b) Conſule Filoſacum de paroch. orig. p. 66. &c.

(c) Vide Paulum Venetum quo prius.

Holy Synod ſaith; when many ſaid the ſame thing, it was written The Biſhops acclaim, or affirm, and the things ſo ſpoken, were taken for Deciſions; if they ſpake in a contrary Senſe, the contrary Opinions were noted with the Names of the Authors, and the Preſidents pronounced. After the Diviſion of the Empire, ſome marks of theſe ancient Councils yet remained in the Weſt, many were celebrated in France and Germany under the Poſterity of Charles the Great, and not a few in Spain under the Gothick Kings. At laſt the Biſhop of Rome his Power prevailing, Princes were abſolutely debarred from medling in Church Matters, whereby the former ſort of Councils grew out of uſe, and that alone remained which was called by Eccleſiaſtical Perſons themſelves, the Convocation of which Provincial Councils was almoſt wholly aſſumed by the Pope, who ſent his Legates to preſide whereſoever he heard that a Council was to be held.

Over all one preſides.

10. At length he aſſumed to himſelf that Power which the Roman Emperours had formerly uſed to convocate a Council of the whole Empire, and preſide himſelf if he were preſent, or in his abſence to ſend Legates to be Preſidents and govern the Action. The Prelates aſſembled, being freed from all fear of a Secular Prince by reaſon of many Indecencies which were multiplied as worldly reſpects increaſed, began to digeſt and order their Matters in private, that they might obſerve more decency in the publick Meeting. In proceſs of time this became a Form, and in Councils beſide the Seſſions, they began to make Congregations of ſome Deputies to ſet in order ſuch Matters as were to be treated of, which in the beginning, if many, were divided, and a proper Congregation aſſigned to every one. But all Indecencies being not hereby removed, becauſe thoſe that were abſent having different Intereſts, raiſed Difficulties in publick; beſides the particular Congregations, they made a general one before the Seſſion, where all were preſent, which according to the antient Rite, is the Conciliary Action, becauſe the Seſſion, every thing being done before, is but a pure Ceremony. But after an Age or two, National Intereſts being different, cauſed Diſſentions amongſt the Biſhops of diverſe Countries; whereupon thoſe that came from far, being few, and judging it unreaſonable to be outvoted by the neighbouring Prelates, who were more in number, to make the ballance equal, it was neceſſary that every Nation ſhould aſſemble by it ſelf, as formerly the Tribes in the Roman Comitia, and reſolve according to the number of Voices, and that the general Deciſion ſhould be Eſtabliſhed, not by the Suffrages of particular Men, but by the Plurality of the Voices of the Nations. This courſe was obſerved in the Councils of Conſtance and Baſil: which uſe, as it was good where the Government was Free, as it was when the World owned no Pope, ſo it ill befitted Trent, where they deſired a Council ſubject to him.

11. But at Nice met Three hundred and eighteen Biſhops from all parts of the Empire, amongſt whom many carried about them the Trophies of their Chriſtian Warfare, Scars all over their Bodies, and mutilation of Members. The Emperour with a ſhort Speech opened the Council, and after general Admonitions commended Two things eſpecially to their Care: the one was for Eſtabliſhing one ſettled Practice in the Church in the Point of keeping Eaſter, and the other was concerning the Arian Doctrine, the principal cauſe of their meeting. The firſt was effected with little or no Conteſt, the Cuſtom of the Weſtern Churches being Eſtabliſhed, and that of the Aſian aboliſhed by Decree of the Council and the Emperours Edict; although from the Acts of the Council now Extant, little appears concerning this Matter. The buſineſs about Arius held them long in Debate, who according to Summons appeared, and maintained his Opinions. The Diſpute againſt him was chiefly managed by Alexander and Athanaſius his Deacon, who charged him with ſuch Tenets as he had formerly maintained at Alexandria. The Council examined his Book called Thalia, wherein were found ſo many of his Opinions, and ſuch Wantonneſs (he being much ſuſpected of Uncleanneſs, in his ordinary Converſation with Women, which he called his Virgins) that it was condemned by the Council and burnt by command of Conſtantine. But when the Fathers ſhould come to eſtabliſh the Orthodox Faith, after they had reſolved againſt Arius his Hereſie, it coſt them ſome labour to invent what Terms were fit to expreſs the co-equal Divinity of God the Son with his Father, ſo as no hole might be left for the Arians to creep out at. At length they reſolved upon the Greek word ὁμοούσιος or Conſubſtantial, which they had obſerved to be much feared and avoided by the Arians from an Epiſtle of Euſebius Biſhop of Nicomedia read in the Synod.

Eaſter ſettled.

Author vitæ Conſtant. c. 16, &c.

The Hereſie of Arius condemned.

12. The Arians perceiving themſelves foiled by the addition of this, thought to reinforce the charge, by putting in the word Unbegotten, with relation to the Father; as thence deducing by conſequence, that the Son was made and Created. But the Fathers aware of their deſign, receiving this word added to it, that the Son was ſo begotten, that he was not made, by which their deſign was quite daſhed; then was drawn up a Formulary of the Catholick Faith: whereof Hoſius, who præſided in the Council, was Author, now called the Nicene Creed, and paſſed June 19. on Saturday. But in this Council, nothing appears to have been added to the Apoſtles Creed, concerning the Holy Ghoſt; which happened by reaſon that nothing was now urged againſt his Divinity by Arius; which courſe was formerly taken up by his Followers, and more privately before this had been practiced by him, it being very ready and in a manner conſequential to him, who denied the Divinity of Chriſt to reject that of the Holy Spirit. Having happily finiſhed the Affair concerning Arius, they ſettled the matter concerning Eaſter; and for that ſeveral Countrys obſerved ſeveral Cuſtoms and Calculations of time, it pleaſed the Synod to commit the charge of the Paſchal Cycles to the Biſhop of Alexandria, in giving notice of the time of Celebation, which was done every Year præceeding; ſeeing that the Letters concerning the time were wont to be publiſhed by the Deacons, on the day of the Epiphany, and by the Biſhop of that City, to be ſent up and down to the Churches of the Weſt.

The Nicene Creed paſs'd

Athanat. Ep. ad ſolit. Soc. Lib. 1. c. 5 Leo. Ep. 64.

13. Having for the better Calculation of time, Eſtabliſhed the Golden Number, containing the period of Nineteen Years, they came to diſcuſs the cauſe of Meletius, the Schiſmatical Biſhop of Lyco, in the Province of Alexandria. This Man for Sacrificing to Idols, in the time of Diocletian, and other cauſes had been deprived of his Biſhoprick by Peter the Metropolitan, who afterwards ſuffered Martyrdom; at which cenſure conceiving great indignation, he ceaſed not to rail againſt Peter, and his Succeſſors, and made a ſeparation from the Communion of the Church; continuing Schiſmatical with a multitude of Followers to this very time. The Synod now tell the Church of Alexandria, and their Brethren throughout Egypt, Lybia and Pentapolis, that they had dealt with him, with more clemency than he deſerved; having decreed that he ſhould remain in his own City without any Epiſcopal power, retaining only the bare, Name and Title of his Office and Dignity, and they reſolved that the Clergy ſhould ſubmit wholly to Alexander, or elſe be deprived of their Spiritual Offices; being alſo to give place to thoſe whom the Metropolitan had ordained: And becauſe that by reaſon of this Schiſm Meletius had throughout Egypt at his pleaſure made many Ordinations, the Synod by a Cannon forbid that in Ægypt, Lybia or Pentapolis, any ſhould be ordained Biſhop without the knowledge of the Metropolitan, (this being the ancient priviledge of the Alexandrian Church) as the Cuſtom was obſerved towards the Roman Biſhop.

Soc. l. 1. c. 6 & 9. ubi vide Epiſt. Synodicam.

Meletius puniſhed.

Council. Nic. c. 6.

14. By this Council were framed Twenty Cannons in all, and no more are to be found in any good and certain Author: Turrian the Jeſuit tells us of Eighty, which having found in the Arabick Tongue he Tranſlated, and Ruffinus counts 22. But Theodoret affirms there were but 20. And whereas many things are cited by Writers of ſucceeding times, as from the Nicene Council, they rather are to be underſtood of the Acts, than the Cannons thereof, rather of paſſages which happened, not directly but accidentally, and recorded in Story, than of the ſolemn decrees of the Fathers; beſides this being the firſt great and Oecumenical Council, all opinions were ambitious, from it to derive deſcent and pedigree; and the Acts afterwards coming to be loſt and imbezeled, whether through the negligence of the Keepers thereof, or which is more likely, through the practice of Hereticks, who were unwilling to be upbraided with ſo urgent a Teſtimony; great latitude was given for pretenders to enlarge the number of the Cannons, and out of them to forge Arguments for the raiſing or upholding of their particular Sects and Opinions.

Lib. 1. c. 8.

The twenty Cannons of the firſt Nicene Council,

15. The firſt of the Twenty received Cannons (a) depoſeth ſuch Clerks, as had voluntarily made themſelves Eunuchs, and prohibits ſuch to be ordained for the future; excepting ſuch as either neceſſity of Cure, or of Force and Violence, had undergone Mutilation from (b) Phiſitians, their imperious Lords, or Cruel and Barbarous Enemies. The Second taking notice, that many contrary to Rule, leapt out of the Font into the Epiſcopal Chair, or the Seat and Office of a Prieſt; having been but lately Catechized (c) or Inſtituted in the Chriſtian Faith; ſtrictly forbids ſuch practice for the time to come, concluding from (d) Apoſtolical

(a) Diſt. 55. Siquis à Medicis.

(b) In the Latin Cannons its Medicis by which both here and in the Imperial Laws, Chyrurgions are underſtood, not thoſe Learned in the Thæory of Phyſick.

(c) Diſt. 48. quoniam multa

(d) 1 Tit. 3.

cal caution againſt a Novice, that a new Convert ſhould both ſtand as a Catechumenus a convenient time, and a Probationer after Baptiſm. If in proceſs of time ſuch an one committed Scandal, and was Convicted by the Teſtimony of two or three Witneſſes, he was to be depoſed, as alſo any ſuch that ſhould Act contrary to this Cannon; which yet, afterwards was diſpenſed with, upon notable occaſions for appeaſing of Tumults, or when the extrordinary worth of a Perſon required it, as in the Caſe of St. Ambroſe and Nectarius. The Third (e) forbids any Biſhop, Prieſt or Deacon, or any Clerk whatſoever, to receive any Woman * as Inmate into his Houſe, except it be his Mother, Grandmother, Siſter or Aunt; in which, and ſuch like Perſons, ſuſpicion may eaſily be declined. By which Cannon nothing was decreed againſt Marriage, that deſign being utterly daſhed by the interpoſition and endeavours of Paphnutius, who diſſwaded the Fathers from laying the unſupportable burthen of Cælibate, upon the back of thoſe whom God and his Church had left free. The Fourth (f) Cannon præſcribes the manner of ordaining or Conſecrating a Biſhop, affirming the Action ought to be performed by all the Biſhops of that Province, if poſſible, but if that may not be, three at leaſt ought to meet for that purpoſe, bringing with them in Writing the conſent of the reſt, and the confirmation of every Province, was to belong to the Metropolitan.

(e) Diſt. 32. Interdixit.

* Subintroductam habere mulierem.

(f) Diſt. 94 Epiſcopi ab omnibus.

16. The Fifth Cannon (a) forbids thoſe that are Excommunicated by ſome, to be received into Communion with others; but to redreſs ſuch inconvenience as might riſe from any Contention or Heat of any Biſhop uſing this cenſure; “ it ſeemed good to the Fathers to ordain that twice every Year a Council of “ Biſhops ſhould be held in each Province, who urgently ſhould examine if any “ complained of ſuch grievance, that ſuch as appeared juſtly cenſured, might be held and eſteemed as Excommunicated Perſons by the reſt, till ſuch time as publickly, or by their own Biſhop they were abſolved. (b) One of thoſe Annual Councils they thought fit ſhould be held before Lent; that all grudges, if any there were, being laid aſide, they might preſent themſelves a Pure and Solemn Offering to Almighty God. The Second Meeting they thought fit ſhould be about Autumn. Now this command concerning the rejecting of thoſe by all that had been Excommunicated by one Biſhop, was not out of conſideration of the ſole Juriſdiction of any particular Biſhop, but of the Nature of the Cenſure, which the Church eſteemed as a thing which ought to be of that great ſtrength and influence that by whomſoever it was applied it might obtain univerſal Force.

(a) 11. qu. Servetur iſta ſententia.

(b) Diſt. 18. Habeatur ſuum conciliam.

17. The Sixth Cannon is of very extraordinary remark, as a great Eye-ſore to certain Noveliſts, who ſeek all manner of ways to cover it by their Gloſſes and Expoſitions, as their adverſaries on the other ſide, ever caſt it in their Diſh. It commands that the Ancient Cuſtom be obſerved throughout Ægypt, Lybia and Pentapolis; ſo that the Biſhop of Alexandria, have Power or Authority over all theſe, foraſmuch as ſuch was the manner or uſe of the Roman Biſhop. In like manner at Antioch, and in the reſt of the Provinces, ſay the Fathers, let every Church enjoy its own Dignity or Honour: However it's manifeſt, that if any be ordained without the conſent and knowledge of his Metropolitan, this great and Holy Council judgeth that he ought not to be a Biſhop. Indeed if two or three out of Animoſity and Contention, ſhall contradict what is generally and rationally and Canonically agreed on, the moſt voices of Prieſts carry it; for Biſhops themſelves are ſo called. The Romaniſts jealous of their Great Biſhops Honour and Authority, labour all ways poſſible to perſwade their Readers that theſe words, for ſuch is the manner (Cuſtom or uſe) of the Roman Biſhops, no way do imply any equally of Power or Juriſdiction bitwixt him and the other of Alexandria, ſome would make them an Argument of his Authority over the Ægyptian Churches, as if ſuch is the Cuſtom of the Roman Biſhop, was to be joyned to thoſe words viz. over, or in the Churches of Alexandria, Pentapolis, &c. And if this will not do, with other of the like ſort, a Latin Edition, of thoſe Cannons, is urged wherein it is read not. Foraſmuch as ſuch is the Cuſtom of the Roman Biſhop; but, Foraſmuch as this ſame is the Cuſtom of the Metropolitan Biſhop. But their Adverſaries ſcarcely think themſevles in Honour obliged to anſwer ſuch ſlight and palpable Gloſſes; although they might oppoſe ſo many ancient Latin Copies, to an obſcure pretended one of Marcellus a Tridentine Legate, not to mention the Greek. And as for the ſence of the words, they ſay it is ſufficiently evinced both by univerſal conſent of pureſt Antiquity, and the Teſtimony of other Councils, eſpecially that of the General Council of Chalcedon, which we ſhall ſcan in its proper place. Thus much at preſent we may obſerve, as a learned Man hath learnedly made out in a peculiar Treatiſe, that firſt Cuſtom introduced the Rights and privi-

Diſt. 65. mos antiquus.

Vide Annot. ad. Conc. Nic. Can. 6. in editione Carania pag. 102.

Priviledges of Patriarchs or Metropolitans: Secondly, Councils confirmed this Cuſtom; and laſtly Emperours who could not but approve of a near agreement and ſimilitude, betwixt the Models of Church and State, Enacted and Confirmed it by their Imperial Authority and Laws.

Dr. Barier De antiqnâ Eccleſiæ Brit. libertate. τὰ ἀρχαῖ ἔθη κράτειτω.

18. The Fathers out of the ſame principle of keeping up Good and Ancient Cuſtoms, as ſenſible of the great Influence of change, further Enact by their Seventh (a) Cannon, that foraſmuch as by ancient Cuſtom and Tradition, Honour was given to Ælia or the Biſhop of Jeruſalem, he ſhould conſequently enjoy the ſaid Honour, provided that the Dignity of the Metropolitan City be preſerved. The Eighth (b) Cannon gives directions how Novatians which returned to the Catholick Church ſhould be received, concluding, that if a Biſhop came over to a Biſhop, if he thought not fit to receive him as ſuch, he ſhould procure him a place either of a Chorepiſcopus or a Prieſt, that he might aſſuredly have ſome Clerical Function, leſt in one and the ſame City, there ſhould be found two Biſhops; this againſt two Biſhops in one City was decreed with very good reaſon, to prevent the Contentions and Emulation, a Biſhops Chair, no more then a Kings Throne, brooking Rivals, although the contrary practice may be found before this time; and St. Auguſtin as he himſelf confeſſeth (c) out of ignorance acted contrary to this Cannon, being both Conſecrated before the Death of Valerius, and ſitting with him in the ſame See. The Ninth (d) Cannon decrees that if any Prieſts were promoted without examination, after this confeſſed their Sins, and after confeſſion yet had hands laid on them (by the Metropolitan and others to be made Biſhops) ſuch were not to be owned by the Eccleſiaſtical Order. The Tenth (e) near of kin to the former, doth Enact, that whether ſuch Criminals were ordained ignorantly, or with the knowledge of Biſhops contemptuouſly, they ſhould be depoſed.

(a) Diſt. 65. Quoniam mos. ubi vide gloſſam inſulſam de Etymologia Eliæ & Hieroſolymorum.

(b) 9. 7. Si qui.

(c) Ep. 110

(d) Diſt. 81. Si qui ſine examine.

(e) Diſt. 81. quicunq; ex his. vide Gloſſam.

19. The Eleventh Cannon, preſcribes Rules of Penitence to ſuch as fell through Frailty during the perſecution of Licinius, allowing the Biſhop to mitigate the Penance where he ſhould find juſt occaſion. The Twelfth Ordains that the Ancient Courſe be obſerved concerning an Excommunicate Perſon, that if any one dye, he be not defrauded of his Viaticum; but if any deſperate Perſon ſhould overlive the Communion, he was only to be admitted to Prayer; and the Biſhops were to approve and judge of thoſe dying Perſons to whom the Communion was to be Adminſtred. The Thirteenth Ordains concerning ſuch Catechumeni as fell, that they ſhould be for the ſpace of three Years amongſt ſuch only as heard the Word, and afterwards ſhould Pray with the Catechumeni who being but Novices or Probationers in Religion, were admitted to hear the Word, but excluded the Congregation at time of publick Prayers and Service. The Fourteenth Reforms a Cuſtom crept into certain Places, of Deacons giving the Sacrament to Prieſts, and receiving it before the Biſhops themſelves, forbidding the like practice for the time to come, on pain fo Depoſition; and that Deacons ſit amongſt Presbyters. In the Fifteenth, the Fathers taking notice of Commotions and Tumults, which happened by reaſon of Biſhops, Presbyters, and Deacons, Fleeting and Changing from City to City, they inhibit this practice for the time to come, and require that an Offender be remanded to that Church wherein he was Ordained; and if this Decree be not ſufficient, in their Sixteenth Cannon they enjoyn that ſuch an one be Expelled and Conſtrained to return to his Church; which if he refuſe obſtinately to do, he is to be Excommunicated.

Cauſ. 26. q. 6. De his qui.

Diſt. 93. Prevenit ad ſanct.

7. q. 1. Non oportet epiſcopum.

7. 9. 1 ſi qui vero.

20. The Holy and Oecumenical Synod in its Seventeenth Cannon (a) Decrees, that if any one ſhould dare to Ordain any Clerk in his own Church, which belong to another Biſhop, without the ſaid Biſhops aſſent, ſuch Ordination ſhould be void. The Eighteenth (b) forbids Uſury to the Clergy, upon pain of Depoſition. The Nineteenth (c) commands that ſuch as returned to the Catholick Church, from the Hereſie of the Paulianiſts and Cataphrygians, ſhould be Rebaptized; as alſo ſuch as were Clerks amongſt them ſhould be Re-ordained, but their ſhe Deacons continue lay as they were. The Twentieth (d) Cannon containeth an Appendix to the Decree, concerning the Feaſt of Eaſter, by occaſion of the Quarto Decimarians, or thoſe who were for Celebrating this Feaſt on the Fourteenth Moon according to the Jewiſh Cuſtom, and that of the Eaſtern Churches, and therefore taking no notice of the Reſurrection at that time were wont to kneel at Prayer, as at other times not Feſtival, the Synod therefore Ordains that for Uniformity ſake, on the Lords day, and in the days of Pentecoſt, all pray ſtanding; for it is to be noted that to the Reſurrection the Primitive Church had ſo chearful a regard, that not only at thoſe times here mentioned, but alſo during

(a) Diſt. 71. ſiquis auſus fuerit.

(b) Cauſ. 14. 9. 4. Quoniam multi Clerici.

(c) 1 q 1. Siquis confugerit.

(d) d. 3. quoniam ſunt.

during thoſe Fifty Holy-days betwixt Eaſter and Whitſontide, no Man did ſo much as de geniculis adorare, Worſhip God or Pray on his knees. Thoſe days, though now neglected, were then, when the memory of the Reſurection, and the benefits thereof was more freſh, carefully obſerved, and Tertullian conſidering their number, takes notice that they were more than the Superſtitious Heathen obſerved throughout the whole Year.

Act Conc. Nic.

Subſcribed firſt by Hoſius Biſhop of Corduba &c.

Ruffinus lib. 1. c. 5.

And confirmed by the Emperours Edict.

21. All things being concluded which the Nicene Council thought fit to Ordain, the Fathers came to Subſcribe both the Cannons and the Creed. Hoſius Biſhop of Corduba was the firſt that Subſcribed, not the Legates of Silveſter Biſhop of Rome viz. Victor and Vincentius, two Presbyters of that City. Seventeen yet are ſaid to have refuſed being infected, it ſeems with the Principles of Arius, which when the Emperour underſtood, as highly affected with the concluſion of the Council, he declared he would Baniſh all refuſers, whereupon Eleven of the Diſſenters were frighted into a Subſcription, of which Diſſemblers Euſebius Biſhop of Nicomedia was chief; ſo the Decrees being confirmed by Imperial Authority, the Council which had Aſſembled on the Eighteenth of the Calends of July (June the Fourteenth) was diſſolved, on or about the Eighth of the Callends of September (Auguſt 25*th*.) having began and ended in the Twentieth Year of Conſtantine, the Firſt of the 276, Olympiad, the 1078. Year of Rome: Of Chriſt 325. Anicius Fauſtus Paulinus, and P. Pubilius Ceionius Jalcanus Camænus being Conſuls.

*Socr.l.*1. *c.*5 .8.

Lib. 1. c. 4.

Socr. lib. 1. c. 8.

Soz. lib. 1. c. 22.

Lib. de Continent.

22. Beſides Hoſius who præſided at the Council, firſt Subſcribed, and is not in the Acts at all taken notice of, as the Legate of the Roman Biſhop, the moſt eminent of thoſe Nicene Fathers was Alexander Patriarch or Metropolitan (the other Name being ſcarcely yet in uſe) of Alexandria, Euſtathius of Antioch and Macarius of Jeruſalem, all of them Famous for their Chriſtian Faith, Courage and Sanctity: Amongſt thoſe Biſhops which Alexander brought along with him, none were ſo Eminent; as Potamon Biſhop of Heraclæa in Ægypt, and Paphnutius, one as good as many, who as he equalized the former in the loſs of his (Right) Eye in the Perſecution of Maximinus, ſo he went beyond him in the loſs of his left Leg, and his Condemnation to the Mines. He is reported by Ruffinus to have been alſo Famous for Miracles, and in ſuch Veneration with all good Men, that Conſtantine the Emperour, himſelf would often moſt kindly and familiarly imbrace him, and greedily kiſs that empty place which had formerly held his Martyr'd Eye; and this is not the leaſt of his Commendations that he ſtood up for the Liberty of Clergy-men, when ſome went about to have enſlaved them under the Yoke of forced Continence; although Caſſiodorus, Epiphanius, Socrates, Sozomen and Nicephorus moſt of them, if not all, Grave and approved Authors for but reporting one piece of Hiſtory in Favour of Prieſts Marriages are ſpit upon and diſcarded with diſgrace by certain Grandees of the contrary opinion. But Eſpencæus a Learned and Sober Writer defends their Authority about Paphnutius.

The Birth place of Athanaſius.

23. As Ægypt affording ſuch Biſhops, made ſome amends to the Church, for that detriment is ſuſtained through Arius a Clerk of the ſame Province; ſo in producing the moſt powerful Adverſary that Arch-Heretick ever had, and one whom Patience and Magnanimitty, as well as Faith commend as a great Pattern to all Ages; it ſeemed to overballance the inconvenience, as no Country can be blamed for the Generation of a Poyſonous and Venomous thing which carries not its Appology viz. a proper Antidote, in its own Boſom. This was Athanaſius a Perſon who though he aſſiſted at this Council, but in quality of Alexander his Deacon is yet to Act the moſt conſiderable part in this Troubleſome and Tempeſtuous Scene, and for that purpoſe muſt needs change his Quality and dreſs ſucceeding Alexander the moſt Worthy Biſhop of Alexandria, who about five Months after the concluſion of the Synod, changed this Life, and went to enjoy that Bleſſed Trinity which he had ſo Faithfully and Induſtruouſly defended. Athanaſius was born at Alexandria about the Riſing and Spreading of Arius his Tenets, being a Boy by conſent of all Writers when Alexander was Biſhop of that See; and when he was yet a Boy (but Twelve Years old, as Baronius gueſſeth) his Genius diſcovered it ſelf, even then ſtrongly bent to an Epiſcopal Demeanure, as appears by a remarkable paſſage.

Soc. lib. 1. c. 15. Sozom.l. 2. c. 16.

Ruffin. l. 1. c. 14.

24. The Church of Alexandria had a Cuſtom of keeping a Solemn Feſtival, and Thankſgiving on that day whereon Peter their Biſhop had ſuffered Martyrdom; one day amongſt the reſt (the Anniverſary that happened about that Age of Athanaſius) after they were come from Church, as Alexander expecting certain of the beſt Rank to Dine with him, by chance looked out at a Window, he eſpied certain Boys on the Sea ſhore, who as he thought were in their ſport Baptizing one another, having called ſome of thoſe that were preſent with him to behold the ſight, he ſent for the Boys, and asked them what they had been doing by the Sea-ſide, and when they being abaſhed and ſilent he urged them to ſpeak, they told him that one of them there, Athanaſius, as chief in their ſport, had Baptized ſome of them who had not formerly been Initiated, and that he had made ſome of them Prieſts, others Deacons to aſſiſt him in that Service; having examined them before, and given them inſtructions how they ought to demean themſelves for the future, and ſo they told him the whole Story: Alexander together with the Prieſts conſidering the ſubſtance of the Work, concluded the Baptized Boys were not to be Re-baptized, but adding what he thought further neceſſary to be done, he ſent for their Parents, and charging them to Educate them for the Miniſtery, he eſpecially took care of Athanaſius, requiring he ſhould be now and then brought to his preſence, that he himſelf might take notice of his Proficiency in Learning. He is ſaid to have much profited at School, being well grounded in Grammar, Skilled in Philoſophy, and Studied in the Law; but thoſe he made but ſubſervient to Divinity, in the Study, whereof having good aſſiſtance from many worthy Confeſſors, who could teach him the Practick part by their own example, as well as the Speculative by Arguments and Precepts; he gave ſuch pregnant Proof of his Induſtry, that beſides other Teſtimonies, he had the Books both of the Old and new Teſtament in Memory without book.

His proficiency in Learning.

25. Alexander finding Athanaſius his Proficiency to have ſurmounted his expectation, took him into his own Family, and made him his Amanuenſis, in which Imployment after he had continued ſome time, and made further Progreſs in his Studies, he took him into the Number of his Deacons at Alexandria, and carried him along with him to the Council of Nice, where he aſſiſted him in his Proſecution of Arius, when the Blaſphemous Doctrines he had uttered at the Council of Alexandria were produced, and ingaged againſt the Hereticks in a Solemn diſputation publiſhed amongſt his other Works: He was now grown in great eſteem for his Abilities and Integrity amongſt all thoſe of the beſt and Orthodox Party, when Alexander dyed, who having more intimate knowledge of him than any other, is thought deſigned him his Succeſſor; the good old Man lying at the point of Death, called for Athanaſius, which one of that name hearing, and coming to him, he looked on him, and turned away his Face, and continuing ſtill to call, at laſt ſaid, thou thinkeſt Athanaſius to eſcape, but it ſhall not be; which words whether he ſpoke Prophetically as ſome imagined, or as deſigning him to his Chair as others think, he ſoon after Expired. Alexander being dead, Athanaſius in a Provincial Council was choſen his Succeſſor, not Thæonas and Achillas, as Epiphanius alone tells the Story. I was, ſaith Athanaſius, choſen by the whole City and Province of Alexandria; Biſhops, Prieſts, and People aſſembled together, with Prayers to God, publick Acclamations, Exhortations, Intreaties, Perſwaſions yea Obteſtations for ſeveral Days and Nights without reſt either to themſelves or me, not ceaſing till they had prevailed with me to accept of their Choice.

He is made a Deacon.

Vide Athan. Diſput. cnt. Arian.

And upon Alexanders death Solemnly choſen his Succeſſor.

Athan. Apol. 2.

26. In the beginning of the Government of Athanaſius, was the Goſpel Preached to the Lower Indians, by Frumentius a Tyrian, who when he was yet but a Boy, being carried thither by Meropius a Chriſtian Philoſopher, after his death (for he was Slain by the Indians) was entertained and preferred by that King, together with Ædeſius his School-fellow, and for his great dexterity in managing publick buſineſs, had in a manner that whole Government put into his hands; having this opportunity he firſt procured Liberty for Chriſtian Merchants to meet together and build Churches; afterward he himſelf returning into his own Country, firſt made a Journey to Alexandria, to move that Patriarch that ſome fit Perſon might be ſent Biſhop into India: Athanaſius being lately Conſecrated, thought none ſo fit as Frumentius himſelf, who being Ordained and ſent thither, is ſaid by his Preaching and Miracles to have Converted an infinite Number of that People, and there to have Founded a Church: Thus much in more words and with more Circumſtances relateth Ruffinus * who ſaith he had the Relation from Ædeſius the Companion of the ſaid Frumentius and Socrates as much more, hath it from him, as alſo Sozomen and Theodoret; all of them moreover unite that about this ſame time were the Iberians converted to the Faith, by the religious Preaching, example, and Miraculous Acts of a certain Captive Chriſtian Woman. Ruffinus ſaith he had it from Bacarius their King who came to Conſtantinople

The Lower Indians Converted.

* L. 1 c. 9. Soc. L. 1. c. 15, Soz. lib. 2. c. 23. Theo. l. 1. c. 23.

And the Iberians.

nople to deſire of the Emperour that Prieſts might be ſent to inſtruct his Nation, of whom he not only obtained what he came for, but was dignify'd with the Office alſo of Comes Domeſticorum, and Dux or General of the Paleſtine Limit. Baronius thinks him the ſame that (a) Ammianus calls Bacarius or Balarius the Iberian, created by the Emperour Comes Domeſticorum, and leader of the Scutarii and Sagitarii: But whereas that part of Iberia which lay toward the Pontick Sea, was long before Converted by the Preaching of Clement the Roman Biſhop, driven thither by Perſecution in the days of Trajan, thoſe now Converted muſt be the Lower Iberians inhabiting thoſe places near the Mountains of Caucaſus and the Caſpian Sea. Two things there were which of old mightily contributed occaſions to the Converſion of Barbarous Nations, the one was the Wars againſt ſuch People, who were often conquered by their Captives, that ceaſed not out of their Chains and Dungeons to Preach unto them: The other thoſe tedious and exquiſite Perſecutions of Heathen Emperours, who forcing the Faithful ones to fly for ſhelter amongſt fierce and Barbarous People, God ſtopped the Mouths of thoſe Lions and Tigers who entertaining thoſe Strangers, entertained Angels or the Meſſengers of glad Tidings for a reward; and though ſome Miſcarried, and as a reward of their Sufferings, received the Crown of Martyrdom (ſuch the Primitive Chriſtians really accounted it) yet through deſignment of Almighty God, the Blood of the Martyrs ſtill became the Seed of the Church.

(a) Lib. 31. ad An. 327.

27. But the Preferment of Athanaſius vehemently diſturbed the minds of the Arians, who knowing him a Perſon moſt likely of all others to ruin their Cauſe, left no Stone unſtirred to remove him. Euſebius Biſhop of Nicomedia eſpecially, who by means of Conſtantia the Widdow of Licinius, and Siſter of Conſtantine, had through his great Induſtry and Diſſimulation, not only recovered the Emperours favour, but inſinuated himſelf much into his good eſteem; he often told him how unfit a Man Athanaſius was for ſuch a place, leſſening him all ways poſſible, and when this would not take, reſolved to tamper with the Biſhop himſelf, and try whether he might not bring him about to his own Party, or at leaſt perſwade or fright him into ſuch Actions as might weaken the Catholick Intereſt: He adviſeth him by Letter to re-admit Arius and his Partiſans into their Churches, or otherwiſe expect great inconveniencies to follow. When neither by intreaty nor threats he could move Athanaſius, whoſe anſwer was, he could not receive into Communion ſuch as had been held for Hereticks by the Council, and to this purpoſe enraged at the Repulſe, animated by his Heretical Zeal, and confident upon the account of his intereſt in Conſtantia, and power with Conſtantine, he begins to patronize Diſputes and Preaching againſt the determinations of the late Council, which that he might do with leſs cenſure of inconſtancy and Knavery, he and his party never left till by indirect practices they got into their hands the Acts of the Council from him, to whoſe Fidelity the Emperour had committed them, and having Obliterated their Subſcriptions, ſo ordered the matter, they deprived Poſterity of any view of them, although concerning the matter of their Fact there was ſufficient Teſtimony. And thus revived the Arian Schiſm, which though it ſeemed ſuppreſſed by the Council, yet revived, and ſo increaſed as almoſt to take away Schiſm or Diviſion, the whole World, as one ſaith, admiring to ſee its ſelf all turned Arian; thoſe that continued Orthodox were counted Singular, and as Elijah, formerly eſteemed themſelves as only (b) left: Such contentions and horrid diſtractions ſo unexpectedly followed this and other Councils, that to ſome ſober Perſons all (c) Chriſtianity ſeemed to be laid aſide, and although of ſuch Meetings there be very much uſe (d) in the Church of God, yet ſome very (e) Eminent Perſons were ſo much diſguſted as to conclude (at leaſt) from the abuſe, againſt the uſe and deſignment of them.

Arius the Heretick rejected by Athanaſius.

Sozom. Lib. 2. c. 20.

(b) Non ſi ego ſolus ſum idcirco minor eſt ratio fidei. Liberius Ep. Rom. ad Conſtant. Imp. Arianum.

(c) Dum alter alteri anathema eſſe Cœpit prope jam nemo Chriſti eſt. Nil erat niſi pugna in verbis, quæſtio de novitatibus, de Authoritatibus quærela, de Studiis certamen, in conſenſu difficultas. Hilarius ad Conſtantinum. cæs. (d) Concilionum in Eccleſia Dei Saluberrimam authoritatem eſſe Aug. ep. 118. (e) Nazienz. Ep. ad procopis. ait ſe φύγειν πάντα σύλλογον ἐπισκόπων, quam nullius unquam Synodi bonum & Felicem Exitum vidiſſet præterea aſſerit non tam λῆσιν κακῶν quam προσθήκην habuiſſe.

28. But Euſebius knowing the Power of the Prince of moſt weight for the ballancing of any Party, feared leſt Athanaſius, ſhould to begin with, and ſecure himſelf of the Emperours favour; he therefore with his Companions reſolved to ſtrike home and unbiſhop him if poſſible, having in vain tryed formerly to diſgrace the Man, now they queſtion his Title, and quarrel with his Election, as brought about by the Faction and Combination of a few Perſons therein concerned, they Remonſtrate to Conſtantine, that after the Death of Alexander fifty and four of the Suffragan Biſhops being aſſembled to an Election, when they had upon their Oaths given their Votes for one Perſon, nevertheleſs Seven of the Uppon which they endeavour to unbiſhop him.

the Number perfidiouſly ſeparated from the reſt, made choice of Athanaſius, and Ordained him, upon which account many of the Ægyptians, both Clergy and Churches, altogether refuſed Communion with him; and they could not but in Duty further inform their Prince that he was Pragmatical, and Turbulent, occaſioning Diſſentions and Fomenting Diviſions amongſt the People.

